

MUSIC 4040.220
v.3-4,
1853-54

Research Library

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2011 with funding from Boston Public Library

<http://www.archive.org/details/dwightsjournalof34dwig>

27-104
DWIGHT'S

JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

JOHN S. DWIGHT, EDITOR.

VOLS. III. AND IV.

BOSTON:

PRINTED BY EDWARD L. BALCH, No. 21 SCHOOL STREET.

1854.

Handwritten text, possibly a name or title, appearing faintly in the upper center.

Gen. T. B. ... 10. 1850.

7668

INDEX.

Allegri's Miserere,.....iv. 11
American Composers,.....iv. 140, 156
American Students and Debutantes in Europe, iii. 6, 62,
73, 135, 159; iv. 39, 46, 78, 93, 127, 156
Art and Industry, Honor to,.....iii. 125
Art, Influence of,.....iii. 126

Bach, J. S., Zelter's estimate of, iii. 3; Life of, 203; Compote Edition of his Works, iv. 54.
Beethoven, "His Egmont," iii. 12; His Adagio, by Ber-lioz, 103; his symphony in C minor (J. S. D.), iv. 1, 23; his Studien, 5; B. according to M. Jullien (Courier and Inquirer), 12; his Symphonies, iv. 61, 150, 181, 191, 198; B. and his three Styles (by de Lenz) iv. 121, 129, 137, 145; his Trios, 133, 133, his Concertos, 149, 139;
his Waltzes, 180; his Septet, 190.

Berlioz, Hector, Life of, iii. 1; His Compositions, 81;
his Benvenuto Cellini, 124, 127; B. in London, 132; Extracts from his "Tour," 145, 153; his Overture to
"Lear," iv. 117; droll letter of, 164.
Billings' Psalmody,.....iii. 2
Biscaccianti in Lima,.....iii. 116, 151
Black Swan, The,.....N. Y. Tribune, iii. 2
Books and Journals, briefly noticed: Putnam's Monthly,
iii. 70; Montgomery's Illustrated Magazine of Art, 79;
Meyer's Universum, and United States Illustrated,
93; Gould's Church Music in America, 182; Mason's
Musical Letters, iv. 113; N. Y. Musical Review, 113; Upham's Acoustic Architecture, 119; Passion Flowers, 124.

Booth and Kean,.....G. iv. 156
Boston Museum, Music at the,.....iii. 149
Boston, Music in,.....iii. 10, 30
(See Concerts, Operas, Intelligence, &c.)
Boston Theatre, The New,.....Atlas, iv. 179
"Bribery," Relation of the Press to Artists and their Agents,.....iii. 173, 181

Chickering Jonas, his Death and Character, iv. 76, 84, 134; "A True Story," 91.
Chime of Bells,.....iii. 10
Chimes of Lancashire,.....iii. 150
Choir Singing,.....iv. 194, 197
Choir, the, How to manage,....."Gulliver," iii. 20
Chopin, Death and Burial of,.....W. H. H. iii. 169
Church Music, iii. 3; Causes of its low condition, 34.
Classical Music, Taste for in Boston, &c., W. Keyzer, iii. 10; List of the works performed in Boston, winter of 1852-3, iii. 30.

Clementi, Life of,.....iii. 91
Coleridge, Sayings of,.....iii. 103
Cologne Union of Male Voices,.....iii. 102, 151
Composer and Public,.....iii. 166
Concert 200 years ago,.....iii. 166
Cruvelli, Sophie,.....iv. 66
Crystal Palace in New York, iii. 125; Report of the Jury on Musical Instruments, iv. 132.

CONCERTS IN BOSTON:
Germania Musical Society, iii. 5; iv. 28, 38, 45, 61, 78, 92, 103, 117, 128, 133, 142, 143, 150, 158, 165, 174, 189, 193, 199, 206.
Handel and Haydn Society, iii. 6; iv. 69, 78, 109, 143, 150, 153, 190, 199.
Aptommas's Harp Soirées,.....iv. 143, 190
Mendelssohn Quintette Club, iii. 6, 23, iv. 62, 78, 93, 110, 127, 143, 159, 175, 190
Mr. Keyzer's Soirée,.....iii. 47, 71
Organ Concert, by Mr. Wilcox, &c.,.....iii. 127
Gottschalk,.....iv. 22, 30
Ole Bull,.....iv. 22
Messrs. Eckhardt, Keyzer, Perahean, &c.,.....iv. 22, 30
Jullien's Concerts,.....iv. 23, 37, 46, 111, 117, 118
Camille Urso,.....iv. 62
Otto Dresel's Soirées,.....iv. 70, 102, 133, 182
Madame Sontag,.....iv. 78, 85, 86
Musical Education Society,.....iv. 101, 190, 199
Mendelssohn Choral Society,.....iv. 101, 103
Mlle. Gabrielle de la Motte,.....iv. 118, 143, 190, 199

CORRESPONDENCE:

New York,.....iii. 38, 76, 175, 198; iv. 13, 181
St. Louis,.....iii. 71
Louisville,.....iii. 132
London,.....iii. 78
Dublin,.....iii. 77
Paris,.....iv. 115, 116, 157, 170, 195
Italy,.....iii. 87
Germany,.....iii. 27, 54, 85; iv. 84, 125, 190

Darley's "Belshazzar,".....iii. 107
David, Felicien; his "Desert,".....iv. 106, 126;
his life, 114.

Dead March in "Samson,".....iv. 35, 45
"Diarist," Letter from, in answer to Mr. Fry, iv. 196, 203
Diogenes' Dictionary of Music,.....iv. 10
Donation Parties, Music at,.....iv. 174
Don Giovanni, analysis of,.....J. S. D. iii. 41, 46, 49
Donizetti, his Life and Works,.....iii. 161
Don Juan,.....Tr. from Hoffmann, iii. 65, 73
Dragonetti, Life of,.....iii. 114
Dramatic Music,.....Choron, iii. 204
Duggan's New Opera,.....iv. 82

Ear, Improvement of the,.....iii. 63
Effect of Music on the cultivated and uncultivated,
Tr. from Rochlitz, iii. 105
England, Music in,.....iv. 53

FROM MY DIARY:

Lack of Oratorios in New York, iii. 4.—Joseph Vernet and Pergolesi, 12—Lindpaintner; Prussian decree about music directors; the Germanians at Washington, 28—Sehnmann's music, 36—"Midsummer Night's Dream" with Mendelssohn's music; Classical Concerts in Boston, 53—
Music in the West; Beethoven's Studien; Jullien's Beethoven night, iv. 5—A story; Rub-a-dub! Mendelssohn Night at Jullien's, 20; Mendelssohn's melodies; Tann-häuser, 27—Jullien, Rossini, Berlioz, &c.; Beethoven musical relics, 45; Gongs, 60; Original edition of the "Messiah," 69—"Samson," 77—American voices, 83—Jullien's Concerts; Fry's Symphonies, 91—Philh ramonic Rehearsals; Jullien, 100—Mason's Letters; "Charles Ancheaster," 125—A Philharmonic Concert; Bryan Gallery, 131; American voices and psalmody, 156—The Fry-Willis controversy, 165—Beethoven's Waltzes, 180—Eisfeld's Soirées, 187—New York Criticism, &c. 197.

Farinelli, Life of,.....iii. 106
Fenice, an Opera Night at the,.....Balzac, iii. 135, 193, 201
Fétis, F. J., Sketch of, iii. 123; his Musical Testament, 189, 206

FINE ARTS:

Ball's Statue of Webster,.....iii. 62
Engraving of Pilgrim's Progress,.....84; iv. 21
American Artists in Italy,.....iii. 84
Page's Portrait of Miss Cushman,.....92
Sayings of Coleridge,.....108
Art in China, Land. Leader,.....116
The Athenæum Gallery,.....149
Cardinal Wiseman's Lecture,.....177, 186, 194
Exhibition of Mass. Charitable Mechanic Association,.....197
N. E. School of Design,.....iv. 6
Miss Hosmer's Progress,.....iv. 7 Fry, W. H., his "Santa Claus" Symphony, iv. 118; his controversy with R. S. Willis, iv. 133, 140, 146, 163, 165, 166, 171, 173, 182, 186, 195

Galli, Filippo, Sketch of,.....Boston Atlas, iii. 139
Germans in San Francisco,.....iii. 100
German Singing Clubs, Fourth Jubilee of,.....iii. 101
Germania Musical Society, Season of 1852-53, iii. 6;
Tour in the West, iii. 71.

Germany, A Greeting from,.....iii. 132
Gewandhaus Concerts, at Leipzig,.....iv. 190
Gleanings from German Musical Papers, iii. 20, 28, 35;
iv. 114, 130

Gluck, Anecdotes of,.....iii. 123, 123
Goldschmidt, Mme. Jenny Lind,.....iii. 23; iv. 52, 190
Gondolier's Song, The,.....Flagg's "Venice," iii. 147 Gottschalk; reply to a "Lover of Truth and Justice,"
iv. 53

Grand Opera at Paris, The,.....iv. 19
Grètry, Life of,.....iii. 146

Hafiz, Who was he?.....Cocks's Mus. Misc., iii. 59
Handel, his "Samson," iv. 69; his "Messiah" at Christmas, 92; his "Hallelujah," 97; Mozart's opinion of him, 99; his "Acis and Galatea," 185.

Harmony and Melody,.....iii. 118
Harp, The,.....N. Y. Mirror, iii. 205
Harvard Musical Association,.....iv. 54
Haydn, His Ox Minuet,.....iii. 61
Heller, Stephen, his "Preludes,".....iii. 150
Hensler, Miss Elise,.....iii. 159
Hindoo Music,.....Tomlinson, iii. 83
How much shall I practice?.....A Kielblock, iv. 131
How they Review Music in Germany,.....iv. 6
How to write an Overture,.....iv. 52
Hummel and his works,.....iv. 9

Josquin des Prés,.....iv. 4
Jullien and his Orchestra, iii. 159, 172, 175, 191, 193, 205, 207; iv. 10, 12, 13, 34, 35, 36, 44, 100; his Shakespeare night, 117.

Kelly, Michael, his Life and Works,.....iv. 3
Knorr's Works on Piano-playing,.....G. A. S., iii. 25, 34, 33, 67
Kook Concerts, The,.....Troy Budget, v. 26

Lachner, Franz, his life and works,.....iv. 4
Leipsic "Neue Zeitschrift," Open Letter from,.....iii. 132
"Light" and "Classical" Music,.....iv. 165
Lind, Jenny, and Miss Bremer,.....v. 52
Lindpaintner, Life of,.....iii. 12
Liszt, his arrangement of the Choral Symphony, iv. 41;
his description of Tannhäuser, 49, 57, 65, 73, 81.

Lock, Matthew,.....iv. 116
London Criticism, Specimen of,.....iii. 14
London "Musical World," The,.....iv. 188
Löstwitz's Pictorial Symphony,.....v. 122

Magic of Music,.....iii. 131
Manners in the Concert Room,.....iv. 45
Mara, Madame, a Sketch by Rochlitz, iii. 113, 12, 129, 137

Mario and Bosio,.....London Times, iii. 52
Marco Spada, analyzed by Scudo,.....iii. 76
Marx, A. B., Life and Works of,.....iv. 34, 75
Masaniello, at Niblo's,.....Tribune, iv. 43
Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association, iii. 197
"Massachusetts Musick" a century ago,.....iii. 155
Melody,.....London Morning Post, iii. 154
Mendelssohn, his Quartet in F minor, iii. 61; his Pre-cocity, 107; M. at Rome and at Leipsic (Berlioz), 145, 153; his "St. Paul," 170, 180, 189; iv. 17; his music as to melody, 37; his Symphony in A major, iv. 89, 92; in A minor, 139; his Biography, iv. 147, 162, 194, 202; his "Midsummer Night's Dream" music in the theatre, 150, 155.

Mendelssohn's Widow, Death of,.....iv. 34
Meyerbeer, his Huguenots, iii. 89, 97; his Robert le Diable, 165; his Prophète in New York (Tribune) iv.
67; his L'Etoile du Nord, 193, 197, 201.
Military Bands, Our,.....Sackbut, iii. 9, 18
Mocking Bird of America, The,.....Audubon, iii. 125 Money versus Music (The N. Y. Musical Review on Mr. Dresel), iv. 134, 142.

Monster Concert by young ladies,.....iii. 142; iv. 20
Mozart; his "Don Giovanni," iii. 41, 46, 49, 54, 65, 73, 83; Michael Kelly's visit to, iii. 69; his 12th Mass
(J. S. D.), 157; his Method of Composing, iv. 99; his Symphonies, 166; his "Magic Flute," 189.

Mr. Bangum's Balcony Brass Band,.....N. Y. Mns. Review,
iii. 115

Music at Home,.....iv. 21
Musical Culture, Its True End and Means,.....Dr. Marx,
iii. 164

Music for the People,.....iii. 94
Music for the Blind,.....iii. 110
Musical Parson, A,.....iii. 148
Musical Festivals, Good resulting from,.....iii. 53
Music Halls,.....iii. 35, 37; iv. 59, 123, 148, 204
Music Trade in the U. S.,.....iii. 75, 79

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE:

- Local, (Boston and New England).—iii. 14, 23, 55, 62, 71, 79, 87, 95, 103, 111, 119, 127, 143, 151, 167, 175, 183, 191, 199, 207; iv. 7, 15, 23, 31, 38, 47, 65, 70, 86, 94, 111, 119, 159, 167.
- New York.—iii. 85, 103, 127, 135, 151, 159, 172, 191, 207; iv. 15, 39, 43, 54, 63, 84, 199.
- Philadelphia.—iii. 15, 29, 71, 79; iv. 39, 199.
- Cincinnati and the West.—iii. 39, 63, 95, 109, 111.
- England.—iii. 7, 15, 31, 39, 47, 52, 55, 63, 87, 95, 119, 132, 135, 143, 147, 153, 191; iv. 86, 185, 206.
- Paris.—iii. 116, 123, 159, 167, 199; iv. 54, 86, 119, 143, 150, 188, 207.
- Belgium.—iii. 111.
- Germany.—iii. 20, 23, 35, 79, 112, 143, 167, 191; iv. 86, 102, 111, 114, 119, 130, 143, 183, 207.
- Italy.—iii. 109; iv. 39, 143.
- Russia.—iii. 7, 143; iv. 111.
- South America.—iii. 151.
- Miscellaneous.—iii. 15, 48, 55, 120, 123, 199; iv. 39, 47, 111, 151, 199.
- "Native Musician": spicy correspondence, &c., iii. 127, 150, 166.
- Nau, Dolorès, Mlle.—iv. 170.
- New York, Music in 25 years ago.—iii. 38.
- "A fortnight in,"—iii. 69.
- Normal Musical Institute in New York.—iii. 46.
- Numeral Notation.—C. Kocher, iii. 75.
- Ole Bull's Colony.—iii. 60.
- Onslow, George, Death of.—London Athenæum, iv. 34.
- Opera Houses; the new one in Boston, iii. 13; Do. in New York, iii. 13.
- Operas in Boston: Mme. Sontag's troupe, iii. 21, 29, 38, 47, 54, 61.
- Opera in the "Far West,"—iii. 22.
- Orchestra, the, and Jullien; Art. in Putnam, w., iv. 10.
- Organ, at Williams Hall, iii. 4; at Bangor, 167; A Monster Organ for the Crystal Palace, iv. 82, 122.
- Organs, Improvement in.—iii. 140.
- Organ Playing, Dresden, 1840.—Chorley, iv. 105.
- Our "Wagnerism," Letter from C. C. Perkins,—iv. 125.
- Paradise Lost, Dr. Wyld's Music to,—London Times iii. 90.
- Pergolesi, Life of.—iii. 67.
- Philharmonic Society in New York, iv. 181, 182, 191, 195.
- Phillips, Miss Adelaide, her debut in Italy.—iv. 127.
- Pianists, Romantic School of.—iv. 91.
- Piano-fortes; new invention of M. Sax, iii. 141; Chickering's new Wareroom, iv. 7; the orchestral piano, 94 in Boston, 99; the Erards and their instruments, 113.
- Porpora, Anecdote of.—iii. 45.
- Portamento di Voce, The.—iv. 98.
- Prelude, as a form of Art, The.—iii. 150.
- Present State of Music.—Dr. Marx, iii. 140.
- Pronunciation in Singing.—*O, iv. 173.
- Psalmody, discussed.—iii. 193, iv. 5.
- "Pupils of Liszt and Mendelssohn,"—iv. 61.
- POETRY:
- Frühlingsnacht, from the German,—J. S. D. iii. 1.
- The Breeze of Spring,—3.

- The Postillion, from the German,—C. T. Brooks, 36.
- Moonrise in May,—Mrs. S. H. Whitman, 52.
- With a Guitar.—Shelley, 59.
- The Sphere of Dreams,—C. P. Cranch, 68.
- The Cooper's Song,—Brooks's German Lyrics, 73.
- The Ting,—Ditto, 76.
- The Ahiling and the Fleeting,—From Goethe, 83.
- Is it Rapture—is it Woe?—Brooks's German Lyrics, 90.
- Two Lovers,—Ditto, 91.
- Sitting on the Shore.—Chambers' Journal, 107.
- The Three Light-houses,—W., 116.
- On the Beard,—117.
- Church Music, Sonnet by Shillaber,—123.
- Eleusinia,—124.
- Lisette,—131.
- Songs from the German of Heine,—J. S. D. 140.
- To a Wild Flower,—Wm. Anderson, 143.
- A Bath,—Dublin University Mag., 155.
- Childe Jullien's Farewell,—Diogenes, 156.
- Sonnets on Musical Instruments,—C. P. Cranch, 164.
- Song of Carlota von Gündersode, from the German,—J. S. D. 170.
- Autumn,—C. P. Cranch, 171.
- Two Sonnets,—Charles Tennyson, 188.
- No More!—Song,—W. W. Story, 197.
- To Music: To calm his Fever,—Herrick, 197.
- The Bride of the Adriatic, From the Italian.—W. H. H. 206.
- Canzonet, from the Italian.—W. H. H. iv. 3.
- The Bell Casting at Breslau, from the German.—W. 13.
- Song of the Golden Web.—B. H. Kinney, 21.
- My Spirit Bride, after the German,—R. S. K. 27.
- At a Solemn Music,—Milton, 27.
- Sonnets.—Mrs. J. R. Lovell, 44.
- The Heavenly Shepherd,—Ditto, 60.
- Christmas Hymn,—Alfred Dommett, 92.
- The Nightingale.—Passion Flowers, 99.
- The Joy of Poesy.—Ditto, 100.
- Pergolesi, from the German of Geibel,—108.
- Hymn of the Earth to the Sun,—108.
- The Royal Guest.—Passion Flowers, 115.
- The Troubadour, from the Italian.—W. H. H. 116.
- The Singing Leaves, a Ballad.—J. R. Lowell, 124.
- The Cemetery in ————T. 131.
- Sonnets.—Elizabeth Barrett Browning, 163.

Queen Elizabeth's Musical Skill,—iii. 131

- Rehearsal, description of a.—iii. 181.
- Rossini, his mode of life, iii. 6; His "Il Barbiere" contract, iii. 44; Anecdotes of, iii. 83; his "Moses in Egypt," 135; iv. 143, 150, 158; how he writes an overture (burlesque) iv. 52; his Biography, 153, 161, 169.
- Rubini, Sketch of,—iv. 19.
- Russia, Music in.—Old English Magazine, iii. 155.

REVIEW, MUSICAL:

- Reed & Co.'s Publications: "Pianist's Album,"—iii. 7.
- Ditson's Do.: Beethoven's Mass in C; his Symphony arranged by Hummel,—31.
- Stephen Heller's Preludes; Liszt's arrangement of the "Choral Symphony,"—118.
- Ditson's Edition of Norma,—142.
- Gems of German Song (5th Series), Reed & Co.,—148.
- Mendelssohn's "Rondo Capriccioso" and Six Duets,—149.
- Ditson's "Beauties of Rigoletto,"—149.
- "Don Giovanni," piano arrangement,—27.
- Variations by Mozart, &c.,—28.
- Richardson's "Modern School for the Piano Forte,"—93.

- Three Waltzes by Chopin (Reed & Co.),—93.
- Thalberg's L'Art du Chant, &c. (Ditson); Babcock's Funeral March; Kielblock's "Leaves," &c.,—127.
- Oliver's Practical Text Book; Mendelssohn's Two-part Songs (arranged); Dance Music (published by Richardson); Duets by Kücken (Reed & Co.),—174.

- Sackbut, Antiquity of.—iii. 69.
- Salisbury Cathedral, A pilgrimage to,—A. G. iv. 42, 50.
- Salvator Rosa, as a musician,—iv. 178.
- Schneider, Friedrich,—iv. 107, 178.
- Schubert Franz; his Symphony in C,—iv. 117.
- Schumann, Robert,—iii. 36; iv. 132, 134.
- Scotland, Ancient Music of,—iii. 139.
- Shakspeare and Mendelssohn, iv. 150, 155; Jullien's Shakspeare night, 117.
- Singers and their Prices,—iii. 47.
- Singular Opera Case in Paris,—iv. 107.
- Social significance of the growing taste for Music, J. S. D. iii. 74.
- Sontag, Mme. Henrietta,—iii. 21, 29, 38, 47, 54, 61.
- Spohr, Dr., in England,—iii. 147.
- Spontini,—Tr. from H. Berlioz, iii. 17, 25, 33, 44, 57.
- Strictures on the Stage,—By, iii. 93, 101, 109, 117, 125.
- Sultan, the, as Critic,—Bizarre, iv. 204.
- Symphonies, A new "Jupiter" among,—iv. 122.
- Symphony Soirées; a new plan,—iv. 76.

- Taglioni and Pasta,—iv. 82.
- Tartini; his "Devil's Sonata,"—iv. 4.
- Tedesco, Mme., in London,—iii. 132.
- Ten Years Ago,—iv. 14.
- Thalberg, Sketch of, iv. 203; his new work (see Review) iv. 11.
- The Age of Music,—iii. 156.
- The Fairy Wife,—Vivian, iv. 42.
- Time, A German's idea of,—Vivian, iii. 139.
- Tones, the Purest the most Effective,—iv. 25.
- Traietta, Filippo, Life of,—iv. 130.

- Variations,—Punch, iv. 147.
- Verdi, iv. 205; His Rigoletto, iii. 82.
- Violins, Improvements in,—iii. 141, 147.
- Vive la Bagatelle,—R. S. R., iv. 35.
- Voice, The,—iii. 45; iv. 148.

- Wagner, Richard; his programme to overture to Tannhäuser, iv. 17; his Tannhäuser, described by Liszt, 49, 57, 65, 73, 81; his Rienzi, 61; his theory of Opera questioned, 101, 125.

- Weber, Carl Maria von,—iii. 77.
- What does Music mean?—iii. 134.
- Whistling a Psalm tune,—Life Boat, iii. 148.
- Willis, R. S.; his replies to W. H. Fry,—iv. 146, 171.

- Yankee Doodle, Origin of,—iv. 27.

- Zelter's Musical Criticisms,—Cor. with Goethe, iii. 3.
- Zimmermann, the Composer,—Atlas, iv. 98.

DWIGHT'S Journal of Music.

A Paper of Art and Literature.

VOL. III.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 9, 1853.

NO. 1.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

TERMS....TWO DOLLARS PER ANNUM, (IN ADVANCE.)

CITY Subscribers can be served at their houses by the further payment of fifty cents per annum.

For Rates of Advertising, see last page.

POSTAGE, if paid in advance, for any distance within the State, thirteen cents a year; if not in advance, twenty-six cents. To all places beyond the State, double these rates.

J. S. DWIGHT,.....EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St.

By REDDING & CO., 8 State St.

" GEO. P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row.

" A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.

" DEXTER & BROTHERS, 43 Ann Street, N. Y.

" SCHARFENBERG & LEIS, 483 Broadway, N. Y.

" MASON & LAW, 23 Park Row, New York.

" G. ANDRE, 229 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

" MILLER & BEACHAM, 151 Baltimore St., Balt.

" COLBURN & FIELD, Cincinnati, O.

" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Persons willing to become Agents for procuring subscribers, especially Music-Dealers and Teachers, are invited to correspond with the Editor, as above. Satisfactory references required, and liberal commissions allowed.

Back numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Also bound copies of Vols I and II, at $2.75.

"FRUEHLINGSNACHT."

Song from the German of EICHENDORF.

O'er the garden, hear the voices!
Birds of passage on their flight!
Spring is coming, earth rejoices,
Grass is springing all the night.

Shouting now, and now nigh weeping,
Feel I that it cannot be!
Wonders of the Past come creeping
With the moonlight in to me.

And the moon, the stars, they tell it,
Dreamy forests lisp the sign,
Nightingales in sweet notes swell it:

"She is thine, is only thine!" J. S. D.

Hector Berlioz.

This famous composer was born at Côte St. Andre, (Isère,) in France, in 1803. The son of a physician of some local repute, he was sent to Paris, after completing his college studies, to attend the courses in law. At that time he knew little of music; the flageolet and the guitar were the only instruments of which he had any notion. Yet, though he was nearly twenty years old, and scarcely able to decipher a few notes, he was passionately fond of the art, and vainly begged his parents to permit him to devote himself to it exclusively. In such a capital the temptation was not to be resisted; so he took the matter into his own hands, quitted the study of the law, and entered the Conservatory. His father, irritated at this defiance of his authority, cut off his supplies, and M. Berlioz had no resource but to become a chorus singer in the Dramatic Gymnasium. He longed to become a composer, and by the shortest route. To learn the piano, to accustom himself to reading music and to the styles of various schools and masters, seemed too long a task for him. Besides, the music in his head bore little resemblance to all this. For him the history of his art began with himself, and with the exception of the "Vestale" of Spontini, which made an early and lasting impression on him, he knew but little of the celebrated master-pieces of music, and had but slight esteem for what he did know. Of course studies were out of the question. He resolved to have no master but his own experience. His first work proved absolutely strange and unintelligible both to hearers and performers. It was a Mass for four voices, with chorus and orchestra. But the ridicule it called forth only stimulated him to renewed ardor. An overture to "Waverly," another to a drama called Les Francs Juges, a Concert de Sylphes, a Symphonie Fantastique; an overture to Shakspeare's "Tempest," scenes from Goethe's Faust, music to some of Moore's "Melodies," &c., marked the development of his tendency. M. Fétis (from whom we glean the above) expresses the pretty general opinion of musicians about these works in the following sentences:—

"His thought, at first uncertain, at length defines itself, so that you may see that the violent passions predominate in it, that the genius of melody is foreign to it, and that the instinct of instrumental effects is the most precious gift with which Nature has endowed Berlioz. Prodigal to him on this side, she has not given him the wisdom to keep him from abusing the gift. Effects, always effects! that is what Berlioz regards in music, and what constitutes three quarters of his own music. It is but justice to admit that these effects are often happy, and would be still more so if their author economized their use. As to plan, I find not the shadow of it in what Berlioz has published up to this date, (1837). Very different in that from Beethoven, by whose example he so often justifies his own vagaries, he seems never to have comprehended the utility of a certain periodical return of ideas; and when he repeats them, it is in a uniform and monotonous manner. His melodies are devoid of metre and of rhythm; and his harmony—a strange assemblage of incongruous sounds—does not always merit the name. Moreover, charm is wanting in all this, because, entirely wedded to his thought, M. Berlioz has not the art of suspending its course by the introduction of unexpected episodes, as men of genius in all times have done, especially Beethoven."

This opinion, however, is far from unanimous. Berlioz had then, and has still more now, a large party of admirers, composed of those who are charmed by what is adventurous, and free, and new; those who gladly hail any revolution in art; there are more poets, painters, &c., than musicians among them. Berlioz competed several times before the French Institute for the prize in musical composition, and obtained the second prize in 1728, and the first in 1830. Then he wrote under the inspiration of the cannons of the revolution of July, and while the bullets struck the Palais des Arts, where he had shut himself up. The subject of the cantata which he then composed was "Sardanapalus." It was performed on the 30th of October of the same year, at a public meeting of the Academy of Fine Arts. As a pensioner of government, he made the tour to Italy; but in his state of mind, Italy, so far as music was concerned, had little for him. Without even entering Germany, but preferring to follow out his own plan, he returned soon to Paris, where, since, he has repeatedly given concerts, bringing out his own compositions with an orchestra of unusual number and variety of instruments; for therein lies his forte. M. Berlioz has also distinguished himself as a literary writer and critic upon music, in the Gazette Musicale of M. Schlesinger, and more recently in the Journal des Debats. He always pens a brilliant article, and his opinions of new works, singers, players, and composers, which he seldom withholds, are still widely copied. In 1844, he published a "Musical Tour in Germany and Italy," in two octavo volumes, which is full of pleasant musical criticism and gossip. Berlioz has recently been in high favor with Liszt at Weimar, where all that is new and original in music is most encouraged, and where his opera Benvenuto Cellini, has been produced successfully during the past year. His overture to "Lear," and his dramatic symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," have been the subjects of much discussion of late. The latter was performed, in the summer of 1852, in London, at the concerts of the New Philharmonic Society, the first season of which was signalized by the conductorship of Berlioz, who, among other things, did not fail to bring out that great work of Beethoven, from which, it seems, he would fain date his own artistic career, namely, the ninth or "Choral" Symphony.

Billings's Psalmody.

For one hundred and fifty years after the landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth, no native son of New England had attempted musical composition. This distinction was reserved for William Billings, a native of Boston, whose works were so much admired in his day, and so much neglected afterwards. He was born October 7, 1746, and died in Boston, September 26, 1800, aged fifty-four. He was the author of six distinct publications, namely: 1. "The New England Psalm Singer," 108 pages, published October 7, 1770; 2. "The Singing Master's Assistant," 102 pages, published 1778, being an abridgment of the former work; 3. "Music in Miniature," 32 pages, 12mo., published 1779—this is principally a collection, containing seventy-four tunes, thirty-one new and original, and thirty-two from his former books, and eleven old standard European tunes; 4. "The Psalm Singer's Amusement," 103 pages, published 1781; 5. "The Suffolk Harmony," 56 pages, published 1786; 5. "The Continental Harmony," 199 pages, published 1794. These, with a few separate anthems, viz., "Except the Lord build the house," &c., "Mourn, mourn, ye Saints," &c., "The Lord is risen from the dead," &c., "Jesus Christ is risen from the dead," &c., comprise all his published compositions; and, excepting the eleven European tunes above mentioned, the whole were his own. Billings was of humble origin, and by occupation a tanner. His opportunities for education of any kind were small, and his literary acquirements of course scant. He had little knowledge of counterpoint, having seen probably no work on the science or rules of harmony, except, perhaps, Tansur's Grammar, a very meagre and imperfect treatise; but his love of music and skill in the art of singing were early manifested, and even in youth he became a popular singing master, and began to compose, and commenced his first publication while quite young. The English publications by W. Tansur, A. Williams, J. Arnold, W. Knapp, and J. Stephenson, had found their way across the Atlantic about the time he came on the stage. The lovers of psalmody here, who had from their youth heard nothing but the slow, isochronous notes of the very few old church tunes introduced in their day in the country, very gladly accepted the more lively and spirited airs which these authors offered them. Billings was foremost in adopting the new style, and formed his taste and took his cue in his compositions from such tunes as the third psalm, thirty-fourth psalm, Milford, Christmas Hymn, and many other similar fuguing and lively compositions, then just becoming popular. His works were of course eagerly adopted, and all the old sacred melodies, however before approved and established, were entirely laid aside for many years. Those who succeeded and imitated him carried this style and taste to a still greater extreme. This music, therefore, so much ridiculed by some, and called, in derision, the American or Yankee style, had not its origin, as has been already suggested, on this side the water. England abounded at that time with the same flashy composition. Volumes were there published, and are still extant, in which not a single solid tune can be found, not one of any description, which has found its way into any respectable collection of music there or here. Though their harmony may be more correct, the melodies bear no comparison with those of Billings, who therefore, in this respect at least, far exceeded his models. His first publication was exceedingly deficient in all the constituent requisites of good melody, as well as good harmony, and particularly as to accent. It will not bear criticism, and it may amuse the reader to see the remarks of the author himself on his own work. In the preface to his second publication he said, "Kind reader, no doubt you remember that about ten years ago I published a book, entitled 'The New England Psalm Singer;' and truly a most masterly performance I then thought it to be. How lavish was I of encomiums on this my infant production! Said I, Thou art my Reuben, my first born, the beginning of my strength; but to my great mortification I soon discovered it was Reuben in the sequel, and Reuben all over. I have discovered that many pieces were never worth my printing or your inspection." Of course, in his second work, which at length obtained the name of "Billings's Best," and which professed to be an abridgment of the first, he omitted altogether a great proportion of the tunes, and amended very much those he retained, particularly in the point of accent. This work, as well as his fourth, called the "Psalm Singer's Amusement," became very popular, and no other music for many years was heard throughout New England. Many of the New England soldiers, who, during the revolutionary war, were encamped in the Southern States, had many of his popular tunes by heart, and frequently amused themselves by singing them in camp, to the delight of all who heard them. A gentleman in Philadelphia, distinguished for his great literary attainments, as well as for his musical taste, often spoke of the great pleasure he enjoyed from this source during that period, and said that the name of Billings had been dear to him, and associated with the happiest recollections ever since. Billings possessed something also of the spirit of poetry, as well as of music, and was the author of many of the words, as well as the tunes, he published. The following words set to "Chester" were his own:—

"Let tyrants shake their iron rod,
And Slavery clank her galling chains;
We'll fear them not; we trust in God—
New England's God forever reigns."

He was a zealous patriot also, and much attached to Governor Samuel Adams, of Massachusetts, who was also a great lover and performer of psalmody; and it is within the recollection of many now living, that that venerable statesman uniformly was seated at church in the singing choir. One secret, no doubt, of the vast popularity Billings's works obtained, was the patriotic ardor they breathed. The words above quoted are an example, and "Chester," it is said, was frequently heard from every fife in the New England ranks. The spirit of the revolution was also manifest in his "Lamentation over Boston," his "Retrospect," his "Independence," his "Columbia," as well as his "Chester," and many other pieces. Finally, whatever may be said of Billings's music, and however deficient it may now be thought to be in good taste as well as in many other respects, it certainly gave great delight in its day, and many now living, who were accustomed to hear it in their youth, are much inclined to prefer it to the more elaborate and learned music of the present time. And who can wonder that, after an age of slow, dull, monotonous singing in our churches, confined at the same time to half a dozen threadbare tunes, our congregations should have been electrified and delighted with this chanting, song-like, spirited style which Billings introduced? Besides, the manner of performance should be considered. In the old way, tunes were set and struck up by the chorister at random; without tuning fork or pitch pipe, and performed by rote, and of course often without tune or time; while the new could be performed only by those who had been instructed in schools and in the art of singing. Billings, therefore, may justly be considered in the light of a reformer, and as having given a new impulse to music generally in our country. Had he lived at the present day, with the superior advantages for obtaining musical skill and science now enjoyed, or had he lived in any other period, there is no reason to doubt he would have been as much distinguished as he was in his own; and though his name and music (as improvement in knowledge and taste in the art advanced) soon declined, and were almost entirely out of date, yet we now begin to see both his name and his melodies making their way again into respectable notice and the best collections. There is fashion even in music. The style and taste of one period have no charms at another. So we look in vain into the music of the earliest antiquity for the wonderful effects ascribed to it. So is it also with the tastes of the different nations at the same period; what prevails in one is without interest in another. The fugues and divisions, once so common and prevalent, and which abounded even to disgust and satiety in former days, particularly in our American compositions, and which served finally, no less than their violation of the rules of harmony, to cast them into the shade of neglect and derision, are now much disused and out of fashion. In this respect we have gone to the other extreme. Very few fugues or divisions are admitted, into church music at least, and sparingly into any other. Within the last twenty years much has been done to restore a better taste, and introduce a better kind of music among us. The struggle has been to banish the fuguing and frivolous airs which deluged the country, and in doing it we have returned too far, perhaps, towards the exclusive use of the old tunes with notes of equal length, and to the plain chant. This cannot last, and the want of more exciting and animating melodies in our churches begins to be manifested, and must and will be gratified. Besides, they want a more distinctive character. To the great majority of every audience all tunes seem too much alike. Modern harmony being restricted to a few simple rules, which also restrain the freedom of the melodies themselves, and the time and measure of our sacred music having settled down into a slow and solemn uniformity, it requires some practical acquaintance with music to distinguish one tune from another. A greater variety and more characteristic difference seems to be called for. Billings's melodies were certainly many of them very good, and he generally gave something of an air to the bass and intermediate parts. This led him often into errors in his harmony, such as the unnecessary omission of the third, consecutive eighths and fifths, and permitting the inner and inferior parts to transgress their proper limits. These and other rules of harmony and progression were not, however, much known or promulgated with us in his time. Correct musical grammars were then unknown in New England. But it cannot be denied that he had genius and talent, which would in any age, probably, have distinguished him, and raised him above his contemporaries; and he must be allowed the merit of exciting a musical spirit, which gave to New England an impulse that is felt even to this day.

THE "BLACK SWAN." The N. Y. Tribune makes the following sensible and humane comment upon this phenomenon.

Metropolitan Hall was well filled on Thursday evening to hear the singing of Elizabeth Greenfield, called otherwise The Black Swan. The person who does the ornithology for her musical renown should remember that, though a black swan is a rara avis (we forbear to give the quotation, believing that certain classical allusions, such as that—Scylla et Charybdis, Homo Sum, &c. &c., should enjoy an amnesty,) it does not sing. Its song when dying is the fancy of a poet when lying. But that apart. There is a certain extraordinary interest attached to Miss Elizabeth Greenfield. She belongs to a poor, peeled, defrauded, abused, despised race. A race that in Africa enslaves itself, and has infernal gods that demand human sacrifices. A race that in this country is either manacled or repulsed. To witness this humble creature seeking to be an artist—to enter the arena of a Sontag or Alboni, has its interest. For our part we could not sympathize with the rollicking gaiety of a considerable portion of the audience in seeing her led forward on the platform. Her behavior was strictly in good taste, and gentlemen should not have laughed at her. Had her auditory been the English House of Lords they would have received her with marked respect.

It is hardly necessary to say that we did not expect to find an artist on the occasion. She has a fine voice, but does not know how to use it. Her merit is purity and fullness, but not loudness of tone. Her notes are badly formed in the throat, but her intonation is excellent. She sings, in a word, like a child. The extent of her voice is great. She takes easily the lowest chalumeau note of the clarinet, and when it is taken it is worth nothing. The idea of a woman's voice is a feminine: anything below that is disgusting: it is as bad as a bride with a beard on her chin and an oath in her mouth. The low note taken in the Brindisi might have passed simply as a hint; but the infliction of a whole ballad lying in the baritone region between E and E was quite unendurable. We hear a great deal about Woman's sphere. That sphere exists in Music, and it is the soprano region of the voice.

What culture may do in the case in hand remains to be seen, but it is certainly a voice that ought to be cultivated in Europe, and ought to stay there. The bills of the Concert stated that no colored persons would be admitted, and a strong police was there in anticipation of riot, which did not happen. Under these circumstances we advise Elizabeth Greenfield to go to Europe and there remain. It may be added that she was encored in singing, and gave satisfaction to her audience, who appeared to recognise her musical position. That she has succeeded to the extent shown is evidence of intellect which merits development. She has had everything to contend against—an education neglected—a spurned thing in social life; but her ambition has thus far triumphed, and we hope to hear a good account of her studies in a country where Alexandre Dumas has learned how to read and write.

[From the Savannah Republican.]

Church Music.

Many strictures have recently made their appearance in the various presses of the country upon the style of music now adopted in sacred worship. The whole repertory of wit, sarcasm and ridicule, has been expended to give effect to these attacks, and extirpate, if possible, the new fangled heresy. These essays, interlarded with oft-reiterated fears of the Romanist tendency of the age, so plainly evinced in this musical revolution, are gems of contradictions and inconsistencies, and will, doubtless, occupy a conspicuous position among antediluvian curiosities of literature. It can surely do no harm to hear both sides before arriving at a conclusion, and I therefore am desirous of representing the reasons which induce the pleasure experienced by those who see no fault in the new system.

Music is, in its very nature, elevating to the human mind. However untutored the taste, or uncultivated the ear, music possesses a voice which speaks sweetly and soothingly to every son of Adam. It may sometimes be perverted, but it lights up no inspiring glow in the bosom clogged up and overgrown with gross indulgence and mere appetite. Like sunlight streaming through the windows of a noble temple, it glorifies and enriches all that is pure in sentiment and taste. Let the heart be saddened by the woes of life, there are chords of harmony to sweep soothingly amid desolation and speak peace to the broken spirit. Let the soul swell with thankfulness for some blessing vouchsafed or danger averted, there are choral anthems of praise to give utterance to the emotions within. In joy or sorrow, in prayer or praise, there is no medium more grateful between the heart and its God.

Until very recently America has been, as it were, destitute of music. Discarding all the little charms and graces which add so much to the amenities of life, the settlers of this country banished, as one of the relics of Popery, all which might truly be denominated music. Shunning the organ because of its apparent identity with the service of the Roman Church, they expatiated with it the immortal works of Mozart and a host of others, whose only crime consisted in having written their works for that Church. Anything—even to Yankee Doodle in long metre, which can be seen by any possessor of a certain old psalm-book published the last century—was preferable and accounted more sacred than the sublime strains of Rossini or Mozart. The more execrable it was, the more acceptable to the rigid Puritan, until it really seemed that religion and refinement were entirely incompatible the one with the other. But this morbid delusion could not last forever. The human mind is necessarily progressive, and, with the advance of other departments of art in America, music has also progressed. Now, if music be elevating in its nature, the higher the style of music the more impressive its effect upon the character. The same frame of mind induces pleasure in listening to the Te Deum as in listening to Old Hundred. Not that all can at once or to a similar extent enjoy the master pieces of art. The unskilled eye cannot appreciate all the beauties of an exquisite painting; but must I on that account confine my admiration to daubs? The untaught rustic, who has only heard the Fourth of July flourishes of the village prodigy, cannot enjoy with the same pleasure the ornate oratory of an Everett as he who luxuriates not only in the ideas expressed but in the beautiful drapery wherewith they are dressed; but must he on that account be debarred the higher enjoyment which flows from a classical oration? No! no! The whole matter lies in a nutshell. Hear the ideas which they whom I represent entertain upon the subject of church music. And these are comprised in two simple propositions.

First, and before every other consideration, a choir should sing to and from the heart, endeavoring to catch and convey the spirit of praise and prayer, involved in the words. And, this done, it is not necessary to confine themselves to any staid routine of old and worn-out themes, the products of inferior minds. There is as much error in one extreme as in another. The Puritans had their faults as well as the Romanists. Because the tunes of the former are familiar to all, it is no reason why they should be eternally sung. Because the masses of Mozart are used by the latter, it is no reason why they should be cast out of the pale of toleration.

Secondly: in their selections, the members of a choir should not be influenced against a piece merely because it is to be taken from an opera or oratorio, but their judgment should simply be upon the question, whether its style be devotional or not. There are many airs, in our church psalmodes, peculiarly unfit for the rendition of sacred words, and there are parts of operas, which seem especially adapted to express the religious emotions of the soul. Let the distinction be made in the style of the music, not in the source whence it comes. Cull the sacred flowers from every garden, and give to God what has too long been monopolized by the world.

Let the Christian choir, then, range through the whole field of classical compositions; let it study the immortal works of Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Rossini and Handel; let it be careful, in its adaptations, to preserve the identity of the ideas conveyed by both music and words; and the people, however unused to such compositions, will experience vastly more pleasure, in proportion as their taste is developed and improved. But let it avoid "St. Bardolph's" as it would destruction. The greatest injury that the Puritans have done to devotional music, is that while striving to destroy real music, they have fostered and encouraged mines of spurious imitations. Hence sprung the ridiculous anthem on "Aaron's Beard," so justly ridiculed; for which all high aspirations must be made to suffer in the minds of those who jump so hastily to conclusions, and who judge of the compositions of Bellini, which they have never heard, by the sickly trash which they have heard. A penitential psalm to the overture from Der Freyschütz is simply ridiculous, and to an imitation thereof absolutely nauseous; but if the soprano aria, from the same opera, adapted to a plaintive hymn, touch not the religious sensibilities of all who hear it, softening, subduing, elevating the soul, I am very much mistaken.

God never placed within us these aspirations toward the beautiful to be shrouded and shunned with the introduction of Christianity. Christianity was never intended to make anchorites of mankind. Give religion attractions to the human mind. Let not the world and the devil conceal their temptations beneath the innocent yet fascinating garb which Christianity should wear. Too long has religion presented a frowning, rugged, unhappy front to the world. Too long have the high and holy feelings, swelling within a breast burning to proffer its best to God, been pent up by the cold and cruel criticisms of professors. Give the soul its liberty, and you will find that "to the pure and good heart, no sublime apperelling, no costly and precious furniture, no incense or ornament, can make the lovely loathsome, the fair foul."

THE BREEZE OF SPRING.

Dull winter hastens to be gone,
He's disappearing fast;
The sunny hours are coming on,
The stormy time is past.
The ice no longer binds the rill,
Nor snows their mantle fling;
For every bleak and barren hill
Has kissed the breeze of Spring.

I hear its music in the wood;
It sighs along the vale,
Where summer flowers in beauty stood,
It lingers in the dale;
It plays upon the primrose banks,
And rests its merry wing;
The drooping snow-drop kindly thanks
The western breeze of Spring.

Ah! well it knows where violets grow
In the lone and shady lane;
It bids its sweet, blue favorites blow,
And onward speeds again.
It wakes the flowers of the field,
And they their offerings bring;
The flowers their sweetest incense yield,
To scent the breeze of Spring.

The blackbird, from the hawthorne bush,
Renews his lively strain;
On topmost branches stands the thrush,
And tunes his throat again;
At close of evening calm and mild,
He makes the forest ring
With native woodnotes, clear and wild—
He loves the breeze of Spring.

The robin leaves his winter friends
For hedge-rows far away—
Above his mossy nest he bends,
And pipes his plaintive lay.
The lark uprising with the light,
On merry mountain wing—
Strains all his might till out of sight,
And hails the breeze of Spring.

A hundred voices fill the air.
The sun shines warmly down;
Away with each intruding care,
And leave the gloomy town.
Come, roam along the woodpath green,
Hear nature's favorites sing,
Enjoy the soul-enlivening scene,
And woo the breeze of Spring.

Zelter's Musical Criticisms.

Translated from the "Correspondence of Zelter and Goethe," by W. J. THOMS.*

NO. 2. SEBASTIAN BACH.

The elder Bach, (says Zelter, in a letter of the 8th of April, 1827) is, with all his originality, a son of his country and of his own times, and yet he could not escape from the influence of the

* London Musical World, 1836.

French—that is to say, of Couperin.* The endeavor to make oneself as agreeable as others, gives rise to that which does not last. All that is foreign to him, however, we can take away like a thick scum, and the bright liquid lies immediately below it. Thus I have for myself alone, set to rights many of his sacred compositions; and my heart told me, that old Bach nodded to me, like the good Haydn, "Aye, aye, that is just as I had wished it."

But then some come and say, no one ought to lay his hands upon anything in that way; and they are not quite wrong in saying so, for it is not every one that may venture to do so. However, that is to me a means of arriving at a knowledge and admiration of that which is true; and if I let them have their opinion, what is mine to them.

The greatest impediment, in our time, consists clearly in the totally distorted German Church-texts, which succumb to the polemical earnestness of the Reformation, while they stir up the unbelieving by a dense faith-vapor which no one desires. That a genius in whom taste is innate, should allow a spirit which must be deeply rooted to spring up from such a soil, is now the most extraordinary thing about him. The most wondrous is, however, when he has had haste, yet not pleasure. I possess manuscripts of his, which he has begun three times, and then scratched them out again; he would indeed rather not have proceeded, but the next Sunday a marriage, a funeral procession, was before his door. Even the commonest memorandum paper (concept-papier) appears oftentimes to have been scarce; but it must be accomplished,—so he sets forth on his march, and lo! at the end there is the great artist as he lived and loved. When he had finished it, he retouched it, and that too with his close writing, so darkly, indistinctly, and learnedly since he was accustomed to use peculiar signs which every body does not understand, that I am obliged to be cautious about falling upon his manuscripts, since it is not easy for me to come from them again.

[Goethe having expressed his surprise at Zelter's opinion, that the thoroughly original Bach was affected by foreign influence, Zelter enters at greater length on the subject, in a letter dated the 9th of June, in the same year.]

What I called the French scum in Sebastian Bach, is certainly not easily lifted off in order to be laid hold of.

It is like the atmosphere, present everywhere, but no where perceptible. Bach passes for the greatest master of harmony, and that justly. That he is a poet of the highest order, one can scarcely venture to pronounce, and yet he belongs to those who, like your Shakespeare, are lifted up high above all childish things. As a servant of the Church, he has written for the Church only, and yet nothing of what we call Church-like. His style is Bach-ish, like everything that is his. That he was obliged to employ the common signs and terms Toccata, Sonata, Concerto, &c., has just as much to do with it, as a man's being named Joseph or Christopher. Bach's primal element was solitude, as you once recognized, when you said, "I lay in bed, and let the Burgomaster's organist of Berka, play me Sebastianiana." Such is he, he will be watched narrowly.

Now was he yet also a man, Father, Gossip, yea even Cantor in Leipsic, and as such, nothing more than another, yet not much less than a Couperin, who had served two kings of France upwards of forty years. Couperin, in the year 1713, printed the first Fundamental Instructions for the Harpsichord, not for striking it,—but for playing (toucher), which he dedicated to his king.

A king play the harpsichord, probably the organ, the pedals! who would not do so after that. The new method of Couperin, consisted principally in the introduction of the thumb, by which a rapid certain execution was alone practicable:† Bach and the rest of the Germans had long practised this method, for it is understood of itself; the work of the right hand and of the left being however still defined, whereby the latter is obviously spared. The Bachish method lays claim to the use of the ten fingers, which are bound to learn the service which their various lengths and powers fit them for; and this method we have to thank for the incredible things which our modern touchers attempt.

And since now all men must be French if they would wish to live, Bach allowed his sons to practise the fine little elegancies of Couperin, with all the curling of the head-notes: nay he himself even appeared as a composer in this style with the greatest success; and thus did the French frippery gain upon him.

Bach's compositions are partly vocal, partly instrumental, or both together. In the vocal pieces there often bursts forth something very different from what the words say, and he has been greatly blamed for this; moreover he is not strict in the observance of the rules of Melody and Harmony, which he with great boldness set aside. When however he works up biblical texts, such as, "Brich dem Hungrigen dein Brodt," &c.—"Ihr werdet weinen und heulen," &c.—"Jesus nahm zu sich die Zwölfe," &c.—"Unser Mund sey voll lachens," &c.—I am oftentimes compelled to wonder with what holy freedom from confusion, with what apostolic irony a something quite unexpected breaks forth and which nevertheless arises no doubt against all the rules of sense and taste. A passus et sepultus lead us to the last pulsations of tranquil might: a resurrexit or in gloria Dei patris to the realms of holy sorrow for the hollowness of earthly pursuits. This feeling is however as it were inseparable, and it may be difficult to carry away from it a Melody or even anything material. Now he begins afresh, now he strengthens himself, ever increasing his power at each repetition of the whole.*

Through all this, he is thus far still dependent upon his theme. We should however follow him upon the organ. This is the soul into which he directly breathes the breath of life. His theme is the feeling born on the instant, which like a spark from a flint springs up at once from his first casual pressure with his foot upon the pedal. Thus he proceeds on by degrees until he isolates himself, finds himself alone, and pours forth an inexhaustible stream into the boundless ocean.

Friedeman (of Halle) who died here, said when speaking of this, "Compared with him, we all remain children."

Not a few of his great Organ pieces are heard through, but not out, for there is no end in them.

But I will leave off, though I could yet say much more concerning him. When everything is considered which can be testified against him, this Leipsic Cantor must be looked upon as a revelation of God; clear but inexplicable. I could address him:

Thou hast shaped out work for me:
I to light again brought thee.

The New Organ at Williams Hall.

[This noble work deserves a tribute, and we cheerfully give place to the following, although without committing ourselves to our correspondent's unqualified preference of one maker over all the others; which is a matter upon which we feel ourselves by no means competent to decide. Free competition and a fair hearing for them all!—for there is plenty and variety of organ-building talent among us. We shall soon be called upon also to appreciate a similar effort from another manufacturer in the new Tremont Temple; and most sincerely we do hope that it will not be very long before there will also be one worthy of such a place, in the Boston Music Hall, which in all other respects has become so consecrated by our highest musical enjoyments.—Ed.]

The trial examination of this instrument took place on Wednesday evening the 30th ult. The examining committee, appointed by the Corporation, consisted of Messrs. Thomas Power, Geo. K. Crockett, well known critics, and S. A. Bancroft, the distinguished organist of the Mount Vernon Church.

* The Leipsic and Zurich editions of Bach's works, are said in the title to be "In the strict style," which they are however, because they are Bachish: i. e. in so far as they belong to him alone.—Zelter.

In behalf of the builders, Mr. Wm. R. Babcock displayed the instrument to great advantage, and closed by performing in a masterly manner a Fugue by Bach. It is worthy of remark that these gentlemen did not desecrate the instrument by a style of performance too generally in use by "flash" performers on such occasions, evidently to attract the admiration of a vulgar, although, perhaps, a too popular taste, or to conceal defects which would be apparent in an instrument, by a performance appropriate to it. In the exterior there is not much to admire, and we very much question the correctness of the taste, which excludes from sight in a concert Hall that which, in our opinion, should be a prominent feature. The Organ is the largest yet built in this city, as will appear from the following:

It has three rows of manuals, each from C₂ to G₂. One pedal board from C₁ to D₂, 27 notes. The whole number of stops is 52, and of pipes, about 2200, disposed as follows: Great Organ, 15 stops; Choir, 10 stops; Swell, 14 stops; Pedals, 4 stops, and of couplers, &c., there are 9. When the number, character and quality of the stops are considered, we doubt if an equal can be produced this side of the Atlantic, or a superior, of its size, abroad.

There may be those possessing parts equally good, but in this, as is the case with most organs from the same manufacturers, an unusual number of excellencies are combined.

Unfortunately it is rare that we find an organ possessing good diapasons, solo stops, and reeds. It is too often the case that when a builder excels in one department, he is quite sure to be deficient in another. Why this is so, we cannot say. But so it is. In this organ, the only alteration we should propose, would be that the clarion of the great organ be more powerful. However, no organ we have yet examined, combines, as this does, such grand and ringing diapasons, with reeds so truly magnificent, and flute of such clear, liquid and silvery tones, with other stops truly ornamental, and of such exquisitely delicate finish.

The diapasons, thus surrounded, are indeed like "Grand jewels, set in emerald rings."

When the whole is combined, to analyze its parts seems impossible, so perfectly does it chime. With many effects produced we were astonished, especially as brought forth by Mr. Bancroft in his ingenious and elegant performance of the selections from Beethoven's 5th and 7th Symphonies. Such effects from an organ were entirely new to us. The Trumpets, Clarinet, and Oboe, are in character true to their originals.

Some of the new stops introduced, are the Harmonic, Possaune, and Tenoroon Trumpet—all stops of intrinsic value, as have been the many heretofore introduced by the builders of this noble specimen of skill.

We would say in closing that we congratulate the builders on so successful a result of their labors, and the citizens of Boston that they have the privilege of hearing such a noble specimen of American skill and ingenuity.

B.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

From my Diary. No. XXII.

NEW YORK, March 23. The Express asks to-day,

"Why should it be thought a thing impossible, Mr. Diarist, for us to have Rouberg's 'Song of the Bell' here? Where's the Philharmonic?"

I hardly know whether this querist—who, by the way, prepares a better abstract of the current musical news than appears in any other of our city papers—be not

* Francis Couperin, Organist and Chamber Musician to Louis XIV. and XV., died in 1733. Some specimens of his compositions may be found in Sir John Hawkins' History of Music.—Translator.

† If I mistake not, in Carlo Dolce's Saint Cecilia, the thumbs are idle, if not hanging down.—Zelter.

quizzing the Diarist, asking so sober a question in relation to Romberg's pretty, though hacknied cantata, which has been going the rounds of our New England musical societies for several years past. From its brevity, and the simplicity of the music, save in one or two numbers, it is admirably fitted to form a part of a miscellaneous concert, but hardly for anything beyond this. But why can we not have it, then, here? Safe enough; why not Mendelssohn's "Elijah," and "Paul"; Handel's "Israel in Egypt," "Samson," "Messiah," "Judas Maccabæus," and "Saul"; Spohr's "Last Judgment," Beethoven's "Christ on the Mount of Olives," Mozart's "Requiem"? Why should the noble old Handel and Haydn Society flourish year after year, and that too with rivals continually coming into existence, and some of them attaining a permanent basis, in the provincial town of Boston (!). Why should Portland support a Sacred Music Society? Why various other cities and towns, with populations varying from six to a hundred thousand, all keep alive organizations for the study and practice of oratorio music, and yet New York and environs—with three-fourths of a million of people, not be able to record the performance of one single great sacred piece during the whole winter? Perhaps this is a little too sweeping. We have had Stabat Mater sung once on speculation, and I think Mr. Curtis's Eleutheria is of the oratorio order, but this I have not heard, and it too was only sung at a charity concert. (Do I err?) It is humbug and nonsense to talk about the musical taste of the public, to make immense flourish about the high condition of Art, to laugh at our neighbors and charge them with affectation in musical matters—and at the same time have nothing to show in the way of music but a few light operas entirely in the hands of foreigners, and two series of classical concerts, all given at prices which are entirely beyond the reach of ninety and nine of every hundred of your vast population. It is nonsense to talk about the high musical cultivation of a people who have let their Philharmonic Society struggle along in a precarious existence, and now after eleven years give it no encouragement to engage a larger place for its performances than the dancing hall at Niblo's!

Why is it impossible to have an Oratorio Society here? Because the people have too much taste [for the 'Daughter of the Regiment,' and 'Don Pasquale,' and 'The Barber of Seville,'] to pay the expenses—or because the Societies which have been formed have been unwilling to trust to a love for music in common audiences, and have tried to make the thing fashionable with most fashionable prices. If this is not right, please correct it.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 9, 1853.

The Farewell Concert of the Germanians.

A very large, though not a crowded audience, assembled on Saturday evening to a second hearing of Beethoven's "Choral Symphony," and to the last hearing (for the present) of those admirable interpreters of this as of every other kind of orchestral music. More than a very large audience could hardly have followed within a few hours of that last Afternoon Rehearsal, when the corridors were almost as full as the Music Hall itself, and not far from 4000 persons must have been within the building. But the evening assembly was one of the most earnest, attentive and appreciating ever seen in Boston. The merely curious class, who had condemned a great work as dull or crazy, on the testimony of their own first hearing, were evidently thinned out somewhat, leaving an audience of perhaps 22 or 2300, whose sincere enjoyment outweighed that of the 3000 who sat through the Symphony the first time.

A miscellaneous first part consisted of Gluck's noble overture to Iphigenia; a Fantasia of Thalberg's by JAEEL, and a Fantasia for violin, by CAMILLA URSO (neither of them the same as set down in the programme, for which, we dare say, nobody cared, so long as the performers were not changed); and that strong, all-confident, believing chorus from "Judas Maccabæus": We never will bow down, well sung by the "Handel and Haydn Society,"—so many of them as were there, for the choir seats looked poorly filled compared with recent oratorio nights:—a bad omen that for the "Joy" Symphony, unless the missing singers should come later.

They did not come! Nevertheless the Ninth Symphony did on the whole go off better than before; and we believe the great majority of the audience comprehended and enjoyed it at least twice as well, and found it twice as great as they did on the previous hearing. So it is and must be always with a great work, which sums up the whole experience and embodies the highest aspirations of a great man of genius. The only wonder is that the Ninth Symphony has found such ready and such earnest audience, and wrought so deeply on the souls of so many, in spite of the warnings of the sceptical. To these it was the musical event of our eventful season, and like Niagara, when we have left it, it will still come back in our thoughts with more and more of majesty and meaning. The orchestral portions were played perhaps even more perfectly than the first time, though the violins were not quite as numerous as then. Of course the largest orchestra would be the best for such a work; but not unless its members were as much one mind and soul as these were.

The two middle movements, Scherzo and Adagio, were doubtless the most widely appreciated, as it is in the nature of those movements to be always. The Scherzo, though very long and for the most part very uniform in its motion, is yet the liveliest possible expression of pure, outward gaiety and careless, reckless, social exhilaration. Not the joy that satisfies, but that in which the deeply unsatisfied soul seeks oblivion of its torturing aspiration in the most desperate abandonment to the philosophy which makes the live-long day and life itself a feast. The ceaseless repetition of the melodic figure, in rapid triple time, delicately staccato, like the leaping of the fresh blood in the veins of youth and pleasure, never seems the repetition of mere feeble routine; it is the inspiring rhythm of nature, in which you feel always something rich and new, and with such delicious blending of the instrumental colors and varied distribution of the harmonies, that you never exhaust its charm. The impetuous refrain reminds you of the peasants' dance in the Pastorale, and what could be more happy, and more positively jolly, yet with the infallible gracefulness of finest humor, than the introduction of the common time rhythm, where the bassoon plays such a pleasant running accompaniment to the simple tune of the oboe humming as it were so merrily to itself;—both figures being passed round at once in imitative duet through all the members of the orchestra.

But more than any part, the divine melody and harmony of that Adagio seemed to sink into the souls of the audience, as the sound of the Easter Bells sank into the soul of Faust when he was on the verge of self-destruction, and their sudden music brought all the sweet, childlike piety of life back again, and "the kiss of heaven descended upon his brow,"—to borrow Wagner's clever parallel. The soothing, heavenly comfort of those strains is indescribable. Is it not the most beautiful of all Adagios? The strong, martial chords, which ring out unanimous before its close, so full of cheerful and inspired determination, indicate the heroic, manly, hopeful mood that naturally follows upon communion of so sweet and pure a kind. It is the trumpet warning of that grand resolution of life's discords that is to follow in the last movement, of which the theme is universal Joy, raised to the religious ecstasy of a general embrace and love feast of the myriads of mankind,—the merging of self in the largest sympathies, and therein finding God!

The first movement (allegro ma non troppo) is less calculated to interest the many; yet a little familiarity with its themes and the light shed back upon it by the progress of the whole work, once heard through, and the summing up in the fragmentary introduction to the "Joy" chorus, gave it a stronger hold upon the audience this time. The important key to it which lies in the very first bars, (that rustling of naked fifths, conveying such a sense of emptiness and unrest), is apt to escape ears not eagerly upon the watch, since it commences pianissimo in a very rapid movement. It is well to have possessed oneself of the theme beforehand, and to have analyzed what seems in the performance a mere rustling tremolo, into its constituent notes. Upon this background of empty and uneasy fifths is soon pronounced with startling emphasis the principal theme, the unison in D minor, which is like the gigantic shadow of Fate interposing itself between the soul and its harmonious destiny. The alternation of this theme with little pathetic, pleading wind-instrument passages, flowing in melodious thirds and sixths, so characteristic of Beethoven, together with an occasional re-exposure of that dark background of barren fifths,—furnishes the substantial ideas out of which this whole Allegro is wrought up. It indicates that same deep, restless, earnest nature, and the same spiritual state somewhat, from which emanated the Allegro to the symphony in C minor:—for there is a singular unity of thought and feeling in the entire development of Beethoven's genius. Those who did not comprehend this Allegro clearly, nevertheless felt its gloomy grandeur and its amazing strength.

The Finale was more clearly rendered this time than it was before; and many, to whom it was then all strangeness and confusion, now recognized some distinct and intelligible outlines of a connected meaning and felt that it was unspeakably sublime. We could have wished a larger orchestra, (say such an one as that of the New Philharmonic in London), to give all the imposing effect of those recitatives of the double basses, which seem suddenly endowed with the gift of human speech in their earnest craving for a fuller utterance of the thought, or rather the desire, with which the whole symphony is teeming, and which reject impatiently the themes of the Allegro, the Scherzo and the Adagio, as they are successively recalled. No, no, that will not do! The sweet Adagio, to be sure, elicits a less petulant response; but the double-basses must pursue their foretaste of human speech still farther and dictate the melody, the simple, beautiful, all-reconciling tune that seems as if predestined in the fitness of all things to an everlasting marriage with the words of Schiller's "Hymn to Joy." Those double-bass recitatives seem to mark the transition from mere instrumental into human music; and in the whole of this exciting, fragmentary introduction, putting you on the qui vive of expectation, the orchestra seems laboring with the presentiment of a marvelous transformation and new birth; it reminds one of the passage: "The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now," &c.

Of course, after this successful clan in which the orchestra rises above itself enough to seize the actual form and outline of the human utterance to which all is tending, there is a momentary reaction, or rather relapse into the stormy and chaotic mood again, (the diminished sevenths,) with which the movement opened. But now an actual human voice is heard: "Friends, no more of these mournful sounds, let us sing," &c., and the rich, ponderous bass recites, almost without accompaniment, the tune, (which seems so simple but which proves so pregnant, and clings to the memory with such charm afterwards) to the first verse of Schiller's words. Then the chorus breaks in; and solo voices, singly or in quartet, vary the tune to the succeeding verses, and carry it up higher and higher, as is the natural tendency of such enthusiasm. The change of the 4-4 rhythm to the 6-8 march time, where the full chorus suddenly modulates and ceases, the several measures of the pause being strangely marked by a single bass trombone note, with which a higher note at length chimes in, and then all the wind instruments blend in so deliciously and buoyantly, as a prelude to the verse which tells of heroic youths rushing joyfully to victory,—is one of the most marvellous effects in music. The energetic, closely involved, arm to arm and face to face sort of symphony which follows, indicates perhaps the conflict, the heroic struggle of and for Humanity. And now the strain of Joy breaks out more overwhelmingly and in the consciousness of universal sympathies, ("Embrace, ye millions! 'tis the world's inspiring kiss"), the chorus rises to a pitch of religious sublimity and the thought of Deity, of the "dear Father, that dwelleth above the stars," absorbs all.—To follow this through exceeds our power. But we have here reached the point at which the whole meaning and connection of the symphony become clear. It is only from this acme of the whole, this top-wave of the composer's joy-inspired enthusiasm, that we can look back over the preceding movements, and feel how they were all tending in their order toward one goal.

And here we have the secret of the success or non-success of the vocal part of the performance. The voice-parts climb high, and ordinary singers are dismayed at the task of sustaining themselves so long at such heights. Evidently the one indispensable condition of fairly singing such music, is ENTHUSIASM! Such excitement as in the orchestra made the double-basses speak, must here in the chorus carry the singers up above themselves, and make them achieve what in our common-place moods is impossible. How can you interpret enthusiasm, unless you feel it? The singers must realize in their own souls the sentiment of the choros, which is Joy and Unity with all Mankind, all souls. They must be inspired with the idea of the symphony, and animated by a common fervor. Such impossibilities are only achieved in that state of exaltation pervading a united mass, which makes a troop of soldiers move as one man in the carrying of a fort by storm; on the cool morrow each looks back and wonders what he did in the excitement of yesterday; he could not do the same thing over again now, but then he was greater than himself. It is unfortunate, in the performance of such a symphony that the chorus could not have been made perfectly familiar with the entire work (instrumental parts and all) beforehand, till they were possessed and inspired with the idea of the whole. But this was hardly possible in such a busy state of society as our's. Enthusiasm cannot be forced, nor always "got up" on purpose; therefore we can excuse the absence of at least a third part of the Handel and Haydn Society on that occasion, simply regretting that the absent ones had not more spirit. Nevertheless the chorus-singing was more effectual and more clear than before, and really did credit to those who so bravely stood in the breach. The solo singers, too, deserve thanks for so well studying and rendering their arduous parts. On the whole it was a proud achievement for Boston, to have brought out and appreciated so much of the life and power of Beethoven's Choral Symphony.

And thus ended the most successful season of musical performances ever given here or in this country. The Germanians, by this success, have come to regard Boston as their head-quarters and their home. They have recently been naturalized as American citizens; and a better class of citizens our New World could hardly adopt from the Old. As men, as well as artists, in their long visits here they have won the esteem of the community, by modest self-respect, correct deportment and gentlemanly manners. They number among them some highly cultivated and intelligent men, and all of them appear to be united by a sentiment of genuine fraternity and enthusiasm for Art. Music is a religion with such men. No wonder they succeed. Their success is a moral triumph; it has been due to the cordial unanimity, the spirit of devotion, the merging of the individual in the common interest, the superiority to petty jealousies, of which their little united band has been so refreshing an example, almost if not quite as much as to their skill as musicians.

By the last programme it appeared that the Germanians had given 622 concerts in the United States and Canada. This season (so the Bee states) they have given in Boston and vicinity, 40 concerts and 25 public rehearsals, and taken part in 19 concerts given by other artists. Their concert audiences in this city have averaged from 2400 to 3000 persons, and their rehearsal audiences from 2300 to 3200. In 27 concerts in the neighboring cities, the audiences have averaged from 900 to 1500 persons. Add to these the concerts in which they have assisted (Sontag's, the oratorios, &c.), and the aggregate number of those who have enjoyed their music is immense.

As to their programmes, they have mingled various styles, popular and solid, in judicious proportions. During the season they have given 31 interpretations of symphonies, including all of Beethoven's except the 7th (which the Fund Society gave us, so that the list is full), three of Mozart's, and others by Mendelssohn, Spohr, Schubert, Gade and Ries. There is not room to tell how many overtures, and lighter matters, besides the brilliant contributions of JAELL and CAMILLA URSO, have diversified the feasts.

The Germanians have left us for Philadelphia, Baltimore, Cincinnati, St. Louis, &c. In July they take up their summer quarters at Newport, and will return to this their adopted home in October, with increased strength. Mr. BANDT, their gentlemanly and efficient agent, who comes in also for not a small share of the credit of their success and of their hearers' comfort, intends to go to Germany this summer to engage new talent. The little Urso, and our matchless JAELL, still continue with them, and we hope will return here with them, though the latter has an eye towards Europe. May these friendly artists sow many seeds of the Beautiful, and wake many undying vibrations of true musical feeling where they go, and return to find the public interest in the best kind of music not a whit abated in the old city of the Puritans!

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.—This ancient body too, made a triumphant finale of its season on Sunday evening. The "Creation" was never so well done here, to our recollection, and the audience was immense. But we have left ourselves no room for particulars now. That "Choral Symphony" is a dangerous topic to begin upon!

THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB have commenced a series of six Public Rehearsals, on Wednesday and Saturday afternoons. This is a timely move. We need something to fill the vacuum now that the musical season has come so squarely to a close, and it is fortunate that we have something so choice as this left to keep the refined appetite from starving. It will be very pleasant of a Spring afternoon to sit in the Masonic Temple and listen to the Quintets and Quartets of Beethoven and Haydn and Mozart.

We have no time this week to gather up and sift the thousand and one rumors of operas, orchestras, singers and virtuosos coming over to this country; of opera houses building, and seasons of rare novelties in embryo. But we shall take a calm survey of the prospect anon, when we are through the hurry of commencing a new year of our Journal.

OUR STUDENTS OF MUSIC IN FLORENCE.—ROSSINI. The Atlas has a pleasant letter from a "Viaggiatore" in Florence, from which we cannot forbear copying the following:

American students of music, I suspect, outnumber those of any other foreign country at present in Florence. Have the vast sums of money, recently amassed in America by Jenny Lind, Catherine Hayes, and others, sent our calculating people abroad into this new field of enterprise? or is it really love for the divine art? The sudden irruption of so many Americans into Italy, for the purpose of studying music, calls for some explanation. Three years ago, I could only hear of two or three American students of music in all Europe; and within the last six months there have been no less than nine American gentlemen and ladies in this city, all ardent devotees of St. Cecilia, and all destined for the public as vocalists. Mrs. EASTCOTT, (formerly of Springfield, Mass.) made her debut some months ago, at one of the theatres here, in the well-known letter-scene of Il Barbiere. I witnessed it, and can testify that her success was very decided; none applauded so much as the Italians themselves, though she was a little hoarse at the time. She repeated her efforts several successive nights, with increasing success, and is now singing as a prima donna at one of the theatres in Naples.

SUMNER and MILLARD, the young Bostonians, are hard at work. The latter is developing his fine tenor rapidly. I heard him the other evening in a cavatina from one of the operas, at an "Academia." His execution of the difficult passages elicited great applause. He has published several original musical compositions since he came here, that quite surprise these music-loving people, who wonder how any such good can come out of Nazareth. Sumner's splendid baritone is getting to be something "rich and strange." Foreigners and natives listen to it with wonder and delight. He labors day and night, under the best of teachers, to overcome the difficulties of the language, and reach the last point of perfection in musical expression and execution. With his fine person and manners, and his uncommon vocal organ, I do not see why he may not compete with Badiali, Ronconi, and the most noted baritones of the stage. I presume that he is aiming at nothing less than that, as he has already mastered the music of some half a dozen of the favorite operas of the day.

How could you be so cruel as to consign such a splendid old fellow as Rossini, not long since in the Atlas, to a residence in Trieste, and the amusement of selling his own fish in the market? The hale old gentleman may be seen every day promenading through the Via Larga, looking at all the pretty faces and pretty ancles that flit by, and now and then following a fine form at a respectful distance. They say his love for the beauty of flesh and blood, when budding into form in the person of a charming girl, quite surpasses all his passion for the charms of harmony and melody. I showed him the passage in the newspaper which sent him to the fish market of Trieste. The great composer read it with great composure, and then burst into a hearty laugh. "Ah," said he, "those knavish wags! They bring me their silly compositions to correct, and just because I will not bore myself with their stuff, they play off these sort of jokes upon me!"

He seldom goes to the opera,—never will hear his own music if he can help it—never will correct or pass his judgment upon the works of others, though often solicited to do so; and, in short, for a great man, lives a life more like an oyster, than any other great man, passing into his dotage, readily to be found.

Musical Review.

Messrs. G. P. Reed & Co., 17 Tremont Row, are almost daily sending forth numbers of several excellent series of piano-forte compositions. Some of these we have before noticed; namely, the earlier numbers of the Variations by Beethoven, and of the transcriptions of Mendelssohn's and Schubert's songs by Mr. Suck and Stephen Heller. We have yet to tell how far these have progressed.

Another series takes the name of "The Pianist's Album," and is to contain some of these finer modern classics of the instrument, which have become endeared by the real poetry there is in them, rather than by their adaptation to the display of brilliant feats of execution. No. 1, however, already out, is one of the most brilliant things in existence, and difficult enough to play so as to bring out all its beauty and its meaning. It is Weber's Invitation a la Valse, long known and loved by not a few among our pianists, and recently familiarized to the many by the orchestral arrangement of Berlioz. It breathes the very soul and sentiment and passion of the waltz, being not merely a waltz itself, but the scene and story of the waltz, in its most sympathetic and inspired hour, with all the dreamy, half ecstatic, half sad, love-sick sense of the swiftly flying moments, in the waltzers. Yet it has all of Weber's purity and delicacy.

Several pieces of Chopin figure in the list. This is in answer to the spirit of the times,—at least hereabouts. The past musical winter in Boston has been marked, among other things, by the development of an interest in the compositions of this most exquisite and individual,—we may say most spiritually imaginative, poet of the piano, who, so far as depth and purity of sentiment and originality of ideas go, is far above all his modern contemporaries, the Lisztz and Thalbergz and Dreychocks, and so forth, who have been astonishing the world by their virtuosity. Until this season it has been a rare thing to get any work of Chopin played here, beyond a mere Mazurka or two. Pianists have studied only for effect in the concert room, and for the concert such music has been thought too choice, too spirituelle. But Dresel in his chamber soirées, and Jaell even before the vast audiences in the Music Hall, have changed all that. Mazurkas, waltzes, polonaises, nocturnes, études, even his most difficult "Ballades" and Concertos, have had repeated hearing; and we have scarcely entered a private musical circle this winter where Chopin did not figure as principal. So it is and must be in the long run: the soul music will carry the day against the finger music; the stars are sweeter than the fireworks. The enterprising publishers do a good moral service to the public in placing the notes of some of the more available of these things before our young piano amateurs in their homes. Already published are:

1. The Marche Funèbre from the Sonata, op. 35, now an established favorite, and a creation almost as remarkable in its kind (which is not orchestral) as the two funeral marches of Beethoven.

2. A set of Mazurkas. The title here given, "Mazurkas in B flat," is incomplete. There are five of them, each in a different key. The thematic catalogue of Chopin's works shows forty-three mazurkas, and these five form the second set, which is op. 7. The first is the well known one for years past, which every body has played to us, in all sorts of time, from andante molto to prestissimo, and it took an artist like Mr. Dresel to restore its poor crazed life. This is the boldest of the five, but the others are full as interesting, and the second has more of the delicate reverie of Chopin.

3. The Grand Waltz in E flat is also forthcoming. We trust the republication of Chopin will go on indefinitely, for it is the dearest of all music in the foreign copies.

There is also a brilliant waltz by Hunten in this Album, called "Les Bords du Rhin," and a right Rhenish, sparkling thing it is.

"Ossian," a "Poetic Caprice," by Gottschalk, too, is promised. We shall see how much of Ossian there is in the young Creole's fancies. This is placing his compositions in rather high company.

Foreign Intelligence.

London.

THE OLD PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY commenced its forty-first season, March 14th. Competition seems to have driven it into the promise of several novelties. Among others the names of Schubert, Mehul, Cherubini, Schumann and Gade are mentioned. Costa is still conductor, and the orchestra somewhat reinforced. The following was the programme:

PART I.

Sinfonia in A minor,.....Gade.
Duet, "Ti veggo," Madame Castellan and Miss Dolby,.....Winter.
Concerto, piano-forte, in G minor, Mrs. F. B. Jewson,.....Mendelssohn.
Scene, Madame Castellan, "Vasto! tremendo mare,".....Weber.
Overture, in C, Op. 124,.....Beethoven.

PART II.

Sinfonia Eroica,.....Beethoven.
Aria, "All' idea de' tuoi perigli," Miss Dolby, Jomelli.
Trio, Mr. Lucas, Mr. Hancock, and Mr. Howell, Corelli.
Duet, "Quis est homo," Madame Castellan and Miss Dolby,.....Rossini.
Overture, "Erg-geist,".....Spohr.

Gade's symphony belongs to a very pleasing class of writing, smoothness and fluency being the leading characteristics—cleverness and taste in instrumentation being also distinguishable. The allegretto, the quaint subject of which is treated with consummate elegance, involving certain delicate conceits for the wind instruments, was loudly encored. The finale, though ingeniously constructed, is not unminged with common-places; but the climax is imposing. The wonderful Eroica came out with immense force and grandeur.

Beethoven's overture in C, has become new again from having been unaccountably forgotten. It is one of his master-pieces, and will scarcely suffer by a comparison even with the magnificent "Leonora." The fine old trio of Corelli was admirably played by Mr. Lucas, Mr. Hancock, and Mr. Howell, and warmly applauded. Madame Castellan's performance of the scene from "Oberon" was a superb display of vocal power and impassioned energy. And Miss Dolby, in the scene from the "Passione" of Jomelli—a fine specimen of the old Italian school—sang with the pure style and truth of expression for which she is distinguished.

The performance of Mendelssohn's Concerto, by Mrs. Jewson, late Miss A. Kirkham, and a pupil of Mrs. Anderson, is highly eulogized.

THE NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY opened its second season of six concerts on the 16th. The orchestra, by an increase of the strings, amounts to over one hundred performers, mostly artists of reputation.

There are 20 first violins, 20 second violins, and 14 violas, 14 violoncellos, 14 contre-bassi, making in all 66 string to 18 wind instruments. Twelve harps and the drums make up the number. The effect of this change of bul ance was striking, and upon the whole satisfactory. The old din of brass was perfectly got rid of, and the lightness, transparency, and brilliancy of tone of the more flexible and expressive strings and bows took the ear at once by storm.

Another novelty was the appearance as conductor of Herr Lindpaintner. This gentleman has for nearly thirty-five years occupied the post of kapel-meister at the Court of Wurtemberg, and is the composer of an infinity of music, of a vigorous, highly-colored, and elaborated class, including many works of sacred music, with upwards of fifteen operas for the Wurtemberg Theatre, and no less than two hundred Lieder, most of which have attained a wide popularity in Germany. Herr Lindpaintner and Dr. Wyde are to conduct the first four concerts, and the venerable Spohr has consented to preside over the two last. Amongst other masterpieces in preparation are Beethoven's cantata, "The Praise of Music" (but in this instance the new will be beaten by the old society, who have announced the work for their next concert); Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night"; Spohr's Symphony for two orchestras. In the Iphigenia choruses, a rich feast of Gluckite music will be found, and the Choral Symphony will not be wanting. An overture by Mr. Macfarren, Cherubini's Requiem, and one of Beethoven's Masses are also to be produced.

The arrangements for the first night included, with one exception, nothing but sterling music. The exception we allude to is the revival of a forgotten battle-piece, composed, we presume, upon some special occasion by Weber, played at Drury-Lane in 1825, dedicated to George IV., and called "La Belle Alliance and Waterloo." The other novelties were—first, a concerto (clarinet) by Herr Lindpaintner, evidently with great knowledge of the capabilities of the instrument, and fitly interpreted by M. Wulle, who played at the last series of M. Jullien's concerts; and, secondly, Herr Lindpaintner's highly dramatic overture to his opera of the Vampire.

The Symphony was Mendelssohn's in A minor, commonly distinguished as the Scotch Symphony. It was magnificently given by the band, the force of the violins telling with great effect, when the pungent Scherzo with its strong Scotch melodic tendencies was as usual encored. Herr Lindpaintner took the time of the first and latter movements quicker than we have been accustomed to hear them, and not we think to the advantage of the music. The second part of the concert was opened by the re-appearance of Mlle. Clauss, who was greeted with a hearty welcome. She played Beethoven's Concerto in C minor, with an appreciative fervor and a delicacy of light and shade as uncommon as they were charming, while her touch was everything which could be desired, in lightness, rapidity, and flying ring. Mlle. Clauss will form a valuable acquisition to the London musical season.

The remaining portion of the programme consisted of the overture to Egmont, spiritedly given, and two of Beethoven's most famous choruses, that of the Prisoners, and that of the Dervishes. The wild and unearthly music of Gluck's Scythian opera, which produced so strong an effect last season, was revived, and formed a conspicuous feature of the second part, which was closed by Mendelssohn's noble march in Athalie.

The vocalists were Mr. Loekey—in default of Mr. Sims Reeves, who was prevented by illness from appearing—Mr. Weiss, Mrs. Endersohn, and Miss Dianelli. The chorus, who are all professional persons, sat, as was the case last year, in front of the orchestra.

The hall was densely crowded. The second concert will be given on the 13th of April.

CLASSICAL CHAMBER CONCERTS are now the order of the day; and the different series given in the names of Sterndale Bennett, Lindsay Sloper, Ella, Bilet, &c., &c., are more numerous than ever. Bennett's second drew the largest audience ever seen in London at a concert of the kind. His programme was choice.

First, there was Mozart's Quotient in E flat, for piano, clarinet, oboe, bassoon, and horn, played by Bennett, Williams, Nicholson, Baumann, and C. Harper, and every movement was followed by loud and prolonged applause. Bach's Sonata in B minor, for the piano and violin, was played by Bennett and Molique. Mr. Bennett's Sonata-duo for the piano and violoncello, was exquisitely played by the composer and Sig. Piatti. The charming "Minuet caractéristique" was encored with acclamations. The rest of the instrumental music consisted of Beethoven's well-known Sonata in F, for the piano-forte and horn (in which Mr. Bennett was accompanied by Mr. Nicholson), and several short pieces played by Mr. Bennett alone, composed by Schumann, Mendelssohn, and Mr. Bennett himself. The vocalist was Miss Dolby, who sang a fine recitative and air from Jomelli's oratorio "The Destruction of Jerusalem," and an English song composed by Piatti, the great violoncellist.

Russia.

DEBUT OF MARIE LABLACHE. "Le Menestrel" gives the following letter from St. Petersburg, dated Feb. 24th.

Yesterday there took place at the Palace of the Hermitage, in presence of His Majesty and all the Court, en gala, the most extraordinary representation which those walls have witnessed since the days of the Great Catherine. It was on the occasion of the début of Mlle. Marie Lablache, the youngest daughter of the illustrious basso cantante of the Italian Theatre. This young person, remarkable for her beauty, had already sung in many private saloons with immense success, when his Imperial Majesty, who heard her for the first time at one of the concerts of the Grand Duchess Helena, and who was charmed with her new and brilliant talent, testified to M. Lablache his lively desire to see his daughter on the stage. The great basso refused to see his daughter on the stage, never having had the intention of exposing his child to a career, strewed with flowers, it is true, but as often replete with vicissitudes and disappointments. Finally, it was agreed that the essay should be made in presence of a select audience—and such an audience! There were present, in addition to the Imperial family—who were all at St. Petersburg—all that Russia can boast of great and illustrious, the diplomatic corps, and, to conclude, that swarm of beautiful and graceful women, who render the Court at St. Petersburg the most brilliant and richest in Europe. The opera selected by his Majesty was La Figlia del Reggimento. The artists were Mlle. Marie Lablache, Mario, Ronconi, Tagliafico, and Lablache himself, who, to assist at the début of his daughter, undertook the small part of Ortensio. The general expectation was surpassed, and never début, if any début ever took place under similar circumstances, was so happy, so triumphant.

The voice of Mlle. Lablache is a mezzo-soprano of the utmost wealth of resources, and of the greatest range, with high notes of a silvery sonority, with chest notes, which recall Mine. Albani. What shall I tell you of her method? She is her father's daughter, brought up in the school of Grisi, Persiani, Jenny Lind, and Sontag. Is that enough? His Imperial Majesty has been happy in his coup d'essai, and we proclaim him now the most intelligent, as he has already proved himself the nicest and most magnificent of impresarii. In the midst of that jewel-box, which is called the Hermitage, in the light of a thousand lustres sparkling in uniforms of gold and silver, and on the necks and shoulders of ladies scintillating with flowers and diamonds, you would nevertheless have imagined yourself in a popular theatre, only to hear the fracas of applause and the "bravi" of the claque—Mon dieu! and what a chef-de-claque!

Mlle. Lablache has then entirely succeeded, and, if her vocation carries her off, she will be one of the most brilliant stars in the Ausonian Heaven. Her Majesty has made her come into the middle of the Court, where she has received the compliments of illustrious dilettanti; and, at the supper which has followed the representation, each artist has found under his napkin a present of his Majesty as his Majesty knows how to make them.

I was forgetting to tell you that the orchestra was being directed by Balfe, the celebrated maestro of her Majesty's Theatre in London. Next week we shall have at the Grand Theatre, for the first time, Meyerbeer's Prophète, under the title of the Siege of Ghent, with Mesdames Viardot and Murray, and M. M. Mario, Tagliafico, and De Bassini, in the cast.

Advertisements.

MASONIC TEMPLE.

SIX PUBLIC REHEARSALS.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club

Will give a Series of SIX REHEARSALS, to take place on

Wednesday and Saturday Afternoons,

Commencing April 6th, at 3 o'clock.

☞ Packages of Six Tickets, $1: Single Tickets, 25 cts. each, at the usual places.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

NEW YORK NORMAL MUSICAL INSTITUTE.

GENTLEMEN and LADIES, who design attending the first term of the NEW YORK NORMAL MUSICAL INSTITUTE, and who wish to have heard procured for them, are requested to give early notice to that effect. This will be necessary, in order to secure suitable accommodations; especially, as there is prospect of a large class.

Applications have been made by some who desire to attend the courses of lectures and other class exercises of the Institute, omitting the private lessons embraced in the full course. Notice is therefore given that the price of a ticket admitting the holder to all the lectures and class exercises, will be twenty-five dollars. Including the course of private lessons, the price is fifty dollars.

The term commences on MONDAY, APRIL 25th, 1853, and continues three months, during which time daily lectures and instruction will be given in the various departments of music, the design being to furnish thorough instruction, and especially to qualify teachers of music.

The assistance of THOMAS HASTINGS, Esq., and other eminent musicians has been secured.

Circulars containing further particulars may be obtained on application to MASON BROTHERS, (late Mason & Law,) 23 Park Row, New York.

LOWELL MASON.
GEORGE F. ROOT.
WM. B. BRADBURY.

Mar. 5. tf

RIMBAULT'S HAND BOOK for the PIANO FORTE. The above work, one of the best low priced Instruction Books for the Piano, has just been published. It is a popular Manual in England, and will, undoubtedly, attain an equal popularity here. Price 50 cents

59

Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

—Edward L. Balch,

TO PRINTERS.

MUSIC COMPOSITOR WANTED. One who is thoroughly acquainted with the business. Apply at this Office.

Massachusetts Academy of Fine Arts.

THE FIRST SEMI-ANNUAL EXHIBITION of the Massachusetts Academy of Fine Arts is now open at its Rooms,

No. 37½ Tremont Row.

☞ The Collection comprises some of the finest specimens of Pictures by American Artists.

Hours of Exhibition, from 8 A. M. until 6 P. M.

Single admission, 25 cents; Season Tickets, 50 cents.

Feb. 26. tf

THEODORE T. BARKER,
MUSIC STORE,
No. 381 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

Chickering's Pianos to let.

All Foreign and American Musical Publications received as soon as published. $23 3m

Pianos and Melodeons to Let.

OLIVER DITSON,

Music Dealer, 115 Washington St., Boston.

HAS a good variety of Piano Fortes, Melodeons, Seraphines, and Reed Organs, to let, for city or country, on low terms. If, within one year from the time of hiring, the party should conclude to purchase the instrument, no charge will be made for rent of it, except the interest on its value. 25 tf

N. D. COTTON,

IMPORTER AND DEALER IN

English, French, and American Stationery,

DRAWING & PAINTING MATERIALS,

No. 13 Tremont Row, Boston.

 Wedding and Visiting Cards Engraved and Printed.

16 tf

G. ANDRÉ & CO.

FOREIGN MUSIC DEPOT,
GIRARD HOUSE BUILDINGS,

NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,

PHILADELPHIA.

N. B. The complete works, for Piano, (Quartets, Trios, Duets for Piano and Violin, Duets for four hands and Piano solo pieces,) of BEETHOVEN and MOZART, as also the Piano solo Works of CLEMENTI and HAYDN, as published by J. André, Offenbach, in sets, at very low prices
Mech. 12. 3m.

BEETHOVEN'S ORATORIO OF ENGEDI, or DAVID IN THE WILDERNESS, known as the MOUNT OF OLIVES, is this day published in a neat, convenient form for the singer or concert-goer by

Geo. P. Reed & Co., Publishers,

Jan. 8.

17 TREMONT ROW, BOSTON.

JUST PUBLISHED,

HAYDN'S THIRD MASS in D. Uniform with "Ditson's Edition of Mozart's, Haydn's and Beethoven's Masses." Price 62 cents.

119

Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

JUST PUBLISHED,

THE STABAT MATER, by Rossini, at the low price of 75 cents.

119

Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

NEW EDITION OF CARCASSI'S GUITAR BOOK. New and Improved Method for the Guitar, by M. Carcassi. Price $2.50.

This new edition of Carcassi's celebrated method embraces much valuable matter not contained in those previously issued. These additions are those which have been made by the distinguished author after an experience which enabled him to determine what was actually needed by the pupil for a thorough understanding of the art. The whole has been carefully translated by a well known Professor of the Guitar, and is thereby rendered as free as possible from those slight but perplexing inaccuracies which sometimes become a part of translations and reprints. A number of popular songs in each of the different keys have been appended, which together with the masterly instructions of Carcassi, and his plain yet comprehensive course of Exercises, furnish all that is desirable to both teacher and scholar.

Feb 26

OLIVER DITSON, Publisher,
115 Washington St.

Germania Serenade Band.

THE SERVICES OF THIS ASSOCIATION can be secured by applying to

H 14 tf

G. SCHNAPP, Leader,
364 Tremont Street.

J. W. TAVERNER,
PROFESSOR OF ELOCUTION,

AT HIS RESIDENCE,

No. 30 CHARLES STREET, BOSTON.

Letter-Press, Music and Job Printing-Office,

JONAS CHICKERING,

RESPECTFULLY gives notice to his friends and the public that, having recovered from the late disastrous effects produced by the destruction of his factory, he is now ready to receive orders for PIANOS, which he promises to execute with as much fulfulness and promptitude as heretofore.

379 Washington Street, Boston.

Mar. 5.

tf

HEWS' PATENT

AMERICAN ACTION PIANOFORTE.

THE MANUFACTURER is in possession of numerous testimonials from distinguished Musical Professors, who have used the greatly improved ACTION PIANO, commending it in high terms. The attention of purchasers and amateurs of Music to an examination of its superiority, is solicited.

GEO. HEWS, 365 Washington St., Boston.

Apr. 10.

tf

D. B. NEWHALL,
MANUFACTURER AND DEALER IN
PIANO FORTES,
No. 344 Washington Street, Boston.

PIANO FORTES REPAIRED, TUNED, & TO LET.

Apr. 10.

tf

SIGNOR G. C. GUIDI respectfully informs his former pupils and the public, that he has resumed his instructions in SINGING, after the Italian school, with the intention to settle permanently in Boston. In order to accommodate those who may not wish to take private instruction, he will open classes for ladies and gentlemen, on moderate terms. None but good voices will be admitted. Terms liberal for persons intending to study for professional purposes.

Sig. G. can be consulted free upon any musical subject, daily, from 12 to 2, at Mr. Hew's Piano Manufactory, No. 365 Washington Street, where terms and time for classes may be known.

Orders or notes for Sig. G. may be addressed to him at G. P. Reed & Co.'s Music Store, 17 Tremont Row, and at Oliver Ditson's, 115 Washington Street.

Feb. 5.

A CARD.

THE SUBSCRIBER respectfully offers his services to the public as Teacher of the Piano-Forte, the Violin, and of Singing, after a clear and easy method. He will also accompany pupils, both in seminaries and in private houses, in the practice of Duets, Trios, &c.

Address for the present at the United States Hotel.

March 26. 3m.

CARL GÄRTNER.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
265 Washington Street, Boston.

Oct. 16.

3m

T. BRICHER,

Organist and Conductor of Music
At the Bowdoin Square Church.

OFFICE UNDER THE CHURCH... ENTRANCE ON CHARDON ST.
Jan. 22. 3m.

H. S. CUTLER,

Organist at the Church of the Advent, also of the Boston Harmonic Society.

ADDRESS—(Care of A. N. JOHNSON,) No. 90 Tremont Street, Boston. 22 tf

F. F. MÜLLER,

DIRECTOR OF MUSIC AND ORGANIST at the Old South Church; ORGANIST of the Handel and Haydn Society; ORGANIST of the Musical Education Society, &c. &c. &c. Inquire of Messrs. REED & Co., No. 17 Tremont Row, Boston. 57 tf

NATHAN RICHARDSON,
PROFESSOR OF MUSIC.

☞ Now in Europe; will return 1st of June. Letters may be addressed at 19 Hanover St. 25 tf

GEORGE F. WILLEY,
TEACHER OF MUSIC.

☞ Private Tuition in the principles of Music and the Cultivation of the Voice.

MUSIC ROOM, THE LECTURE ROOM OF KIRK STREET CHURCH,
RESIDENCE, 34 FRANKLIN SQUARE, SUFFOLK STREET,
Feb. 5. LOWELL, MASS.

A. W. FRENZEL,
PROFESSOR OF MUSIC,
Feb. 5. 4 Pine Street, Boston.

RATES FOR ADVERTISING.

For half a square, (8 lines,) or less, first insertion, . . . $0.50

each additional inser. 25

For a square, (16 lines,) first insertion, 1.00

each additional insertion, 50

On advertisements standing three months or longer, a discount of twenty per cent. on the above rates is allowed.

(A column counts as seven squares.)
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 School St.

DWIGHT'S Journal of Music.

A Paper of Art and Literature.

VOL. III.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 16, 1853.

NO. 2.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

TERMS....TWO DOLLARS PER ANNUM, (IN ADVANCE.)

CITY Subscribers can be served at their houses by the further payment of fifty cents per annum.

For Rates of Advertising, see last page.

POSTAGE, if paid in advance, for any distance within the State, thirteen cents a year; if not in advance, twenty-six cents. To all places beyond the State, double these rates.

J. S. DWIGHT,.....EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St.

By REDDING & CO., 8 State St.

" GEO. P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row.

" A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.

" DEXTER & BROTHERS, 43 Ann Street, N. Y.

" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 483 Broadway, N. Y.

" MASON & LAW, 23 Park Row, New York.

" G. ANDRE, 229 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

" MILLER & BEACHAM, 131 Baltimore St., Balt.

" COLBURN & FIELD, Cincinnati, O.

" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Persons willing to become Agents for procuring subscribers, especially Music-Dealers and Teachers, are invited to correspond with the Editor, as above. Satisfactory references required, and liberal commissions allowed.

Back numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Also bound copies of Vols I and II, at prices varying from $2.50 to $3.50.

Our Military Bands.

MR. EDITOR:—The Concert Season is drawing to a close, and the time hastens on when the ears of those of us who tarry in town must be filled with the brazen music of the streets—and that too, volens volens. Now I am not among those who despise all other than the highest manifestations of the Divine Art. On the contrary, every department of it is grateful to me in its proper time and place, and with a confessed passion for symphony in its season, I very much doubt if I should not positively suffer (in a musical sense) if compelled to receive it within closed doors on a summer night. But abroad in the witchery of the warm air, with what delight do my ears drink in all sounds of music! Then even the yodling monotony of street minstrelsy hath its charms, and I bless in my heart the itinerant organ-grinder who stops beneath my open window, if he do but grind with a steady hand and upon barrels approximately in tune. But the stirring music of military bands in summer—that is my joy and delight. It was this which, many years ago, awakened within me my first love of the Art.

Seriously, it is not my purpose to malign martial music, as such. But I do protest most solemnly against the general character and composition of our military bands, at the present day, throughout the country. This is emphatically the age of progress and improvement, and we are a progressing and improving nation in all things else, it may be; but in our excellence of military music—by no means. Fifteen or twenty years since, the field performances of the Old Brigade Band exceeded, by far, anything of which Boston can boast now in this line. It was so, also, in New York and Philadelphia—and why? Because the age of brass had not then dawned. And because the so-called improvements in the instruments of martial music were either not then known, or were justly looked upon with suspicion, if purity and excellence of tone must be the sacrifice for their adoption.

But the love of new things becomes a passion with men. All at once the idea of a Brass Band shot forth: and from this prolific germ sprang up a multitude of its kind in every part of the land, like the crop of iron men from the infernal seed of the dragon's teeth. And, as if the invention of new and deadlier implements of war, which came out about the same time, had hardened men's hearts, all the softer companions of the savage science were banished. The wood went first; bassoons, serpents, oboes, clarinets, flutes—a sad, complaining train. Next, all that mollified and tended to harmonize the fierce clangor of what was left: the mellow bugles gave way to valve trumpets and angry cornets,—and in place of contralto and tenor trombones, came the tuba and ophicleyde. Last and most to be deplored, the gentle horns retired, and noise and clamor and cracking brass had full possession of the field. What matter now, if it finds its sphere in the thoroughfares and crowded ways of the city. What are the shoutings of men and the rattle and clatter of paved streets, but a fitting accompaniment to the braying brass?

Nor did the work of innovation rest here. Latest and worse still, if possible, came into being the whole tribe of cornet bands so called, being an assemblage of instruments all of one and the same kind essentially, differing only in size, like a register of metallic pipes in an organ.

One very natural result of this transformation in the character of our military bands was their gradual decrease in numbers, till at length, from being composed of twenty-five and thirty pieces, they have dwindled down to about seventeen, cymbals and drums included. At the same time the sum total of bands has largely increased. Now all this essential change could not have come about without, at least, some array of reason—and the alleged arguments in favor, as I apprehend, may all come under the two following heads, viz:

1st. The greater facility of execution gained.

2d. The supposed increased power over the old system.

The former has reference to the general introduction of valves and pistons—the latter to the total rejection of the wood and the substitution of cornet and trumpet and all their kindred species, in place of the milder accompaniments of former days.

It certainly cannot be questioned that the employment of valves greatly facilitates the performance of difficult passages in music. Of the truth of this we have sad evidence in the readiness with which half-fledged artists essay the execution of compositions wholly beyond their calibre of comprehension, on the one hand; and, on the other, in the performance, by virtuosos, of parts unfitted and never intended for the particular instruments they profess. But however much be gained in ease and rapidity of execution, the full equivalent, and more, is lost in quality of intonation. Like dampers upon vibrating strings, this multiplicity of valves and keys interferes with the free action of the metal and essentially dulls and deadens its tone. In confirmation of this, compare the unsatisfactory effect of the valve trombone with the richness of intonation that belongs to that noble instrument in its original form.

The same is true, though in a less marked degree, in the horn and trumpet and all other instances in which this modern contrivance has been applied. I would not be understood here as doubting wholly the utility of this improvement, but as deprecating rather its indiscriminate use, whereby, too often, genius and skill are made to give way to conceit and incapacity. And as to the idea that more available power is obtained in the present constitution of our bands, I believe it is borne out neither by philosophy nor experience. It is not always the greatest noise that reaches farthest, or produces most effect. The liquid tones of the flute, clarinet and bassoon are clearly heard above all the din of the orchestra; and the mellow-voiced horns, in a full band, are observed distinctly at the remotest distance to which the music penetrates, "speaking," as is well expressed by an English writer, "the language of sincerity, and drawing, like a friend, the opposing instruments together into one brotherhood of concordant harmony. Indeed it is a well attested fact that the tones of this instrument have been recognized, in performing even the most delicate passages, at the distance of more than a mile, filling the air with their mellifluous music. And it is more often, whether on the weary march or amid the noise of battle, that the strains of these milder accompaniments of the band are those that pour their alluring notes into the remotest ranks of the column.

Lastly, what can be said in defense of the hordes of cornet bands which threaten to overrun the land? A certain peculiar and pleasing effect invests their music, at first, but it is of a kind which lacks character and durability. For genuine enjoyment I would as soon listen to a Choral Symphony performed with flutes and the voices of eunuchs. But a well balanced band should and does have undue prominence of no particular instrument or class of instruments. Each feels and acknowledges its dependence on the others, and all together produce the grand and harmonious result. It is thus with the splendid bands in the Prussian service; it is so, in a great degree, in the effective music of the English troops at Montreal; and it is so, too, (may we be thankful) with that most excellent band attached to the 7th Regiment of National Guards in New York. That this ere long may be said, with equal truth, of our military music throughout the land, is the earnest hope of your trusty friend,

SACKBUT.

A Chime of Bells.

(An Extract.)

Let us next consider the duties of the bells as they hang, a musical octave, in their airy home. These duties are threefold—to chime, to ring in peal, and to toll; and they are thus defined in some quaint old verses:—

"To call the fold to church in time,
We chime.
When joy and mirth are on the wing,
We ring.
When we lament a departed soul,
We toll."

... Lest any of our readers, however, should not understand what chiming is, it consists of swinging the bell to and fro by the rope, so that it moves like the pendulum of a clock, and comes in contact with the clapper, which remains nearly stationary inside, owing to its weight and the loose manner of suspending it. Nor let any one despise this method as a dull substitute for the wilder peal, which seems to cheer the people on their walk to church by its sonorous changes. It is possible that those who object may never have listened to good chimes. If so, let them withhold their judgment, for we can assure them that eight sweet-toned bells, if well chimed, afford as beautiful music as ever charmed a Christian's ear. The effect, too, being more solemnizing than inspiring, is only more becoming the occasion; and this influence, though varying according to circumstances of place, time, health, and state of mind, will seldom fail to induce feelings in harmony with devotional exercises, and to move the sensitive with tenderest impressions.

Kinging a peal has next to be noticed. This is done on all occasions of congratulation or festivity; such as marriages, births, victories, elections, the arrival of distinguished persons, &c. A peal, in technical language, is a performance on the bells of more than 5000 changes; and it occupies the ringers a considerable period of time, generally more than three hours. But a touch or flourish on the bells, which is the ordinary method of notifying any joyful occurrence, is round ringing varied by changes at the option of the ringers, or according to the custom of the belfry. It is usual in the first instance to set the bells; that is, to throw every bell, with its mouth upward, in a stationary position in the frame. And then, every ringer being ready in his place, the treble bell is first dropped, and off they all go in quick succession, closing the round with the stroke of heavy tenor. This performance, often repeated, is called round ringing, to distinguish it from change ringing; and formerly it was the custom to close every change, as well as every round, with the tenor bell. But this practice is discontinued, as any bell may conclude a change.

A common peal of rejoicing might be arranged thus: First, round ringing for one hundred times; then firing a number of cannons, which means a simultaneous crash from all the bells; then the bells trip off lightly again, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, from treble to tenor. And again, and yet again they go, quicker, at each rotation, until the sounds flash past the ear just as the spokes of a turning wheel dazzle the eye; and then, on a sudden, they all stop as if the whole peal were demolished. But no; the bells are only set, mouths up again in their cage,—and first one of them drops for a single stroke, and then another, just to prove that they had not lost their voices.

Let us try a wedding peal, which our fair readers may practice for amusement on the piano-forte, since it is certain that they will not attend to it when it gilds their own nuptial morn. We will first ring twelve rounds in regular order, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, then twelve changes on the bells in the following rota, 1, 5, 2, 6, 3, 7, 4, 8, then twelve changes thus, 1, 3, 5, 7, 2, 4, 6, 8, then twelve chords thus, $\frac{1}{2}$ $\frac{2}{3}$ $\frac{3}{4}$, and conclude the peal with twelve rounds, as at starting.

Ah! was it not the merry peal thus described which holds that poor lad's attention, who leans against a mile stone at Halloway on a certain cold November morn? His small wallet is over his shoulder, containing all that he has in the world. He has run away from his employer. He is going he knows not whither; any where to which a chance or a kind word may invite him. But who is there to speak to the lonely runaway? Hark! a voice of Providence through the air seems to greet him. The wind is gently blowing from the south-east, and it wafts the sound of eight bells in full peal into his ears; and, as he listens, his fancy extracts from them a clearer promise than Delphic oracle ever spoke.

1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8
Turn	a	gain,	a	gain,	Whit	ting	ton,
Lord	mayor,	lord	mayor	of	Lon	don	town.

And again in the chords, the notes of which are struck slightly apart, but they soon mingle in their vibrations.

15	26	37	48
Turn	again	Whitting	ton,
Lord	mayor	London	town,

A dumb peal, to commemorate a death, ought always to be conducted in round-ringing order; and it is thus managed. One side of the bulb of the clapper is covered with a thick cloth or felt, and over this a firm piece of leather is tightly strapped. When all the bells are thus prepared, one round is struck with the uncovered side of the clapper, and the usual tone, somewhat deadened, perhaps, is produced. At the next rotation, the padded side of the clapper strikes the bell, and a dull vibration, scarcely perceptible, follows. These alternations produce a very saddening effect.

But the ordinary way of noticing a death or a funeral is by tolling. This is done by a succession of single strokes on one bell. It needs no further explanation. Few who read this will not be able to recall at least one occasion in their past lives when each toll of the bell went like a shock to their own hearts; and they knew that nearer every stroke was the moment coming when the grave would evermore hold the beloved dead.

There are, generally, rules and regulations for good order in the bell chamber; and it is very desirable to make these conducive to the decorous behavior of the ringers in the discharge of their important duties about a church. In All Saints' Church, at Hastings, a mandlin exertion in this direction seems to have been made by the subjoined inscription, which is painted on the wall:—

"This is a belfry that is free
For all those that civil be;
And if you please to chime or ring,
It is a very pleasant thing.

"There is no music, played or sung,
Like unto bells when they're well rung:
Then ring your bells well if you can—
Silence is best for every man.

"But if you ring in spur or hat,
Sixpence you pay—be sure of that;
And if your bell you overthrow,
Pray pay a groat before you go." (Dated, 1756.)

The growing taste for Classical Music in Boston—and the Causes.

I will by way of text take Henri Herz's assertion: "They prefer classical music in Boston, but don't like to pay for it;" and also your New York correspondent's quotation from a Philadelphia paper, that they have the best music in that city. Now it strikes me that the "boot is on the wrong leg" in both cases. First, the taste for classical music with the many in Boston has been brought about by paying for it; (more anon;) and secondly, some may consider best that which for a while pleases the million; and, at that rate, the "Mysteries of Paris" ought to be placed above "Paradise Lost," (the Cossack preferring sperm oil to chocolate comes under the item of de gustibus non, &c.) Best means that whose intrinsic merit gives it permanence. After the "Don Juan" was composed, the operas of Paesello, Cimarosa, Pæer, Winter, Gretry, &c., were quite popular. The "Doctor und Apotheker," by Dittersdorff, was for a while the favorite in Germany, and "Cendrillon," by Nicolo Isoard, made a furor all over Enrope. All these operas are now passées. "Don Juan" stands yet as the opera; so does Handel's "Hallelujah" as the chorus, by the colossal effect from a comparatively few notes. The cultivated, refined and reflecting mind, that can appreciate the best, will read Homer, gaze on a Raphael's painting, or listen to a Beethoven's symphony again and again, and will discover each time something new to admire and to enjoy. The red man, aye, and many a white man too, is only attracted by the glaring colors of the Saracen's Head, the noise of drums and fifes, and the roaring, like an infuriated ox, called acting.

It is the ignorance of the mass that encourages charlatanism. A Monsieur Canderbeck came out in this country as a modern Paganini and gave "Napoleon's retreat from Waterloo" on the fourth string, which was afterwards out-Heroded by genius No. 2, in giving the "Cataracts of Niagara" on the first string, now and then holding out a high harmonic note, slowly drawing the bow, though already off the string, and causing some of the audience to say: "bless my soul, how fine! I can hardly hear it." (This actually has happened.) When a clown performs his tricks in an adroit style, he becomes an artist in his line; but when an artist, even if it should be a Paganini, has recourse to tricks, he becomes a clown; and who knows but a third may yet add a sauce piquante by giving the event of "Jonah swallowing a whale" as a duet for guitar and ophichlyde, the guitar representing Jonah in double harmonies, and the ophichlyde spouting "very like a whale."

But revenons, &c. How was the taste for classical music in Boston brought about? Eighteen or twenty years ago, some of the wealthy and public-spirited Bostonians had the notion to do a lasting benefit for a rising generation, particularly in a comparatively new country, where refinement of the mass required to be forwarded and assisted by efficient means, instead of leaving it to time. The Maine Liquor Law will no more prevent excesses in those so inclined, than the iron hand of an Inquisition will make people morally religious; the appeal must be to the cultivated reasoning power. Idleness, excesses and vices are not prevented, or cured, by legislation, but by giving the mass an opportunity, in the way of recreation, to cultivate and refine their minds; and if the shopman, mechanic, clerk or laborer, after the day's toil, can be induced to listen to good music, or an intellectual lecture, that same person may by degrees be brought to feed his mind by reading Locke, &c., and if so, the point is gained; and if the point is gained, the sway of the designing ones will lose its power over brutal ignorance and rowdyism, and Astor Place scenes will in future be looked upon as the dark age of the new world, like the auto da fé festivals of the old.

To cultivate the taste, it should be planted early. Something more than common schooling for the mass is necessary. Music, even classical music, is not merely, as some will have it, an acquired, it is a cultivated taste. I can explain myself to more advantage by giving a few extracts from an address delivered by the Hon. Samuel A. Eliot, on the occasion of the opening of the Odeon, in 1835, as an Academy for Music.

"In a country where the education of the young is so important, and has, from the earliest period, received so much attention, and excited so deep an interest as in our own, it is certainly singular that the aid of music has not been sought to stimulate the attention of the youthful student, and introduce those habits of order and method which are indispensable to the acquisition of the art, and are such important means of progress in every species of knowledge. Music is at once a charming relaxation from the tedious task, the dry drudgery of the grammar, the pen, or the slate, and a mode of discipline scarcely inferior in efficacy to the dullest lesson of the horn book, learned under the fear of the searching experiment of the birch or the ferule. It is a study and an amusement, a discipline and a sport. It teaches, in the most attractive manner, the advantage of combined, harmonious action, of submission to rules, and of strict accuracy. All these are necessary to the agreeable result of the practice; and the attainment of that result is, itself, stimulus and reward sufficient for the required exertion. It produces, in a remarkable degree, the effect attributed by a classic poet to all the elegant arts, of softening the character and refining the manners. Nothing is more obvious than the change of tone, in children of the rougher sex, which follows a moderate proficiency in this exquisite accomplishment. Are these tendencies of no value, or of slight importance? Surely not. The teacher, who experiences so often the want of some agreeable stimulus to the flagging attention, and the need of relaxing his own toil, will seize upon music with grateful avidity; while the pupil will wonder what has become of the weariness he felt a moment before, and his eye will brighten, and his apprehension quicken, at the first sound of the music lesson."

"Throughout the whole extent of northern Germany, every child who goes to school is as sure to be taught to sing as to read. The exceptions are almost as few to the capacity of learning something of music, as to that of learning to spell; and serve, in fact, only to show the general prevalence of what is erroneously thought so rare—an ear for music. The obstacle in this country, and in some others, which has produced an opposite impression, is, that the attainment of musical knowledge has been deferred till a period of life when the facility of acquisition is diminished, and the organs are less flexible than in early youth; while the instruction has been given on the plan of benefit to the teacher rather than the taught; its difficulties have been unnecessarily magnified; and it has been attempted to make every pupil a first rate solo singer. It has, too, been unfortunately regarded as a mere accomplishment, which might as well be left to the pursuit of the young, the frivolous and the worldly, and was unworthy the attention of the parent, seriously anxious for the education of his child."

* * * * *

"It is not necessary to the understanding or enjoyment of good music, whether vocal or instrumental, that one should be able to perform it one's self, (an idea that has been strangely prevalent in some of our churches,) but some acquaintance with the design of music, and its means of accomplishing its own designs, is necessary; and this knowledge will be very generally diffused, if the academy should be successful in its plans. Part of the effect, therefore, of the operations of our academy, will be to make good listeners, as well as good performers, and one is scarcely less desirable than the other."

Look what effect followed. In Philadelphia, with three times the population of Boston, with a much larger number of resident musicians, and with several "Männer-chor" societies, a symphony, oratorio, or public quartet is yet, I believe, (unless quite recently,) among the things longed for by the few. In New York, in 1840 or '41, several musicians came together and commenced giving symphonies, &c. They persevered con amore, and have by this time increased to quite a large orchestra, selected from the cream of the resident musicians. I allude to the "Philharmonic Society." They rehearse every other Saturday, under the efficient Einfeld, and their performances of the best classical music are most excellent; besides having the assistance of such pianists as Timm and Scharfenberg. They give only four concerts during the season. How are they patronized in a population of over half a million? Instead of having the Metropolitan Hall filled to overflowing, they can accommodate their subscribers in the Apollo or Niblo's saloon, and have room to spare.

When I came to Boston in the winter of 1841-2, I was under the impression, then so common in the southern cities, that Boston in regard to music was provincial, nay, a shade worse than that, namely, Puritanical. But I was not a little taken by surprise to find an audience of over fifteen hundred in the old "Odeon," listening to an entire classical instrumental performance, and where the gem of the concert was a Beethoven symphony. The government of the Academy, to follow up their notion of cultivating a taste for the best music, made these concerts accessible to all, by a mere nominal price of subscription. The list for subscribers was open to all. There was no regard to expense; extra rehearsals, at an additional cost of $80 each, were had as often as thought necessary. These concerts were kept up year after year; from 1841 to this time the taste for classical music has made gradual progress with the many.

My article is already too long to dwell more on particulars, such as the great popularity of the Harvard quartets, under the direction of the late Mr. Herwig, etc. This present season, now nearly closed, music has almost become a mania. Morning, noon, and night, there have been concerts, public rehearsals (which in fact were concerts), by the "Musical Fund Society," ditto by the "Germanians," oratorios by the "Handel and Haydn" and "Education" societies, public quartets, matinees, soirées,—in short, people had to use some management how and when to take their meals. I have seen crowds going to the new hall two hours before the beginning; * at three o'clock there was an audience of over 2500, and on the evening of the same day the hall was crowded again, and extra chairs placed on the platform of the orchestra—to listen—to what? a Paganini or Jenny Lind for the first or only time?—no; but to a Symphony, classical "Concertstück," &c., and without the attraction of a singer.

"But they don't like to pay for it." True, the price of admission for all these concerts, rehearsals, &c., was moderate. But the rich, naturally the smallest portion, do not all like music, and those who like music (happily the largest portion) cannot all afford to pay dollars every night. But, suffice it to say, they like it, and will go, aye, and take their young ones, too, if the price of admission is within their means. But though the rich ones do not all like music, yet they are not backward in the way of helping along. I will name a few instances. The Academy first brought to public notice the advantage of imparting a knowledge of music to the rising generation, and at their own expense furnished teachers for the public schools of the city during the first year that it was so taught. A Miss Ostinelli had a fine voice, but without cultivation. A purse of over $1000 was raised to send her to Italy. She came back the accomplished singer, Mme. Biscaccianti. A Miss Phillips and a Miss Hensler have been aided in the same way, and are now in Europe for instruction. The Melodeon, considering the population of Boston, is quite a large hall, but was found not sufficient to hold all, and in almost no time $120,000 were raised for building the present Boston Music Hall, and $250,000 are now subscribed to build an opera house. So you see, Mr. Herz, they will "pay for it," and if you, or if Signora—ending with an i,—cannot at all times get a hall filled at a dollar admission, that does not prove that they don't like to pay for it—perhaps they don't like you, or the Signora. The only city in the Union, besides New Orleans, where Vieuxtemps was successful, was Boston. Nearly all the classical music that is republished in this country, from a sonata to an oratorio, hails from the music-publishers in Boston.

To show the views with which the best classical music has been cultivated in Boston, I will close with the following extract from the address already mentioned.

"If this be so, is it any thing less than a duty we owe to ourselves and to society to watch well what kind of music is to be cultivated among us, what kinds of passion are to be excited by it, what kinds of feeling are to be stimulated by its sympathetic power? It is for the purpose of attempting our part in the performance of this social duty, that we now dedicate this hall to pure, and elevating, and holy harmony. No corrupting influence shall henceforth be spread from these walls; but here shall the child be early taught the beauty and the charm of an exquisite art. Its own voice shall aid in the development and expansion of the best feelings of its heart; and love to its fellow mortal, and a holy fear of its God, shall grow with its knowledge and its stature. Here shall the adult practise on the lessons of youth, and with maturer power bring a stronger feeling, and a more cultivated understanding to the execution of the most expressive music. Here shall the ear be feasted, and the heart warmed, and the soul raised above everything base or impure, by the sublimity, the pathos, the delicate expression which music only can give to language. Here shall be trained those who not only feel, but shall acquire the power of making others feel those emotions of love, gratitude, and reverence to God, and of sympathy and kindness to men which are most suitably expressed in the solemn services of the Sabbath; and here too, shall be sung those anthems of praise to the Most High, which, if they delight us now, will constitute and express the fullness of our joy in the more visible presence of Him whose name is excellent in all the earth."

* There could be no affectation or hypocrisy in the case. On the contrary there are yet plenty of Puritanical ideas left with some who would consider going to a concert in broad day-light (1 o'clock, P. M.) as much a waste of time as playing whist.

Let me only add, that, for the first time in my life, I have this winter heard and enjoyed Beethoven's most stupendous work, the Ninth, or Choral Symphony; and this has been in Boston.

WILLIAM KEYZER.

Beethoven's Egmont.

(From the New Philharmonic Programme.)

The music which Beethoven composed for Goethe's celebrated tragedy of Egmont comprises an overture, in F minor; a song, in the same key, for Clärchen, "Die Trommel gerühret;" an interlude, or entr'acte, for the orchestra, in A; a second interlude in E flat; a song for Clärchen in A, "Freudvoll und Leidvoll;" a third orchestral interlude, including a march, in C; a fourth beginning in C minor and ending in E flat; an incidental symphony, in D minor, accompanying the death of Clärchen; some melo-dramatic music, during which occurs the death of Egmont; and a Siegessinfonie, or battle piece for the orchestra, in F, almost identical with the coda of the overture. Of these nine pieces the longest and most important is the overture, which many consider the finest of Beethoven, preferring it even to Coriolan and Leonora. Perhaps it would be nearer the truth to say it is equal in merit to those master-pieces; since to pronounce it superior is to assume that perfection may be surpassed. So celebrated a piece, and one so frequently performed as the overture to Egmont, needs no description here. Every musician knows the score by heart. It is enough to add, that the two airs of Clärchen are among the most beautiful songs of Beethoven; and that some of the interludes are worthy of all admiration.

Lindpaintner.

Of this composer, newly called to the conductorship of the "New Philharmonic" concerts in London, we find the following notice:

Peter Joseph Lindpaintner was born on the 8th of December 1791, at Coblenz, on the Rhine. His father, Jacob Lindpaintner, an opera-singer, settled, with his family, in 1795, at Augsburg, where he placed his son at the Gymnasium, to be educated for the medical profession. The early indications which the boy gave, however, of a strong predilection for music, altered the intention of his parents, and Lindpaintner became a pupil of the celebrated composer Winter, who then resided at Munich. Some years later he studied counterpoint with Joseph Gratz, who at that time was reputed one of the most learned masters in Germany. Under such favorable circumstances the progress of the young musician was very rapid, and he speedily acquired a knowledge of all the secrets of his art. He was encouraged by several distinguished persons, and among others by the Elector of Treves, who promised to supply him with the means of making an artistic tour in Italy. The unexpected death of his friendly patron (in 1811), however, prevented the realisation of his plan, and he accepted the post of Music Director at the Opera, which had just been opened at Munich. Although only twenty years of age, Lindpaintner performed the duties of this office with such success that he rapidly obtained fame as a chef d'orchestre, and after six years residence at Munich, he received proposals from Stuttgart to undertake the post of Kapel-meister to his Majesty the King of Wurtemberg. The terms were so highly advantageous that Lindpaintner did not hesitate to accept them. He went to Stuttgart in 1819, and has remained there up to the present time. Besides having been chiefly instrumental in forming an orchestra which holds the reputation of being one of the most efficient in Europe, Lindpaintner otherwise employed his time to good purpose. The largest number of his works for the church, the theatre, and the concert-room, were written at Stuttgart, and established his name as one of the most prolific and successful composers of his country. The music of Lindpaintner has no decided school, but may be said to mingle the characteristics of two of the greatest modern masters—Weber and Spohr—with the light brilliant "ad captandum" manner of the French. The melange is of itself highly agreeable, more especially when combined with such clear and masterly orchestration as distinguishes the overtures to Der Vampyr, and other operas.

A list of the vocal and instrumental compositions of Lindpaintner would occupy a larger space than can be afforded in this programme. A specification, by name, of some of those which are the most highly esteemed, will suffice to present some notion of their number and variety. Among these are The Young Man of Nacci, a short oratorio; Abraham, an oratorio in three parts; and The Lord's Prayer, for solo voices and chorus; the operas of the Vampyr, Genesirinn, Sicilianische Vesper, Die Macht des Liedes, and Giulia (the last, which is only just completed); the Ballets of Joko and Zeila; and several concert overtures. Lindpaintner has written, in all, fifteen operas and operettas, fifty psalms, and four masses. His instrumental compositions are very numerous, including solos for almost every instrument, two concertantes for wind instruments, twenty concert overtures for the orchestra, besides entr'actes and melo-dramatic music. As a song writer he has been no less prolific, having composed no less than 200 lieder, some of which have obtained a wide popularity in German. In England one of these lieder (known under the title "With Sword at rest" and the "Standard Bearer") has been made famous by the singing of Herr Pischek, who first introduced it at one of the concerts of the Philharmonic Society, in Hanover-square.

Lindpaintner, besides being a member of nearly all the musical societies of Germany, is Chevalier of the Order of the Crown of Wurtemberg, and member of the Royal Academy of Berlin. His Majesty the King of Prussia presented him with the large gold medal of the Arts and Sciences, and H. R. H. the Duke of Coburg with that of the Ernestine Order of Merit. Her Majesty the Queen of England, through Prince Hohenlohe, also presented him with a golden medal, bearing her Majesty's likeness, as an acknowledgment of her Majesty's having received the score of the oratorio of Abraham.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

From my Diary. No. XXIII.

NEW YORK, March 31. Here is something from the April number of the Illustrated Magazine of Art, which is exceedingly interesting. Is it true? It is from an article on Joseph Vernet, the first of the series of great French painters of that name.

"What he most loved, after painting, was music. He had formed an intimate acquaintance with Pergolese, the musician, who afterwards became so celebrated, and they lived almost continually together. Joseph Vernet had had a harpsichord placed in his studio for the express use of his friend, and while the painter, carried away by his imagination, put the waters of the mighty main into commotion, or suspended persons on the towering waves, the grave composer sought, with the tips of his fingers, for the rudiments of his immortal melodies. It was thus that the melancholy stanzas of that chef-d'œuvre of sadness and of sorrow, the Stabat Mater, were composed for a little convent in which one of Pergolese's sisters resided. It seems to me that while listening to this plaintive music, Vernet must have given a more mellow tint to his painting; and it was, perhaps, while under its influence, that he worked at his calms and moonlights, or, making a truce with the roaring billows of the sea, painted it tranquil and smooth, and represented on the shore nothing but motionless fishermen, sailors seated between the carriages of two cannons, and whiling away the time by relating their troubles to one another, or else stretched on the grass in so quiescent a state that the spectator himself becomes motionless while gazing on them.

"Pergolese died in the arms of Joseph Vernet, who could never after hear the name of his friend pronounced, without being moved to tears. He religiously preserved the scraps of paper, on which he had seen the music of the Stabat Mater dotted down beneath his eyes and brought them with him to France in 1753, at which period he was sent for by M. de Marigny, after an absence of twenty years [at Rome]. Vernet's love for music procured Gretry a hearty welcome, when the young composer came to Paris. Vernet discovered his talent, and predicted his success. Some of Gretry's features, his delicate constitution, and, above all, several of his simple and expressive airs, reminded the painter of the immortal man to whom music owes so large a portion of its present importance: for it was Pergolese who first introduced in Italy the custom of paying such strict attention to the sense of the words and to the choice of the accompaniments."

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 16, 1853.

BOUND VOLUMES OF OUR FIRST YEAR. We have a limited supply of these now ready and for sale, at prices varying with the styles. Looking over our year's work, now that we have it all between two covers, we really feel that it contains much which music-lovers will find worth preserving and of use for future reference. Perhaps nowhere can you find, in so compact a form, so much of the living history of the past year of music, hereabouts at any rate, and to a considerable extent in the whole musical world. Our series of concert programmes and reviews, alone, constitutes a complete catalogue raisonné of the music that has been performed or published during this uncommonly active year in Boston. So too, with less fulness of detail and comment, our musical intelligence and correspondence from abroad. The musical features of England, France, Italy, Germany—not omitting "Young Germany," are sketched.

Nor is this all. The book is rich in papers of a less local or temporary interest, relating to the most important questions and personalities of Art, which we should not have taken the pains to translate or procure, if we had not thought them worthy to be preserved and identified with the history of our own musical culture. The series of papers upon CHOPIN, by Liszt, is alone worth the price of the volume to not a few appreciating readers. The able papers on "Acoustic Architecture" embody, and for the first time in any popular form, the best light of the day on that obscure subject, with the addition of many new suggestions. The lives of not a few great composers, and analytical descriptions of not a few of their immortal masterpieces, must have interest to the young student or amateur of music. The interesting reminiscences connected with the opening of our new Music Hall, and other local events; the farewell strains of Mme. Goldschmidt, the subsequent career of Sontag and Alboni, &c., &c., stand here recorded.

Surely it is no offence to modesty, in these times, to hint that such a volume would not be an inappropriate present to a young friend, musically inclined, whose feet one should deem it worth while to direct somewhat towards the sources of true taste and inspiration.

"Sackbut," on our first page, blows a true blast of warning against the degenerate tendency of our military and street bands to run into mere brass. We fully sympathize with his complaint, and trust it will be duly weighed. Are the business and politics of the day so harsh, that the tones of our street music must, in correspondence, renounce all their sincerity and gentleness, and become mere bluster?

Mr. Keyzer's communication, too, is sound and interesting, although we have no wish to contrast our own too glowingly with any other city, as regards the taste for music. The experience of Boston deserves such notice, chiefly as illustrating the cheerful lesson, that any community may be made subject to the charm of the best kind of music, by rightly educating the masses. But the Quaker City, it will be seen by referring to our Musical Intelligence, is even now redeeming herself from our friend's charge of boasting to be music-loving, and yet encouraging no classic concerts.

Mr. K. does no more than justice to the efforts of the old "Academy" in furthering this taste for solid music in our city. But there were also older causes at work, before the date of his acquaintance with us, which we should like to see fitly commemorated. For instance, the oldest oratorio society in America, the "Haudel and Haydn," which thirty or forty years ago made some of Handel's choruses familiar as household words, in those days of our musical barbarism. There was an amateur orchestra, too, in Boston, earlier than our recollection, and still alive, which had its audience and played the symphonies of Haydn and Mozart.

OPERA AND OPERA HOUSES. It seems now to be almost certain that another winter will see a large new opera house in each of our three great Eastern cities, New York, Philadelphia and Boston. Success of opera enterprise must in the main depend on the excellence combined with the cheapness (to the music-loving many) of the entertainments offered. Paying houses must be large houses, and the exclusive system of high prices must yield, in lyric as it has already done in concert music, to the spirit of our democratic culture. When books and newspapers are cheap, and (the latter at least) more excellent the more cheap they are, it cannot be but that the enjoyment of the Fine Arts must follow the same course, and the best artists of every kind seek their remuneration in the small price, gladly paid by thousands of Art-lovers. With this view, we are happy to present our readers with the communication from our friend "E," below, with whose suggestions we entirely accord.

To the idea of cheapness combined with excellence, too, another circumstance looks favorable. With three great opera houses at the points above-named, the operatic campaign will naturally become a triangular one. Or rather, it will be a unitary organization, with its centre in New York; and its two wings in Philadelphia and Boston; so that by skilful alternation the entire force of a company equal to the wants of a metropolis as big as the three consolidated, may be available in turn at each of the three points. The three cities have a common interest in the matter, and by offering each a suitable locale to one common impresario, may share in the largest luxuries of opera, as individuals in a Club House share the luxuries of rich private dwellings. On this point too we find the following good suggestions, in conformity with those of our correspondent, in the Home Journal:

Mr. T. S. Arthur, the editor of Arthur's Home Gazette thinks the price of opera tickets is unreasonably high. He says, "In this city (Philadelphia) we know that a very large number of opera-goers absented themselves, from principle, during the late series of operas by Sontag—excellent as they were. The system of high prices they regarded as a public evil, and though able to pay the prices, denied themselves a real gratification in order to discountenance a system based on a false estimate of the real value of such performances. If editors and musical reporters would only come out on the right side in this—refusing to let a few tickets of admission influence their opinions or induce silence—a better and more healthy state of things would soon exist. The idea of giving a singer five, six, or seven hundred dollars a night is preposterous." So preposterous, the editor might have added, that it is done very rarely. Good opera cannot be cheap. The expense of producing operas in creditable style is unavoidably great. There are forty musicians to pay, at the rate of three, four, or five dollars each per night, and a conductor, whose services are worth from ten to twenty. The chorus ought to number forty persons, and their pay averages about two dollars and a half. The four principal singers demand—and justly demand—from fifty dollars to one hundred and fifty for each performance; the four second-rates, from ten to twenty-five. The advertising is a serious item. Then there are door-keepers, money-takers, ushers, scene-shifters, costumers, carpenters, agents, and others, to be paid. The rent of the theatre is seldom as little as a hundred dollars a night. Besides all this, there are several other circumstances to be taken into the account. The opera season is short, and the singers' annual income is all to be obtained in a few months or weeks. Rainy evenings diminish receipts, but not expenses. Some operas, produced at great cost, fail to please, and have to be soon withdrawn. The taste of the public is variable, and the popularity of a singer, which is, this season, at its height, may next season be on the wane. A voice is a perishable commodity, and, if that is lost, all is lost. If, therefore, any person is more called upon than any other to make hay while the sun shines, and to make it in prodigious quantities, surely it is a favorite singer. In every profession—law, physic, literature, politics, clerical, mercantile, or mechanical—there are a few great prizes to be won, the contention for which gives life to those pursuits. Of the hundreds of public singers, it is only a Lind, a Grisi, a Sontag, an Alboni, and a few more, that realize anything like the sums named by our contemporary; while the fact that those few do realize them, stimulates the exertions of the whole musical profession. There is but one way to place the opera within the reach of the million, and that way will probably soon be attempted. When the three large opera houses, now meditated by New York, Philadelphia, and Boston, are built, they are likely to be leased to one great manager, who will, doubtless, be able, by short, brilliant seasons, at each city, to attract a succession of audiences sufficiently large in number to make low prices of admission remunerative.

Since writing the above we notice, in the New York Tribune, another view of the three proposed opera houses, evidently from the pen of W. H. Fry;—a long and able article, in which he regards the Philadelphia as a model plan, destined to result in a national lyric school. We hope to find room to copy it entire next week.

The New Opera House.

MR. EDITOR:—It may be assumed that all persons who have studied attentively the phenomena of theatrical or operatic enterprises in Boston or in any other city in America, have come to one and the same conclusion as to the cause of their want of success. To be permanently attractive, a theatrical or operatic company must have merit. The first constituents of merit in this department are numbers and high grade of the performers, and these cannot be secured without great expense. It requires but a very simple arithmetical process to show, with the knowledge of a few notorious facts, that a house of 1000 capacity cannot pay a night's expenses unless brim-full at $2 or $3 a head. This statement is designedly far within the truth. The Impresarii engage their troupe, chorus included, by the month or season; formerly it was done by the season, until repeated bankruptcies warned the unhappy entrepreneurs that the risk was too great. The shorter the engagement the poorer the company and the greater the expense. It is notorious, in other departments of work as in this, that men and women can afford to and will work cheaper by the long than by the short period. It is equally notorious that the highest talent can best command its own terms. Hence the best artists, vocal or instrumental, will most readily work on long engagements. If the Impresario fears (as well he may under present arrangements) to make long engagements, he is driven to a choice of alternatives, each fraught with risk, and all generally terminating in failure and discouragement. 1. He must submit to a short engagement and its increased rate of pay; or, 2. He must put up with inferior artists and even then pay them higher on the short than on the long term. Let us look at the working of each course. He takes a poor company—poor in talent and thin in force. By dint of puffs and handbills, expensive in the ratio of their falsity and exaggeration (for your regular out and out puff-writer has a tariff to his conscience and asks high for the blackest lies in the largest capitals) the company gets one full house. Puff takes his pay in advance, and having a reputation (!!) as well as conscience to care for, can't puff the next day, in the face of the awful performance, and a half house greets the second representation—and—the third, is not.

But next time Impresario tries the other expedient. He takes a good company, (who must be paid, you know,) and puts his prices at one, two and three dollars. Does he make money at that here in Boston? Ask those who have tried it. They will tell you the class is too small who can afford to pay those prices to fill the house even for a few nights, and twenty nights would hardly pay. He goes off disheartened and the papers cry out, some against high prices, others against the want of taste for music in our public.

In the meantime, if his troupe is a good one, it is probably engaged for a long season. New York is tired; the smaller cities can't keep up the high prices; the troupe is not at work, but their wages are running, and either they must be cheated or their employer fail—generally both happen.

Now we are not engaged with the question, "Can the opera be made to pay in this country?" Nous n'en sommes pas là. The case does not call for that ruling. We are building opera houses here and in New York and not stopping to ask,

"Can they succeed?" Yet we are interested to know what are the chief obstacles to their success and how we can best avoid them? It would seem to be an almost inevitable thought: "Have your house so large that half a dollar per seat shall maintain the company." We therefore make, with full confidence, based on observation, the following statements of the actual and possible in this matter.

1. No enterprise, musical or theatrical, has ever contrived to pay for any length of time in this city (perhaps we might say in America) where the price of admission has been over fifty cents.

2. More money will be netted in an operatic season, long or short, at this price, where the company is full and good, in a building of 4000 or 4500 capacity, than can be netted in a smaller one at any price. The experiment at Castle Garden goes to prove this, if it proves anything. Therefore,

3. If an Opera House, or First Class Theatre, well conducted, can be permanently successful in Boston at all, it can only be by force of great capacity, comfort, elegance, first-rate performance, low and uniform price.

4. If the taste for these amusements is not general enough to ensure paying houses with these conditions, we boldly assert that the amusements cannot be maintained under any conditions; for the indisputable fact must not be overlooked that the genuine lovers of music and the drama are not from the wealthier classes. If any discrimination in prices is insisted on, let a given number of seats, not confined to any section of the house, but scattered all over it, be held at an advanced price, and let those occupy them who can afford to pay for exclusiveness, but let them not be superior in any respect to the other seats. Every seat in the house should be numbered and sold invariably by number. It is democratic, convenient and economical. It permits people to reach the house ten minutes before the performance, saves an hour's gas and gives the mechanic and the capitalist an equal chance for a good seat.

We have conversed with more than one "Manager" on this topic, and the above are substantially the views we have gathered from them, fully confirmed by our own observation. They all insist upon four thousand capacity as the minimum.—E.

A Specimen of London Criticism.

The editorials in the leading musical Journal in England, called the Musical World, are often delightfully original; but we have seen nothing in its columns lately that came quite up to the following demolishing criticism upon Schumann and "Young Germany." Certainly it is a gone case with them, and all such geniuses as vainly think to do better than they care to have in England! We quote from an onslaught upon the Athenæum, apropos to certain strictures of the latter upon Mr. Ella's programmes to his "Musical Union" and classical "Winter Evenings":

"We are at a loss to explain the sudden hostility of the literary journal, which, ere now, has been so meek. The Director of the Musical Union, however, threw out a sop on Thursday, in the shape of a hideous quintet by Robert Schumann—an intimate protégée of Franz Liszt, who stands up manfully for the ugliest music he can find, and who has found Wagner and Schumann, Richard and Robert, the Siamese twins of modern æsthetic art (æsthetics!—what a fine synonyme for rhodomontade!), ready and willing to furnish him with as much as he wants, presto and scherzando, though not ready nor able to put their heads close together, and make up the first bar of a presto scherzando like poor Mendelssohn's. The sop-quintet in E flat was doubtless thrown out to conciliate the Athenæum, which, being of the Leipsic party, and an advocate of "they four" (Ezekiel), does not want the Reformation Symphony of Mendelssohn, and consequently craves for the æsthetics, which are now doing so much to make music mysterious, not melodious, horrible not harmonious. The sop will soapen the Athenæum, and in the next number, the Director of the Musical Union will be apostrophised as a cumini sector instead of being mythicised as a Midas.

Take courage, Mr. Ella, go on with Schumann. Engage Wagner to write a quadruple-quintet; and though you must sacrifice your performers on the altar of Bel, (poor little Wilhelmine Clauss, we never sympathised with you so much as when your little fingers and your large soul were vainly striving to make music of such miserable mummery,) the steam of their entrails will be a peace-offering to the false god, who now sits on a throne at Leipsic, and the odor will be welcome to the nostrils of the Athenæum.

Moreover, the music of Schumann brings with it a second and still greater advantage. It acts as a foil to that of the other composers. Not to speak of Mendelssohn, (the comparison would be 'odorous,') the Bohemian melodies of Goldberg, the Guttenburgian, after the purgatory of the quintet, were as the first glimpse of Heaven to a pardoned sinner, and the fair comely Doria, from whose pouting lips they flowed so glibly, as the ministering angel, to lead the way to Paradise. The effect of contrast was never more delicious."

There, reader! now take breath, and congratulate yourself that you have lived where the terrors of such learned criticism did not prevent your enjoyment of that "hideous quintet" by Robert Schumann, which you have heard so warmly interpreted at various times by both Scharfenberg and Dresel with the Quintette Club. When we shall have attained that distant height of musical taste and culture that we can, like these English critics, condescend to adopt and father (even against his own less appreciating fatherland) the author of "Elijah," and say "poor Mendelssohn" (!), we shall perhaps discover that these artists have been mystifying our green senses with music that is not the genuine article, inasmuch as it does not pass current in England:—unless it may be with the Athenæum party. But here again the World upsets our former understanding. The Athenæum "of the Leipsic party!" Did we not a few weeks since copy from that paper a critique as satirical, if not as ingenious and refined as this just quoted, upon Schumann, Wagner and "Young Germany?" Then as to Schumann being "an intimate protégée of Liszt," we have understood that there was actual coolness in their personal relations, although Liszt is a generous recognizer of what is genuine Art, even if guilty of the crime of being new.

WHAT HAS BECOME OF "HAFIZ"? Since summer went he has not sung to us. For "Hafiz" is an Eastern bird that loves not our wintry clime. But with the new approach of summer listen for his notes again. One who knows all about him sends us this malicious warning of his plans:

NEW YORK, April 14th.

"Any time these six months I have seen a skulking scoundrel who endeavored to avoid my notice, and always turned pale when he saw a copy of D.'s J. of M.—I pursued him rigorously and he confessed to me that he was the chief of sinners and that his name was 'Hafiz.'"

"But," said he, when he saw in my eyes the firm resolve to acquaint the editor with the fact that his correspondent was still living, 'but, oh! say that ———,' and thereupon he vanished, and I haste to discharge my duty, for, if I have a failing, it is doing my duty. Should you see the editor will you please state not only the fact, &c., but that I have heard the perjured Hafiz swear that not many moons should wane before he wrote to D.'s J. of M. a letter about things in N. Y.—'Our new music, and other things,' for instance.

"Hafiz, who tries to make me believe that he does the music in 'Putnam,'" says that in the May number he has commended your Journal! He is an abandoned fellow."

"Hafiz" is heartily forgiven,—that is, if he will only sing again; but this tell-tale correspondent, who knows him so well and has so little cause to feel ashamed of the intimacy, we forgive not for speaking of him in such disrespectful terms.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. That extra concert, our readers will be glad to know, comes off to-night; when the Club, with the assistance of Messrs. Suck, Eichler and Mass, will let us have a second hearing of the Octet that produced so fine an impression on the evening of Mendelssohn's birthday.

We must warn many of our music-lovers, too, that they are losing much in not attending the Wednesday and Saturday afternoon rehearsals of the Quintette Club, at the Masonic Temple. We have never enjoyed the music or the place so much as in these sunny afternoon Spring hours. Last time they performed the exquisite Quartet of Mozart in E flat, the posthumous Quartet (in F minor) of Mendelssohn, a Quintet by Mr. Ryan, &c. The audience, from a very small beginning, has been rapidly increasing; but there are still many missing who should be there, and three out of the six rehearsals are already gone. We doubt not that a later hour than three would be more convenient for many would-be listeners.

OPERA. The signs and rumors, which it had long become idle to report or trust, are at length coming to pass. Mme. SONTAG, as it appears by the official announcement below, is actually to open at the Howard on Tuesday evening, in what has been in New York and Philadelphia her most admired character of La Sonnambula. The place is so small, the season promised so short (only two weeks), the chance of prices by auction sale so high, and the dearth of opera here so long, (while the last that we look back upon was no whole opera, but only Alboni, with a few feeble surroundings,)—in short, kid gloves have had so few chances of late, that we may presume the Countess's opera will be fashionable.

There seems every reason, too, to believe that the opera, as a whole, will be excellent;—and that is what we look to most in Boston. A solitary transcendent prima donna does not constitute a lyric drama. SONTAG brings with her the full chorus and the picked orchestra of thirty, which have so contributed to her success in New York and Philadelphia; and the admirable ECKERT is conductor. We have not heard a full list of her principal singers; but Badiali, Pozzolini, Rocco, Mme. Pico, &c., are of the number. The pieces will undoubtedly be those which have been most admired in New York. Yet it would please Bostonians, could "Don Juan" be added to the list. Why is not Bosio here!

THE MUSICAL FUND SOCIETY have played at their two last public Rehearsals, and with great acceptance, a Symphony of Haydn new to Boston ears, namely the Ninth. These rehearsals still continue every Friday afternoon, and but for them the beauty and the charm of the Music Hall would be entirely shut up from us. The GERMANIA SERENADE BAND add much to the attractions.

NEW CLASSICAL MUSIC STORE. We call attention to the card of Messrs. White Brothers, who have opened an agency for the sale of André & Co.'s editions of the music of Mozart, Beethoven &c. It is their design, we understand, to keep a strictly classical music depot, where the lovers of such may find what they want without wading through piles of negro melodies and Woodbury bathos.—The Messrs. W. are well known for their skill as makers and repairers of violins and other instruments.

MASONIC TEMPLE. Our enterprising fellow-citizen, Jonas Chickering, Esq., has leased the ground floor and lecture hall of this building for a term of years, for the purpose of altering the interior of the edifice into grand show and sales rooms for the disposal of his popular instruments. The location of the Temple is very fine for this purpose, as it is near the business centre of the city, and the rooms will be accessible to strangers and lady visitors, without the annoyances incident to a crowded thoroughfare. We cordially wish Mr. Chickering complete success in the new enterprises in which he is engaged. The Temple will be fitted for his use as soon as possible.—Transcript.

Philadelphia.

MME. SONTAG has performed in Don Pasquale, Lucresia Borgia and Lucia di Lammermoor,—all apparently to the greatest satisfaction of the opera-goers, and closes her season with Maria di Rohan and the Figlia. It is now our turn in Boston.

The "GERMANIANS" gave four concerts, the concluding one on Monday evening. The adagio to the "Choral Symphony" figured in their last programme. JAEHL, who was detained in Boston for some time by sickness, joined them in the two last concerts and performed the Concert-Stück by Weber, besides lighter things. The assistance of the German "Young Männerchor" is highly commended. The Germanians are now in Baltimore.

MR. L. MEIGNEN, a long resident musician and leader of the Musical Fund orchestra, has composed a grand Mass, which was produced for the first time last Sunday evening at St. Mary's Church. The Bulletin says of it:

The choir numbered about thirty voices, and the orchestra was full in all its parts. The work is of a strictly religious character, and the music is in every phrase characteristic of the sentiment of the words. The Kyrie eleison is a solemn, majestic movement; the Gloria in Excelsis a lofty and exulting strain, and the succeeding passages are properly expressive of the language of the service. The Credo is a true representation of the confidence of a well-grounded belief, and as a mere piece of music is one of the most brilliant and effective passages we know of in religious composition. The Et incarnatus est, for baritone solo, with chorus, is very impressive and full of fine effects of harmony. A strict fugue (Et vitam) is the most pleasing thing of the fugue kind that we have heard. The Benedictus, (a quartet) will generally be regarded as the gem of the work, and the Agnus Dei (a quintet) is not only very ingeniously written, but is the very perfection of the style proper for that most solemn portion of the service. The Dona nobis pacem, for full chorus, is in a more cheerful vein and leaves a most pleasing last impression. Mr. Meignen, throughout the work, has proved himself worthy of the first rank as a composer. Not only in the arrangement of the vocal parts, but in the instrumentation also, has he shown his thorough knowledge of the art. The style of his composition is thoroughly religious, but less severe than that of the mass-writers whose works are standards. Still the constant flow of melody and the occasional employment of effects heretofore confined to dramatic writing, while they gratify the senses, are wholly free from meretricious ornament. Mr. Meignen has hit upon a happy blending of the two styles—the old severe and the modern dramatic.

Mme. SONTAG'S ORCHESTRA gave a concert this week at the Musical Fund Hall, with ECKERT for conductor, and played, among other things, the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven.

In addition to the above items, a friend in Philadelphia writes us the following:

"Mr. Thorbeck's Private Soirée Musicale, the third and last for this season, took place last Tuesday, (March 25th,) at Scherr's Piano Warehouse.

"It was a rich treat to hear the Piano Trio of Mayseeder, Piano quintet of Beethoven and the Piano sextets and septets of Beethoven and Onslow performed in so masterly a manner.

"Mr. T. showed again that he is not only an excellent solo player, but also—and what is more—as excellent a performer of chamber music. The programme I send enclosed. What a pity that such soirées are so rare. In that respect Boston is far ahead of Philadelphia.

"The Singing Academy is making rapid progress. It consists of a chorus of about forty ladies and gentlemen, mostly Germans, who perform the works of Mendelssohn, Kreutzer, &c. with great precision and feeling.

"Mr. Ph. Reiter, the conductor, deserves all praise for the pains he takes in establishing a Society of this kind, which is as yet the only one in this city, where secular music is performed."

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. The season has commenced, and as there is now no rival establishment, there is promise of brilliant times at Covent Garden. The Standard for March 22d, thus surveys the prospect:

The advertisement just issued by the enterprising manager of this undertaking, affords proof that he intends to pursue his course with the same activity that has hitherto characterized his connection with the Royal Italian Opera. Grisi stands at the head of the soprano; and with this great and unrivalled vocalist will be associated Castellan, so honorably known to opera and concert-room habitués. Madame Jullienne, who made so sensible an impression upon the audience in the great works of the Académie played last year, has been re-engaged; and likewise Mme. Bosio, the agreeable representative of Adina in the Elisir, who, though making but little sensation at first, improved in the opinion of the subscribers as the season advanced. Of Madame Medori, Mlle. Donzelli, and Mlle. Albini, we know nothing, though report has been unusually emphatic in its praises of the first-mentioned lady, who has gained laurels, it seems, at St. Petersburg. Only one contralto singer is mentioned—a Mlle. Nantier Didée from the Theatre Italien of Paris. This department, therefore, is anything but promising. The seconde donne are Mlle. Bellini and Mlle. Cotti, both useful artists, as we have frequently had occasion to know. Mario, who, we trust, has completely recovered his voice, and Tamberlik, supported by Stigelli, a sound and at all times an available singer, are the principal tenors; besides whom we are to have Luchesi, hitherto unknown in this country, Luigi Mei, and Soldi. The baritones consist of Ronconi and Belletti, the latter a very excellent engagement, remembering the cleverness displayed by him at Her Majesty's Theatre, for several seasons past. Formes and Zelger are the stars of the bassi profondi. The second of these artists came over here with the Brussels company, and three seasons ago was an adjunct of the Royal Italian Opera. His merits, consequently, are well known. This section is also strengthened by the useful Tagliafico, Polonni, Gregorio, and Rache. The manager entertains "sanguine hopes" that Mlle. Wagner will be enabled by "circumstances" to realize a "limited number of representations."

The foregoing constitutes the list of principal vocalists. The orchestra remains, of course, under the superintendence and conductorship of Signor Costa. Piatti and Bottesini, however, no longer hold seats in it, and by whom their places will be supplied, the advertisement does not inform us. A Signor Panizza, from the Scala, is to be the Maestro al piano; Signor Monterasi, the prompter; and the accomplished Signor Maggioni, the poet, as usual.

The advertisement promises the production of at least three out of six new operas which are mentioned. There seems to be no doubt of a version of Spohr's Jessonda, which has been arranged expressly for the Italian stage, and which will be conducted by the illustrious composer himself. The Benvenuto Cellini, of Hector Berlioz, is also among the probabilities. The other operas named are Verdi's Rigoletto, "performed with the greatest success at Venice and St. Petersburg," Rossini's Matilda di Shabran, Donizetti's Don Sebastian, and an opera by one Sig. Bonetti, entitled Juana Shore. The great French master-pieces—the Huguenots, the Robert, the Prophète, and the like, which have given such distinctiveness and importance to the Royal Italian Opera, we no doubt shall frequently encounter, and fare like this can never be unacceptable.

The ballet, we observe, is to be more considered than heretofore, and diversissements are to be given in conjunction with the operas which do not occupy the entire evening. The engagements, however, in this department, are not very remarkable. Mlle. Belina Marmet, Mlle. Barville, Mlle. Kolemberg, Mlle. Teresa, Mlle. Le-rieux, and Mlle. Mathilde Besson, suggest a group of light-heeled nymphs, but with whose attainments we are wholly unfamiliar, and of whom, fame, hitherto has not had a word to say. The maître de ballet is M. Desplaces, and the leader of the ballet Mr. Alfred Mellon.

The season commences on the 29th with, we believe, Masaniello.

SALE AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. The sale of the valuable properties and effects of Her Majesty's Theatre, adjourned from Monday last, in consequence of no advance having been made on the upset price of £12,000 for the whole in one lot, was resumed yesterday by Mr. James Scott. A goodly assemblage of theatrical managers and proprietors of saloons, with a very large number of brokers, were in attendance. Mr. Scott mounted the rostrum on the stage at 1 o'clock, and commenced by reminding his auditory that this was an adjourned inquisition as to the fate of Her Majesty's Theatre, for, upon the verdict of those present, would depend its future existence. If he failed in obtaining an offer for the whole property, it would be his duty at once to proceed to sell in lots, and then they might rely, the magnificent temple in which they were then assembled, would never more be a theatre. After reading the conditions of sale, and pointing out that the upset price had been reduced from £12,000 to £11,000, Mr. Scott urged his audience to favor him with a bidding, remarking that it was not simply a question of property, but a question of whether the national theatre should be kept open or not. He was earnest in saying, that if he had no bidding, the sale in lots would at once proceed. After a lapse of some duration, no offer having been made, the auctioneer adjourned to the concert room, where the sale was to be commenced. The articles sold consisted chiefly of a selection from the gentlemen's wardrobe, and most of the lots went at the price of old rags. 140 lots realized about £200. The sale will be continued for eleven days.—London Musical World.

Miscellaneous.

Spontini's La Vestale is to be revived with great splendor at the Grand Opera in Paris.

Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred" is to be brought out this month in Dresden.

The Hamburg papers tell a tale of a tenor of marvellous beauty and power having been found by a musician singing to a hurdy-gurdy in the streets, of his having been engaged on the spot at a large salary, and placed immediately under accomplished masters.

MISS CAROLINE LEHMANN, our admired cantatrice, is giving concerts, with her brother and other talent, in Cincinnati. May she be encouraged to sing them her best music. The "Germanians" will be there too, anon, so that she need not lack an orchestra.

MADAME BISACCANTI, at the last accounts, was playing in the Italian opera at Lima.

At St. Petersburg, at the close of La Sonnambula, in which Mme. Viardot performed, the Emperor of Russia left his box and went on the stage at the close of the second act. He offered Mme. Viardot his arm, and led her to the imperial box, where he presented her to the Empress and the Grand Duchesses. He presented her also with a superb ornament, and she was afterwards called out before the curtain twenty times.

"A Life on the Ocean Wave! Ho, ho, &c."—Mr. Henry Russell, a great charlatan, has put forth a scheme for "ameliorating the condition of the poor," by advertising in the programme of a week's entertainment, just concluded at the Strand theatre, that he will each evening present a ticket to every person on entrance, which will entitle them to a chance of obtaining a free passage to America. The drawing will take place after his entertainment.

BERLIN.—The Conservatory of Music will be opened to the public, on the 11th of April. It is engrafted on the old "Berliner Musikschule," which confined its instruction to the pianoforte, singing, string instruments, and the Theory of Music. To this will be added the organ, wind instruments, and harps, for which twelve new professors have been engaged, and embracing the most talented in our town. Rumor says, that the opening of the Conservatory will be ushered in with considerable clat under the guidance of Dr. Theodore Kullak, the esteemed pianist and composer.

Advertisements.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

NEW YORK NORMAL MUSICAL INSTITUTE.

GENTLEMEN and LADIES, who design attending the first term of the NEW YORK NORMAL MUSICAL INSTITUTE, and who wish to have board procured for them, are requested to give early notice to that effect. This will be necessary, in order to secure suitable accommodations; especially, as there is prospect of a large class.

Applications have been made by some who desire to attend the courses of lectures and other class exercises of the Institute, omitting the private lessons embraced in the full course. Notice is therefore given that the price of a ticket admitting the holder to all the lectures and class exercises, will be twenty-five dollars. Including the course of private lessons, the price is fifty dollars.

The term commences on MONDAY, APRIL 25th, 1853, and continues three months, during which time daily lectures and instruction will be given in the various departments of music, the design being to furnish thorough instruction, and especially to qualify teachers of music.

The assistance of THOMAS HASTINGS, Esq., and other eminent musicians has been secured.

Circulars containing further particulars may be obtained on application to MASON BROTHERS, (late Mason & Law), 23 Park Row, New York.

LOWELL MASON.
GEORGE F. ROOT.
WM. B. BRADBURY.

Mar. 5. tf

Pianos and Melodeons to Let.

OLIVER DITSON,

Music Dealer, 115 Washington St., Boston,

HAS a good variety of Piano Fortes, Melodeons, Seraphines, and Reed Organs, to let, for city or country, on low terms. If, within one year from the time of hiring, the party should conclude to purchase the instrument, no charge will be made for rent of it, except the interest on its value. 25 tf

TO PRINTERS.

MUSIC COMPOSITOR WANTED. One who is thoroughly acquainted with the business. Apply at this Office.

MADAME HENRIETTE SONTAG'S FIRST APPEARANCE IN OPERA.

The Public are respectfully informed that the First Night of the Opera in Boston will be

ON TUESDAY, APRIL 19th,
AT THE HOWARD ATHENÆUM,
When will be performed Bellini's Opera, in three Acts,
LA SONNAMBULA.

In which MADAME SONTAG will appear as AMINA; SIG. BADIALI as COUNT RODOLPHO; SIG. POZZOLINI as ELVINO; assisted by a competent and perfect GRAND CHORUS.

Especially attention is called to the unequalled perfection of MADAME SONTAG'S GRAND ORCHESTRA, which has created such an immense sensation in New York and Philadelphia, under the Conductorship of

CARL ECKERT.

It embodies all the prominent members of the New York musical societies, as well as all the solo players who have given so much clat to the orchestral performances of MADAME SONTAG'S Concerts in Metropolitan Hall.

LEADER.....MR. JOS. NOLL,
(The Celebrated Violinist.)

CARD.

For the purpose of discountenancing any speculation in tickets, to which the moderate price at which they have been placed may be an inducement, the choice of seats will be sold at AUCTION.

ON MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 18th.

The particulars of the manner in which the auction will be conducted, will be given in future advertisements.

The standard price of secured seats has been fixed at $2 00 and $1 50,

according to location. Both the $2 and $1 50 seats are numbered, and there is but one general entrance (and a free circulation) to all parts of the house.

With each ticket ($2 or $1 50) there will be given a certificate entitling the holder to a secured seat, good for the whole evening.

To prevent confusion in the interior of the house, no person can possibly be permitted to occupy any seat without producing the corresponding certificate.

All seats that may not be disposed of at the Auction can be had at the Music Store of

E. H. WADE, 197 Washington street.
Doors open at 7—Opera commences at 8 o'clock.

MME. SONTAG'S ITALIAN OPERA At the Howard Athenæum.

The subscriber will receive orders to purchase choice seats for MME. SONTAG'S Opera, at the auction sales, having a person especially appointed to attend them for this purpose. Every order must be accompanied by the standard price of each seat; and the premium paid, duly authenticated by the auctioneer, will be payable on delivery of the tickets. The tickets must be called for before 11 o'clock on the day of the Opera, or the money forfeited—10 per cent commission will be charged.

E. H. WADE, 197 Washington street.

CHAMBER CONCERT.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club

Respectfully inform their friends and the musical public of Boston, that they will give an EXTRA CONCERT.

ON SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 16, 1853,

At the Lecture Room of the Boston Music Hall.

ASSISTED BY MESSRS. SUCK, EICHLER, AND MASS.

Mendelssohn's celebrated Octette will be performed for the 2d time in America, and Beethoven's Quintette in C, &c.

Tickets at 50 cents each, to be obtained at the usual places. Doors open at 7; Concert to commence at 7½ o'clock.

NEW EDITION OF CARCASSI'S GUITAR BOOK. New and Improved Method for the Guitar, by M. Carcassi. Price $2.50.

This new edition of Carcassi's celebrated method embraces much valuable matter not contained in those previously issued. These additions are those which have been made by the distinguished author after an experience which enabled him to determine what was actually needed by the pupil for a thorough understanding of the art. The whole has been carefully translated by a well known Professor of the Guitar, and is thereby rendered as free as possible from those slight but perplexing inaccuracies which sometimes become a part of translations and reprints. A number of popular songs in each of the different keys have been appended, which together with the masterly instructions of Carcassi, and his plain yet comprehensive course of Exercises, furnish all that is desirable to both teacher and scholar.

OLIVER DITSON, Publisher,
115 Washington St.
feb 25

JUST PUBLISHED,

HAYDN'S THIRD MASS in D. Uniform with "Ditson's Edition of Mozart's, Haydn's and Beethoven's Masses." Price 62 cents.

Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

JUST PUBLISHED,

THE STABAT MATER, by Rossini, at the low price of 75 cents.

Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

Edward L. Balch,

MASONIC TEMPLE.

SIX PUBLIC REHEARSALS.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club

Will give a Series of SIX REHEARSALS, to take place on Wednesday and Saturday Afternoons,
Commencing April 6th, at 3 o'clock.

Packages of Six Tickets, $1: Single Tickets, 25 cts. each at the usual places.

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE, No. 86 TREMONT STREET, BOSTON.

WHITE BROTHERS,

DEALERS IN MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS,
Best Italian, German, French and English Strings,
AGENTS OF
J. André, Offenbach; and G. André, Philadelphia,
FOR THE SALE OF FOREIGN CLASSIC MUSIC,
CHOIR MUSIC, &c.

Instruments Made, Repaired, Tuned, Bought, Sold, or Exchanged, on the most favorable terms.

IRA J. WHITE.

A. WARREN WHITE.

iii 2 3m

Massachusetts Academy of Fine Arts.

THE FIRST SEMI-ANNUAL EXHIBITION of the Massachusetts Academy of Fine Arts is now open at its Rooms,

No. 37½ Tremont Row.

The Collection comprises some of the finest specimens of Pictures by American Artists.

Hours of Exhibition, from 8 A. M. until 6 P. M.

Single admission, 25 cents; Season Tickets, 50 cents.

Feb. 26. tf

THEODORE T. BARKER,

MUSIC STORE,

No. 381 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

Chickering's Pianos to let.

All Foreign and American Musical Publications received as soon as published. ii23 3m

N. D. COTTON,

IMPORTER AND DEALER IN

English, French, and American Stationery,
DRAWING & PAINTING MATERIALS,
No. 13 Tremont Row, Boston.

* * * Wedding and Visiting Cards Engraved and Printed.
16 tf

BEETHOVEN'S ORATORIO OF ENGEDI, or DAVID IN THE WILDERNESS, known as the MOUNT OF OLIVES, is this day published in a neat, convenient form for the singer or concert-goer by

Geo. P. Reed & Co., Publishers,
17 TREMONT ROW, BOSTON.
Jan. 8.

Germania Serenade Band.

THE SERVICES OF THIS ASSOCIATION can be secured by applying to

G. SCHNAPP, Leader,
364 Tremont Street.
ii 14 tf

J. W. TAVERNER, PROFESSOR OF ELOCUTION,

AT HIS RESIDENCE,

No. 30 CHARLES STREET, BOSTON.

J. C. WOODMAN,

ORGANIST AND CONDUCTOR OF MUSIC AT CENTRAL CHURCH,

Teacher of Singing, Piano Forte, &c.,

No. 94 Chestnut Street, Boston.

iii 2 3m.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.

FOREIGN MUSIC DEPOT,
GIRARD HOUSE BUILDINGS,
NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,
PHILADELPHIA.

N. B. The complete works, for Piano, (Quartets, Trios, Duets for Piano and Violin, Duets for four hands and Piano solo pieces), of BEETHOVEN and MOZART, as also the Piano solo Works of CLEMENTI and HAYDN, as published by J. André, Offenbach, in sets, at very low prices. We have appointed

Messrs. WHITE BROTHERS,

TREMONT TEMPLE, BOSTON,

our Agents for the sale of the above Standard Editions of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, &c. &c.

iii 2 tf

Letter-Press, Music and Job Printing-Office,

JONAS CHICKERING,

RESPECTFULLY gives notice to his friends and the public that, having recovered from the late disastrous effects produced by the destruction of his factory, he is now ready to receive orders for PIANOS, which he promises to execute with as much faithfulness and promptitude as heretofore.

379 Washington Street, Boston.

Mar. 5.

tf

HEWS' PATENT

AMERICAN ACTION PIANO FORTE.

THE MANUFACTURER is in possession of numerous testimonials from distinguished Musical Professors, who have used the greatly improved ACTION PIANO, commending it in high terms. The attention of purchasers and amateurs of Music to an examination of its superiority, is solicited.

GEO. HEWS, 365 Washington St., Boston.

Apr. 10.

tf

D. B. NEWHALL, MANUFACTURER AND DEALER IN PIANO FORTES,

No. 344 Washington Street, Boston.

PIANO FORTES REPAIRED, TUNED, & TO LET.

Apr. 10.

tf

SIGNOR G. C. GUIDI respectfully informs his former pupils and the public, that he has resumed his instructions in SINGING, after the Italian school, with the intention to settle permanently in Boston. In order to accommodate those who may not wish to take private instruction, he will open classes for ladies and gentlemen, on moderate terms. None but good voices will be admitted. Terms liberal for persons intending to study for professional purposes.

Sig. G. can be consulted free upon any musical subject, daily, from 12 to 2, at Mr. Hews's Piano Manufactory, No. 365 Washington street, where terms and time for classes may be known.

Orders or notes for Sig. G. may be addressed to him at G. P. Reed & Co.'s Music Store, 17 Tremont Row, and at Oliver Ditson's, 115 Washington street.

Feb. 5.

A CARD.

THE SUBSCRIBER respectfully offers his services to the public as Teacher of the Piano-Forte, the Violin, and of Singing, after a clear and easy method. He will also accompany pupils, both in seminaries and in private houses, in the practice of Duets, Trios, &c.

Address for the present at the United States Hotel.

March 26. 3m.

CARL GÄRTNER.

L. H. SOUTHARD, TEACHER OF MUSIC,

265 Washington Street, Boston.

Oct. 16.

3m

T. BRICHER,

Organist and Conductor of Music
At the Bowdoin Square Church.

OFFICE UNDER THE CHURCH... ENTRANCE ON CHARDON ST

Jan. 22. 3m.

H. S. CUTLER,

Organist at the Church of the Advent, also of the Boston Harmonic Society.

ADDRESS—(Care of A. N. JOHNSON,) No. 90 Tremont Street, Boston. i22 tf

F. F. MÜLLER,

DIRECTOR OF MUSIC AND ORGANIST at the Old South Church; ORGANIST of the Handel and Haydn Society; ORGANIST of the Musical Education Society, &c. &c. &c. Inquire of Messrs. REED & Co., No. 17 Tremont Row, Boston. ii7 tf

NATHAN RICHARDSON,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC.

Now in Europe; will return 1st of June. Letters may be addressed at 19 Hancock St. 25 tf

GEORGE F. WILLEY,

TEACHER OF MUSIC.

Private Tuition in the principles of Music and the Cultivation of the Voice.

MUSIC ROOM, THE LECTURE ROOM OF KIRK STREET CHURCH, RESIDENCE, 34 FRANKLIN SQUARE, SUFFOLK STREET, feb. 5. LOWELL, MASS.

A. W. FRENZEL,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC,

feb. 5. 4 Pine Street, Boston.

RATES FOR ADVERTISING.

For half a square, (8 lines,) or less, first insertion, . . . $0.50 each additional inser.25

For a square, (16 lines,) first insertion,1.00 each additional insertion,50

On advertisements standing three months or longer, a discount of twenty per cent. on the above rates is allowed.

(A column counts as seven squares.)

Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 School St.

DWIGHT'S Journal of Music.

A Paper of Art and Literature.

VOL. III.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 23, 1853.

NO. 3.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

TERMS....TWO DOLLARS PER ANNUM, (IN ADVANCE.)

CITY SUBSCRIBERS can be served at their houses by the further payment of fifty cents per annum.

For Rates of Advertising, see last page.

POSTAGE, if paid in advance, for any distance within the State, thirteen cents a year; if not in advance, twenty-six cents. To all places beyond the State, double these rates.

J. S. DWIGHT,.....EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St.

By REDDING & CO., 8 State St.

" GEO. P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row.

" A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.

" DEXTER & BROTHERS, 45 Ann Street, N. Y.

" SCHARENBERG & LUIS, 483 Broadway, N. Y.

" MASON & LAW, 23 Park Row, New York.

" G. ANDRE, 229 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St., Balt.

" COLBURN & FIELD, Cincinnati, O.

" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Persons willing to become Agents for procuring subscribers, especially Music-Dealers and Teachers, are invited to correspond with the Editor, as above. Satisfactory references required, and liberal commissions allowed.

Back numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Also BOUND copies of Vols I and II, at prices varying from $2.50 to $3.50.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

SPONTINI.

[From the French of M. Hector Berlioz.]

On the 14th of November, 1779, was born at Marjolati, near Jesi, in the Marche d'Ancone, a child named GASPARD SPONTINI. All that I know concerning the earlier years of Spontini, and which I have myself heard him relate, are confined to a few facts, which I will reproduce, without however attaching to them more importance than they deserve. When he was between twelve and thirteen years of age he went to Naples to enter the Conservatorio della Pietà. Was it at the desire of the child that his parents opened to him the gates of this celebrated school of music? or did his father, doubtless reduced in circumstances, think by entering him there to open to him an easy as well as a modest career, intending perhaps to make him chapel-master to some convent or church of second rank? Which of these motives might have actuated him, I know not. I willingly incline, however, to the second hypothesis, having in view the disposition for a religious life manifested by the other members of the Spontini family. One of the brothers was the curé of a Roman village, the other (Anselme Spontini) died a monk a few years since in a Venetian monastery, if I recollect aright, and his sister also finished her days in a convent, where she had taken the veil.

Be it as it may, his studies were sufficiently fruitful at La Pietà to enable him to write as many did, one of those follies, decorated in Italy, as elsewhere, with the pompous name of opera, which had for title: "I puntiglie delle donne." I do not know whether this first attempt was ever represented or not. Nevertheless it inspired its author with sufficient ambition and confidence in his own talents to induce him to fly from the Conservatory, and repair to Rome, where he hoped to encounter less difficulty than at Naples in the producing of his pieces upon the stage. The fugitive was soon caught, however, and under penalty of being reconducted to Naples was required to justify his escapade, and the pretensions which had caused it, by writing a carnival-piece. He had given him a libretto, entitled "Gli amanti in cimento," which he promptly set to music, and which was almost immediately represented with success. The public behaved to the young maestro with the enthusiasm common to Romans on such occasions. Moreover, his age and the episode of his flight had disposed the dilettanti in his favor. Spontini was applauded, called out, carried in triumph, and—forgotten in a fortnight. This brief success obtained for him at least his liberty. He was dispensed from returning to the Conservatorio, and received a very advantageous offer to go and write, as they say in Italy, at Venice. Here he is then, emancipated, left to himself, after a short abode in the classes of the Neapolitan Conservatory.

Here we think it most fit to attempt to clear up the doubt concerning the question which very naturally presents itself: "Who was his master?" Some say Father Martini—who died before the entrance of Spontini into the Conservatorio, and I believe myself even before he was born. Others, a certain Baroni, whom he may have known at Rome; others still ascribe the honor of his musical education to Sala, to Traetta, and even to Cimarosa.

I have not had the curiosity to question Spontini upon this subject, and he never appeared disposed to speak about it to me. But I have clearly recognized and received as an avowal in his conversation that the real masters of the author of La Vestale, Cortez, and Olympio were the masterpieces of Gluck, which he first became acquainted with on his arrival in Paris in 1813, and which he studied with passion. As to the author of the numerous Italian operas, the list of which I am to give, I think it of little importance to know what master taught him the manner of composing them. The manners and customs of the Italian lyric theatres of that time are faithfully observed, and the first-comes of the musicastres of his country might easily have furnished him with a formula which already at that epoch was the secret of comedy. But to speak only of Spontini the Great. I believe that not only Gluck, but also Mehul, who had already written his admirable Euphrosine, and Cherubini, by his first French operas, developed in him the latent germ of his dramatic functions, and hastened its magnificent development.

On the contrary, I do not find in his works any trace of the influence which, in a purely musical point of view, the German masters, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven might have exercised over him. The latter was hardly known by name in France, when Spontini arrived there; and the Vestale and Cortez already were achieving brilliant triumphs at the Grand Opera of Paris, when their author visited Germany for the first time. No, instinct alone in Spontini guided him, and suddenly revealed to him in the use of vocal and instrumental masses, and in the enchainement of modulations, so many riches unknown, or at least less resorted to in theatrical compositions by his predecessors. We will soon see what was the result of his innovations, and how they drew down upon him the hatred of his compatriots, as well as that of the French musicians.

Resuming the thread of my biographical sketch, I must confess my ignorance with regard to the actions of young Spontini after he had produced at Venice his third opera. I am no better informed as to the theatre at which he brought forward those operas which followed his third. Without doubt they were as little productive of money as of glory, for he resolved to seek his fortune in France, without being called thither by the public voice, nor by a powerful protection.

We know the titles of some thirteen or fourteen Italian scores composed by Spontini during the seven years which followed his first and ephemeral success at Rome. They are: L'Amor secreto; l'Isola disabitata; l'Eroismo ridicolo; Teseo riconosciuto; la Finta Filosofo; la Fuga in maschera; I Quadri parlanti; il finto Pittore; gli Elisi delusi; il Geloso e l'Audace; le Metamorfosi di Pasquale; Chi più guarda non vede; la Principessa d'Amalfi; Berenice.

He preserved in his library the MSS, and even the printed libretti of all these pale compositions, which he sometimes showed to his friends with a disdainful smile, as the playthings of his musical infancy.

On his arrival in Paris, Spontini, I believe, suffered much. He contrived to eke out an existence by giving music-lessons, and obtained the representation at the Théâtre Italien of his Finta Filosofo, which was favorably received. Notwithstanding what most of his biographers say upon the subject, I believe that the opera of Milton of M. Jouy, was the first attempt of Spontini to French words, and that it immediately preceded the insignificant work entitled, Julie, ou le Pot de Fleurs.

On the engraved title pages of these two scores we find, indeed, that Milton was represented at the Opera Comique on the 27th of November, 1804, and that Julie appeared March 12, 1805. Milton was pretty well received. Julie, on the contrary, broke down beneath the weight of the public indifference, like a thousand other productions of the same stamp, which are daily born, and die, without attracting the notice of any one. One air alone has been preserved by the vau-deville theatres; that is the air: Il a donc fallu pour la gloire. The celebrated actor Elleiron, became quite attached to Spontini, and wishing to furnish him with an opportunity for a revanche, he procured for him a libretto for a comic opera in three acts: La Petite Maison, which the imprudent musician had the weakness to accept. La Petite Maison was so completely damned that not a trace of it remains. The representation was not even finished. Elleiron played an important part, and, indignant at one or two isolated hisses, he forgot himself so far as to make a contemptuous gesture to the audience. A most frightful tumult was the result; the enraged pit rushed upon the orchestra, drove away the musicians and destroyed everything that came to hand.

After this double failure of the young composer, every door would necessarily be closed against him. But still he had a high protection, that of the Empress Josephine. She was good to her word; and it is certainly to her alone, that the genius of Spontini, about to be extinguished even before its rising, owed its power two years later to make its wondrous ascension into the heaven of Art. For a long time M. Jouy had preserved in his portfolio a poem for a grand opera, La Vestale, refused by Méhul and by Cherubini; Spontini solicited it so eagerly that the author at last decided to give it up to him.

Poor, cried down by the throng of musicians of Paris, Spontini forgot everything, and descended with eagle swoop upon his rich prey. He shut himself up in a wretched garret, neglected his pupils, and regardless of the first necessities of life, he applied himself to his work with that feverish ardor, that trembling passion, sure indications of the eruption of his musical volcano.

[To be continued.]

"Mozart's scores are the fairest in existence; but few as are his blots, he has given us no reason to wish he had blotted more."

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Military Music.

A REASON FOR ITS DEGENERACY—PROPOSED PLAN FOR A CITY BAND.

DEAR DWIGHT,—Allow me to draw on your patience and good nature while I refer once more to the subject of military music. I have been told that other, and more practical reasons, exist for the degenerate condition of our street bands, than those suggested in my communication of last week. And a principal one is, that, in most cities possessing abundant material for the purpose, there is not sufficient occupation for a band of proper construction and dimensions, to warrant the trouble and expense of keeping it up; in other words, it don't pay.

This is, no doubt, the true and plain statement of the case. On the ordinary occasions for street music, a few pieces only are engaged, for the very good reason that the price of more cannot well be afforded. Consequently, those few must be of the ear-splitting order, that lack of numbers and variety may be made up in noise. And I see no present probability of a change in this state of things, in our own city.

There appears, then, to my mind, but one way in which we can hope to obtain a properly organized force for out-door music, with a full complement of instruments,—and that is to enlist the patronage of the city in its support. Let an association be formed, which shall be called the Municipal or Metropolitan Band, if you please, with the stipulation that it shall be employed on all occasions of city celebrations, and the like, and to play for the benefit of the music-loving public two or three times a week, or oftener, upon the Common, in the pleasant evenings of summer.

No injustice would be done by this plan to any of the organizations for street music that now exist; for on all occasions of public demonstrations, the whole resident force, and more, will be called into requisition, besides. Nor do I mean any disparagement, by this proposition, to the various bands we already possess. They are excellent of their kind, and will, I venture to say, vie in superiority with those of any other city in the Union, so far as they go. But to produce the intended effect of a full instrumental band, in the open air, requires, as I stated in a previous communication, a combination of instruments, differing in kind and far exceeding in numbers any that, at present, exist amongst us.

An organization of the kind in question should number, at least, thirty pieces, exclusive of the instruments of percussion. Objections will, no doubt, be raised on the score of expense. To this I would reply that, in many ways, enough of needless, or, to say the least, questionable expenditures by the city, can be saved every year to provide for the enjoyment of the public, a band equal in capacity and in excellence to any on the Continent of Europe.

Say, citizens of Boston, shall not the attempt be made to carry into execution some such plan as is here proposed? There is especial reason why in this, rather than in most other cities, such a project should succeed. There are scores of excellent musicians who leave us every summer, for lack of employment, and who would gladly remain and labor with a will, as active members of the association, for moderate wages. We are favored with a more than ordinarily salubrious climate, and an atmosphere for the most part clear and bracing in summer, tempting hither the residents of more Southern cities during the warm months. The nights are wholesome, calling abroad the denizens in narrow streets by thousands to breathe the pure air that comes in, fresh and unobstructed, from many miles of open country to the westward. And our spacious Common is ample enough for all;—so large, too, as to prevent the interference with music from the noise and din of the streets. And who can doubt the beneficial influence of so elevating and rational an enjoyment, thus freely offered, upon the multitudes who would otherwise, perhaps, crowd the lurking places of low dissipation and vice?

SACKBUT.

[From the New York Tribune.]

The New Opera House.

The Legislatures of Massachusetts, New York and Pennsylvania have abandoned their ancient opposition to dramatic performances, and granted what formerly could not be obtained, charters under which stock-holders can unite, and without incurring risk beyond the amount of their subscriptions, build theatres or opera-houses as they have built colleges and cotton mills. The result of this enlightened legislation is beginning to appear. Already the sum of $250,000 has been subscribed for the Boston Opera-House, and the building is to be immediately commenced. In Philadelphia considerable progress has been made in subscriptions to stock for a house intended far to eclipse in magnitude and splendor any now existing; and in this City $165,000 have been subscribed to build an opera-house at the corner of Fourteenth street and Irving place, the building of which will be commenced as soon as a further sum of $35,000 is obtained, which the parties who have the matter in hand confidently expect will be immediately.

Having carefully read all that has been published in relation to these three projects, and made particular inquiries of those having them in charge, we have little doubt that the Philadelphia one will be the most successful, because it is neither a fashionable nor a real estate speculation, but a design to found and permanently sustain a great National Temple and School of Music, worthy of the era and of the American people. It is to be the National Opera-House, because it is designed for the representation of Operas in our own language, and as a school for rearing our own Artists, and will appeal to the whole people and not to any class for support. It is nearly the same with a project brought forward in Philadelphia in 1839, and from the complete and perfect details of which, as then published, has sprung every improvement introduced into the theatres and opera-houses since erected. Had the project then been carried out, the Art would now be half a century in advance of its present position. The scheme was a vast one and required a capital of nearly half a million of dollars, most of which had been subscribed when the great panic and commercial disasters, suddenly caused by the failure of several of the Philadelphia banks, led to its abandonment. We have before us the pamphlets published in 1839, describing the objects proposed in the Philadelphia Academy of Music and Grand Opera-House—and the system of direction intended to be pursued. All these seem so comprehensive and perfect, that we shall make a brief synopsis of them, in the form of a statement of the requirements of a great operatic and dramatic establishment and call to it the particular attention of the parties about to build the New York and Boston Opera Houses.

Up to this period every attempt to establish the Italian opera has failed. It is not an institution, but an incident dependent on the chance presence of some European prima donna. The Italian opera house in Leonard street failed, and was turned into an English theatre. Next the Astor-place opera house was built, failed, and is about to be demolished to make room for a Library. And now the ACADEMY OF MUSIC, as it is entitled in the Act of incorporation, is in all probability about to be erected in Fourteenth-st., and although no mention is made in its charter of its use specially, or indeed at all as an Italian opera house, yet that is the object of the stockholders, and as an Italian Opera House it is at least to be opened. Whether it can be kept open for that purpose after Grisi and Mario have inaugurated it and the charm of the novelty of their appearance has worn off, and when, as the case will be, scarcely a single world-renowned singer of the Italian stage will remain unheard in this country, forms a question for consideration and suggestion.

We are of opinion that no Fine Art can flourish in a country at second-hand. We believe it must be rendered National, and in the case of Music, be presented through the language the people understand. Basing thus our argument, we further believe, that Europe cannot supply this country habitually with singers. It is as much and more than she can do to afford them to her own principal Opera Houses. Whatever may be the first and absorbing use to which the Opera House may be put, in regard to Italian Opera, in conformity with its title of Academy of Music and the specific provisions of its charter, it should be obliged to educate artists, and to produce original works. It is to be established, says the charter, "for the purpose of cultivating a taste for Music by Concerts, Operas, and other entertainments, which shall be accessible to the public at a moderate charge, by furnishing facilities for instruction in Music, and by rewards of prizes for the best musical compositions." In this view, it becomes an object of national consideration, and we trust accordingly that the small sum comparatively required to complete the subscription will be speedily obtained.

The expense of sustaining an opera house so nurtured at home will be at most not more than one-fourth what it would be if the artists were brought from Europe. American vocalists would be content with some few thousand dollars a-year, and if they were sought for, and educated, boarded and lodged gratuitously the meanwhile, their services could be secured for several years in payment of the expenses of apprenticeship. In that way alone can the exorbitant demands of foreign artists be diminished, and the folly and extravagance of paying them from one to ten thousand dollars a night, as has been done in this city, will be forever avoided. The rule of political economy which makes that cheap and at the same time good, which we produce at home, will be more strongly evidenced in the Fine Arts than even in cloths or calicoes. It may be added, that this country, owing to its Common-School education, possesses more intelligent persons than any other; and there being the full average of fine voices, it enjoys extraordinary facilities for obtaining good subjects, mental and physical, for singers.

We wish, therefore, to see this economical and national feature of the New York plan equally insisted upon with that of the Philadelphia project. The Academy of Music should be above speculation. Its character should be benign and genial. If it be considered a platform for putting money in the pockets of the last adventurers from Europe, it will assuredly fail. We see no reason why wealthy men should not endow such an institution independent of the money principle. Our Colleges are so endowed, and why should not a College for Lyrical Art be equally esteemed? It is true we are on a false road: we have separated Art and Letters, which the great ancient masters of Beauty, the Greeks, deemed inseparable; hence their grandeur and immortality. But why cannot true principles of æsthetics guide us, and the analysis of sight and sound form part of a liberal education? An Opera House on a grand scale, with proper illustrations, magnificent scenery and a pervasively artistic spirit, makes a common appeal to the universal sentiment of the beautiful. It educates the eye and ear alike; it involves, too, through its poetry, the study of letters. In every relation of the fine arts it should be sustained. Separated from intemperance and vice of all kinds, it is a teacher of good morals and good manners. Such may it become, under the possibilities of our political and social institutions.

The permanent attractions of an Opera House are inseparable here from the use of the English language. With its use, the whole repertory of Italian, German and French Operas translated, as well as our own vernacular Musical Dramas, can be produced. The lyrical genius of the world can be presented through our own tongue. It is considered a good run for an Italian opera to be played six times in succession: but Cinderella in English was given sixty times in succession at the Park Theatre: and Amilie and The Bohemian Girl not less than forty times. Christy's Minstrels also have for years been nightly attended by some six or seven hundred people, while their audiences would have counted by tens if the language had been foreign. The reasons therefore for producing American artists are paramount. England can no more afford us a supply of singers in our own language than Italy can of Italians. By rearing American artists we indefinitely enhance the dignity of the profession; and the moral phenomena that our country affords in some other things, may radiate over the stage. In connection with this it may be mentioned that there are some Americans now studying for the operatic stage in Italy, and one, a lady of Boston, has appeared at Naples with success. It may yet come to pass that Art, in all its ramifications, may be as much esteemed as politics, commerce, or the military professions. The dignity of American artists lies in their own hands.

That Italian opera management in New York should thus far have failed is not surprising. High rent, making a few nights pay a whole year's rent, has been one of the causes. In London for 20 years, the system of making a season of 60 or 70 nights at the Italian Opera-House in the Haymarket pay a whole year's lease has been pursued. The rent has varied from $400 up to $1,000 a night. The latter sum was paid by Mr. Ebers during one season as appears by his published book. In the last 20 years every manager of that house has failed. At present it is unoccupied in consequence of Lumley's failure, and all its library, wardrobe, and fixtures, have been sold at auction. At the rival, Covent-Garden Italian Opera-House, as appeared by the proceedings in bankruptcy against Mr. Delafield, he lost in three years a fortune of five hundred thousand dollars, into the possession of which he had just come when he undertook the management. Lumley has been called one of the ablest managers in Europe: therefore there must be something in the system to cause failure like his and that of all those who preceded him, and it should be our aim to find out what the causes are and prevent their being engrafted on the opera in this country.

The success of the proposed ACADEMY, besides its possession of a National school of artists and composers, depends on various things connected with the auditorium. These may be recited as follows: The seats should be separate arm-chairs, each occupying a space of two by three feet, with ample passage-ways and lobbies. Then, between the acts people could easily leave them and return to their places; and in case of fire and alarm the house could be immediately emptied and without danger. Then there could not be practiced the present system of crowding, on attractive nights, six persons on a bench not wide enough for five, and filling the passage ways with chairs, so as to compel people to remain jammed into them, without possibility of change of position during an entire evening. Bodily torture is not a process to put a man through to enable him to enjoy an opera. A place of amusement should at least possess every comfort and luxury, which one would leave at home on going to it. It should be thoroughly well-furnished, in its lobbies, retiring and refreshment rooms, with pictures and statues to improve and gratify the taste.

All the Fine Arts to triumph individually must go together. For the same reason the scene-painting should be perfect and appropriate to every piece, and the dresses of all the actors, from the highest to the lowest, always historically exact as at the Paris Académie. There should be one only price of admission. This is the most important consideration of all. In Europe all people acknowledge the existence of classes. The middle classes speak of themselves as such, and with deference to the higher classes, and usually with contempt of the lower orders. Here, the case is different; all are sovereigns. No American man will take a lady to a second price part of the house, but he will be satisfied, with any, even if the worst place, if assured that all the places have been fairly allotted on the first-come-first-serve principle. There is no class here, as in Europe, able to pay two, three or five dollars constantly, but the whole community can pay fifty cents. Hence the house must be of the largest size; larger than any in Europe, where the private box system uniformly prevails. The proposed building will seat the enormous number of from 4,000 to 5,000 persons.

The selection of an Architect for an Opera House is a most important matter, as one well acquainted with acoustics in its application to architecture can erect a building of immense size in which all the spectators can see and hear. The objection to a vast theatre does not hold good against an opera house; musical sounds are easily heard at much greater distances than spoken words, and the effect of distance to the sight is almost overcome by the high perfection of opera glasses.

The ventilation, which embraces the cooling of the house to any required temperature in summer, as well as properly heating it in winter, is of the last importance. It is usually and erroneously said that Castle Garden is a model plan for a summer theatre, because of its coolness. Inside it is not cool; the balcony outside is, however. In the original plan of which we have been speaking, a system of ventilation appears to attain the object. It proposes the complete exclusion from the building of the external heat in summer by means of double-cased windows, and a perpetual supply of pure, artificially cooled air, which is to be introduced by pipes leading to shafts containing furnaces at the top of the building. The whole expense of this ventilating apparatus, if erected in the building, is estimated at ten thousand dollars. If it attain its object, as it doubtless can, it will increase the value of the property ten thousand dollars a year.

A wide lot is necessary, so as to have the auditorium, or audience-part, built in the form of a parabola or semi-circle with diverging sides, bringing all the audience near to the stage, and not on the old horse-shoe form, upon which the European opera houses are constructed. The Conservatory, or Musical School, should be in the same building with the Opera; an additional story would give scores of small practising and lodging-rooms for the pupils, who may be supported and instructed at an expense of $10,000 annually. There are in ordinary opera-houses no proper accommodations for the performers. This should be obviated, and handsome dressing-rooms for all of them, each with a bath-room attached, should be constructed. In a word, the principle to be followed, is to render the opera house artistic and attractive in every detail, before and behind the curtain.

The lot on which it is proposed to build in this city, was lately held by Mr. Phalen, who purchased it for the end in view. It is 204 feet on Fourteenth-st., by 122 feet 6 inches on Irving place. Fourteenth is a street 100 feet wide; Irving-place, one of 80 feet: this is a great advantage. There will be a covered carriage-way, so as to set people down inside, without exposure in bad weather. The vomitories will be ample; the staircases of the colossal order of European palaces. The solidity of the building will be remarkable. The space under the stage will be in this case 60 feet deep, to admit of scenic economies.

In the Philadelphia plan a lot of 150 by 240 feet, giving 36,000 square feet of ground is deemed essential to include all the requirements of such a house; how far the lot on Fourteenth-st., 122 by 204 feet or 25,000 square feet, can embrace the same, is a subject for inquiry.

If Boston, a city one quarter the capacity of New York, and with one-tenth of the transient population, can raise $250,000 for an opera, surely we can here. We trust therefore, there will be no delay. It may be added that a year ago, Mr. Lunley was willing to send out a first-rate Italian company, for such a house. One more point should not be forgotten: $50,000 should be invested as part of the stock, for scenery, dresses, library and properties, so that the cost to the manager should be simply current expenses, or so that he may put on any opera with but little additional outlay. His ability to give performances six times a week, and on yearly salaries, will, of itself, reduce the average expenses one-third each night. The current expenses of an opera are increased one-third or one-half, by its being an occasional and not a systematic thing. The absence of the pragmatical interference of government, as on the European Continent, will much increase the ease and economy of such a foundation fairly put in practice here.

We have presented our views at length on this matter, as we believe the business interests, as well as the popular taste and civility of New York are deeply concerned in having such a first-class lyrical institution self-supported in its artistic supplies, and forming a common growth with the national pursuit of high Art.

Gleanings from German Musical Papers.

[Prepared for Dwight's Journal.]

The Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, published at Leipzig, of Dec. 24, says, the songstress Tedesco, who is now exciting so much attention at Paris, is a German by birth, a native of Brunn, in Moravia. Her real name is Deutsch. In Italy she translated this into the Italian Tedesco, and under this name has gained a high fame, especially in America. She numbers at the present time 28 years, and is said, both in her voice (a contralto) and in her person, to resemble Johanna Wagner. She is very happily married to a Creole, but still retains the name by which she has become famous. Cornet and Meyerbeer, who heard her in Paris, have engaged her for Vienna and Berlin.

Meyerbeer's Prophète has recently been performed in Riga, Russia, under the title of the "Siege of Ghent, or the Spaniards in Flanders," because the original subject has "too subversive a tendency." John of Leyden is called John of Hamlise, and Fidés, Sally. Despotism does not fear the music, it seems, however much the text may displease it.

Richard Wagner has promised an opera, or rather a series of three operas connected together, upon the subject of the "Death of Siegfried" and the "Vengeance of Chreimhild"—a performance requiring three evenings. Gade and Dorn (of Berlin) are both engaged upon the same subject.

The Neue Zeitschrift farther informs us that "the Brothers Fries, from Schleswig-Holstein, have founded at Boston a Mendelssohn-Bartholdy-Quintette-Club, the object of which is to awake a taste for classic music." [The editor of the Zeitschrift should see this winter's file of our Journal—he might possibly think that some such taste was already awakened.]

The authoress of the original text to von Weber's Euryanthe, Helmina von Chezy, is living near Vevay, in Switzerland, and has become nearly blind.

In our articles on Richard Wagner, in Vol. II., we mentioned that they were founded upon Fétis' articles in the Gazette Musicale, and that Fétis was for the most part unfriendly to the German composer. The Neue Zeitschrift, which may be looked upon somewhat in the light of Wagner's organ, has the following savage paragraph upon the French critic.

"M. Fétis published some months since in the Gazette Musicale seven long articles upon Richard Wagner, his life, his system, his works and his party in Germany, of which we have hitherto taken no notice, because that paper is as good as not read at all in Germany, and the French journals would hardly dare to translate and publish any answers which we might write to M. Fétis. In whose interest that gentleman writes the world knows; but that he has no hesitation to falsify in the most shameless manner—of this at least we will give one example in proof. Of Tannhäuser he affirms that it could only be produced twice in Dresden. This assertion is sufficient for itself and for M. Fétis; for that opera has, within the period of three years, lived through 19 performances in Dresden."

Whatever may be the real merits of Wagner's operas, it is certain, as we see in our German files passim, that both the Tannhäuser and Lohengrin are making their way into all the principal opera houses of Germany; and that notwithstanding the excessive disgust with which the English critic of the London Athenæum was inspired at a representation of one of them, as they become better known they are slowly winning something more than the approbation of the learned, they are becoming popular. In Breslau, Tannhäuser was given seven times during the first three weeks of its performance there, and at the close of January had been given fourteen times. At Leipzig, Feb. 6th, Tannhäuser was produced for the fifth time.

On the 7th of April OTTO GOLDSCHMIDT gave a private concert in Berlin. The D minor Trio of Mendelssohn, and compositions by Thalberg, Chopin and himself, were produced. The Neue Berliner Musikzeitung says that all that is demanded of the most distinguished virtuoso is fulfilled by him, and that his taste for Mendelssohn and classic music makes his worth as an artist still higher. Mrs. Goldschmidt did not sing, and Johanna Wagner supplied the place which she would formerly have filled.

Miss Westerstrand, the new Swedish singer, has been singing Rode's variations, in the "Daughter of the Regiment," at New Strelitz. Her voice and school are praised in the highest terms.

A correspondent of the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung, says, "The rumor which has been extensively spread by the newspapers of the death of Oulibicheff, the author of the celebrated book on Mozart and his works, can most decidedly be declared untrue. I met him recently in Nichni-Nowgorod and conversed with him, and to-day have received a letter from him. He is about to write a work upon Beethoven." The paper from which this is taken is dated March 14th.

There is getting to be a wonderful-female-child-violinist for every city in Europe. Virginia and Caroline Ferni, rivals of Theresa Milanollo, have just appeared in Paris. Theresa, by the way, has given a long series of concerts in Berlin this winter. She gave twelve in the Grand Opera House and at the last the house was filled! Judging from all we find in the European press she must be one of the greatest violinists living.

The story of Alboni in the Massachusetts House of Representatives has travelled into the German papers, but the scene is laid in the House of Representatives at Washington. One gives the story thus: "Some of the members became aware of Madame Alboni's presence in the spectators' gallery, upon which Mr. Bedford (!) made a motion that the assembly should show her some mark of attention. The motion was greatly opposed and the matter was ended by the President (!) requesting that the orders of the day be taken up, so that the newspapers might take no notice of it. He did not succeed in his wish apparently."

Breitkopf and Härtel of Leipsic have published a new edition of Beethoven's Leonore ("Fidelio"), in which the music of the original work as at first performed is given. The edition has been carefully prepared by Prof. Otto Jahn, "out of the original Beethoven Manuscripts, from copies and the original Theatre parts." It is said to surpass the later arrangement known as "Fidelio" in small particulars, but to be greatly inferior to it as a grand and artistic whole.

The Funeral Mass composed by Cherubini in his 77th year was recently performed in the Church del Carmine, at Turin, by a chorus of 120 and an orchestra of 80.

Who has not sung the vocal pieces of Conradin Kreutzer? He died in 1849, leaving a widow and daughter. The latter had a fine voice, thoroughly cultivated, but mainly owing to grief at the loss of her father, lost it, and determined to become an actress in the spoken drama, and for this purpose she went to Vienna to study. During the past winter a nervous disorder has forced her to give up the profession. As poor Kreutzer left no property, the widow and daughter are in a most unfortunate condition.

The following is the report of the monthly performances at the opera house in Leipsic for the month of January. Jan. 4. "Merry Wives of Windsor," by Nicolai (German). 6th. "Oberon," Weber (do.). 8th. "Robert the Devil," Meyerbeer, (do.). 9th. The "Elixir of Love," Donizetti (Italian). 11th. "Der Freyschütz," Weber (German). 14th. "Lucia di Lammermoor," Donizetti (Italian). 18th. "Barber of Seville," Rossini (Italian). 31st. "Tannhäuser," Wagner (German).

Theodore Uhlig, one of the editors of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, and of the most zealous champions of Richard Wagner, died on the third of January, aged 31.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

How to Manage the Choir.

DEAR MR. EDITOR:—Knowing your desire to see the love of real church music grow and diffuse itself in our community, I send you herewith, as bearing on the subject, an extract of a letter I lately received from a young Strulldbrug, a particular friend of mine; which you are at liberty to make use of should you think the hints of any value to our dear countrymen. It may possibly incite some of our societies to consider the character of their musical performances, and perhaps to improve them by a study of what may be recognized as sound authority in the matter. As some of your readers are ignorant of my friend's language I have translated it, but have endeavored to preserve the tone and as far as possible the style, as nearly as our idiom will admit of it.

The letter is dated at Luggnugg, and after telling me the news of the Court and town he goes on to say:

"The society of which I speak is one of eminently high principles, a regarider of precedent, and generally opposed to innovations, which are too readily entertained by those of a low caste. They have made constant endeavors to bring their music to a point of excellence, in which many organists have been tried and the choir sifted and reformed so often that its complexion has been as changing as a dolphin's, and certainly with the happiest result so far as variety is concerned, though not perhaps with entire success, considering the end proposed to be accomplished. From so many experiments, however, some most valuable truths could not fail to be deduced, which cannot be too widely known.

"In forming and conducting a choir, absolute authority should be vested in a committee chosen for abilities a few of which I will mention.

"They should be long-headed, self-made men, as practical as possible, and withal shrewd at a bargain; for it is too well known to deserve mention, that musicians are, almost without exception, the keenest, sharpest, nearest traders to be found, and so snug that they can generally hold off and treat with a committee-man till he is forced to come to their terms.

"They should have a proper contempt for all music besides psalmody, such as operas, symphonies and even oratorios, which are after all only agreeable to an acquired taste, however some affected people may extol them; and any child can say that the wisest way of attaining to excellence in any one-branch of a science is by eschewing all its others.

"Another excellent rule is that of letting the choir know their place clearly, without that strained delicacy which prompts certain well-meaning but weak people to suggest and opine, merely from conscious ignorance, when they should only command. I have known some of these amiable ones to assert that musicians, even more than other artists, are sensitive and susceptible; but when they tell you in the same breath that the same class are often improvident and pressed for money, two such statements merely contend for superior absurdity, and may be passed over by any sensible person without so much as a reply.

"The choir should be allowed no taste or discretion whatever, but should be in the smallest details subject to the direction of the committee, or to that of any dull pedant they may appoint. All members of the church should be encouraged to press upon the committee their individual ideas, which would guarantee a result pleasing to all, and serve more than anything else to perfect the style of performance.

"Our committee are so admirable an example of what I would advocate that I cannot forbear dwelling on them for a moment. They were selected with a foresight and judgment on which our church may well plume itself. They are sharp business men, cool and prompt in trade, and indeed I would not fear to back them at a bargain against almost any dreaming artist I know of. They professedly despise music, and call all singing squawking (a mere pleasantry you will of course understand, inexpressibly entertaining to musicians). Their understanding with the organist is of the frankest nature. His position is anything but equivocal, and his mind kept free from conflicting doubts, which might be prejudicial to his inspiration. He knows that he can either play what he's told to, or clear out. Could anything be more satisfactory? Yet such I grieve to say is the ingratitude and folly of the Luggnuggians, particularly the musical portion of them (who are not as with you, the most yielding, unopinionated, easily managed creatures that ever existed) that several of our hired performers have refused to obey some most reasonable orders, preferring loss of wages to what they facetiously termed fickle-thickheadedness and even disrespect.

"I am proud to say that such ludicrous exhibitions of spirit are uncommon, and the class generally allow themselves to be guided with commendable meekness. I may whisper to you that they are too jealous of each other to act with unanimity, which might be fatal to our authority, and until they find this out things will undoubtedly go on in the good old way.

"One happy result of our many experiments has been the bringing to light of several facts, so novel that I long to have them known in your country, where they doubtless will be received with reverence and treated with all the consideration they deserve. One of our committee discovered, one fine day, that Te Deums were of an irreverent tendency, and desecrated the church; which the society agreed to at once, wondering it had not before occurred to the world. They were accordingly proscribed—only, in a mistaken spirit of conciliation to a small minority, it was allowed that once in a while they might be sung, arranged to a modern psalm tune; and once a year, at Christmas, even to the secular music of Boyce or Purcell. This minority is so inconsiderable a fraction of the society that I am ready to apologize for mentioning it. Will you believe, my dear friend, that at this late day some of the most obtuse will still affect to compare the old masters with the modern professors—and actually persist in re-asserting the long-exploded opinion that a life of culture, even from early years, is conducive to pre-eminence in the science of music; and that an old Mus. Doc. is in any respect the superior of a modern free and independent professor, even though the latter may have devoted the larger portion of his life to trade or mechanical pursuits.

"Another committee-man, naturally piqued at the eclat gained by his colleague, bethought him suddenly that voluntaries were in some respects a desecration, and especially the organ itself, as the author of them, and proposed singing without accompaniment; which, though the impudent minority styled it an innovation, was accepted by nearly the whole of the society, who adopted it with acclamation, and proposed to encourage congregational singing. So the organ was closed, the choir dismissed, and their places supplied by delegates from the pews. The music at once assumed a devotional (some thought even a snuffling) character, but we won't praise it too extravagantly at first. An old lady has probably immortalized herself by suggesting that each of the congregation should sing whatever hymn and tune seemed appropriate to his or her frame of mind. This has not been tried yet, but is almost certain to be, since we've tried every other scheme that has ever turned over.

"As the fairest actions are always open to cavilling, and as even the most insignificant Luggnuggian is suffered to think what he pleases, an insolent fellow ventured to hint that it seemed to him almost as if our music savored in a very slight degree perhaps of a camp-meeting rather than of a church; but he was instantly bullied into eating his words and holding his tongue for the future.

"All things are possible, and it may be that some new notion in the way of church music will be evolved some time or other, when be sure I shall hasten to acquaint you with it."

GULLIVER.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 23, 1853.

Madame Sontag's Opera.

So we write down our text, and not "Madame Sontag in Opera," because in a true work of lyric art the prima donna is not all in all, but the chief interest of the performance lies in the perfection of the ensemble. A good whole opera is a thing which it is a greater gain to have witnessed, than it is to have heard and seen the greatest singer and actress, or even the three or four greatest on one stage. And we hasten to give credit to Henriette Sontag for studying the unity and integrity of her drama as a work of art, apparently with as much care as she has studied her own individual success;—in short for identifying her own success with that of the opera as a whole. It requires mind and thinking to do that; and that is what, as a general rule, distinguishes a great German from a great Italian singer, whether in theatre or concert, that the former seeks to realize the intellectual enjoyment of a complete, consistent, well-proportioned, perfect whole, as complex as it may be without loss of unity; while the latter places herself between you and the opera or the composer, invites all your attention to the beauty of her voice, her execution and her personal witchery, and is content with threadbare back-ground, third-rate accompaniments, braying orchestra and bawling chorus, serving chiefly as it were for foil to her own sweetness and artistic finish. Our German may have a less fresh and luxurious voice, less gushing and spontaneous pathos, less personal attraction; yet she invites us to a satisfying whole, in which, though she be the soul and centre, yet there is no part that does not seem equally indispensable to the charm.

In La Sonnambula, as given at the Howard Athenæum on Tuesday, Mme. Sontag's opening night, we felt that we enjoyed, for the first time in Boston, a good opera as a whole. We have had operas better in certain specialities. We have had greater excitements. We have had greater aggregates of talent on the stage at once. Nay, (and perhaps here we utter a bold heresy,) we have felt a deeper thrill of soul, imagination, genius, (to say nothing of voice in its fresh prime,) in a prima donna, than we felt here once in a whole evening of artistic beauties of unquestionable excellence;—felt it, we may say, in prime donne of far humbler pretensions than this one. But those things singly do not suffice for that very complex and harmonious pleasure which should result from a good opera. Single gems shine falsely in a bad setting. Your out and out furori and champagne intoxications are not the best effects of Art. Many fine artists in one opera do not necessarily make the opera complete, or good;—it might be better and yet contain fewer good things. And the personal magnetism of one badly supported singer of genius, even were she first-rate, excites in you a personal interest and admiration, still leaving you minus the artistic satisfaction that you sought.

The Sonnambula of the Sontag troupe charmed us as a whole. With the confession of having become somewhat blasé to Italian Opera, as we have heard it, we did really experience a fresh sensation and carry away a new satisfaction from the performance of Tuesday night. For the first time in any opera here, we had a chorus, numbering we think twenty-four, which did not bawl and scream. There was little, if any, of that fish-market quality of voice in the female portion of it, which we had grown to believe a fixed peculiarity of the Italian opera. The voices were true and prompt, well blended and subdued. For the first time, too, almost, there was an orchestra that did not bray and crash and smother all with most preponderating brass. Thirty good instruments, under the skilful sway of ECKERT, produced always euphony. They proved their virtue at the outset in the overture to "William Tell," (the Sonnambula having no overture of its own,) and afterwards brought out all the beauty of the Bellini accompaniments, while giving full opportunity to the softest modulations of the voice. In a word, the musical ideas (to our taste the freshest and most beautiful in any of Bellini's works), were never murdered or obscured by scrambling hurry or obstreperous noise. The piece was well put upon the stage. A refined propriety pervaded the performance; and this, reflected back from the very large, refined and intellectually well-pleased audience, made the old shell of a theatre look and feel a better place than usual, and actually seemed to transform for the time being that old homely, shabby scenery into a sort of interesting quaintness. It certainly was not a great performance; and therefore all the more we mention these things as showing what a power resides in conscientious art, if it be only genuine.

Mme. SONTAG's Amina was an admirable impersonation; in look, dress, action she was the charming, sincere peasant girl with a refined nature, on the eve of the most interesting event in life. All the little by-play was consistently and gracefully kept up, and there was a development of stronger passion in the tragic second act, which one could hardly credit to her who had only heard her in the concert room. Now and then there was, to our taste, the fault of over-action. Thus the dragging herself upon her knees across the stage, in the struggle with her lover in the Count's chamber, seemed to exceed the bounds of true Art. Nothing, to be sure might exceed the agony of Amina's situation, supposing it real life; but we doubt if all should be represented; a little reserve, we think, is wholesome in ideal representations, as in actual manners. Again, in the extreme reaction of joy and rapture, when the fatal cloud is dissipated, in the finale: Ah! non giunge, we felt that that violence of action conveyed less of the contagion of joy, than we have received from a more quiet manner. The fresh, bright tones of rapture ought legitimately and principally to do the work. In this finale, too, the dryness of the singer's low tones was some drawback; and—(we name it from no spirit of fault-finding, but because it is absurd and toadyish to pretend to find all perfect, where in the nature of things it cannot be)—the wear of her voice, wherever the full voice was required in trying passages, was quite perceptible throughout. This it should be no offence to name, for it deducts not one particle from Sontag's merits in the higher senses as an artist; on the contrary it gives us opportunity again to bear witness to the consummate skill with which she conceals the natural effects of time by the exquisite devices of art. It was music that admitted of much of that fine sotto voce embellishment, which is her peculiar skill; while everywhere, in recitative and song, in the tender love passages, and in a thousand little things which go to make up the fair whole of Art, although we may not note them, she approved herself a thinking and consummate artist;—and that is the charm in a lyric singer that should outweigh all others, at least until we can have with it also the magnetism of heaven's rarest gift of genius.

Sig. POZZOLINI, the Elvino, had been ill and his voice, in music so severely trying, soon betrayed fatigue; yet as far as it went his tenor was extremely sweet and musical, and (bating a little tendency to sentimentality) he expressed the tenderness and pathos of the Bellini melody as we have seldom heard it. He bore the part of the peasant lover well, and quite won upon the audience by the naturalness of his action, particularly in the jealous part, and in the parting duet (so sweetly sung and acted) with Amina on the night before the wedding. This duet, we believe, has commonly been left out.

The contrast of the two men, this young and sensitive and simple Elvino, with BADIALI's manly, self-possessed and dignified Count Rodolpho, was one of the happy points of the presentation as a whole. Badiali, always magnificent, in voice and manner, was entirely satisfying and himself on this occasion. The parts of the mother and the coquette Lisa were respectably done, never offensive, and the action and grouping of the chorus partook of the ease and refinement of their singing.

The opera must have been good to have afforded us so much which it is pleasant to record, when we heard it from the narrowest minimum of a seat, which might have been invented for a machine of torture, quite as well as for what is facetiously called "accommodation of the Press."—Speaking of accommodations, we thought it a sin and a shame that the upper gallery (a place heretofore frequented nightly by the best amateurs of opera who have to take the pleasure economically or not at all), was closed up and empty; and we were glad to see that the device of the one dollar "Standee tickets" (barbarous term, worthy of the invention) proved not so attractive as to greatly crowd the lobbies.

Opera and other Music in the "Far West."

The city of Milwaukee, in Wisconsin, is in possession of a musical privilege, enjoyed at present by no other city in the Union: namely, a German Opera, with full orchestra, chorus and principal singers. And what is more, it is likely to be domesticated there, since the performers are all resident Milwaukians. It is well known that the German element enters largely into the population of that young and growing giant of a city; and wherever Germans make their home,—such Germans as come over in these days, not such as settled Western Pennsylvania generations since and always set their faces against the introduction of free schools and all sorts of enlightenment,—they carry with them good seeds of artistic culture and of a cheerful, rhythmical social life.

We met a lady friend at the last Handel and Haydn Concert, when the "Creation" was performed, who had just returned home on a visit from Milwaukee, who told us that, a week or two before, she had there listened to the same oratorio, performed wholly in German, by a chorus of two hundred resident Germans, and a good orchestra, and that the style of the performance was superior to that of our old Society. Pretty well that for the newly peopled Western wilds! But for the opera.

The piece selected for the first performance was Lortzing's "Czar und Zimmermann" (The Czar and the Ship-carpenter), which has been given, we doubt if so well, or on so full a scale, by a company of Germans in New York, and which seems to be the favorite opera of the day among the multitude in Germany. The plot is founded on the life of Peter the Great, disguised as a workman, in the docks of Holland, involving him of course in a love adventure with a young damsel; and many of our readers may have seen the same thing dramatized on the stage of our Museum and other theatres. The first performance was given on Friday evening, April 8th, in Metropolitan Hall, before a public that had long been on the qui vive for such a musical treat. We glean the following sentences from an account in the Milwaukee Sentinel:

"After a due amount of breathless anxiety, the overture by a full orchestra was given with fine effect. Up rolled the 'baize,' &c., and behold as romantic a crowd of ship-carpenters meet one's eye, as it would expect to see in dream land. Amid broad axes and grins, and strange apparel, it was pleasant to behold many a well known friendly face and form metamorphosed for the nonce. In this scene the genuine Peter (Mr. Brackel) trolls a merry lay, and a fine chorus, performed with much spirit, brings it to a close. The success of the Opera was, at this early stage of its progress, a fixed fact. As a work of art it must stand well the test of criticism; for the untutored ear it is filled with gems which cannot fail to give delight. To the amateur its harmonies and rich clustering beauties, vocal and instrumental, will ever render its performance and study a rich and satisfactory treat. In plot and general interest it is superior to any comic opera of the Italian school that has been performed in the States. Its humor is more human and less clown-like than that which pervades the southern musical comedies; at the former you laugh understandingly; at the latter if at all, ridiculously. It would be impossible in a sketch like this, to note all the good points made by the actors in its first performance here. They were all good, and might have trod the board for years for all the audience might have seen to the contrary. The self-complimentary song of Von Bett the Burgomaster (Mr. Balatka) was given with rare gusto. That gent's inimitable 'getting up' and acting was applauded to the echo throughout the evening; not overdone even to a hair's breadth, it was the embodiment of the self-conceited, pursed up, greedy, and greasy old official; a very dogberry of a Burgomaster. What could be more admirable than his acting and singing before the carpenters, in teaching the music lesson (what a gem that was by the way!) where he finally comes under suspicion, and his quarrel with the Czar—his duet with Peter, No. 2. How wonderfully good it all was! Mr. Brackel, as the Czar, of whom much was expected as a vocalist, though but little as an actor, surprised the audience in the latter qualification and displayed with much discrimination the deep feeling, pride and generosity which belong to the character. His fond recollection of childhood was given with a pathos and power which reminded me of Bettini; his farewell song was a fitting finale to his praiseworthy effort. He has a fine baritone voice, which approaches in its compass to the tenor and seems to blend with it;

it is capable of rendering music which touches the heart with great effect. Nothing but a slight huskiness mars its beauty, and it is to be hoped use will do away gradually with this throat difficulty.

Mrs. Mahler appeared before her numerous friends, as Maria, the heroine of the opera. She dressed the part admirably, and displayed much self-possession; acting and singing with that delicacy and taste which shows refinement of feeling and intense love of art. Surely our society is much indebted to this talented and amiable lady for her devotion to the cause of music. Mr. Richter went through his rôle in a manner very creditable to him as an amateur. Mr. Beiderman, the French Ambassador, presented a very courtly appearance; his voice was more flexible and potent than usual, and occasionally took one of those hoists, (to use an unmusical expression) which are an agreeable relief to the usual dead calm of his solo singing. The Russian and English Ambassadors did the little they had to do well. The Sextet in the second act was one of the gems of the evening and was rather overlooked by the audience, no doubt to the surprise of the performers. Praise of the chorus and orchestra was in every mouth. Natural genius and severe drilling produced a result which our city has reason to be proud of, a result perhaps never equalled in the country, certainly not by local talent; it might have been shown Maretzek himself, as a musical wonder from a wooden country, where but a few short years ago "the rank thistle nodded in the wind and the wild fox dug his hole unscared."

Mr. Balatka, after the fall of the curtain, was loudly called for and acknowledged the compliment in a few appropriate remarks. Mr. Brackel also obeyed a similar call. H.

JENNY LIND'S LETTER. The N. Y. Tribune gives the following improved version of the extract from a private letter to the Swedish consul Habicht, which appeared first in the Musical World and Times, and which completely sets at rest the idle and malicious rumors to which we have before referred.

The extract from Madame GOLDSCHMIDT'S letter, recently published in the city papers, seems worse than Coptic to readers generally. The mis-translation of the last word, and the erroneous printing of the original have bewildered the sense altogether. We give below a correct version of the extract, accompanied by a literal translation, which may serve to clear up the doubt as to Jenny's meaning, and prevent ridiculous surmises of domestic infelicity. Otto's hard work is undoubtedly musical composition, which would naturally keep him closely at home. What "changes" are referred to we cannot guess, but the idea of discord is out of the question. After stating that they are both well, Madame G. says:

"Otto är mycket god och snäll. Han arbetar jemt; Otto is very good and sweet. He works constantly; är hemma jemt; vänlig jemt; densamma till is at home constantly; kind constantly: the same to beförlilliga vännen alltjemt; tänker bara på min väl, och depended-upon friend always; thinks only of my weal, and min förnöjsamhet; och bär et lugnt stilla mod my contentment-of-mind; and bears a serene, still spirit i alla växlingar." in all changes.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. The Extra Concert, given in the Lecture Room of the Music Hall, last Saturday evening, was one of the most satisfactory chamber concerts of the season. It opened grandly with that never-failing old favorite, Beethoven's Quintet in C, op. 29, and closed with the Ottetto of Mendelssohn, for four violins, two altos, and two violoncellos, whose full, strong tide of harmony seemed to bear the composer's thoughts proudly along, and the imaginations of the audience sympathetically with them. The work more than confirmed the favorable impression of the former hearing. Both the Quintet and the Octet were performed in the best manner of the Club, assisted in the latter by Messrs. Suck, Eichler, and Mass, of the Musical Fund Society. So too were the introduction and two first movements from Mendelssohn's Quartet in E flat, op. 12, including that quaint and fascinating little "Canzonet," which sounds so wild and ballad-like, as if it had sprung into being like one of the primitive melodies of the people, at the same time that it has all the refinement of modern art.

The violoncello solo by Mr. WULF FRIES was quite the model of what a solo should be in such a concert. It was short, select, simple,—entirely free from clap-trap variations and embellishments;—just a neat, artistic and expressive rendering of one of Mozart's perfect little melodies, which has had no opportunity here to become hacknied; namely Wie schön ist die Liebe, (in Italian, Un'aura amorosa) from "Cosi fan tutte." Mr. RYAN, too, gave a pleasing and not too ambitious clarinet solo by Müller, on themes from Il Pirata.

The Lecture Room seemed to impress everybody as an excellent place for music of this kind. Such certainly was our own experience, quite contrary to our impression at Mr. Dresel's concert in the same room. Was it owing to so small a change as the placing of the instruments this time upon a platform, a foot or more above the floor? The audience was a most attentive and delighted one, of about the number that was usually assembled at the Masonic Temple. The Lecture Room well filled (it holds some 900 persons) would be just the audience which the Club need and deserve, and we trust another winter will see that realized.

Our Carrier for the West end of the city distributed last Saturday some eighty copies of No. 1, instead of No. 2, before he discovered that he had snatched up the wrong bundle. The mistake was at once rectified so far as serving each house again with the right number. But as our supply of No. 1 runs short, we shall feel obliged to any of the twice served subscribers, if they will send us back the extra copy, unless it be too late.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

The last of the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB Rehearsals takes place at three o'clock this afternoon in the Masonic Temple. They have been choice and delightful opportunities of hearing much of the best of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and Mendelssohn in a genial, unceremonious, social way. Go this afternoon, for we see no more prospect of Chamber Music this Spring, since Mr. AUGUST FRIES, the leader of the Club, is to take the steamer next Wednesday for Europe. Could any arrangement be made to supply his place, we are quite sure that such Rehearsals would find larger and larger audience for a month to come.

Mme. SONTAG, with her principal singers, and fine orchestra, is to join the HANDEL and HAYDN SOCIETY to-morrow evening, in another performance of Rossini's Stabat Mater;—the whole under the conductorship of ECKERT. Of course it will be admirably rendered, but we wish that the "Sacred Concerts" of prime donne did not always mean Rossini's Stabat Mater, as if the brilliancy of that had quite extinguished all other religious music.

PORTLAND, MAINE. This city seems to be lifting up its head in classical music, with a degree of enterprise that promises right well for "Down East." Such societies and programmes, as we have here to mention, are an honor to the Portland population if they give them good support, and certainly an honor to the artists and professors who evince such faith in good music and the public capacity of learning to appreciate it. In the first place they have a SACRED MUSIC SOCIETY, which gave a concert on the evening of Fast Day, under the direction of Mr. ARTHURSON, formerly of this city, and produced selections from the "Messiah," and the whole of Haydn's Third or Imperial Mass, (to English words, we are sorry to say). Mr. Kotzschmar presided at the organ, and Mr. Arthurson sang the tenor solos. (We have received from a correspondent a long criticism upon this performance, in many respects sound and just, we doubt not, but of so personal a character that we must decline to publish it.)

But what is most remarkable and promising for such a place is a Series of Chamber Concerts, under the direction of Mr. KOTZSCHMAR (an ex-Germanian, we believe) and Prof. CROUCH, the author of "Kathleen Mavourneen," who seems to be the most active and public-spirited musician resident in Portland. The Prospectus to these concerts is so unique that we are sure our readers will be glad to see it copied here in full, as follows:

CLASSICAL CHAMBER CONCERTS.

For the perfect rendering of unmitigated works of the great Masters, Vocal and Instrumental.

In conformity with the desire of many friends, admirers of the more Classical branches of Musical Science, Messrs. KOTZSCHMAR and CROUCH have determined upon giving a Series of Classical Chamber Concerts, every Wednesday Afternoon, commencing at 3 o'clock, P. M., to take place at their respective Music Rooms alternately, LANCASTER HALL, and EXCHANGE STREET.

The Piano-Forte expositions will include master pieces from SEBASTIAN BACH, SPOHR, MOZART, HUMMEL, HAYDN, CHOPIN, WEBER, BEETHOVEN, HANDEL, MENDELSSOHN. The Vocal Readings, selections from PALESTRINA, Dr. BLOW, Dr. PEPSH, Dr. ARNE, PURCELL, Dr. HORSLEY, HANDEL, HAYDN, MOZART, BEETHOVEN, MENDELSSOHN, Dr. CROUCH, SPOHR, WEBER, MEYERBEER, SCHUBERT, &c. &c.

In addition to the truthful rendering of these works, the Executants propose giving introductory remarks to such of the Pieces, as require Historical exposition, all of which will be duly notified in the Programmes of the day. The undertaking springing from a pure love of their profession, and a desire to elevate the musical taste of the City, Messrs. KOTZSCHMAR and CROUCH, beg their friends and patrons to distinctly understand there will be no postponement on account of weather, or mutilation of an Author's Work to court meretricious approval.

Single admission, Twenty-five Cents. Tickets can only be procured of J. S. PAINE, and of the Delectators, Messrs. KOTZSCHMAR and CROUCH.

Auxiliary aid will be called into requisition when presenting itself, or necessary for the development of a Composition.

We append also the programmes of the first four Concerts.

For March 23d.

PART FIRST.

1. Songs without words—Piano Forte, Mendelssohn. Mr. KOTZSCHMAR.
2. Air, Qui s'adego, Mozart. Mr. CROUCH.
3. Polonaise, in E flat—Piano Forte, C. M. Weber. Mr. KOTZSCHMAR.
4. German Song, Serenade, Schubert. Mr. CROUCH.
5. Duet—Piano Forte, Mozart, Miss PAINE & Mr. KOTZSCHMAR.

PART SECOND.

1. Scene, Angel of Life, Dr. Callcott. Mr. CROUCH.
2. Sonata, in E flat—Piano Forte, Haydn. Mr. KOTZSCHMAR.
3. Song, Wave from Wave, Handel. Mr. CROUCH.
4. Lullaby—Piano Forte, Henselt. Mr. KOTZSCHMAR.
5. Scene, Mad Tom. Mr. Purcell.

For March 30th.

PART FIRST.

1. Souvenir de Valse, Chopin. Mr. KOTZSCHMAR.
2. German Song, The Exile, Keller. Mr. CROUCH.
3. Introduction and Fugue, Handel. Mr. KOTZSCHMAR.
4. Air, Qui s'adego, Mozart. Mr. CROUCH.
5. Duet—Piano Forte, Mozart, Miss PAINE & Mr. KOTZSCHMAR.

PART SECOND.

1. Air, Lord remember David, Handel. Mrs. CROUCH.
2. Sonata, in E flat—Piano Forte, Haydn. Mr. KOTZSCHMAR.
3. Recitative and Air, And God said, Haydn. Mrs. CROUCH.
4. Polonaise, in E flat—Piano Forte, C. M. Weber. Mr. KOTZSCHMAR.
5. Duet, I would that my Love, Mendelssohn. Mrs. and Mr. CROUCH.

For April 6th.

PART FIRST.

1. Overture, four hands, Il Flauto Magico, Mozart. Miss Paine and Mr. KOTZSCHMAR.
2. Recit. and Air, "What tho' I trace," Handel. Mr. CROUCH.
3. Air, "Lovely is Nature's Book," Gluck. Mrs. CROUCH.
4. Introduction and Fugue, Handel. Mr. KOTZSCHMAR.
5. German Song, "Knowest thou the Land," Beethoven. Mr. CROUCH.

PART SECOND.

1. Offertory, "Ave Maria," Schubert. Mrs. CROUCH.
2. Grand Sonata, C minor—Piano Forte, Mozart. Mr. KOTZSCHMAR.
3. German Song, "Down a thousand fathoms Deep," Keller. Mr. CROUCH.
4. Elegie—Piano Forte, Ernst. Mr. KOTZSCHMAR.
5. Duet, "The May Bells," Mendelssohn. Mrs. & Mr. CROUCH.

For April 13th.

PART FIRST.

1. Sonata, in F—Piano and Violoncello, Beethoven. Messrs. Jungnickel and KOTZSCHMAR.
2. Air, "My Dream of Love," Spoher. Mr. CROUCH.
3. Air, "Holy, Holy," Handel. Mrs. CROUCH.
4. Romance—Piano Forte, Ch. Voss. Mr. KOTZSCHMAR.
5. German Song, "Knowest thou the Land," Beethoven. Mr. CROUCH.

PART SECOND.

1. Air, "Voi che Sapate," Mozart. Mrs. CROUCH.
2. Sonata, in D—Piano Forte, Mozart. Mr. KOTZSCHMAR.
3. Serenade, "Could I thro' Ether fly," Moliere. Mr. CROUCH.
4. La Melancolie—Violoncello and Piano, Felicien David. Messrs. Jungnickel and KOTZSCHMAR.
5. Duo, "La ci darem," Mozart. Mrs. and Mr. CROUCH.

Advertisements.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

MADAME HENRIETTE SONTAG
AND THE

Händel and Haydn Society

Will give on SUNDAY EVENING, April 24th,
AT THE BOSTON MUSIC HALL,

ROSSINI'S STABAT MATER,

Preceded by a GRAND SACRED CONCERT, on which occasion they will be assisted by

MME. ROSINA PICO, Sig. RADIALI, Sig. POZZOLINI, Sig. ROCCO, and the GRAND ORCHESTRA of the SONTAG TROUPE.Conductor,.....Mr. CARL ECKERT.
Organist,.....Mr. F. F. MÜLLER.Tickets with Seats secured, at ONE DOLLAR each, to be had at the Music Store of Mr. E. H. WADE, 137 Washington street, on Friday and Saturday; on Sunday at the Tremont House, and at the office of the Hall on Sunday Evening.
Doors open at 7—Concert to commence at 8 o'clock.

Pianos and Melodeons to Let.

OLIVER DITSON,

Music Dealer, 115 Washington St., Boston,

HAS a good variety of Piano Fortes, Melodeons, Seraphines,
and Reed Organs, to let, for city or country, on low terms.
If, within one year from the time of hiring, the party should conclude to purchase the instrument, no charge will be made for rent of it, except the interest on its value. 25 tf

TO PRINTERS.

MUSIC COMPOSITOR WANTED. One who is thoroughly acquainted with the business. Apply at this Office.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

NEW YORK NORMAL MUSICAL INSTITUTE.

GENTLEMEN and LADIES, who design attending the first term of the NEW YORK NORMAL MUSICAL INSTITUTE, and who wish to have board procured for them, are requested to give early notice to that effect. This will be necessary, in order to secure suitable accommodations; especially, as there is prospect of a large class.Applications have been made by some who desire to attend the courses of lectures and other class exercises of the Institute, omitting the private lessons embraced in the full course.
Notice is therefore given that the price of a ticket admitting the holder to all the lectures and class exercises, will be twenty-five dollars. Including the course of private lessons, the price is fifty dollars.The term commences on MONDAY, APRIL 25th, 1853, and continues three months, during which time daily lectures and instruction will be given in the various departments of music, the design being to furnish thorough instruction, and especially to qualify teachers of music.The assistance of THOMAS HASTINGS, Esq., and other eminent musicians has been secured.Circulars containing further particulars may be obtained on application to MASON BROTHERS, (late Mason & Law), 23 Park Row, New York.LOWELL MASON.
GEORGE F. ROOT.
WM. B. BRADBURY.

Mar. 5. tf

MRS. ROSA GARCIA DE RIBAS,

TEACHER OF THE

PIANOFORTE, SINGING & GUITAR,

2 Seneca St., corner Harrison Avenue.

MR. De RIBAS will give instruction on the Oboe and
Flute. Also MUSIC ARRANGED, TRANSPOSED, &c.
Boston, April 23. 3mNEW EDITION OF CARCASSI'S GUITAR BOOK. New and Improved Method for the Guitar, by M. Carcassi. Price $2.50.This new edition of Carcassi's celebrated method embraces much valuable matter not contained in those previously issued.
These additions are those which have been made by the distinguished author after an experience which enabled him to determine what was actually needed by the pupil for a thorough understanding of the art. The whole has been carefully translated by a well known Professor of the Guitar, and is thereby rendered as free as possible from those slight but perplexing inaccuracies which sometimes become a part of translations and reprints. A number of popular songs in each of the different keys have been appended, which together with the masterly instructions of Carcassi, and his plain yet comprehensive course of Exercises, furnish all that is desirable to both teacher and scholar.

feb 26

OLIVER DITSON, Publisher,
115 Washington St.

JUST PUBLISHED,

HAYDN'S THIRD MASS IN D. Uniform with Häytson's Edition of Mozart's, Haydn's and Beethoven's Masses. Price 62 cents.

Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

JUST PUBLISHED,

THE STABAT MATER, by Rossini, at the low price of 75 cents.

Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

—Edward A. Balch,

MASONIC TEMPLE.

SIX PUBLIC REHEARSALS.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club

Will give a Series of SIX REHEARSALS, to take place on

Wednesday and Saturday Afternoons,

Commencing April 6th, at 3 o'clock.

Packages of Six Tickets, $1: Single Tickets, 25 cts. each at the usual places.

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE,

No. 86 TREMONT STREET, BOSTON.

WHITE BROTHERS,

DEALERS IN MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS,

Best Italian, German, French and English Strings,

AGENTS OF

J. André, Offenbach; and G. André, Philadelphia,

FOR THE SALE OF FOREIGN CLASSICO MUSIC,

CHOIR MUSIC, &c.

Instruments Made, Repaired, Tuned, Bought, Sold, or Exchanged, on the most favorable terms.IRA J. WHITE.
iii 2 3m

A. WARREN WHITE.

Massachusetts Academy of Fine Arts.

THE FIRST SEMI-ANNUAL EXHIBITION of the Massachusetts Academy of Fine Arts is now open at its Rooms,

No. 37½ Tremont Row.

The Collection comprises some of the finest specimens of Pictures by American Artists

Hours of Exhibition, from 8 A. M. until 6 P. M.

Single admission, 25 cents; Season Tickets, 50 cents.

Feb. 26. tf

THEODORE T. BARKER,

MUSIC STORE,

No. 381 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

Chickering's Pianos to let.

All Foreign and American Musical Publications received as soon as published. ii 23 3m

N. D. COTTON,

IMPORTER AND DEALER IN

English, French, and American Stationery,

DRAWING & PAINTING MATERIALS,

No. 13 Tremont Row, Boston.

 Wedding and Visiting Cards Engraved and Printed.
16 tfBEETHOVEN'S ORATORIO OF ENGEDI, or DAVID IN THE WILDERNESS, known as the MOUNT OF OLIVES, is this day published in a neat, convenient form for the singer or concert-goer byGeo. P. Reed & Co., Publishers, Jan. 8. 17 TREMONT ROW, BOSTON.

Germania Serenade Band.

THE SERVICES OF THIS ASSOCIATION can be secured
by applying toG. SCHNAPP, Leader, ii 14 tf 364 Tremont Street.J. W. TAVERNER,
PROFESSOR OF ELOCUTION,

AT HIS RESIDENCE,

No. 30 CHARLES STREET, BOSTON.

J. C. WOODMAN,

ORGANIST AND CONDUCTOR OF MUSIC AT CENTRAL CHURCH,

Teacher of Singing, Piano Forte, &c.,

No. 94 Chestnut Street, Boston.

iii 2 3m.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.

FOREIGN MUSIC DEPOT,

GIRARD HOUSE BUILDINGS,

NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,

PHILADELPHIA.

N. B. The complete works, for Piano (Quartets, Trios,
Duets for Piano and Violin, Duets for four hands and Piano solo pieces,) of BEETHOVEN and MOZART, as also the Piano solo
Works of CLEMENTI and HAYDN, as published by J. André, Offenbach, in sets, at very low prices. We have appointedMessrs. WHITE BROTHERS, TREMONT TEMPLE, BOSTON,our Agents for the sale of the above Standard Editions of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, &c. &c.

iii 2 tf

Letter-Press, Music and Job Printing-Office,

JONAS CHICKERING,

RESPECTFULLY gives notice to his friends and the public that, having recovered from the late disastrous effects produced by the destruction of his factory, he is now ready to receive orders for PIANOS, which he promises to execute with as much faithfulness and promptitude as heretofore.

379 Washington Street, Boston.

Mar. 5. tf

HEW'S PATENT

AMERICAN ACTION PIANOFORTE,

THE MANUFACTURER is in possession of numerous testimonials from distinguished Musical Professors, who have used the greatly improved ACTION PIANO, commending it in high terms. The attention of purchasers and amateurs of Music to an examination of its superiority, is solicited.

GEO. HEW, 365 Washington St., Boston.

Apr. 10. tf

D. B. NEWHALL,

MANUFACTURER AND DEALER IN

PIANO FORTES,

No. 344 Washington Street, Boston.

PIANO FORTES REPAIRED, TUNED, & TO LET.

Apr. 10. tf

SIGNOR G. C. GUIDI respectfully informs his former pupils and the public, that he has resumed his instructions in SINGING, after the Italian school, with the intention to settle permanently in Boston. In order to accommodate those who may not wish to take private instruction, he will open classes for ladies and gentlemen, on moderate terms. None but good voices will be admitted. Terms liberal for persons intending to study for professional purposes.Sig. G. can be consulted free upon any musical subject, daily, from 12 to 2, at Mr. Hew's Piano Manufactory, No. 365 Washington street, where terms and time for classes may be known.Orders or notes for Sig. G. may be addressed to him at G. P.
Reed & Co.'s Music Store, 17 Tremont Row, and at Oliver
Ditson's, 115 Washington street. Feb. 5.

A CARD.

THE SUBSCRIBER respectfully offers his services to the public as Teacher of the Piano-Forte, the Violin, and of Singing, after a clear and easy method. He will also accompany pupils, both in seminaries and in private houses, in the practice of Duets, Trios, &c.

Address for the present at 168 Tremont Street.

March 26. 3m.

CARL GÄRTNER.

L. H. SOUTHARD,

TEACHER OF MUSIC,

265 Washington Street, Boston.

Oct. 16.

3m

T. BRICHER,

Organist and Conductor of Music

At the Bowdoin Square Church.

OFFICE UNDER THE CHURCH. . . ENTRANCE ON CHARDON ST
Jan. 22. 3m.

H. S. CUTLER,

Organist at the Church of the Advent, also of the Boston Harmonic Society.ADDRESS—(Care of A. N. JOHNSON,) No. 90 Tremont Street, Boston. 22 tf

F. F. MÜLLER,

DIRECTOR OF MUSIC AND ORGANIST at the Old South
Church; ORGANIST of the Handel and Haydn Society;
ORGANIST of the Musical Education Society, &c. &c. &c.
Inquire of Messrs. REED & Co., No. 17 Tremont Row, Boston. ii 7 tf

NATHAN RICHARDSON,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC.

Now in Europe; will return 1st of June. Letters may be addressed at 19 Hanover St. 25 tf

GEORGE F. WILLEY,

TEACHER OF MUSIC.

Private Tuition in the principles of Music and the Cultivation of the Voice.MUSIC ROOM, THE LECTURE ROOM OF KIRK STREET CHURCH, RESIDENCE, 84 FRANKLIN SQUARE, SUFFOLK STREET,
feb. 5. LOWELL, MASS.

A. W. FRENZEL,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC,

feb. 5.

4 Pine Street, Boston.

RATES FOR ADVERTISING.

For half a square, (8 lines,) or less, first insertion, . . $0.50 each additional inser. 25For a square, (16 lines,) first insertion, 1.00 each additional insertion, 50On advertisements standing three months or longer, a discount of twenty per cent. on the above rates is allowed.(A column counts as seven squares.)
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 School St.

DWIGHT'S

Journal of Music.

A Paper of Art and Literature.

VOL. III.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 30, 1853.

NO. 4.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

TERMS.... TWO DOLLARS PER ANNUM, (IN ADVANCE.)

CITY Subscribers can be served at their houses by the further payment of fifty cents per annum.

For Rates of Advertising, see last page.

POSTAGE, if paid in advance, for any distance within the State, thirteen cents a year; if not in advance, twenty-six cents. To all places beyond the State, double these rates.

J. S. DWIGHT,.....EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St.

By REDDING & CO., 8 State St.

GES. P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row.

A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.

DEXTER & BROTHERS, 43 Ann Street, N. Y.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 453 Broadway, N. Y.

MASON & LAW, 23 Park Row, New York.

GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.

G. ANDRE, 229 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

MILLER & BEACHAM, 151 Baltimore St., Balt.

COLBURN & FIELD, Cincinnati, O.

HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Persons willing to become Agents for procuring subscribers, especially Music-Dealers and Teachers, are invited to correspond with the Editor, as above. Satisfactory references required, and liberal commissions allowed.

Back numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Also BOUND copies of Vols I and II, at prices varying from $2.50 to $3.50.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

SPONTINI.

From the French of HECTOR BERLIOZ. (Continued.)

The score finished, the Empress immediately caused it to be put to study at the opera; and then the protégé of Josephine began to experience the agony of rehearsals—frightful torture for a novice without acquired authority, and to whom the entire personnel of performers is naturally and systematically hostile—a perpetual struggle against malevolent intentions; heart-rending efforts to obliterate limits, warm icicles, reason with fools, talk of love to eunuchs, of imagination to idiots, of art to common laborers, of sincerity to liars, of enthusiasm to the envious, of courage to cowards. Every body revolted against the pretended difficulties of the new work, against the unusual forms of that great style, against the impetuous movements of that incandescent passion, lighted at the purest rays of an Italian sun. Each wished to abridge, cut out, prune, and mould to rude exigences this noble music, which wearied its interpreters by requiring ceaseless attention, sensibility, vigor, and a scrupulous fidelity. Madame Branchu herself, that inspired woman, who so admirably created the rôle of Julia, has since acknowledged to me, and not without regretting this culpable discouragement, that she once declared to Spontini that she never could learn his unsingable recitatives. The revising of the instrumentation, the suppression and restoration of phrases, and the transpositions had already cost the Opera enormous copying expenses. Without the indefatigable kindness of Josephine, and the will of Napoleon, who always exacted the impossible, there is no doubt but that the Vestale, refused as absurd and inexecutable, would never have been performed. But while the poor great artist writhed amid the tortures which they so cruelly persisted in inflicting upon him at the Opera, the Conservatory was preparing melted lead to pour upon his open wounds on the grand day of the first representation. All the embryo-contrapuntist-brats, swearing on the authority of their masters that Spontini ignored the first elements of harmony, that his melody was balanced upon the accompaniment like a lock of hair upon a dish of soup, (for more than ten years I heard in the classes of the Conservatory this noble comparison applied to the works of Spontini,) all the young manufacturers of notes, as capable of understanding and feeling the noble in music, as Messieurs the porters, their fathers, were of judging of literature and philosophy; all clubbed together to effect the downfall of La Vestale. The system of hisses and whistling was not admitted. That of yawns and laughter having been adopted, each one of these myrmidons agreed on the end of the second act to put on a night cap, and feign to sleep.

I hold these details from the chief of the band of sleepers. He had associated with himself for the direction of the sleeping a young ballad singer, since become one of the most celebrated of our Opera Comique composers. The first act passed off without any grievance, and the cabal-ers not being able to refrain from acknowledging the effect of this fine music, so badly written, according to them, contented themselves with saying, in a tone of naïf astonishment, devoid of all hostile intent: "cela va!" (it succeeds!) Boieldieu, being present 22 years after at the general rehearsal of Beethoven's symphony in C major, ejaculated also with the same feelings of surprise: "cela va!"—the Scherzo had appeared to him so oddly written, that in his opinion it could not go at all. Alas! there are many things which have succeeded, do succeed, and will succeed, despite the professors of Counterpoint, and the authors of opéras-comiques.

At the end of the second act of La Vestale, the steadily-increasing interest of the temple scene gave no chance to the conspirators of thinking for an instant of the wretched farce which they had prepared, and the finale drew from them, as well as from the impartial public the warmest applause; for which they had, no doubt, to make amende honorable the next day, by continuing in their classes to despise the ignorant Italian, whose music, nevertheless, had so vividly affected them. Time is a great master! The adage is not new; but the revolution which twelve or fifteen years have made in the ideas of our Conservatory is a striking proof of its truth. No longer in this establishment do we find prejudice, or parties hostile to new works; the spirit of the school is excellent. I believe that the Society of Concerts, by familiarising the young musicians with a great number of chefs-d'œuvres, written by masters whose hardy and independent genius has never known even our scholastic reveries, has had a great hand in the accomplishing of this result. Also the execution of fragments of La Vestale, by the Society of Concerts, and pupils of the Conservatory has always obtained an immense success, a success of applause, of tears, a success which affects the performers and the public to such a degree that it has sometimes been found impossible to continue the concert for half an hour. One day, on a similar occasion, Spontini, hidden in the recess of his box, was observing philosophically this tempest of enthusiasm, and was, doubtless, asking himself on seeing the tumultuous manifestations of the orchestra and chorists, what had become of all those petty contrapuntists, all those little rogues of 1807, when suddenly the pit, having perceived him, rose in a body turning towards him, and the whole hall resounded with cries of recognition and admiration. Sublime enthusiasm, with which earnest souls salute true genius; and its most noble recompense! Was there not something providential in this triumph awarded to the great artist in the very bosom of the school in which during more than thirty years were taught hatred of his person and contempt of his works!

And, nevertheless, to those (and their number is large) who have not heard it at the Opera, how much the music of La Vestale must lose, being thus deprived of the illusions of the stage. How is it possible to imagine at a concert that multitude of different effects in which dramatic inspiration bursts forth in so great abundance and depth? What those listeners can seize, is a variety of expression which they imagine from the commencement of each rôle, the intensity of passion which renders this music luminous by the ardent flame concentrated therein, (sunt lacrymæ rerum), and the purely musical value of the melodies and groups of chords. But there are ideas which can only be seized at the theatre; one, especially, among others is of rare beauty, in the second act. In the air of Julia: Impitoyables Dieux, an air in the minor mode, and full of desperate agitation, there occurs a phrase heart-rending in abandon and sorrowful tenderness: Que le bienfait de sa présence enchante un seul moment ces lieux. At the end of this air, and the recitative: Viens, mortel adoré, je te donne ma vie, when Julia retires to the back of the stage to give entrance to Licinius, the orchestra takes up a fragment of the preceding air, in which the accents of the passionate trouble of the vestal still predominate; but at the very instant in which the door opens, giving admission to the friendly rays of the evening star, a sudden pianissimo brings back to the orchestra, rich in wind instruments, the phrase—que le bienfait de sa présence; immediately a delicious atmosphere seems to pervade the temple, a perfume of love is exhaled, the flower of love is bursting forth, the heavens are opened, and we readily conceive that the amante of Licinius, discouraged by her struggle with her heart, should tremblingly sink at the foot of the altar, willing to give up her life for a moment of transport. Starting with this piece, the musical and dramatic interest increases in grandeur; and we could almost say that, taken altogether, the entire second act is a gigantic crescendo, of which the forte only bursts forth at the final scene of the veil. How is it possible not to note, en passant, marvels of expression like those at the beginning of the lovers' duo:

LICINIUS. Je te vois.

JULIA. Dans quels lieux!

LICINIUS. Le Dieu qui nous rassemble,
Veille autour de ces murs, et prend soin de tes jours.

JULIA. Je ne crains que pour toi!

What a difference in the accent of these two persons! The words of Licinius crowd upon his burning lips; Julia, on the contrary, has no inflection to her voice, her strength fails her, she sinks down fainting. The character of Licinius is still better developed in his cavatina, of which it is impossible to cease admiring the melodious beauties; he is at first gentle, consoling, an adorer, but towards the end, at these words: Va, c'est aux dieux à nous porter envie, a kind of pride is manifest in his accent, he contemplates his beautiful conquest, the joy of possession becomes greater than the happiness itself, and his passion is slightly tinted with self-pride. As to the duo, and especially to the peroration of the ensemble,

C'est pour toi seul que je veux vivre!

Où pour toi seule je veux vivre!

they are are indescribable; they contain palpitations, exclamations, passionate caresses unknown to you, pale lovers of the North. It is an Italian love in all its furious grandeur and volcanic ardor. In the finale, at the entrance of the people and the priests into the temple, the forms of rhythm enlarge beyond all measure; the orchestra pregnant with tempest, swells and undulates with a terrible majesty; here the question in point is, religious fanaticism.

O crime! ô desespoir! ô comble de revers!
Le feu céleste éteint! la prêtresse expirante!
Les dieux, pour signaler leur colère élatante,
Vont-ils dans le chaos replonger l'univers?

This recitative is truthfully frightful in the development of its melody; in its modulations, and its instrumentation it is of monumental grandeur. Everywhere there is clearly manifest the threatening power of Jupiter Tonans. And in the phrases of Julia, successively full of distress, resignation, revolt, and audacity, there are accents so natural that it seems as if no others could be used, and yet they are so rare that the finest scores contain but very few. Such are:

Eh quoi! je vis encore.....
Qu'on me mène à la mort.....
Le trépas m'affranchit de ton autorité.....
Prêtres de Jupiter, je confesse que j'aime.....
Est-ce assez d'une loi pour vaincre la nature....
Vous ne le saurez pas.....

At this last reply of Julia to the question of the pontiff, the thunders of the orchestra burst forth with violence; we feel that she is lost, and that the touching prayer which the unfortunate one has just addressed to Latona will not save her. The measured recitative: Le temps finit pour moi, is a master-piece of modulation, with regard to that which precedes and follows it. The high priest has ended his phrase in the key of E major, which will become that of the final chorus. The chant of the vestal deviating gradually from this key, reposes upon the dominant of C minor; then the altos commence alone a sort of tremolo in B, which the ear takes to be the note sensible of the last established key, and bring about by this same B,—about suddenly to become the dominant,—the explosion of brass instruments and cymbals in the key of E major, which vibrates anew with redoubled sonorousness; like those lights, which, in the night, re-appear the more brilliantly, when an obstacle has for a moment excluded them from our sight. With regard to the anathema, with which the pontiff crushes his victim, as well as to the Stretta, all description is as powerless as it is useless for whoever has not heard them. There, especially, you recognise the power of that orchestra of Spontini, which, notwithstanding the various developments of modern instrumentation, has stood erect, majestic, draped in the antique, and as brilliant as the day on which it issued arrayed in armor from the head of its author. You palpitate with pain under the incessant repercussion of the pitiless rhythm of the double syllabic chorus of priests, in contrast with the moaning melody of the weeping vestals. But the divine anguish of the listener arrives at its climax when, abandoning the use of the precipitate rhythm, the instruments and the voices,—the former in tremolo, the latter in sustained sounds—pour forth in continuous torrents the strident chords of the peroration. That is the culminating point of the crescendo which increases so grandly during the second half of the second act, and to which, in my opinion, no other is to be compared for its immensity, or the formidable slowness of its progress. During the grand performances of this Olympian scene at the Conservatoire and at the Grand Opera of Paris, all shuddered, public, performers, the edifice itself, which, metalized from base to roof, seemed, like a colossal gong, to send forth sinister vibrations. The means of small theatres are insufficient to produce this strange phenomenon.

[To be continued.]

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Julius Knorr's Instructive Works on Playing the Piano.*

I.

Among musical instruments the Piano is that most in use. For it the greatest number of works have been written, from Bach down to our days. "Methods" for it have multiplied since C. Ph. Em. Bach wrote his "Essay on the true manner of playing the Piano," in the last quarter of the 18th century. The convenience of the instrument for the reproduction of orchestral works, the facility of executing harmonical combinations, and hence the necessity of being familiar with it (in some degree at least) to every composer, have induced most who study music, either for their profession or for amusement, to acquire some mastery of the Piano. Such an universal cultivation of necessity has led to the most extensive application of all known, and the invention of innumerable new, musical forms and figures. Difficulties have increased not only as to mechanical execution, but as to spiritual conception; chiefly since Beethoven, who carried the whole instrumental world to a point so far above anything before him, that he will forever stand out the landmark of a new era. Upon him the whole development of modern music is founded, and the ideas laid down in his latter works will furnish abundant food for musical centuries to come. He was the first to introduce in Piano music a melody with a distinct and separate accompaniment,* and thus opened a field, which the entire modern school has not by any means exhausted. He first employed chords more widely laid out, fuller arpeggios, than his predecessors. It is not too much to assert, that his and John Sebastian Bach's works are study enough for a lifetime, and if one would devote himself exclusively to those two authors he would have included in his studies the whole compass of the art in its application to the Piano.

This is said with no intention to underrate a Mozart, a Haydn, a Dussek, a Mendelssohn, Weber, Chopin, and many others. But after all, with all due reverence for their immortal works, Bach and Beethoven will remain the greatest attraction to the Piano-player who is a true musician, the main object of his devotion and cultivation. The difficulties of execution by the introduction of new and more complicated passages, have greatly increased even since Beethoven. But the root and germ of all the new forms created by a Kalkbrenner, Ries, Thalberg, Chopin, Liszt, are contained in Beethoven's works.

The player who plays Beethoven's greater works artistically, is eo ipso master of all that has been written before him, and little trouble will enable him fully to do justice in mechanical execution and spiritual conception to all that has been written after him, up to the immense mechanical difficulties created by Chopin and Liszt.

We have arrived now at a point from which at present a new climax of mechanical difficulties seems impossible. Such periods, when a certain cyclis of artistical labors is closed, are the time for collecting the materials, for reducing them to certain fundamental formations, in short, for preparing them to the use of the musical student. This task, which a Method for the piano has to carry out in our days, has been marked out by JULIUS KNORR in the preface to his "Materials" so distinctly that it seems best to quote his own words. He says:

* See even among his first works the Largo of the 2d Sonata of op. 2 dedicated to Father Haydn or the Adagio cantabile of his great Sonate pathétique, op. 13.

"Already in the first volume of the musical paper (Neue Leipziger Zeitschrift für Musik) founded by R. Schumann and myself, of which I was then editor, I maintained the necessity of confining a method for the piano in our days, when the mechanical difficulties in pieces for the piano have increased so much of late, mainly to the nucleus of the different mechanical exercises. This only will enable the player to overcome those difficulties in the shortest possible time. Such a method, I hold, should not be a compilation of all figures and passages existing already, . . . but must exclusively and fully lay the foundation for a sure touch and unerring fingering, without which the study of the larger compositions cannot be undertaken. . . . Such an instruction book cannot and must not contain the more complicated forms which much more advantageously are to be studied from the better études, (in reality only supplements of the instruction book) and the compositions themselves."

This task has been carried out to the satisfaction of certainly every teacher by this same Jul. Knorr, well known to the musical public by his former successful labors and his instruction books in this beautiful department of our Art. Whoever will only glance over his edition of A. E. Müllers "Method for the Piano," will concur in the writer's opinion, that he has accomplished in it all that could be desired for the wants of a rational instruction, as far as the mechanical part of the Art is concerned.

This work, of which there exists no English edition as yet,* came out in Leipzig under the title: "Large Method for the Piano, by A. E. Müller, newly revised edition by Jul. Knorr;" in two volumes; the first of which contains, besides the rudiments of music, a systematical exposition of fingering, &c., "and many hints as to modes of expression (musical elocution). For the teacher a very valuable guide for elementary instruction is interspersed between the exercises." After a brief introduction in musical rudiments follows his explanation of the only rational position of the hand, with diagram. The only rational, because based upon the anatomical structure of the hand. Then follow some very concise rules on touch and on the motion of the wrist. To the first might have been added, that pressing hard after the key is struck is a great means of soon acquiring strength of fingers; and to the rules on the motion of the wrist might have been added an enumeration of those cases, where the staccato notes are to be played only from the knuckles! Then come five-finger exercises, the hand standing still. At this point already we cannot but admire the logical arrangement of this Method, which in this particular has no equal. First one finger at a time is made to strike, then follow two alternately, thus preparing the study of that important mechanical requisite, the trill; then follows an exercise where two fingers are playing simultaneously, thus introducing the study of thirds, &c. Only then is the pupil taught the notes. The preceding exercises he has had to study without them. According to a truly practical principle, the pupil learns only treble notes now, and is introduced, in § 42, to works written in little four-hand pieces, on five notes, where the hand, constantly in one position, can accustom itself to that regular position, until it has become a settled habit. A most excellent piece of this kind is reprinted there from the Method of Moscheles, Fétis and Kullak, which in connection with those by Diabelli, recommended for use, will fully answer the above purpose.

These five finger exercises are succeeded by similar ones for two hands, where the extent of a fifth is overstepped already, furnished with practical remarks on different manners of fingering, on musical elocution, &c.

Next follows a chapter on time, rests, abbreviations, with a very important, short and comprehensive synopsis of cases where perfect independence of the hands is required. Then follow some theoretical chapters on intervals, chords, together with some practical ones on different manners of execution, viz. legato, staccato, &c., and on rhythm. Sections 97-112 contain some general rules of fingering "necessary for the little pieces the pupil is to play now," as the author says; of far wider bearing, however, so that they really serve as ground work for all possible cases of fingering. With reluctance we abstain from translating the important chapter. Remarkable are the rules for those cases, when the use of the thumb or the 5th finger on black keys is justifiable, and when not.

Then follow, in section 114, some progressive pieces ranging in difficulty after those of section 42. And here a feature of the book is to be noticed which alone would recommend it to every teacher that loves his Art. It is a part of that guide for the teacher mentioned above. In section 114, several pieces by our best masters, such as Haydn, Clementi, C. M. von Weber, Kuhlman, Czerny, J. Schmitt, &c., are recommended to be practised, besides those contained in the Method. The intrinsic value of these pieces forms quite an agreeable contrast to the collections of trashy waltzes, &c., which almost exclusively fill methods like those by Hünten, Burgmüller, &c.

Next comes a chapter on the embellishments, the turn, appoggiatura, mordente, trill and its different ways of termination, double trill, trill accompanying a melody &c.

A short but highly interesting chapter on musical elocution, the use of the pedals, legato, portamento, staccato, with very valuable hints on the character and correct manner of delivering compositions of different composers, closes the first part.

[To be continued.]

IT NEVER RAINS BUT IT POURS.—The musical season proposes to be a wet one, to judge by the following list of waterworks. Evening Dew, Osborne. Morning Mist, Calcott. Water Spray, Sloper. Cascade, Szekely. Wasser-fall, Vogel. Ditto, Pauer. Rippling Stream, Spindler. Water Music, Handel. La Source, Blumenthal. Rivulet, Bartholdy. L'Eau Dormante, do. Rain-drop, Gabriel. A Rainy Summer's Day, Szekely. Mountain Streamlet, do. In mercy to suffering mortality, will no good and musical soul write an "Umbrella," as a protection against the above.—London paper.

Our Correspondence from Germany.

MUSIC IN LEIPZIG AND BERLIN—BACH'S "PASSION"—GEWANDHAUS ORCHESTRA—SINGERS—LISZT—MARIE WIECK—THE KING OF PRUSSIA AND HIS MILITARY BANDS—MUSIC-PRINTING IN A PRISON—JOHANNA WAGNER.

DRESDEN, April 7, 1853.

MY DEAR SIR: I received your letter this morning, and shall be very happy to keep you booked up with regard to musical matters this side of the water, if my letters will afford any one the least pleasure or satisfaction. I arrived at Leipzig in fourteen days and two hours from the time I left New York, notwithstanding I was obliged to stop in London twenty-four hours and in Cologne twelve. I think this will be considered a very quick trip for the season of the year.

The first musical performance I have had the pleasure of listening to was the Passions-Musik (an oratorio) by BACH, performed in the Pauline church by a chorus of 200 voices, accompanied by an orchestra of 100 performers. Solo parts were sustained by Fraulein MEYER, Frau DREYSCHOCK, Herr BEHR, Herr —, tenor, — cannot remember his name. The whole was directed by the well known music director, RIETZ.

I must say that I have never been so much pleased and charmed by any music of the same character before. The melodies were so classical and beautiful, and rendered so finely by the different artists. Fraulein MEYER is quite celebrated as a classical singer and is the Leipzig favorite; this of course you well knew long ere this. Mme. R. DREYSCHOCK you perhaps have not heard so much about. She possesses a very full, round, and strong Soprano voice and sings with good taste and expression. The several arias she sang that evening gave general satisfaction, and she really deserves much credit. (The same lady has been very successful at the Gewandhaus Concerts the past winter.) The Orchestra, well known as the Gewandhaus orchestra, of course was nothing else but good and their part was performed as one would naturally suppose it must have been under the direction of such an eminent composer and director. I really had a favorable opportunity of hearing this orchestra, as the instrumentation of the "Passion" music was of a character that required a well and skillfully trained orchestra to do it justice. Very full, grand, with many most delicious effects.

The chorus had evidently been under a long drill to do such justice to themselves. Their part was very difficult indeed, and in fact the whole Oratorio is so difficult and requires such an orchestra and chorus that it is seldom given. When it is performed it draws all the musicians and professors from all the neighboring cities to hear it. The house was crowded from the very top to the bottom. Among other distinguished characters I saw LISZT, squeezed up in one corner, with the Partitur in his hand looking over and following along with the utmost attention. The whole performance went off admirably and without any faults that any reasonable critic should notice, when considering the immense orchestra and chorus. An orchestra of from forty to fifty performers, can in a comparatively short time be able to play very well together; but one composed of a hundred must be thoroughly trained in order to keep those fiddles any where near together, or those confounded horns from making such an awful noise as to drown all the other parts; and a new orchestra must undergo long practise before the corners get well rounded off.

*An English translation has just been finished in manuscript.

I had the pleasure of speaking with N. W. GADE, the celebrated composer, also with LISZT, both of which gentlemen I met at the office of Mr. Bartholf Senff, who is the editor of the Leipsic Signale, also a music dealer. This gentleman is a friend to all musicians, and his office is taken advantage of by musicians and composers, who step in to read the papers and learn what is going on in the musical world. In speaking with Liszt, I told him that his life of Chopin was being translated in America and that part of it had already appeared in our Boston Journal of Music. He remarked that he felt himself quite flattered and that he should feel proud to receive a copy; which I promised to send him.

RAYMOND DREYSSCHOCK, who ranks very high as a violinist in Leipsic, has given several concerts with wonderful success. He has a strong idea of visiting America.

After finishing up my business in Leipsic, I visited Berlin, where I had the pleasure of meeting many musicians of celebrity. I called on Mr. SCHLESINGER, who showed me many musical curiosities, portraits, &c. I met here Fraulein MARIE WIECK, the celebrated pianist, who has been giving several concerts with most wonderful success. She is now about to return to Dresden again. After leaving Mr. Schlesinger's my attention was called at once towards the Royal Palace, where I saw a tremendous crowd of people, and a large number of military. I made my way through the crowd, when I saw the King of Prussia just making his appearance from the Palace, on foot, accompanied by some two hundred officers of different grades and from different companies. He walked up and down the street in a most commanding manner, which led a Yankee to suppose that he was "some pumpkins." While reviewing his troops, a Band of something more than a hundred musicians played several marches, and melodies from different operas, most splendidly. However, as my time was somewhat limited, I was obliged to leave to fulfil an engagement with Mr. Bock, music dealer. On my arrival at his place, his carriage was in readiness and waiting. I was introduced to Herr SINGER, a celebrated violinist from Pesth; also to Herr Von MEYER, a young composer of considerable talent.

We all stepped into the carriage and took a survey of the suburbs of Berlin. It being a delightful day, it was very pleasant and agreeable. Mr. Bock conducted us to the Prussian State Prison, which we went all over. I was very much interested, and found every part of the whole establishment in such perfect order, so neat, and clean, that I was about to venture to enquire the price of board, as I am sure it would be a very desirable location to live in, provided one could keep his own keys. After going through several departments we came to Mr. Bock's music printing office, which is in this establishment, privileged by the King. He has three large rooms. The first is where the lead is melted, and the plates are made. The second is where they are engraved. In the third the music is printed, pressed, and from there sent to his store ready for sale. The rooms are about fifty feet long and twelve wide, and the floor is waxed and polished so nice that it would almost serve as a mirror. Each prisoner is dressed in dark red throughout; stout jacket, vest, knee breeches, and long stockings to meet them, with heavy shoes. Their ages are from twenty to fifty, and every one is sentenced for life. Very agreeable occupation that, but rather long time to serve! I think it will be quite interesting to your readers to know that all the music published by Bote and Bock, Berlin, is printed in a prison.

After passing some two hours here we rode to a large coffee garden, where we seated ourselves and indulged in a glass of Bier. In the evening I went to the Opera and heard the celebrated WAGNER in the Prophete. More perfect acting I have never witnessed; and a more beautiful voice, more finely cultivated, is seldom heard. Her low and middle tones are perfectly wonderful, and such as I have never heard from any other woman's lips. I was completely carried away by her. Yours, &c.

NATHAN RICHARDSON.

Gleanings from German Musical Papers.

[Prepared for this Journal.]

The reorganization of the post office in Berlin has admitted a large number of qualified military men, whose service had expired, into that branch of the civil service. Among the new officers in the general office are about forty who were formerly in the bands. These have united and form an orchestra, which a few weeks since gave a concert to their fellow officials and their families. Beethoven's overture to "Prometheus," and Rossini's to "William Tell" were performed, together with solos for the violin and clarinet. Pretty well for a post office!—at least we should think so if the thing had occurred.

The Barcelona Courier recently published the following notice: "All lovers, wishing to pay court to their ladies, may apply at the bureau of the theatre, which will furnish an orchestra of forty persons, who for five francs, are ready to give serenades before any doors designated."

These are the bills of the fifth and sixth of the Sinfonie Soirées of the Royal orchestra at Berlin during the past season:

FIFTH SOIREE.

- | | | | |
|-----------|---|-----------------------------|------------|
| 1st part. | { | Symphony in G minor,..... | Mozart. |
| | { | Overture to Coriolan,..... | Beethoven. |
| 2nd part. | { | Overture to Don Juan,..... | Mozart. |
| | { | Symphony in C (First),..... | Beethoven. |

SIXTH SOIREE.

- | | | | |
|-----------|---|----------------------------|--------------|
| 1st part. | { | Overture to Ray Blas,..... | Mendelssohn. |
| | { | Symphony in E minor,..... | Haydn. |
| 2nd part. | { | Overture to Oberon,..... | Weber. |
| | { | Symphony in F (8th),..... | Beethoven. |

We fear it will be some time before an American audience will be satisfied with such programmes, and what is more sit in perfect silence during the entire performances.

Flotow's new opera, "Indra," is going all through Germany.

A German paper says that the new Music Hall at Boston is exquisitely adapted to music. A concert of sacred music given by Mme. Sontag in connection with the Handel and Haydn Society left nothing to be desired. It speaks also of a new statue of Beethoven, to be executed by Crawford, and to be placed in the hall; also of a new Biography of that composer by an American "music-loving dilettant, Taylor." These paragraphs are evidently taken, in part, from the London papers.

The annual report of the Grand Opera at Munich in Bavaria, shows that 123 operas and musical dramas were performed during the year 1852. They were as follows:

German.	French and Italian.
Beethoven.....1	Spontini.....1
Mozart.....5	Cherubini.....1
Gluck.....1	Cimarosa.....1
Weber.....2	Mehul.....2
Meyerbeer.....3	Gretry.....1
Spohr.....1	Anber.....6
Dittersdorf.....1	Rossini.....3
Flotow.....3	Halevy.....3
Lortzing.....2	Bellini.....2
Lochner.....1	Donizetti.....3
	Verdi.....1
20	24

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

From my Diary. No. XXIV.

NEW YORK, April 17. Though not very fond of his music, the name of Lindpaintner has long had a charm for me, which probably is owing to the associations with which I first became acquainted with it. The few who can read Bettine's correspondence with Goethe, will not need be reminded, that in the portion of her letters written from Landshut, she speaks of him more than once. The particular passage I have in mind, is in the letter of Oct. 16, 1809, and is as follows:

"I have into the bargain an accumulated correspondence with young off-shoots of the fine arts;—a young architect at Cologne; a musician of eighteen years of age, who studied composition with Winter, rich in beautiful melodies, like a silver swan, which sings in the clear blue atmosphere, with swelling wings. The swan has a confounded Bavarian name; he is called Lindpaintner; yet, says Winter, he will bring the name to honor."

In another letter she refers to him in a single sentence, which closes with a sly reference to Goethe's want of musical powers. "The Musician," says she, "is my favorite, and with him I might easily have driven my discourses upon art to excess, for there I expatiate more, and cede nothing to you."

Jacob, the elder Lindpaintner, was a tenor singer, of the school of Righini, and had a situation under Clemens Wenzeslaus, the last elector of Treves. It is a little curious sometimes to mark the connection between small and great things, and several men who have made their mark upon the musical world might have remained comparatively unknown had the French Revolution been delayed ten years longer! The association in this case is on this wise. The French armies put an end to the Electorate of Cologne and Treves, and the poor musicians of Maximilian and Clemens were dispersed. Beethoven could now remain in Vienna; the two Rombergs had to travel for a subsistence, and lo! they proved to be in the very highest rank—Bernhard as violoncellist, Andreas as violinist; old father Ries, deprived of his situation, sent his son Ferdinand to Vienna; and Jacob Lindpaintner followed his prince to Augsburg, where he settled as a member of Clemens' household, and appears to have given up his profession as a singer. Peter, the son, was kept at the gymnasium until he was sixteen years of age, and pursued the study of music as a recreation. He had two good teachers, Plüdderl, a fine violinist and a very excellent music-director, on the violin, and Witzka, the director in the Cathedral, on the organ, and the piano forte, and in the science of music. Augsburg at that time was not the still, sleepy, grass-grown city, which I found in 1851, but was filled with musicians and artists, and young Lindpaintner, once on the way, had every inducement to make himself, what nature intended, a fine musician. Clemens was a great lover of music and through his influence the father finally consented that Peter should give up his intended profession and devote himself to Art. It must have been in the youth's 17th year that the Elector (elector no longer, though) sent him to Munich, to Winter. Winter was in fact no teacher, and his pupils could learn little if anything of him; yet the boy in the space of two or three years wrote an opera (Demophon), a Mass and a Te Deum, which were performed in 1811 at Munich.

About the time he came to Munich, came also Bettine, and they soon became acquainted of course, for she was as free as air with everybody, and was studying music and drawing and no one knows what—the pet and playthiog of all the grave heads of the splendid circle of literary men at that time in Munich. There were Tieck, and Rumalex, and old Jacobi, and Stadion, and Archbishops and Bishops and Counts and so on. And, with them all, Winter. She writes:

"Every morning I pay my old Winter a visit; in fine weather he breakfasts in the garden arbor with his wife; then I must always settle the dispute between them about the cream upon the milk. Then he ascends his dove cote, big as he is! He must stoop to the floor, a hundred pigeons flutter about him, alight upon his head, breast, body and legs; tenderly he squints at them, and for very friendliness he cannot whistle, so he begs me: 'Oh, pray whistle,'—then hundreds more come tumbling in from without, with whistling wings, cooing and fluttering about him; then he is happy and would like to compose music, which should sound exactly so."

There is a picture of the composer of the "Interrupted Sacrifice!" and so at "old Winter's" Bettine and the young musician with the "confounded Bavarian name" became acquainted. And now nearly half a century has passed away, and Bettine is the Baroness von Arnim, a little, lively, black-eyed, handsome old lady, full of life and romance, with the best heart and one of the noblest heads in the world, and the youthful musician is a dignified man of sixty, who has brought his name to honor. Where was I?

Well, the first opera, "Demophon," succeeded pretty well, and Clemens would have his protégé visit Italy—and the protégé was no ways disinclined—when death stepped in, took off Clemens, and poor Peter (1812) must get a living by his own resources. Just at this time a new theatre was opened at Munich, and Lindpaintner, not yet 21, was invited to the office of Kapellmeister. This was no slight honor, but it led him to neglect theoretical studies, and to compose away, hit or miss, rule or no rule. A German Biographical Sketch of him tells how this was cured. On a certain occasion a new overture by him was performed with extraordinary applause. Delighted and self-satisfied the composer left the hall. Meeting an old friend, a thorough musician, from whom he expected nothing but praise, he was not a little astounded to have the question put to him, how it was possible for him, a young man with so much and such fine talent, to write such miserable stuff! The speaker then proceeded to point out to him some of his more notable failings, and finally closed by telling him that before he wrote anything more, he had better learn something solid, for as yet he knew precious little of the principles of composition! This was what led him to place himself under the instructions of Gratz, as mentioned in the Sketch in Dwight's Journal; instructions by which he profited, as all the world knows.

April 22. Looking over a file of German papers this evening, I found the following proclamation in the column of official news:

"So numerous of late have been the applications for the title of Music-director, the conferring of which falls within my official duties, that I find myself obliged, for the purpose of preserving the value of this distinguishing mark of excellence in the art, to revise carefully the circumstances under which the aforesaid title shall be conferred. Having obtained the opinion of the musical section of the Royal Academy of Science on this matter, I have for the present come to this decision;—that, for the sake of preserving in future a proper limit to the grant of the title, Music-director, notice shall only be taken of the claims of such musicians as possess a general scientific and fundamental musical education, who, through great works of musical composition of acknowledged excellence, have become known, and who have successfully assumed the direction of works of the higher class and of the performances of established musical associations. At the same time I reserve the right in certain cases of conferring the title upon suitable persons upon the recommendation of the musical section of the Royal Academy. I bring the above to public notice, in order that proper circumspection may be used in future applications for the title aforesaid, and to prevent improper and unfounded solicitations, and that those applying may produce the proper witnesses and proofs of their having fulfilled the indispensable requisites to the grant.

VON LADENBERG,

Minister of Ecclesiastical, Educational and Medical Affairs.

Berlin, July 8, 1850."

I could not help thinking, with a feeling of commiseration, of the fate—if some such order should proceed from the Department of the Interior—of not a few of our "Professors!"

April 25. Considering what a teapot tempest was raised by a paragraph in the Diary some months since, I was rather glad to see the following in a Pittsburgh paper, which came to hand to-day:

"The third and last grand concert of the Germania Society will take place this evening at Masonic Hall. For the first time in this city a grand entire symphony of the great BEETHOVEN will be performed."

Then follows an account of the Pastorale. I hope that this favorite Society will continue in the right path and do something to show people the difference between classic and dance house music.

A correspondent of the National Intelligencer a few weeks since seems however to have been not a little dissatisfied with the Germanians' programmes in that city. Hear him:

GENTLEMEN:—This society gave two more of their Washington Concerts, &c., &c. It may not be known to the citizens of Washington that when the Germania Society give a concert here, they select such music as they deem fitted to the culture of our citizens. It is a settled conviction in the minds of these gentlemen that we of Washington are not yet able to appreciate the compositions of Beethoven and other eminent musical composers, all which they play a whole season through in Boston; but, instead of such masterpieces of musical genius, we have the Overture of Weber, in Der Freyschütz, which, however excellent, has certainly become stale by repetition. Then we have a Waltz, by Lanner, and so on to the end; and for Thursday evening we had more waltzes, gallops, and such like—the very garbage of their collections. It would be hard to find a more stupid piece of music than the Castilian Gallop, performed on Wednesday evening. Rousseau thought he had done wonders when he wrote the air known by his name on "four notes;" but Lumbye, the author of this Gallop, has excelled him, for his piece is written on "three," and very like those of a hardy-gurdy they are.

Messrs. Editors, we are not so utterly wanting in musical taste as these gentlemen have supposed. And concert after concert would be attended here if they would but give us such bills as they present to the people of Boston and New York.

JAELL is the prince of pianists, and one piece of his in a concert is enough; and as for the young girl, she makes one believe in a pre-existing state, in which she was doubtless an accomplished violinist, taught perhaps by St. Cecilia, and who with ease recovers what she better knew in her former life.

P. S.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 30, 1853.

The Opera.

Since our notice of her opening in the Son-nambula, Mme. SONTAG has appeared in the characters of the Daughter of the Regiment, Linda, the Borgia, Rosina, and Lucia. Six widely different rôles in as many nights! And all with a rare measure of both vocal and dramatic success. We cannot but take note of this uncommon wear and versatility of talent, this consummate positive economy of strength, in a woman renewing the artistic triumphs of more than twenty years ago, and now already far gone into the second twelve-months of this active After-Summer.

Another general note we have to make of the peculiar and enduring charm there is in the quality, the individuality, the color, (so to speak) of her voice, notwithstanding that that voice is the first thing about her that confesses itself overtaxed by such continuous and arduous employment. This rich complexion of her tones (fancy we speak of golden or purpling grapes) has steadily grown upon us and lingers with a deep-reaching pleasantness in the mind. Of marvelous execution, subtle ornament, graceful art of veiling the defect of time, we need add nothing to repeated and full notes already taken by ourselves and others. A few words of the operas singly.

The high-bred Countess takes the "Daughter of the Regiment"—i. e. so long as she is of the Regiment, through the first act—somewhat daintily. She cannot go into it with the smacking gusto, the sincere girl-boyishness of an Alboni. She does not drum, and she does not pour out the liquor to the soldiers with her own hands. And who would have her do it? It is not her nature. She could only be the spoiled child of the army, by ceasing to be the Sontag; and that is an individuality which we can hardly afford to lose. But if Alboni in largeness and out-door haleness of voice, in dashing abandon, and power of making herself entirely happy with the part, is her superior in the first act, Sontag gives you a very winning archness and prettiness of a more refined sort, which promises better for better things (for really the music is hardly worth a great artist's trouble); and already when it comes to parting from the regiment, she sings with a sweetness and a pathos, far beyond Alboni; while in the second act, transplanted into the high-bred saloon life, without forgetting her free, frolic impulses, she gives you the ideal of the character as much more perfectly as the Alboni does it in the first act. The music-lesson scene was inimitably fine. Then too the Salut a la France was restored, with other things curtailed to the requirements of Alboni's register; so that more and more it grew upon you as a good artistic whole. BADIALI, always good, was less at home than Rovere in the old Sergeant; it was not character enough for him. The Tonio was pretty and feeble; but evidently Signor POZZOLINI was quite ill. The choruses were good again, generally; but we did recognize (after all our congratulation last week) that old fish-market tone again in a single very prominent contralto voice in the kneeling chorus, at the beginning.

The same phenomenon again in the opening prayer chorus in Linda di Chamounix! But not repeated, that we noticed, in the rest of the performance, either this time or the last. And this was absolutely the only fault that we could find in Linda. It was at once forgotten in the charming completeness of the performance as a whole, and in the admirable art with which Sontag conveyed all the music and the individuality of her part. We had remembered Linda as a pretty opera, the music thereof gracefully and sweetly commonplace. But this time we were quite fascinated to the end; and we can fully second the general suggestion that this is one of the operas which it would most delight the worthy public to have repeated. It was, so far, Sontag's finest part. The for the most part sweet, florid, birdlike, gently pathetic character of its melody was suited to her voice and skill; while the quiet, every-day, amiable, refined domesticity of the character was native to her. Her simple, filial grace in her peasant home, her faithful love of Carlos, her earnest, respectful listening to the sad, mellow music of her good neighbor Pierotto, her affecting farewell, as she sets out with Pierotto and the Savoyards over the mountains on their winter pilgrimage to Paris, were all chastely beautiful as one could wish. In her sumptuous Parisian dwelling, to which she has been wonderingly persuaded by her now revealed noble lover, and in that elegant old Louis Quatorze dress, she is the most perfect beauty we have seen upon the stage.

Her resistance of the old roué of a Marquis, who finds her in this somewhat questionable position, was a most perfect piece of acting, thoroughly alive with the genuine haughty scorn of a pure, a high-souled and insulted lady; and her recitative was a model of distinctness and impressiveness. The delirium, in which her brain seems musically whirling, under the double effect of her lover's seeming perfidy and her old father's curse, comes on and proceeds in the most natural and life-like manner, and never, in its intense and spasmodic demonstrations, oversteps (as almost all mad scenes are wont to do) the limits of artistic beauty. The sad, dull, utter prostration of mind and body, in which Pierotto leads her back to her village home, were as natural and touching as the sleep of exhaustion that succeeds a raging fever; and the lightning-swift return of joy and reason crowned all with a blaze of glory. One knows not the half of that artistic charm which has so long borne the name of Henriette Sontag, until he has heard and seen her on the stage in a part so perfectly her own as Linda.

Signora PICO VIETTI found out all the advantages of the pretty and poetic contralto part of Pierotto, and sang the quaint and plaintive Romanza with a luscious, Alboni-like largeness and richness of voice. Her husband, Sig. VIETTI, achieved the tenor part very creditably; while BADIALI as the old father, GASPARONI, as the priest, and Rocco as the jolly, sly old Marquis, made three as strong and telling and artistically finished basses as we ever heard together on one stage. The unaccompanied quintet, in which these were joined with Vietti and Pico, was a faultless rendering of a rich, impressive piece of harmony, and merited the encore it received.

On Monday Mme. Sontag again surprised us in a character as opposite as could be to the last. The Lucrezia Borgia, the most dramatic of all the modern Italian operas, opened in a style that far surpassed the many representations we had hitherto enjoyed of it. In the first place there was some clever attempt at scenery, showing the grand canal of Venice and its illuminated palaces in the background; and the luxury of that festal music needs the luxuries of sight at the same time,—luxuries long obsolete in that old theatre. Then the spirited rendering of the chorus parts, with good dressing and good acting, and the unusual energy put into that admirably dramatic denunciatory passage: Maffeo Orsini, Signora, son io, &c., with the proud, vindictive, Borgia-like rage with which Sontag meets the insult, not falling to the ground as other Lucrezias have done, but following her enemies out, shaking her clenched hands at them with the triumph of revenge in store, and so connecting the end with the beginning of the opera,—made this whole scene in its ensemble splendidly effective. The solo and duet with Gennaro were exquisitely sung on her part, and this tender episode of maternal feeling was finely, touchingly impersonated; and foreign as it must ever seem for a woman of her nature to assume with any great force or intensity the dark and terrible nature of a Borgia, yet at the first touch of insult she appeared to swell with beautiful, envenomed passion, like the serpent that is trod upon. In the scene with the duke, before the poisoning, she displayed consummate action, modulating with the vivid suddenness of lightning through the whole gamut of conflicting passions. The trio would have been great, but for the feebly audible tenor of POZZOLINI, who evidently had not recovered his strength. Indeed the want of all effective seconding in a Gennaro was necessarily a damper more than once upon the dramatic power of Sontag. The last scene indeed was nearly ruined by it. Even the drinking scene was poorer than we many times have had it, partly because of the tenor's weakness robbing it of all the fine point of the by-play between him and his poet friend Orsini, and partly because of Mme. PICO's somewhat coarse impersonation of the latter character, and only voluptuous, not refined, rendering of the Brindisi.—BADIALI's singing and acting of the Duke was all superb. GASPARONI made a better Gubetta than we have had before; and the choruses, especially those fine and graphic ones of the Duke's assassins in the street, (which have a touch of the Rossini "Barber" vein in their music—not forgetting that too of the pointed encounter between the two spies,—a sort of Shakespearian incidental wit there is in these little things) were done in praise-worthy style.—On the whole, even with the drawbacks already mentioned, this was the most impressive performance we have yet had of Lucrezia Borgia,—though we would have given something for Benedetti's robust, golden tenor in Di pescator, and for his general fire and manliness of action; also for such a refined, ideal type of the Maffeo Orsini, as we once had in gentle Rossi Corsi. In Sontag here was revealed a capacity of tragic fire and elevation, which few had suspected; there was not a little of the quickening fire of imagination in it, and it enforced the recognition of more depth of nature than anything we have witnessed from her before. The only pity was, first the want of a Gennaro to conspire with her in much that was not to be done by one alone, and secondly, the fact that her strength hardly held out for such prolonged intensity of action.

Presto! again, and cruel Borgias are forgotten in the charming espiegleries of the most arch, most fascinating, most refined, most musical Rosina, we have ever witnessed on our stage, and in the exquisitely witty plot and witty melodies of the immortal "Barber" of Rossini. There are more musical ideas in the "Barber," more fresh, original and individual melodies, and more admirable harmonic combinations, than in all the current Italian operas put together. The music has a summer warmth and geniality, an ever shifting heat-lightning of fancy, an inexhaustible invention, which is quite Mozart-ish. Lucrezia Borgia alone has touches of the same quality, in those little incidental passages above referred to. But the "Barber" is all healthy, glorious, invigorating music; and we can conceive of no more perfect luxury than to see and hear it played and sung as well as it is composed. To a high degree we shared that luxury on Wednesday. Never have we enjoyed an opera half so much, with the exception of Don Giovanni; and that was never half so well performed here.

For the first time here this opera had good justice done it; and for the first time it fully made its mark upon the public,—the largest audience of the season. The great amount of Recitative in it, and the careless, slovenly, coarsely farcical representations have heretofore been an obstacle to its taking hold of any but those musical enough to direct their chief attention to the orchestra, which Rossini has made an evergushing spring of mingling melodies. This time the whole was lifted above low farce into fine, genial, exquisite comedy, and it was felt, in the perfect marriage of sounds with thoughts, how much of the essential comedy resides in the music itself. When that is so refined, what excuse is there for flat vulgarity in the action! This time, it was all carefully and conscientiously sung; and all effectively, save Pozzolini's Almaviva, who still looks pale and weak, but in whom there is no offensive pretension ever. The recitative on all hands was so distinctly uttered, as to convey even to new ears the charm of the inimitably expressive Italian parlante. Then the soul and main-spring of the whole funny plot, the Barber himself, was the first genuine barber we have seen. BADIALI agreeably disappointed us in this. It is not of course his most fitting part; but he did it with an ease, a gusto, an ever-active reference to the other actors and the main plot, forgetting himself to make a whole of it; and he sang its rich music, and rolled out its voluble parlante with such satisfying tones, that his one part alone seemed to re-make and restore the play.

Rocco's Dr. Bartolo was altogether clever and appropriate, and he did what we see Tagliafico has just done in London,—restored the fine air in which he upbraids his niece: A un dottore, &c. GASPARONI's Don Basilio was well made up, and he sang the grotesquely solemn La Calomnia and Buona Sera with very good effect. The officer, too. (Sig. BARRATINI) gave character to his small part. Signora MORA's Bertha finished out the domesticity of the scene in a style worthy of the whole; indeed in all the plays she is the best old lady we have had. Of Mme. SONTAG herself we have only room to say, that musically she was more to us in the Rosina than in any other form in which she has sung to us; while her acting was not inferior to her previous rôles,—unless that it might have been a little more fiery for a Spanish girl chafing against bars;—but we incline to Mme. Sontag's rendering, which subdues the one part to the fresh, bright, unsentimental tone of the whole comedy; the only exaggeration in place here is the grotesque, the comic, not the serious and intense. Real life fitnesses must yield to ideal ones in such a pure artistic humor of the brain.

Works of Great Composers

PERFORMED IN BOSTON DURING THE PAST WINTER.

We thought it would be an easy matter, as well as interesting to our readers, to present in one tabular view the many classical compositions, with a hearing of which our Boston audiences have been favored during this last season. But it is difficult to do it thoroughly. The following list includes the principal, and yet it is by no means complete, except so far as the evening concert programmes furnish the materials. But at the Public Rehearsals there have also been not only many repetitions of much of the same music, but many presentations of other pieces, of which (in the want of programmes) it has been impossible at once to recover anything like a full list. We mention only works of the principal composers, omitting the lighter music, and leaving the operas to be summed up after Mme. Sontag's season. It is quite likely, too, that we have made some errors in regard to the relative number of performances of certain pieces by the different societies and artists.

BEETHOVEN.
Symphonies:	No. of times.	By whom.
No. 1.....	1.	The Germanians.
2.....	3.	do.
3.....	3.	do.
4.....	2.	do.
5.....	2.	Musical Fund.
6.....	2.	Germanians.
7.....	1.	Musical Fund Soc.
8.....	2.	Germanians.
9.....	3.	Musical Fund.
Overtures: To Egmont ,.....	3.	do.
Leonora ,.....	3.	Germanians.
Fidelio ,.....	1.	do.
Men of Prometheus ,.....	2.	Musical Fund.
King Stephen ,.....	1.	do.
Sextet, op. 81, (Strings and 2 horns),.....	1.	Mendelssohn Club.

Advertisements.

(Postponed from last week.)

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

MADAME HENRIETTE SONTAG
AND THE

Händel and Haydn Society

Will give on SUNDAY EVENING, May 1st,
AT THE BOSTON MUSIC HALL,

ROSSINI'S STABAT MATER,

Preceded by a GRAND SACRED CONCERT, on which occasion they will be assisted by

MME. ROSINA PICO, Sig. BADIALI, Sig. POZZOLINI, Sig. VIETTI, Sig. GASPARIANI, Sig. ROCCO,
And the GRAND ORCHESTRA of the SONTAG TROUPE.

Conductor,.....Mr. CARL ECKERT.

Organist,.....Mr. F. F. MÜLLER.

Tickets with Seats secured, at ONE DOLLAR each, to be had at the Music Store of Mr. E. H. WADE, 197 Washington street, on Friday and Saturday; on Sunday at the Tremont House, and at the office of the Hall on Sunday Evening. Doors open at 7—Concert to commence at 8 o'clock.

TO PRINTERS.

MUSIC COMPOSITOR WANTED. One who is thoroughly acquainted with the business. Apply at this Office.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

NEW YORK NORMAL MUSICAL INSTITUTE.

GENTLEMEN and LADIES, who design attending the first term of the NEW YORK NORMAL MUSICAL INSTITUTE, and who wish to have board procured for them, are requested to give early notice to that effect. This will be necessary, in order to secure suitable accommodations; especially, as there is prospect of a large class.

Applications have been made by some who desire to attend the courses of lectures and other class exercises of the Institute, omitting the private lessons embraced in the full course. Notice is therefore given that the price of a ticket admitting the holder to all the lectures and class exercises, will be twenty-five dollars. Including the course of private lessons, the price is fifty dollars.

The term commences on MONDAY, APRIL 25th, 1853, and continues three months, during which time daily lectures and instruction will be given in the various departments of music, the design being to furnish thorough instruction, and especially to qualify teachers of music.

The assistance of THOMAS HASTINGS, Esq., and other eminent musicians has been secured.

Circulars containing further particulars may be obtained on application to MASON BROTHERS, (late Mason & Law,) 23 Park Row, New York.

LOWELL MASON.
GEORGE F. ROOT.
WIL. E. BRADBURY.

Mar. 5. tf

MRS. ROSA GARCIA DE RIBAS,

TEACHER OF THE

PIANOFORTE, SINGING & GUITAR,
2 Seneca St., corner Harrison Avenue.

MR. De RIBAS will give instruction on the Oboe and Flute. Also MUSIC ARRANGED, TRANSPOSED, &c. Boston, April 23. 3m

BEETHOVEN'S CELEBRATED MESS in C,
IN VOCAL SCORE:

With an Accompaniment for the Organ or Piano-Forte, by Vincent Novello. With Latin and English text. Just published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St. iii 4

THE SYMPHONIES OF BEETHOVEN:—

ARRANGED FOR THE PIANO-FORTE BY J. N. HUMMEL. The above excellent compositions are now in course of publication by the subscriber.

Symphony No. 7, in A, op. 92, is now ready.

Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St. iii 4

Sold by all Music Dealers.

JUST PUBLISHED,

THE STABAT MATER, by Rossini, at the low price of 75 cents. iii 9

Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

NEW EDITION OF CARCASSI'S GUITAR BOOK. New and Improved Method for the Guitar, by M. Carcassi. Price $2.50.

This new edition of Carcassi's celebrated method embraces much valuable matter not contained in those previously issued. These additions are those which have been made by the distinguished author after an experience which enabled him to determine what was actually needed by the pupil for a thorough understanding of the art. The whole has been carefully translated by a well known Professor of the Guitar, and is thereby rendered as free as possible from those slight but perplexing inaccuracies which sometimes become a part of translations and reprints. A number of popular songs in each of the different keys have been appended, which together with the masterly instructions of Carcassi, and his plain yet comprehensive course of Exercises, furnish all that is desirable to both teacher and scholar.

OLIVER DITSON, Publisher,
115 Washington St.

Feb 26

—Edward A. Balch,

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE,
No. 86 TREMONT STREET, BOSTON.WHITE BROTHERS,
DEALERS IN MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS,

Best Italian, German, French and English Strings,

AGENTS OF

J. André, Offenbach; and G. André, Philadelphia,

FOR THE SALE OF FOREIGN CLASSIC MUSIC,
CHOIR MUSIC, &c.

Instruments Made, Repaired, Tuned, Bought, Sold, or Exchanged, on the most favorable terms.

IRA J. WHITE.

iii 2 3m

A. WARREN WHITE.

Massachusetts Academy of Fine Arts.

THE FIRST SEMI-ANNUAL EXHIBITION of the Massachusetts Academy of Fine Arts is now open at its Rooms,

No. 37½ Tremont Row.

The Collection comprises some of the finest specimens of Pictures by American Artists.

Hours of Exhibition, from 8 A. M. until 6 P. M.

Single admission, 25 cents; Season Tickets, 50 cents.

Feb. 26. tf

THEODORE T. BARKER,

MUSIC STORE.

No. 381 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

Chickering's Pianos to let.

All Foreign and American Musical Publications received as soon as published. iii 23 3m

N. D. COTTON,

IMPORTER and DEALER IN

English, French, and American Stationery,

DRAWING & PAINTING MATERIALS,

No. 13 Tremont Row, Boston.

 Wedding and Visiting Cards Engraved and Printed. 16 tf

BEETHOVEN'S ORATORIO OF ENGEDI, or DAVID IN THE WILDERNESS, known as the MOUNT OF OLIVES, is this day published in a neat, convenient form for the singer or concert-goer by

Geo. P. Reed & Co., Publishers,
17 TREMONT ROW, BOSTON.

Jan. 8.

Germania Serenade Band.

THE SERVICES OF THIS ASSOCIATION can be secured by applying to

iii 14 tf

G. SCHNAPP, Leader,
304 Tremont Street.J. W. TAVERNER,
PROFESSOR OF BLOCCUTION,

AT HIS RESIDENCE,

No. 30 CHARLES STREET, BOSTON.

J. C. WOODMAN,

ORGANIST AND CONDUCTOR OF MUSIC AT CENTRAL CHURCH,

Teacher of Singing, Piano Forte, &c.,

No. 94 Chestnut Street, Boston.

iii 2 3m.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.

FOREIGN MUSIC DEPOT,

GIRARD HOUSE BUILDINGS,

NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,

PHILADELPHIA.

N. B. The complete works, for Piano, (Quartets, Trios, Duets for Piano and Violin, Duets for four hands and Piano solo pieces,) of BEETHOVEN and MOZART, as also the Piano solo Works of CLEMENTI and HAYDN, as published by J. André, Offenbach, in sets, at very low prices. We have appointed

Messrs. WHITE BROTHERS,

TREMONT TEMPLE, BOSTON,

our Agents for the sale of the above Standard Editions of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, &c. &c. iii 2 tf

Pianos and Melodeons to Let.

OLIVER DITSON,

Music Dealer, 115 Washington St., Boston,

HAS a good variety of Piano Fortes, Melodeons, Seraphines, and Reed Organs, to let, for city or country, on low terms. If, within one year from the time of hiring, the party should conclude to purchase the instrument, no charge will be made for rent of it, except the interest on its value. 25 tf

Letter-Press, Music and Job Printing-Office,

JONAS CHICKERING,

RESPECTFULLY gives notice to his friends and the public that, having recovered from the late disastrous effects produced by the destruction of his factory, he is now ready to receive orders for PIANOS, which he promises to execute with as much faithfulness and promptitude as heretofore.

379 Washington Street, Boston.

Mar. 5.

tf

HEWS' PATENT

AMERICAN ACTION PIANO-FORTE.

THE MANUFACTURER is in possession of numerous testimonials from distinguished Musical Professors, who have used the greatly improved ACTION PIANO, commending it in high terms. The attention of purchasers and amateurs of Music to an examination of its superiority, is solicited.

GEO. HEWS, 365 Washington St., Boston.

Apr. 10.

tf

D. B. NEWHALL,
MANUFACTURER and DEALER IN
PIANO FORTES,

No. 344 Washington Street, Boston.

PIANO FORTES REPAIRED, TUNED, & TO LET.

Apr. 10.

tf

SIGNOR G. C. GUIDI respectfully informs his former pupils and the public, that he has resumed his instructions in SINGING, after the Italian school, with the intention to settle permanently in Boston. In order to accommodate those who may not wish to take private instruction, he will open classes for ladies and gentlemen, on moderate terms. None but good voices will be admitted. Terms liberal for persons intending to study for professional purposes.

Sig. G. can be consulted free upon any musical subject, daily, from 12 to 2, at Mr. Hew's Piano Manufactory, No. 365 Washington street, where terms and time for classes may be known.

Orders or notes for Sig. G. may be addressed to him at G. P. Reed & Co.'s Music Store, 17 Tremont Row, and at Oliver Ditson's, 115 Washington street. Feb. 5.

A CARD.

THE SUBSCRIBER respectfully offers his services to the public as Teacher of the Piano-Forte, the Violin, and of Singing, after a clear and easy method. He will also accompany pupils, both in seminars and in private houses, in the practice of Duets, Trios, &c.

Address for the present at 168 Tremont Street.

March 26. 3m.

CARL GÄRTNER.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
265 Washington Street, Boston.

Oct. 16.

3m

T. BRICHER,

Organist and Conductor of Music

At the Bowdoin Square Church.

OFFICE UNDER THE CHURCH...ENTRANCE ON CHARDON ST

Jan. 22. 3m.

H. S. CUTLER,

Organist at the Church of the Advent, also of the Boston Harmonic Society.

ADDRESS—(Care of A. N. JOHNSON,) No. 90 Tremont Street, Boston. 22 tf

F. F. MÜLLER,

DIRECTOR OF MUSIC AND ORGANIST at the Old South Church; ORGANIST of the Handel and Haydn Society; ORGANIST of the Musical Education Society, &c. &c. &c. Inquire of Messrs. REED & Co., No. 17 Tremont Row, Boston. iii 7 tf

NATHAN RICHARDSON,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC.

Now in Europe; will return 1st of June. Letters may be addressed at 19 Hanover St. 25 tf

GEORGE F. WILLEY,

TEACHER OF MUSIC.

Private Tuition in the principles of Music and the Cultivation of the Voice.

MUSIC ROOM, THE LECTURE ROOM OF KIRK STREET CHURCH, RESIDENCE, 84 FRANKLIN SQUARE, SUFFOLK STREET, Feb. 5. LOWELL, MASS.

A. W. FRENZEL,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC,

Feb. 5.

4 Pine Street, Boston.

RATES FOR ADVERTISING.

For half a square, (8 lines,) or less, first insertion, . . . $0.50

each additional inser. . . 25

For a square, (16 lines,) first insertion, . . . 1.00

each additional insertion, . . . 50

On advertisements standing three months or longer, a discount of twenty per cent. on the above rates is allowed.

(A column counts as seven squares.) Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 School St.

DWIGHT'S Journal of Music.

A Paper of Art and Literature.

VOL. III.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 7, 1853.

NO. 5.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

TERMS.....TWO DOLLARS PER ANNUM, (IN ADVANCE.)

CITY SUBSCRIBERS can be served at their houses by the further payment of fifty cents per annum.

☞ For Rates of Advertising, see last page.

POSTAGE, if paid in advance, for any distance within the State, thirteen cents a year; if not in advance, twenty-six cents. To all places beyond the State, double these rates.

J. S. DWIGHT,.....EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

☞ OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St.

By REDDING & CO., 8 State St.

" GEO. P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row.

" A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.

" DEXTER & BROTHERS, 43 Ann Street, N. Y.

" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 483 Broadway, N. Y.

" MASON & LAW, 23 Park Row, New York.

" GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.

" G. ANDRE, 229 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St., Balt.

" COLBURN & FIELD, Cincinnati, O.

" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Persons willing to become Agents for procuring subscribers, especially Music-Dealers and Teachers, are invited to correspond with the Editor, as above. Satisfactory references required, and liberal commissions allowed.

☞ Back numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Also bound copies of Vols I and II, at prices varying from $2.50 to $3.50.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

SPONTINI.

From the French of HECTOR BERLIOZ. (Continued.)

Observe now, with regard to the disposition of the male voices in this inimitable Stretta, that far from being awkward and poor, as has been pretended, the parcelling of the vocal forces has been profoundly calculated. The tenor and bass voices are, at the commencement, divided into six parts, of which three only are heard at one time; it is a double chorus in form of dialogue. The first part sings three notes, which the second repeats instantly, so as to produce an incessant repercussion of each time of the measure, and consequently without there ever being more than one half of the male voices employed at one time. It is only at the approach of the fortissimo that this whole mass unites itself into one chorus; it is at the moment when, the melodic interest and passionate expression having attained their highest power, the panting rhythm requires new forces to dart forth the heart-rending harmony which accompanies the female chorus. This is the result of the vast system of crescendo adopted by the author, and the extreme limit of which, as I have already said, is found at the dissonant chord which bursts forth when the Pontiff throws over the head of Julia the fatal black veil. It is an admirable combination, upon which we cannot lavish too much praise; and it is not excusable to underrate its value except in a petty fragment of a musician like him who blamed it. But it is natural to criticism, thus guided from low to high, to reproach exceptional men, whose morals she takes it upon herself to form, with having qualities, and to see weakness in the most evident manifestation of their knowledge and strength.

When therefore will the Paganinis of the art of writing cease to take lessons of the blind mendicants of the Pont Neuf? . . . The success of La Vestale was brilliant and complete. A hundred representations were insufficient to weary the enthusiasm of the Parisians; La Vestale was performed tant bien que mal at all the provincial theatres; it was played in Germany; it occupied for a whole season the stage of the St. Charles at Naples, where Madame Colbran, afterwards Madame Rossini, performed the part of Julia: a success of which the author was unconscious until long after, and at which he experienced the most profound joy.

This chef-d'œuvre, so admired during 25 years by all France, would be almost entirely unknown to us, were it not for the grand concerts which bring it to light now and then. The theatres have not retained it in their répertoire; and this is, indeed, an advantage for which the admirers of Spontini should felicitate themselves. In fact, its execution requires qualities which are becoming more and more rare every day. It exacts most imperiously great voices well practised in the grand style; actors and especially actresses endowed with something more than talent. The perfect rendering of works of this nature requires a chorus well practised in singing and acting; it requires a powerful orchestra, a conductor of great skill for leading and animating it, and above all it demands that the ensemble of the performers should be penetrated with an appreciation of expression, a sentiment now almost extinct in Europe, where the most enormous absurdities become wonderfully popular; where the most trivial style, and especially that which is the most false, has, at the theatre, the greatest chance of success. Hence the difficulty of finding for these models of pure art listeners and worthy interpreters.

The lowness of the mass of the public, its inability to understand works of imagination and the heart, its love for brilliant insipidities, the baseness of all its melodic or rhythmic instincts have naturally launched the artists upon the way they now follow. The most vulgar mind readily understands that the public taste ought to be formed by them; but, unfortunately, on the contrary, it is that of the artists which is deformed and corrupted by the public. The fact that it adopts, now and then, a really fine work, and causes it to triumph, is not to be argued in its favor. That only proves that a grain of corn would have answered quite as well, that it had swallowed a pearl by mistake, and that its palate is still less delicate than that of the cock in the fable who was not thus to be deceived. Without this, if the public applaud such works because they really are fine, for the contrary reason they should on other occasions manifest an angry indignation; they should require severe accounts of their works from those men who so often come before them to insult art and good sense. And the public is far from having done so. Circumstances, foreign to the merit of the work, must therefore have brought about the success; some sonorous plaything must have amused these great children; or else a performance, captivating by its spirit, or of an unaccustomed splendor, must have fascinated them. For (at least so it is in Paris) by taking the public unawares, before it has had time to form an opinion, you may, by some performance exceptional by the brilliance of its exterior qualities, force it to admit anything.

We, therefore, readily see how much we should congratulate ourselves for the neglect which the theatres of France show to monumental scores, because the obliteration of the sens expressif of the public being evident and proved as it has been, there remains only a chance of success for such miracles of expression as La Vestale and Cortez, in an execution impossible to obtain now-a-days.

When Spontini came to France, the art of chant orné, or elaborate singing, for female voices, doubtless was not so far advanced as it is now; but certainly the chant large, dramatic and passionate, existed free of alloy; it existed so, at least, at the opera. We had then a Julia, an Armide, an Iphigenia, an Alceste, a Hypermnestre. We had Madame Branchu, the type of soprano voices, full and resounding, sweet and strong, capable of predominating over chorus and orchestra, and of sinking to the softest murmur of timid passion, of fear, or reverie. This woman has never been replaced. Her admirable manner of pronouncing recitatives, and of singing slow, sad melodies, had long been forgotten, when Duprez, at the time of the débuts in Guillaume Tell, recalled to mind the power of this art, carried to that high degree of perfection.

But to these eminent qualities Mme. Branchu joined those of an irresistible impetuosity in passionate scenes, and a facility of emission of the voice, which never obliged her to slacken, out of place, her movements, or to add to the measure, as is constantly done now-a-days. Besides, Mme. Branchu was a tragedienne of the first rank—a quality indispensable for the rendering of the grand female rôles of Gluck and Spontini; she possessed fascination, a real sensibility; and, to imitate these, she was never obliged to resort to any trickery. By what she was in Alceste, in Iphigénie en Aulide, in les Danaïdes, and in Olympie, I judged of what she must have been, fifteen years previously, in la Vestale. Besides, Spontini, in preparing his work for the stage, had the luck to find a special actor for the part of the sovereign pontiff; this was Dérivis, senior, with his formidable voice, his high stature, his classic and majestic gesture. He was then young—almost unknown. The part of pontiff had been given to another actor, who acquitted himself very badly of the task, and grumbled incessantly, during the rehearsals, at the pretended difficulties of this music, which he was not capable of understanding. One day, in the green-room, his want of energy and his impertinence having manifested themselves more pointedly than was customary, Spontini, indignant, snatched the rôle from him and threw it into the fire. Dérivis was present; rushing to the hearth, he plunged his hand into the flame and withdrew the rôle, crying: "I have saved it, and I will keep it!" "It is yours," replied the author; "I am sure you will be worthy of it!" The prognostic was not deceitful; this part was, in fact, one of the best of those created by Dérivis, and even the only one, perhaps, in which the inflexibility of his rough voice showed off without disadvantage.

This score, as I imagine, is of a style quite different from that adopted in France by the composers of that epoch. Neither Méhul, nor Cherubini, nor Berton, nor Lesueur, wrote thus. It is said that Spontini proceeded from Gluck. With regard to dramatic inspiration, to the art of painting of character, with regard to fidelity, and vehemence of passion, that is true. But as to the style of the melody and harmony, as to the instrumentation and musical coloring, he only proceeds from himself. His music has a peculiar physiognomy which it is impossible to mistake. Certain oversights in the harmony (very rare) have given rise to a thousand ridiculous reproaches of incorrectness, launched against the music by the Conservatorians; reproaches originating principally in a new and beautiful harmony, which the great master had found and most happily applied, before the magistri of the age had ever dreamed that it existed, or ever found the reason of its existence. This was his great crime. Could he possibly have reflected upon its enormity! to employ chords and modulations which usage had not vulgarized, or before the doctors had decided that it was lawful to make use of them! There was also, I must confess, another motive for this arming of the Conservatoire. If Lesueur be excepted, whose opera of the Bardes, had a great number of brilliant representations, no composer of that epoch had been able to succeed at the opera. The Jerusalem of Persuis, and his Triomphe de Trojan, obtained that fleeting success which does not count in the history of art; and which, moreover, may be attributed to the pomp of the mise en scène, and to the allusions which political circumstances permitted to be established between the heroes of those dramas and the hero of that immense drama which caused the whole world to palpitate. The grand répertoire of the opera was therefore almost exclusively sustained by the two operas of Spontini (La Vestale and Fernand Cortez) and the five scores of Gluck. The old glory of the German composer had no rival, on ours, the first lyric theatre, save the rising glory of the Italian master. Such were the motives for the hatred of the school directed by musicians whose endeavors to reign at the opera had been fruitless.

[To be continued.]

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Julius Knorr's Instructive Works on Playing the Piano.

(Conclusion of Art. I.)

The second volume, constantly referring to the theoretical rules of part the first, is devoted entirely to the mechanical part of piano-playing, written on the same plan as the author's "Materials," only on a broader basis and comprising many things which could not find room there. It begins in its first chapter with five-finger exercises for the hand standing still. For the purpose of getting the fingers accustomed to all positions, the author recommends transpositions of them into keys, that present difficulties to a correct position of the hand on account of black keys occurring promiscuously with white ones; such as for instance: E flat, B flat, B, &c. &c. These, together with exercises based on the chords of the Tonic and Dominant, are given in the Nos. 3—110.

Next follow exercises to make the fingers independent of each other. One or more fingers are kept down, while the others are playing. Then examples in thirds, melodies with accompaniment played by the same hand. Remarkable are 12 exercises (Nos. 149—160) on the fingering of thirds and sixth. With the fingering continued in Nos. 151—153, four and five thirds are played in one position. The author says that those twelve examples, indispensable as they are, are not contained in any other Method. Exception must be made however to H. Bertini Jr.

The second chapter is devoted to the Scales. In no other instruction book are the scales accompanied with so short and full practical advice as to fingering and certain manners of playing them; as for instance, in syncopations, with dotted notes, increasing and decreasing in loudness, staccato, portamento, &c. L. Adam, about the time of the French Revolution, and some thirty or forty years after him Hummel, have perhaps devoted more space, the first to explanation, the latter to examples on the scales; but none of them has in so practical a manner separated the more from the less important. Nor do they give so lucid a synopsis of the ways of playing the scales as our author. Each scale appears in four different ways in parallel octaves, thirds, sixths, and in counter-movement from the octave. Counter-movements from the third, sixth, &c. are recommended. Very useful are the preparatory exercises to the scales, altered from Kalkbrenner, for passing the fingers over and under each other. Very valuable are also the remarks on fingering the scales in parallel thirds for both hands, and runs derived from scales. The author recommends in such cases a close adherence to the original fingering of the scale, or at least the adaptation of the fingers to it as far as practicable.

The fingering of the chromatic scale is given in three different ways, viz: the German, as used by Moscheles, the French, as used by Kalkbrenner, and the English, as used by Kramer, with remarks on the uses and advantages of each of them.* Next follows the chromatic scale in thirds, sixths and counter-movement.

The third chapter treats of those other mechanical operations of the fingers, which, with the passing of fingers over and under each other, are the only ones by which we execute runs and passages; viz: extending, exchanging and repeating a series of fingers on an ascending and descending figure. Selecting only the most simple examples, our author with most admirable precision and mathematical accuracy enumerates all the cases in which such an operation can be applied. For the operation of exchanging fingers, for instance: he enumerates ten cases, besides which mathematically no other is possible. Wherever there is an opportunity remarks are made on peculiar manners of fingering, by which to produce different shades (nuances) of expression; for instance No. 35 on page 42, where changing fingers on the same key without striking it again is used for aiding to produce a nice diminuendo. Two remarkable cases of exchanging fingers on double notes are given on p. 44.

The fourth chapter treats of the trill, double-trill, &c.; the fifth of passages resulting from intervals. Concise rules for fingering the different intervals, also valuable advice for making the fingers familiar with playing on black keys are given. Our room forbids us to enumerate even a small part of those many practical rules and examples that are contained in this chapter alone. Be it sufficient to say, that there has never been a more complete and well condensed exposition of the mechanical part of piano-playing in any method whatever.

The sixth chapter treats of runs and scales in double notes, and contains a full collection of fingerings for chromatic scales and runs, as applied by Moscheles, Hummel, Kalkbrenner, and Chopin. The author very properly advises to play octaves staccato exclusively from the wrist, while formerly they used to be played with the fore-arm.

The seventh chapter treats of chords and passages derived from them; the eighth, of the strict style, with examples in three and four parts for one hand. The ninth has examples on leaps; the

*There is a fingering of the Chromatic Scale by A. de Kontsky, the originality of which may justify its transcription here from K.'s "l'Indispensable."

and so on.

tenth treats of operations like alternating with, crossing, interlocking hands. This chapter closes a work, which may justly be called a model of its kind. Coming up to the achievements of the present day, it contains the germ and root of all those passages and runs, that occur in the compositions of the masters of all times. It is one of the few works that fully come up to the intentions of the author. One of those that leave that quiet intellectual pleasure upon the mind which one feels, when profound experience, perfect mastery over the subject, and hence logical order, meet one in the smallest particular.

May this (for the importance of the work much too) short exposition of its contents recommend it to many teachers, so that it may supersede those abominable fabrics like a Hünten's or Burgmüller's "abridged" Method. Books that have done good to nobody but the pockets of the trade; but indescribable harm to the taste of the rising generation by their collection of hackneyed pieces for "recreation from study," which has not preceded nor does it succeed such "recreation."

The writer adds the wish, that an English edition might soon make this valuable work accessible to the teacher and student of music. It deserves the patronage of all those teachers, who have a higher aim, than to have their pupils play trash all their lives long.

G. A. S.

Gleanings from German Musical Papers.

[Prepared for this Journal.]

On the second of April the Leipzig Conservatory of Music celebrated the completion of its tenth year. Artists and former members of the institution were invited from all parts of Germany. Among those present are mentioned the concert-masters Zahn and Mortel from Bremen; music-director John from Halle; chamber-musician (kammer-musikus) Riccius, von Sahr, van Eycken, Otto Goldschmidt and Fräulein Constanze Jacobi, from Dresden. The concert took place in the great hall of the Gewandhaus, and the programme was prefaced by an account of the origin and efficacy of the Conservatory, of which we have already given a full history in the first volume of the Journal. Thus far it has had 434 pupils of both sexes (317 German, and 117 from other countries). The proceeds of the concert went to found a new scholarship. A large audience were present, and MENDELSSOHN'S medallion, wreathed with evergreen, hung above the orchestra over which he had presided with such glory. Parts of his unfinished oratorio, Christus, were performed, under the direction of the chapel-master RIETZ. Then came orchestral pieces; the first movement of a symphony, by JUL. OTTO GRIMM of St. Petersburg, and a festival overture by Em. BUECHNER, scholars of the Conservatory in 1851 and 1843, conducted by the author. For instrumental solos, OTTO GOLDSCHMIDT (pupil in 1843) played Beethoven's Concerto in E flat, RICCIUS a violin cantabile by Spohr, and ZAHN a fantasia by Ernst. All three pieces, says the Signale, were treated with taste, dexterity and musical talent. "Herr Goldschmidt particularly delighted us by his solid and adroit play." An aria from Graun's Tod Jesu was sung by Frau Dr. RECLAM; a song each of Schubert and Mendelssohn, by Fräulein BLEYEL. But Fräulein CONSTANZE JACOBI, (pupil of the Conservatory in 1843) is said to have borne off the palm by her deeply feeling and effective delivery of three posthumous songs of Mendelssohn (op. 99) and the Frühlingsnacht of Schumann; she is said to be one of the most musical and poetic singers heard in Leipsic for a long time, and as a Lieder-singer perfect. After the concert, the professors, pupils, graduates and friends of the Conservatory, to the number of 200 persons, adjourned to a banquet at the Hotel de Pologne, where speeches, toasts and presentations gave an artistic zest to the other good things.

The following is the list of operas in Leipsic for March. March 2, Indra, by Flotow. 4th, Tannhäuser, Wagner. 6th, Indra. 12th, "The Templar and the Jewess," Marschner. 16th, Tannhäuser. 19th, "Freyschütz." 27th, "The Vampyre," by Marschner. 31st, Tannhäuser. This last opera had been performed eleven times within nine weeks, with increasing favor.

Kittl in Prague has finished a new opera, called die Bilderstürmer, "the Image-breakers," the text by Julius Hartmann.

Franz Abt, author of "When the Swallows homeward fly," is appointed second chapel-master in Brunswick, and will share the direction of the opera with chapelmaster Müller.

The Leipzig Signale says: "ALFRED JAELL is still in Boston, making continually great success. He plays in his concerts not only his own compositions, and other modern things, but also the classical works of Beethoven, Bach, Mendelssohn, &c., and excites with the latter, (a rare thing in America,) an equally great sensation. In May he thinks of coming back to Europe."

The Bach Society in Leipsic have issued the second volume of Bach's complete works. It contains ten cantatas for the church.

Giovanni Ricordi, the celebrated music-dealer and founder of the Gazetta Musicale di Milano, died at Milan on the 15th of March. He is succeeded in his business by his son, Tito Ricordi.

A new theoretical work on music, by the most learned living contrapuntist, Hauptmann, (who we believe never before could be induced to print), is announced by Breitkopf and Härtel. Its modest title is: Die Natur der Harmonik und der Metrik; zur Theorie der Musik. (The nature of Harmony and Metre; a contribution to the Theory of Music).

Berlin was promiscuously rich in music in the last week of March. At the Royal Opera they had Flotow's Indra, with Mme. Köster and Herr Formes in the principal parts; at the Königstädtisches theatre, "The way to get a lover," by Gumbert; at the Singakademie, Graun's Tod Jesu, for Good Friday; at the Garrison Church, the same, performed by the Hansmann Song Union; at the Hiennig'schen Song Union, selections from the Tod Jesu, from the "Mount of Olives," and Pergolese's Stabat Mater, with instrumentation by Alexis Lvoff; at the Gray Cloister, Herder's cantata: "The Stranger at Golgotha," composed by Bellerman; at the concert of the Tonkünstler-Verein, quintets, airs from Gluck, &c.; at Kroll's establishment, the operas Zampa, Max and Michel, Otello, Czar and Zimmerman; at the Cathedral, under the direction of Dr. Neithart, old church songs a capella, in the sublimest manner. There is also a new singing society, devoted to the practice of choruses, not excluding the connecting solos, of such operas as Gluck's, Mozart's and Spontini's.

"La Traviata," a new opera of Verdi, recently brought out in Venice, appears to have called forth various opinions, among which that of the composer himself is probably as near right as any. He writes to the editor of the musical gazette at Milan: "Last evening the Traviata made here a complete fiasco. Who is to blame, I or the singers, I know not; time will show. Let us talk of other matters." A later account states that the third performance was more successful, and the maestro called out several times.

The Berlin Musik-Zeitung, of March 30th, announces Sontag's intention of singing the Stabat Mater with the Handel and Haydn Society in Boston. Early news!

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Another Word about Music Halls.

MR. EDITOR:—Hoping that the subject of Acoustic Architecture will be often entertained in your Journal, I venture to offer a few more hints toward its discussion. Your correspondent "U." has devoted to it so much skill and attention that we naturally take him for our text-book; and therefore too it is presumed he will expect an occasional stricture as a matter of course.

The Analogy of nature enters into almost every department of Natural Science. It is especially employed in Theology, and is essential in every branch of Art. Architecture derives its most graceful forms from this source; in that, at least, which is addressed to the eye. Why then, when the ear is to be consulted, should we not look for guidance in the same study, of sounds as they exist in Nature; instead of referring only to the laws of Mechanics or to other branches of science? If a kindred art or science be at fault, and we copy from that, how will not our own difficulties be multiplied! For example, it has been supposed that the laws of sound resemble those of light. Now it is taken for granted that light is a fluid, whence the phrase "sonorous wave," etc. But it has never been proved that light is a fluid. The rising sun gilds my roof and the mountain fifty miles distant at the same moment. And it is more obvious, and more philosophical, to suppose the distinction between sound and light as broad as that between vegetable and mineral, or sand and water, or fish and fowl. We shall get but poor help if we depend upon some other department of science, when the same perhaps rests upon an hypothesis so doubtful, that it can scarce be said to have a bottom of its own to stand upon.

Leaving aside then for the present these complicated and perplexing views of the subject, we take this much for certain, viz. Sound being created, vibration is produced and is propagated indefinitely. This vibration is always of the atmosphere, and more or less of every other substance within range. The question is, how to dispose the latter so that their reverberation shall aid and not obstruct good music.

The echo of the rock or cavern is not very enlivening. That of the forest is better; it is full and sweet. But that of the mountain tops is sublime. Height and distance, then, appear to be the chief requisites. But "ars deficit ab operatione natura," and since it is vain to hope to contrive a sphere for sound, which shall be perfect in respect of the first mentioned condition, the analogy furnished by the forest is most to the purpose. Here nature has placed her own sweet choristers, where, as in a temple, they may sing the praises of the Creator. This too has suggested the architecture of the Gothic Churches of the Middle Age; and these very buildings, it has been remarked, are the best, to this day, for musical effect.

To introduce then into Musical Architecture the "winding lane . . . the dell and bosky bourn" of the forest, we have only to employ the Gothic style, with aisles and transepts ad libitum. And if some portions of the latter would be thus excluded from a view of the choir or scena, they might be walled off with a kind of screen; which should rise so high as to permit the excluded parts to be serviceable as offices, yet not so high but that it should bear a very diminished proportion to the main ceiling. Perhaps these offices might be finished off with a ceiling of their own, or a strong grating, and used as shops or the like.

I cannot conclude without observing, respectfully, that many of the proposals for absorbing or modifying sound, contain more of the Mechanist than of the Artist. Such appliances are certain and successful where ear-trumpets, hotel speaking tubes and such matters are concerned; but will the "heavenly maid" be wooed in this way?

LEGATO.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

THE POSTILLION.

From the German of LENAÜ. By C. T. BROOKS.

Lovely was the night of May;
Clouds of silvery whiteness,
O'er the blooming spring, away,
Sailed in fleecy lightness.

Meadow, grove and mountain brow
Silent rest were taking;
No one but the moonshine now
On the roads was waking.

Glare and din of day had fled,
Ceased each warbler's numbers;
Spring her fairy children led
Through the realm of slumbers.

Whispering breeze and brooklet crept
Slow with silent paces;
Fragrant dreams of flowers, that slept, —
Filled the shadowy spaces.

But my rough Postillion, now,
Cracked his whip, and flying,
Left the vale and mountain's brow
To his horn replying.

O'er the hill, across the plain,
Loud the hoofs resounded,
As, through all the bright domain,
On the good steeds hounded.

Wood and mead, as on we sped,
Flew with scarce a greeting;
Town and country by us fled,
Like a still dream fleeting.

In this lovely May moonlight
Lay a churchyard nestled,
And the traveller's roaming sight
Solemnly arrested.

On the mountain-side the wall
Seemed with age reclining;
And above, a sad and tall
Crucifix was shining.

Driver, at a slower pace,
Up the wood advances,
Stops, and towards the burial place
Reverently glances.

"Horse and wheel must tarry here—
Sir, 'tis not for danger;
But there lies one sleeping near
Was to me no stranger.

"'T was a lad most rare and true,
Ah! the sorrow ponder!
None so clear the post-horn blew
As my comrade yonder!

"Always must I linger here,
And with mournful pleasure,
To the dead one's waiting ear
Blow the favorite measure!"

Toward the churchyard now he blew;
Such entrancing numbers
Well might pierce the dull ground through,
Stir the dead man's slumbers;

And a blast upon the air,
From the heights came flying—
Was the dead Postillion there
To his song replying?

On again! and faster still
On the good steeds bounded;
Long that echo from the hill
In my ear resounded.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

From my Diary. No. XXV.

May 1. Cut the following from the "Mail gleanings" of some paper or other:

Dr. Schumann, one of the greatest living German Composers, has been appearing in London. A critic remarks with regard to him, "that having an inordinate ambition to be ranked as an original thinker, he gives to the world the ugliest possible music."

I believe it is a mistake about his having appeared in London, and that he strives with an "inordinate ambition" to be ranked as an original thinker. Would it not be nearer the truth probably to say of him and of Richard Wagner, that there is a something within them—great, grand, mighty, huge, or mean and insignificant—what it is matters not—but a something which they feel the musician's longing to produce musically, while the musical forms in use—the means hitherto sufficient for the purposes of others, do not and will not give the expression they desire. They read, study, hear, ponder the great works of past masters. They think not audaciously of rivalling them—but the language used by them to express their emotions is not suited to the ideas, which now are waiting to be clothed in tone. Thus have all the mighty masters wrought—thus many have tried to work and have failed. I do not suppose Father Heinrich has been all his life trying to be original—he has been laboring to give expression to new ideas—we may think as we will of his success—but is not the honest simplicity of the good old man a guaranty that the oddity and eccentricity of his music does not arise from a mere "inordinate ambition" to be original?

I liked Schumann's symphony, on hearing it for the third time last week at the Philharmonic, very much. By that time it had begun to be coherent, and the thread of the discourse—so to speak—to be traceable. It possesses great energy and strength—is certainly novel—and far from being the "ugliest possible music," as it seemed on the first hearing at the rehearsal. Now Schumann may never have succeeded, he may never succeed, in bringing out that unknown something; the reflective and imaginative faculty may be stronger than the so called creative—really producing—genius, which clothes the thought so that the next man can comprehend it; and the music, which he would write, may only be found in Hawthorne's cabinet of a virtuoso, or be heard in that hall in the clouds, where the Man of Fancy met his strange guests. Schumann may be all wrong—but if so I believe honestly. We all know how Mozart was all wrong and how the Emperor was obliged to let the singers and others concerned know that they must do their best with the composer's music. So was Gluck before him, all wrong, and Beethoven afterwards, but—queer, is n't it?—they are all right now! So Schumann's wrong may twenty years hence prove a right—and so may Wagner's. I find the following upon Schumann in a file of the Augsburg Allgemeine Zeitung, which comes to-day by the Baltic. It is a communication from Düsseldorf—not Mr. Düsseldorf, the painter, Madam, whose pictures you admire so much. The letter is as follows:

"So far as I know, our art-loving city does not possess a single competent person, who takes the trouble to impart his opinions upon our music in the public prints. And yet we have here a great number of by no means ordinary performances, the real spirit of which is a product of our own soil. If I venture to say a word upon them, it is only as a layman. Among other things of course I must speak of Robert Schumann, who forms the real kernel—the central point of our music. As a music director, I cannot give him unqualified praise. To say nothing of Mendelssohn and Hiller, in the particular talents necessary for a kapellmeister, Julius Rietz surpasses him indisputably, though it is well known he is far behind as a composer. Schumann is throughout and throughout a Tone-poet. Such natures are at the same time dreamers, and dreamers are seldom fitted for practical activity. However, as an offset, he poetizes and dreams at times in a truly genial manner. But, to speak the truth, in the case of one person, a clear understanding of the tones he marshals very often fails. They seem over-laden, inundated, wanting in simplicity. I admit that this was thought to be the case once with Beethoven; and it is said that not his generation, but one that came after and whose ears were accustomed to other melodic movement and chords, understood him. Whether it will be the same with Schumann, as his ecstatic admirers say—this must be decided by the future. At all events he succeeds in introducing here and there passages which so surely and powerfully tell, that nobody can withstand their effects. He comes forth on these occasions as an artist, who moves forward and excites us in the grandest manner.

"And so during his residence here, with indefatigable productiveness he presented us a multitude of the noblest compositions, among which "The Pilgrimage of the Rose," "The King's Son," by Uhland, and "The Page and King's Daughter," by Geibel, for chorus and orchestra, a symphony, and the overture to "The Bride of Messina," and several truly noble trios, are conspicuous. In these works, as well as in the personal character of the composer himself, is exhibited a large artistic nature, which marches forward in its path, never wavering, always boldly and securely. This is already producing an effect. A band of disciples, true and confident, have joined the master. Albert Dietrich, H. von Sahr and Julius Tausch are named as talented scholars of Schumann. Mrs. Clara Schumann, his wife, (Clara Wieck) the most perfect pianist of the present time, plays as ever in a truly ravishing manner.

"I take this opportunity also to mention a symphony by our former music-director, Ferdinand Hiller, which was produced under his guidance at our last concert, and rejoiced in universal applause. Its title is "Im Freien," ("In the open air,") and its character was remarkably idyllic. It represented, in its pleasant and easily comprehended melodic and harmonic movements, a village history. The amiable and popular composer received a most friendly reception on the part of the public. We had at the same time a cantata, "Tasso in Sorrent," by Karl Müller, music-director at Münster, and produced under his direction. He was formerly music teacher and member of the orchestra here, and earned by this work, fresh and rich in melody, stormy applause. I mention before closing, that at Pentecost the Music Festival of the Lower Rhine is to take place here, the triumphal performances at which are to be Handel's "Messiah" and Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony." Schumann and Hiller are to direct, and Clara Novello and other celebrities are to take part.

GOETHE'S DESCRIPTION OF HIS SISTER.—Her eyes were not the finest that I have ever seen, but the deepest; those behind which one expected the most. If they expressed a preference, an affection, their glance was like no other, and yet this expression was not tender as that which comes out of the heart and brings with it something of longing and desire; this expression came out of the soul, it was full and rich, it seemed to wish only to give, not to need to receive.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 7, 1853.

The Boston Music Hall.

We are frequently asked to give our opinion publicly of the new hall, as a place for music. At the opening in December, we simply recorded a few detached first impressions, and postponed a judgment until we should have tried it through a season, "got the hang" of the place, and heard music of all kinds, from all parts of it, enough to know with some degree of certainty whether we enjoyed it more or less from hearing it in that hall. A long musical season of five months has elapsed, during which the Boston Music Hall has monopolized nearly all the music of any magnitude; and we are reminded that we have never yet recorded a direct judgment on its merits or demerits, although we have recorded a vast deal of musical satisfaction there experienced. We have been frank, journalizing our impressions of particulars, as they struck us at the moment, without considering how they might effect an ultimate conclusion. If we have not found any serious faults in the hall, it was not because we did not try hard enough to find something faulty: for it was of far more consequence to us to maintain a character for impartiality and candor, than it was to find the hall a good one, warmly as we hoped for that result in common with all good music-loving people.

But we are told that our course hitherto may be construed into non-committalism:—and so for a long time we were more than willing that it should be;—and now those who may have heard us speak decidedly in private, call for a more formal and revised edition of the same talk in these columns. With all our heart, so be it! Only with the understanding, reader, that we are not parading here our dictum as authority for others, any farther than as they may like to know how the hall wears with one who has heard so much music in it as we have, and who may be presumed to have been mainly anxious to realize the best musical effect. Nothing is easier than to give you our individual opinion, if that is all you want; and we are happy to be able to say that we have an opinion,—one which we flatter ourselves is not a foregone conclusion.

In a word, then, our experience of the Boston Music Hall, as a place for the clear and just rendering of musical sound, whether of voices or instruments, combined or single, has been one of almost unqualified satisfaction. That hall is endeared to us by more pure musical enjoyment, than any place in which we ever listened to instruments or voices; and that, notwithstanding that our first and freshest perceptions of the divinity residing in great music are everlastingly associated with older and less pretending places, some of which have kindly passed away before the aroma of the old poetry had ceased to haunt their walls, so that they still remain ideal in the memory. We regard the new hall, in reference to its primary intention, as a remarkable success, a triumph;—one of the greatest gains which Art in this locality has realized. If this be so, if it be not a mere idiosyncratic feeling of our own, the Hall is a treasure which this community cannot too jealously guard from all possibility of being converted into other uses than that for which it was originally intended. It is a glorious monument to the growing love of Art among our people, and the experience of a winter has shown how noble an instrument it may be in the deepening, extending and refining of our musical and artistic culture. We may have other good music halls, and doubtless shall have other excellent ones; but this has fairly earned its title to the love and the support of a community which finds the sweet and harmonizing influences of music a more and more essential element in its daily life,—influences enhanced, too, as they are in this case, by the architectural harmonies of sight. To be more explicit, our observation may be summed up thus:

1. In whatever part of the house we have sat, the sounds from the orchestra have come to us distinctly and without blur. Nowhere have we found an echo, or anything more nearly resembling it than a slight reverberation, to which one is soon reconciled, perceptible immediately over the orchestra, and perhaps at one or two points on the floor; and few will notice even that when the room is well filled. A remarkable neatness of outline, with which tones, separate or blended, reach the ear, seems to us a characteristic of this hall. The softest fioriture of Sontag's sotto voce, the faintest tinkle of Jaell's silvery trill, the vanishing pianissimos of little Urso's violin, have faithfully sought us out and made their full report to us in whatever space or corner we were seated. If there has ever been an exception, it was either where tone was not delivered freely, but with timidity or uncertainty on the part of the performer; or where the voice or instrument was false in pitch or intonation (for everything has since confirmed the observation, which we made upon the opening night, that the truest tones tell farthest); or where there has been external disturbance; for in a room so large, with large, promiscuous audiences, it is of course somewhat difficult to secure always the requisite silence. But many times it has been our experience, and many times we have heard the same thing said by others, that music which we did not fully catch at once, grew perfectly distinct and appreciable as we grew, with our neighbors, into the right state of receptivity.

2. What has been true of single tones, we have found equally so of instrumental symphonies, overtures and choruses, provided they were given with unity of time, tone and accent, and with the several masses well-proportioned. At first we were astonished, until it became a familiar matter-of-course, to find how easily we recognized an instrument out of tune in the orchestra; and we have heard many persons testify to the same experience. Each individual component of the harmony was appreciable. Of course this very fidelity with which the individual sounds sought the ear, accounts for the blurred and confused effect of the whole sometimes, when the instruments or voices were not in tune. The hall, as we long ago intimated our suspicion, is a great truth-teller in these matters.

3. There has always seemed to be plenty of resonance,—quite as much as we could hope to secure without echo. It is true, music does not sound so loud here, in proportion to its mass, as in some smaller rooms. But in a choral or orchestral crescendo we have never felt the lack of volume. Many people are not satisfied unless tones snite and thump upon their tympana; but real music lovers are partial to that that is more subdued and rounded; just as the freshest colors in a painting strike the ignorant, while the cultivated eye demands that the picture shall be toned down and harmonized. Nearly the whole complaint upon the score of resonance has come, we believe, from singers on the stage, who felt that their own singing sounded dead to them; that there was no response, no sympathetic sense of the blending of their own tones with those of their neighbors round them. But habit has been found to remove the objection in most cases; they had only to get a little used to singing in a large and strange place; while any one of them, who had the curiosity to go out into the auditorium and listen to his companions, found that what seemed to him dull and dead while he was in the midst of it, was clear, appreciable harmony to those a little farther off. We suppose this phenomenon is in the nature of things. An organist hardly hears himself play. Large masses of tone become more palpable at a little distance, where the ear can take it all in as one whole. Those concert-goers, therefore, who uniformly choose one of the very front seats, just below the stage, can scarcely be said to know how music sounds in that great hall.

4. There is another quality of which we would fain make an item, as forming a large part of our experience of the hall, although it is of that evanescent nature that is hard to identify and describe. We mean that music has not only sounded distinct enough and full enough, but it has met us genially; the hall itself has seemed sympathetic to good music. Perhaps it was the harmonizing aspect of the place, the good air, the pleasant ensemble, and a multitude of conspiring extraneous circumstances, that made the music seem more musical, than it seemed elsewhere. We were by no means alone or eccentric in the feeling.

5. We do not of course affirm that music sounds equally well in all parts of the hall; but we have found no positively bad place for hearing; and there is far less to choose between different positions here than in any other large hall we have known, not excepting even the much-praised Melodeon. Various considerations dictate the choice of seats with various persons; and those preferences have seemed so well distributed, that every part of the hall has been the chosen place with somebody. A person musically curious likes to hear the same music, sometimes near and sometimes far off; now steeping himself in it and becoming as it were himself part and parcel of the orchestra, and now putting it all at a dream-like distance from him. Under all these circumstances he comes nearer to its soul and essence.

6. To the enjoyment of music yourself, it is essential that those with you enjoy it also. Hence our observation is not complete, without observing the effect on others. We are not unaware that strong opposite testimonies may be heard. It is a fact which one learns more and more not to wonder at, although it never ceases to be strange, that two or more people will see differently and hear differently and report differently of the same thing. Some took a prejudice against the hall at the outset and have never since heard anything right in it. Did you ever know of any great result that satisfied all? But we are bound also to confess, that we have heard very honest and very strong dissent from our opinion expressed by persons, for whom we have the highest respect both as competent judges in most musical matters and as men of candor and high character. Still these have been few enough to pass for exceptions. The great majority of music-lovers hereabouts, we are quite sure, are with us; and the manner in which the hall has been thronged, the attraction it has exercised upon the masses, whatever the musical bill of fare might be, is certainly some argument in its favor. We have heard not a few persons, some of them eminent musicians, who have been familiar with the principal music halls in England, France and Germany, declare that they have never found a better hall than this.

Much more might be said, but this article is already too long. We have no manner of private interest in the Boston Music Hall, save as a simple lover of good music, who is happy that our city at length rejoices in so good a place for music. We have felt it to be a debt of gratitude, which we could not omit without sin, to tell what we and so many others have owed during the past winter to this admirable hall. One naturally trembles about any great public good realized, for fear the privilege should not be enough prized or carefully enough guarded. We do not know that there is any need of caution, or any danger that the Music Hall will ever be allowed to be less to us than it has been. But we are the more moved to say what we have said, because we hear rumors of individuals eagerly buying up and accumulating shares in its stock, now accidentally below par. What the motive of this may be, or who the individuals referred to, we know not; but the hundreds of music-lovers, who hold most of this stock in small amounts, and who took it from a pure desire of securing a good music hall to our city, may properly be on their guard, lest in parting with their small interest, they allow this property, which now possesses a far higher than any money value, to fall into the hands of speculating Philistines, to whom the only music is the clink of dollars.

Music in New York twenty-five years since.

(By a German Musician.)

["To see ourselves as others see us" is no bad plan, and as Gungl has held up the mirror in these latter days to the musical public, here is a sort of retrospective looking-glass to go with his, in which we may see ourselves (with a German's eyes) as we looked quarter of a century since. The letter is to be found in Gottfried Weber's musical periodical, "The Cecilia," vol. IX, "printed word for word after the original," and we translate it as literally.]

NEW YORK, July 27, 1828.

The reason why I have not written before, although I have been here since the third of June, is this; I wished to be able to write somewhat more particularly about myself, and especially to be able to give more information respecting the position of music here.

I have been engaged at the Lafayette theatre and received —. I am going soon to Boston, which is reported to be a very musical place. The following will give an idea of music in this city; New York has four theatres, the Park, Bowry, [sic.] Lafayette and Schottam [Chatham]. In these theatres are performed tragedies, comedies, melodramas: also passages from operas, as for instance the Wolf-den scene (in Der Freyschütz),—not with the music, however, but melodramatically,—and operettas. A complete and fully appointed opera is not to be thought of; they have no orchestras for that, for the orchestras here are in the highest degree bad, as bad as it is possible to imagine, and not then complete; ofttimes they have two clarinets—but that is a great deal—generally but one. One sees nothing of bassoons, oboes, trumpets or drums (?): perhaps, now and then, one of the former. Oboes are entirely unknown in this country; there exists but one oboist in North America, and he is said to live in Baltimore.

But in spite of all their incompleteness they play the symphonies of Haydn and grand overtures; and when there comes a gap, they think to themselves—only a passing matter—all right as soon as all cracks again.

In every one of the orchestras you are sure to find a trombone: this instrument serves only to strengthen, and therefore never plays its own proper part, but that of the violoncello; and if the subject is suitable, it plays now and then a passage with the violin. This instrument and the double bass are also the best paid; sixteen or seventeen dollars a week is not uncommon; the others have ten; some of the better twelve, and the very highest for a first clarinet is fifteen, because the usefulness of this instrument comes next to that of a contrabass and the trumpet; but the player must be able to blow strong.

It is a matter of course that the director of the orchestra accompanies every solo with the violin; therefore one never hears a solo performed alone; one reason of this is probably to strengthen the voice.

In all these theatres they perform six times a week; Sunday is a day of rest. The performances begin at 7½ and last till 12, often till one in the morning. If a rope dancer comes, or one who can play the clown well, or jump about a little something like dancing, and in addition can make up all sorts of faces, and farther, one who can grind a hand-organ, blow the panpipes, beat a pair of cymbals and a big drum, and jingle a string of bells upon his hat, and all this at once,—these are the men that are good for the treasury of the theatrical lessees, and who make enormous sums.

Such is the condition of music here, so far as I have been able to learn it during my short stay in New York. I am now going to see if it is better in Boston; I have my doubts of it.

In a pecuniary point of view, music is a lucrative business for men who in addition to their regular engagements can give lessons on the piano or guitar. Such persons can save up a small fortune in a short time;—but only on these two instruments; nobody finds time for any other. Good teachers get one thaler (75 cents) a lesson; others get eighteen thalers ($13.50) for twenty-four lessons.

Living is not very dear here; young musicians from Germany, even those with only moderate talents, who could scarcely keep soul and body together at home by their music, find good incomes here, and if economical, make their fortunes; and moreover, they find themselves placed in the first rank of artists. However, for lesson giving, the English tongue is an indispensable necessity.

Next time farther from Boston.

[The letter from Boston is not forthcoming; whether the music was too good to speak of in this city at that epoch or not, we have no intimation.]

THE OPERA.—We missed the first performance of Lucia. Of the repetition of Linda di Chamouni we heard the middle portion, including the great scene in Paris, in which Linda rebuffs the marquis, and goes distracted under the curse of her old father,—as fine a piece of acting on SONTAG'S part as we almost ever witnessed. But the opera generally went off with less spirit than before. Mme. Sontag's voice seemed weary, and VIETTI'S tenor painfully flat; but BADIALLI made amends for all.

Don Pasquale, on Wednesday evening, called forth continual and unbounded expressions of delight. Its music is trifling, but happily adapted to the plot; and both in singing and in acting it was an excellent little musical comedy. Musically, of course, it is nothing to the "Barber;" but there was such completeness, such uniform felicity in the performance, that it was probably more unanimously, if less deeply enjoyed. The business upon the stage is all done by the four principal persons, with the exception of a single instance in which the stage is suddenly flooded with a chattering, bustling chorus of maids and servants; and once where instruments and voices behind the scenes accompanied the tenor's lack-lustred "Summer night" serenade, (which had to be most tediously repeated,) with the most calthumpian sort of tambourine obligato. The only other drawback—we may as well name them all at once—was the inordinate quantity of stunning fortissimo on the part of the orchestra, which seemed all brass.

Sontag's Norina was a delightfully natural, graceful and refined impersonation of a bewitching, roguish coquette of a young widow; her dress, her ceaseless espieglerie of action, and her rendering of the music made a charming, satisfying whole. Rocco did the testy, gouty old Don Pasquale as well as one so far within the physical dimensions of a Lablache could do it. BADIALLI'S Dr. Malatesta was an admirable piece of genteel comedy, full of life and truth; while POZZOLINI, in better possession than usual of his sweet, fresh tenor, sustained the lover's part agreeably and in good proportion with the rest.

The Don Pasquale is the least pretending of all the Donizetti plays in vogue; but it is one of the most genuine, and felicitous as a whole, most enjoyable, and most perfectly suited to the artistic powers, the lady-like pleasantries and archness of a Sontag. In all of Norina's shifting aspects,—in her laughing soliloquy over the book that tells the coquettish arts of kindling love; in her assumed simplicity of a bashful maiden from a convent; in her sudden revelation of the shrew, tormenting the old man: or in the sincere scenes with her lover, she appears one of the most youthful and fascinating of young widows. The Don Pasquale will surely have to be repeated.

We were not present at the performance of the Stabat Mater on Sunday evening; but all intelligent reports agree that it was not a very felicitous performance. We can easily believe that the orchestra, (spoiled as all orchestras are by opera habits) proved not as genial to the chorus singers, as the Germania orchestra; and that they were somewhat confounded by its brassy, hard fortissimos.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Letter from "Hafiz."

New York, May 5th, 1853.

An appointment as Purveyor of Pleasure to the Shah, took me home to Teheran at the beginning of last summer, and I should still be there, but that I heard of Sontag and Alboni singing here. They have made the dull, weary winter of this dreary city musical. While Paris has been pleased with Bosio, and Cruvelli (whom may a kind fate and wise managers permit us to hear) and London has languished in its usual winter silence, New York has had the only soprano who was thought worthy to succeed Jenny Lind at "Her Majesty's," and the contralto who is probably without peer in musical history. If you reflect that, three years since, this same New York was happy to be rapturous about Truffi, and endeavored to like Parodi only a few months ago, you will agree that the signs of the times point to a musical equality with Paris, London, and St. Petersburg. The contracts for Grisi and Mario are signed. The Opera House is fast finishing—upon paper. The public ear has the pitch, and the public will henceforth be only content with the best.

Alboni's opera has not succeeded, as Sontag's did. There were many reasons, and, chief among them, the fact which you so well stated, the greater unity of Sontag's representations. She is doubtless the greater artist, in the sense of a conscious devotion to Art; which, as a rule, Italian singers rarely have. Jenny Lind could not speak of her art without enthusiasm. Alboni, probably, has no conception of it. I mean that she has no intellectual appreciation of the value of music, for instance, as a refining and humanizing influence. She has a wonderful voice and a gay nature. She can sing deliciously and enchant every listener. She is applauded and is happy. Voilà tout. Sontag has something more than this. I fancy she prefers being a countess rather than an artist. But she cannot entirely escape the feeling for Art that seems to inhere in the German character.

Individually Alboni's troupe was superior to Sontag's. Her own voice is far finer, as a voice, and she sings exquisitely; too simply, perhaps, for our pampered ears that love to surfeit upon elaborated difficulties. Salvi is finer than Pozzolini; Badiali is unmatched by Beneventano; but Marini, Rovere, and San Giovanni, thrown in, make up a good balance. The Lucrezia, with the whole company, was very imposing in the fulness of the chorus and the general prestige; but it lacked that indescribable unity essential to success. It was the last great card. The houses were full, but it is now impossible to tell whether a full house fills the managerial pocket, for the determination to impart the prestige of a crowd to the performance distributes a great many free tickets. Norma was announced for Saturday. But De Vries was to sing it, and De Vries is not an agreeable singer. Salvi was cast as Pollione, but it was whispered that certain offers had been made from other quarters, and that, thereupon, the great Salvi took airs, did not find it convenient to sing, and the house was suddenly closed.

We have Don Giovanni announced for Friday with Salvi as Ottavio and Alboni as Zerlina. But ——— Madame Siedenbarg is to "do" Elvira! That is the way we go on building, three parts gold and one pewter. Can you conscientiously require of us a genuine work of art? The rôle should be omitted rather than committed to a lady who was hissed as Lisa in La Sonnambula. There is promise of unparalleled splendor, &c., at incredible expense, but the thoughtful student of opera programmes is not sanguine. When Grisi and Mario come, there will be great disappointment. Tempora mutantur et voces in illis. Why do not prime donne enjoy a brevet of eternal youth? Why must Pasta, and Catalani, and Grisi fall, like mere Coliseums and Parthenons, into ruins? In Paris I heard what was Duprez. Once or twice the old sweetness flooded his voice, and restored the prime of the Académie. Then it cracked, and split, and was silent for whole bars. In London I heard Pasta. The mien and the manner were left. It was easy to feel, this once was Norma, as in the Coliseum to-day, to recall the great games of the Emperors. But the one feeling was as pensive as the other. Mazzini stood in a box looking on. I could believe there was a tear in his eye, as he gazed at Pasta and listened; and believed her a symbol of Italy.

I heard Gockel at the Philharmonic Concert. He plays nimbly but not neatly. I found little in his performance that seemed to indicate anything more than a skilful talent, that should be better trained. He has not made a mark here. Gottschalk did. He is, in some ways, a very remarkable artist. But we have much good music very privately—in a way not to be more than hinted, even in your Journal. Choice mornings, such as have been commemorated in these columns, at Tonwacker's, and elsewhere; rare evenings, not to be forgotten, too soon to be ended. What a pity that the summer is the pleasantest month for every place and everything! There musical re-unions end, the congress of lovers is scattered,—and a poor Persian remembers the chances of the game, as Mazzini in the box at Covent Garden looked at Pasta and remembered Italy. HAFIZ.

Musical Intelligence.

PHILADELPHIA. At an extra concert of the Harmonia Sacred Music Society, last Thursday evening, was produced an original Sacred Cantata, by a young Philadelphian, Mr. FRANK T. S. DARLEY. The work is called "Belsazzar." There was great curiosity to hear the first public effort of a young composer yet in his minority; all the local musicians, including the veterans, were out. The Bulletin says it suffered in the performance, and, to have a fair trial, should be heard again; but all agreed that the cantata would be creditable to any one, while it was extraordinary for one so young. It praises a baritone solo with chorus, a trio, and other concerted pieces, but is not so well satisfied with the solo passages.

CINCINNATI, O.—Miss LERMAN has been singing with great acceptance in the Oratorio of the "Creation." The GERMANIANS, with JAELE and UNRSO, by the last accounts, had given four concerts, greatly exciting the music-lovers, and creating a call for Symphonies in some of the papers.

London.

NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. The feature of the second concert (April 19.) was Cherubini's Rèquiem. The work was new to the English public, who have never heard either his great church works, or his operas, which rank among the best in Germany, and know him only as we do, by a few overtures, and parts of masses. This requiem has been thought worthy of comparison with Mozart's, the recent successful performance of which, in the face of a bigoted Protestant opposition, by the Sacred Harmonic Society, is said to have stimulated the New Philharmonic directors to bring out this of Cherubini. The News say:

"It was very finely performed. In style it is entirely different from the Requiem of Mozart. It is neither so beautiful nor so pathetic, but it is not less grave and solemn (perhaps more so), and more strictly ecclesiastical. It is wholly choral, and unrelieved by such ravishing movements for solo voices as the "Recordare" and the "Benedictus" of Mozart; broad, simple harmonies of the old Italian school are intermixed with pieces of the most masterly fugal counterpoint; and the whole is enriched by all the charms of modern instrumentation. The music of Cherubini will delight the ear less than that of Mozart; but we are not certain that it is not even better adapted to its real purpose, that of deepening the impression created by the celebration of the Mass for the Dead."

There were two great works of Beethoven: the Concerto in E flat, played in a "masterly style" by M. Alexander Billet, and the Seventh Symphony, "splendidly executed." The Times says:

Herr Lindpaintner takes the second movement (A minor) slower, and the scherzo quicker, than we have been accustomed to hear. In both instances the music gains. In the trio of the scherzo there is a certain passage for the horn, which, when played loud (after the mistaken English tradition,) produces a sound little short of offensive; this passage Herr Lindpaintner makes piano, and thereby deprives it of a certain effect (not dreamed of by Beethoven) which, at the old Philharmonic Society, raises an inclination to laughter. Musicians and well-informed amateurs will recognise the passage alluded to. The allegretto, in A minor—which stands in the place of a slow movement—was repeated, in obedience to a very ill-judged "encore."

The finale to Mendelssohn's "Loreley" was sung by Miss Louisa Pyne, with chorus; and the same lady sang with great effect a Scena from an English opera, "Fair Rosamond," by John Barnett, whom the News calls "a truly great dramatic composer, whose 'occupation is gone' in consequence of the ruin of the musical stage in England." The overtures, concluding each part of the concert, were Rossini's to the "Siege of Corinth," and Lindpaintner's to "Faust," which is pronounced brilliant and effective, but far inferior in depth of thought to Spohr's on the same subject.—Herr Lindpaintner, as conductor, is warmly applauded.

THE ORCHESTRAL UNION, a new society, similar to the Société des Concerts in Paris, gave its first concert April 9th.

It numbers about thirty performers; the conductor is Mr. Alfred Mellon; Mr. Cooper is the principal violin, Mr. Hill the principal viola, and Mr. Howell the principal contra-basso. The number of wind-instruments is in due proportion to the scale of the whole band, and includes Nicholson, Pratten, Rae, Winterbottom, and other distinguished names; every name in the orchestra, we observe, being English.

The concert began with the overture to Mendelssohn's pretty domestic operetta, The Son and Stranger, and the second part opened with Mozart's Symphony in G minor. We never listened to this delicious music with so keen an enjoyment of its beauties. The harmony was so clear and transparent, so free from the slightest impurity of sound; the varied combinations of instruments were so finely brought out; and the tender, expressive melodies so sweetly breathed, that we could not even imagine anything more charming. In the two overtures—the fanciful and romantic Näideles of Bennett, and the light and brilliant Domino Noir of Auber—the performance was equally admirable and successful. Mr. Cooper played Spohr's eleventh concerto in a manner which could not be surpassed by any violinist of the day; and its effect was enhanced by the softness of the accompaniments, which supported, without ever overpowering, the principal interest.

The singers were Mr. and Mrs. Weiss; the former sang Schubert's fine song "The Wanderer," and the latter Beethoven's great scena, Ah perfido. Arne's famous bravura air, "The Soldier tired," was played as a solo on the trumpet by Mr. T. Harper—an admirable display of beautiful tone and brilliant execution.

QUARTET ASSOCIATION. Messrs. Sainton, Cooper, Hill and Piatti, commenced their second season on the afternoon of April 14th. By constant practice they are said to have reached a rare perfection in the art of quartet playing. The programme consisted of three quartets and a sonata for the piano. The quartets were Hummel's in C. op. 30; Mozart's in D, No. 7; and Mendelssohn's in E minor, op. 44. The last created a furor. But one of the great events of the town seems to have been Miss Arabella Goddard's performance of Beethoven's "prodigious Sonata" in B flat, op. 106. One of the critics says:

The execution of the young lady was almost as much a prodigy as the sonata itself, and her reading of each movement was that of an accomplished master. So grand and masculine a conception of a work of such matchless profundity—the ninth symphony of the piano-forte—was little short of miraculous in a girl of seventeen. About the mechanism we can say nothing. The fugue, the longest and most difficult of the four movements, taken at a speed almost incredible, and sustained with astonishing power to the end, electrified the audience—among whom were nearly all the well-known pianists and amateurs of the piano in London—good judges of the extraordinary and almost impracticable difficulty of the work. A more musical audience was never assembled, and a more brilliant and legitimate success was never obtained. It is useless to say more. Miss Goddard has now established herself in the first rank of pianists, without reference to country.

OPERA. The Barbiere was repeated for the third night of the season, and our Bosio rose another degree in the estimation of the critics, and still another on the fourth night in the Elisir d'Amore. One of them says of her:

We have never had a more charming Adina than Bosio. The part is in every way suited to her;—it is suited to her face and figure, to her style of acting, to the compass and quality of her voice, and her light and brilliant execution. She enacted to perfection the little rustic flirt, wild and capricious but not heartless; and her touches of feeling in the latter scenes were sweetly and gracefully given. In her duet with Dalcimara, Quanto amore! and in the subsequent scene with her lover, contrasting the fire of Prodi, per me, her tender earnestness reached the pathetic. Her whole performance was received with the most cordial applause. Luchesi, as Nemorino, deserved a warmer reception than he met with. There is nothing striking about him, certainly; but his appearance is agreeable; his voice, though not powerful, is sweet and tunable; he sang in a pure Italian style, and acted the part in an unaffected and intelligent manner. We have seldom heard the little air, Un'fiorita lagrima, sung with greater taste and expression. Ronconi, as the illustrious Dr. Dalcimara, the prince of quacks, was more rich than ever in his inimitable humor.

But the first decided triumph of the season was the performance of Rossini's masterpiece, the "William Tell," in which Tamberlik took Duprez's great part of Arnold, exceeding Duprez (so the Times says) in his best days. Mme. Castellan was the Matilda, Ronconi the Tell. The forces of the Walter, Lucchi, the fisherman; and "Costa's directing power, great skill and energy, were never more strongly manifested throughout."

OLD PHILHARMONIC. The programme of the second concert included Robert Schumann's "Overture, Scherzo and Finale" played by the Germanians a year ago in Boston; that Minna and Brenda sort of duet from the Freyshatz, sung by Misses Pyne and Poole; a violin Concerto of Spohr, by M. Sainton; a Cantata of Beethoven: "The Praise of Music," not reckoned among the master's greatest works; Mozart's 5th Symphony, in B flat; an Aria by Hummel: Deh, calma, amor; Mendelssohn's "Loreley" finale; and the overture to "Masaniello."

Advertisements.

TO PRINTERS.

MUSIC COMPOSITOR WANTED. One who is thoroughly acquainted with the business. Apply at this Office.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

NEW YORK NORMAL MUSICAL INSTITUTE.

GENTLEMEN AND LADIES, who design attending the first term of the NEW YORK NORMAL MUSICAL INSTITUTE, and who wish to have board prepared for them, are requested to give early notice to that effect. This will be necessary, in order to secure suitable accommodations; especially, as there is prospect of a large class.

Applications have been made by some who desire to attend the courses of lectures and other class exercises of the Institute, omitting the private lessons embraced in the full course. Notice is therefore given that the price of a ticket admitting the holder to all the lectures and class exercises, will be twenty-five dollars. Including the course of private lessons, the price is fifty dollars.

The term commences on MONDAY, APRIL 25th, 1853, and continues three months, during which time daily lectures and instruction will be given in the various departments of music, the design being to furnish thorough instruction, and especially to qualify teachers of music.

The assistance of THOMAS HASTINGS, Esq., and other eminent musicians has been secured.

Circulars containing further particulars may be obtained on application to MASON BROTHERS, (late Mason & Law,) 23 Park Row, New York.

LOWELL MASON.
GEORGE F. ROOT.
WM. B. BRADBURY.

Mar. 5. 1f

BEETHOVEN'S CELEBRATED MASS in C,

IN VOCAL SCORE:

With an Accompaniment for the Organ or Piano-Forte, by Vincent Novello. With Latin and English text. Just published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

Sold by all Music Dealers.

iii 4

THE SYMPHONIES OF BEETHOVEN:—

ARRANGED FOR THE PIANO-FORTE BY J. N. HUMMEL. The above excellent compositions are now in course of publication by the subscriber.

Symphony No. 7, in A. op. 92, is now ready.

Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

Sold by all Music Dealers.

iii 4

NEW EDITION OF CARCASSI'S GUITAR BOOK.

Now and Improved Method for the Guitar, by M. Carcassi. Price $2.50.

This new edition of Carcassi's celebrated method embraces much valuable matter not contained in those previously issued. These additions are those which have been made by the distinguished author after an experience which enabled him to determine what was actually needed by the pupil for a thorough understanding of the art. The whole has been carefully translated by a well known Professor of the Guitar, and is thereby rendered as free as possible from those slight but perplexing inaccuracies which sometimes become a part of translations and reprints. A number of popular songs in each of the different keys have been appended, which together with the masterly instructions of Carcassi, and his plain yet comprehensive course of Exercises, furnish all that is desirable to both teacher and scholar.

Feb 26

OLIVER DITSON, Publisher,
115 Washington St.

Edward L. Balch,

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE,

No. 86 TREMONT STREET, BOSTON.

WHITE BROTHERS, DEALERS IN MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS,

Best Italian, German, French and English Strings,

AGENTS OF

J. Andre', Offenbach; and G. Andre', Philadelphia,

FOR THE SALE OF FOREIGN CLASS'D MUSIC,
CHOIR MUSIC, &c.

Instruments Made, Repaired, Tuned, Bought, Sold, or Exchanged, on the most favorable terms.

IRA J. WHITE,
iii 2 3m

A. WARREN WHITE.

Massachusetts Academy of Fine Arts.

THE FIRST SEMI-ANNUAL EXHIBITION of the Massachusetts Academy of Fine Arts is now open at its Rooms,
No. 37½ Tremont Row.

The Collection comprises some of the finest specimens of Pictures by American Artists

Hours of Exhibition, from 8 A. M. until 6 P. M.

Single admission, 25 cents; Season Tickets, 50 cents.

Feb. 26. 1f

THEODORE T. BARKER, MUSIC STORE.

No. 3-1 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

Chickering's Pianos to let.

All Foreign and American Musical Publications received as soon as published.

iii 2 3m

N. D. COTTON,

IMPORTER AND DEALER IN

English, French, and American Stationery,

DRAWING & PAINTING MATERIALS,

No. 13 Tremont Row, Boston.

* * Wedding and Visiting Cards Engraved and Printed.

16 1f

BEETHOVEN'S ORATORIO OF ENGEDI, or DAVID IN THE WILDERNESS, known as the MOUNT OF OLIVES, is this day published in a neat, convenient form for the singer or concert-goer by

Geo. P. Reed & Co., Publishers.

Jan. 8.

17 Tremont Row, Boston.

Germania Serenade Band.

THE SERVICES OF THIS ASSOCIATION can be secured by applying to

G. SCHNAPP, Leader,

iii 14 1f

364 Tremont Street.

J. W. TAVERNER,

PROFESSOR OF EDUCATION,

AT HIS RESIDENCE,

No. 30 CHARLES STREET, BOSTON.

J. C. WOODMAN,

ORGANIST AND CONDUCTOR OF MUSIC AT CENTRAL CHURCH,

Teacher of Singing, Piano Forte, &c.,

No. 91 Chestnut Street, Boston.

iii 2 3m.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.

FOREIGN MUSIC DEPOT,

GIRARD HOUSE BUILDINGS,

NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,

PHILADELPHIA.

N. B. The complete works, for Piano, (Quartets, Trios, Duets for Piano and Violin, Duets for four hands and Piano solo pieces,) of BEETHOVEN and MOZART, as also the Piano solo Works of CLEMENTI and HAYDN, as published by J. Andre', Offenbach, in sets, at very low prices. We have appointed

Messrs. WHITE BROTHERS,

TREMONT TEMPLE, BOSTON,

our Agents for the sale of the above Standard Editions of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, &c. &c.

iii 2 1f

MRS. ROSA GARCIA DE RIBAS,

TEACHER OF THE

PIANOFORTE, SINGING & GUITAR,

2 Seneca St., corner Harrison Avenue.

MR. De RIBAS will give instruction on the Oboe and Flute. Also MUSIC ARRANGED, TRANSPOSED, &c. Boston, April 23.

3m

Letter-Press, Music and Job Printing-Office,

JONAS CHICKERING,

RESPECTFULLY gives notice to his friends and the public that, having recovered from the late disastrous effects produced by the destruction of his factory, he is now ready to receive orders for PIANOS, which he promises to execute with as much faithfulness and promptitude as heretofore.

379 Washington Street, Boston.

Mar. 5.

1f

HEWS' PATENT

AMERICAN ACTION PIANOFORTE.

THE MANUFACTURER is in possession of numerous testimonials from distinguished Musical Professors, who have used the greatly improved ACTION PIANO, commending it in high terms. The attention of purchasers and amateurs of Music to an examination of its superiority, is solicited.

GEO. HEWS, 365 Washington St., Boston.

Apr. 10.

1f

D. B. NEWHALL,

MANUFACTURER AND DEALER IN

PIANO FORTES,

No. 344 Washington Street, Boston.

PIANO FORTES REPAIRED, TUNED, & TO LET.

Apr. 10.

1f

SIGNOR G. C. GUIDI respectfully informs his former pupils and the public, that he has resumed his instructions in SINGING, after the Italian school, with the intention to settle permanently in Boston. In order to accommodate those who may not wish to take private instruction, he will open classes for ladies and gentlemen, on moderate terms. None but good voices will be admitted. Terms liberal for persons intending to study for professional purposes.

Sig. G. can be consulted free upon any musical subject, daily, from 12 to 2, at Mr. Hew's Piano Manufactory, No. 365 Washington street, where terms and time for classes may be known.

Orders or notes for Sig. G. may be addressed to him at G. P. Reed & Co.'s Music Store, 17 Tremont Row, and at Oliver Ditson's, 115 Washington street.

Feb. 5.

A CARD.

THE SUBSCRIBER respectfully offers his services to the public as Teacher of the Piano-Forte, the Violin, and of Singing, after a clear and easy method. He will also accompany pupils, both in seminaries and in private houses, in the practice of Duets, Trios, &c.

Address for the present at 168 Tremont Street.

March 26. 3m.

CARL GÄRTNER.

L. H. SOUTHARD,

TEACHER OF MUSIC,

265 Washington Street, Boston.

Oct. 16.

3m

T. BRICHER,

Organist and Conductor of Music

At the Bowdoin Square Church.

OFFICE UNDER THE CHURCH. . . ENTRANCE ON CHARDON ST

Jan. 22. 3m.

H. S. CUTLER,

Organist at the Church of the Advent, also of the Boston Harmonic Society.

ADDRESS—(Care of A. N. JOHNSON,) No. 90 Tremont Street, Boston.

22 1f

F. F. MÜLLER,

DIRECTOR OF MUSIC AND ORGANIST at the Old South Church; ORGANIST of the Handel and Haydn Society; ORGANIST of the Musical Education Society, &c. &c. &c. Inquire of Messrs. REED & Co., No. 17 Tremont Row, Boston.

iii 1f

NATHAN RICHARDSON,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC.

Now in Europe; will return 1st of June. Letters may be addressed at 19 Hanover St.

25 1f

GEORGE F. WILLEY,

TEACHER OF MUSIC.

Private Tuition in the principles of Music and the Cultivation of the Voice.

MUSIC ROOM, THE LECTURE ROOM OF KIRK STREET CHURCH,

RESIDENCE, 34 FRANKLIN SQUARE, SUFFOLK STREET,

Feb. 5

LOWELL, MASS.

A. W. FRENZEL,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC,

Feb. 5.

4 Pine Street, Boston.

RATES FOR ADVERTISING.

For half a square, (8 lines,) or less, first insertion, . . . $0.50

each additional inser. 25

For a square, (16 lines,) first insertion, 1.00

each additional insertion, 50

On advertisements standing three months or longer, a discount of twenty per cent. on the above rates is allowed. (A column counts as seven squares.)

Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 School St.

DWIGHT'S Journal of Music.

A Paper of Art and Literature.

VOL. III.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 14, 1853.

NO. 6.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

TERMS....TWO DOLLARS PER ANNUM, (IN ADVANCE.)

CITY Subscribers can be served at their houses by the further payment of fifty cents per annum.

For Rates of Advertising, see last page.

POSTAGE, if paid in advance, for any distance within the State, thirteen cents a year; if not in advance, twenty-six cents. To all places beyond the State, double these rates.

J. S. DWIGHT,.....EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St.

By REDDING & CO., 8 State St.
" GEO. P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row.
" A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.
" DEXTER & BROTHERS, 43 Ann Street, N. Y.
" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 453 Broadway, N. Y.
" MASON & LAW, 23 Park Row, New York.
" GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.
" G. ANDRE, 229 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.
" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St., Balt.
" COLBURN & FIELD, Cincinnati, O.
" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.
" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Persons willing to become Agents for procuring subscribers, especially Music-Dealers and Teachers, are invited to correspond with the Editor, as above. Satisfactory references required, and liberal commissions allowed.

Back numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Also bound copies of Vols I and II, at prices varying from $2.50 to $3.50.

Mozart's Don Giovanni.

BY THE EDITOR.

[First published in Graham's Magazine for Jan. 1852.]

This masterpiece of MOZART must always stand as the highest type of musical drama. Yet most persons who go to this famous opera for the first time, and look over the libretto, are disappointed in a worse sense than the travellers who complain of the first unimposing view of Niagara. It seems to them a waste of so much fine music, to couple it with a mere story of a desperate rake, (a young cavalier estremamente licenzioso, as he is set down in the list of characters), who after running a most extravagant career, is brought to judgment in a marvellous way; namely, by his inviting in jest the statue of an old man, whom he had murdered, the father of the noble lady he had sought to ruin, to sup with him, and by being surprised in the midst of his feast by the statue in good earnest, with the whole posse comitatus of the nether world rising to claim him! We are at a loss at first to account for the charm of so vulgar and grotesque a tissue of absurdities. Yet there is a meaning in it that concerns us all.

Don Juan is one of the permanent traditional types of character; and Mozart's music, sympathetically, instinctively, rather than with any conscious philosophical purpose, brings out the essence of it. The gay gallant, magnetic disturber of every woman's peace that comes within his sphere, is not intended for that vulgar sensualist, that swaggering street-rake, that caricatures the part in most performances we may have seen. The true conception of Mozart's Don Juan is that of a gentleman, to say the least, and more than that, a man of genius; a being naturally full of glorious passion, large sympathies and irrepressible energies; noble in mind, in person, and in fortune; a large, imposing, generous, fascinating creature. Dramatically he is made a little more than human, yet in a purely human direction. He is such as we all are, "only more so," to borrow an expressive vulgarism. Remarkably is he such as Mozart himself was. He is a sort of ideal impersonation of two qualities, or springs of character, raised as it were to the highest power, projected into supernatural dimensions;—which is only the poet's and musician's way of truly recognizing the element of infinity in every passion of the human soul, since not one ever finds its perfect satisfaction. Mozart in his own life knew them too well, these two springs or sources of excitement! They are: (1.) the genial temperament, the exquisite zest of pleasure, the sensibility to every charm and harmony of sense, amounting to enthusiasm, and content with nothing short of ecstasy; that appetite for outward beauty, which lends such a voluptuous Titian coloring to his music. And (2.) as the highest mortal foretaste of celestial bliss, the sentiment of sexual Love,—that sentiment which is the key-note of every opera. In Mozart, music appears as the peculiar native language of these passions, these experiences. His music is all fond sensibility, pure tranquility of rapture, and most luxurious harmony of soul and sense. And therefore in him we have the finest development of the dramatic element in music. The two together make the genuine Giovanni creed,—the creed of Mozart and of Music,—the natural creed and religion of Joy. This free and perfect luxury of passion and fruition Mozart imagines, raised (as we have said) to the highest power, in the hero of the old tradition. His Don Juan is a grand believer in the passions and in pleasure; he is the splendid champion and Titan of that side of the problem of life, a superb vindicator of the senses. He stands before us in the glorious recklessness of self-assertion and protest against the soul and passion-starving conventionality, the one-sided, frigid spiritualism of an artificial, priest-ridden, Mammon-worshipping society; opposing to these meshes of restraint his own intense consciousness of being, (with a blind instinct that it is good, divine at bottom, and only needing to appear in its own natural language of a Mozart's music to prove this); strong in the faith, against the world, that JOY, JOY is the true condition and true sign of life; but blindly seeking to realize this in the ecstatic lawlessness of Love, which necessarily involves sooner or later a proportional reaction of the outraged Law and Wisdom of the Universe.

Excessive love of pleasure, helped by a rare magnetism of character, and provoked by the suppressive moralism of the times, have engendered in him a reckless, roving, insatiable appetite, which each intrigue excites and disappoints, until the very passion, in which so many souls are first taught the feeling of the Infinite, becomes a fiend in his breast and drives him to a devilish love of power that exults over woman's ruin, or rather, that does not mind how many hearts and homes fall victims to his unqualified assertion of the everywhere rejected and snubbed faith in Passion. The buoyant impulse, generous and good in the first instance, goes on thus undoubtingly, defying bounds, till it becomes pure wilfulness, and the first flush of youth and nobleness is hardening to Satanic features. The beauty and loveliness of woman have lost to him now all their sacredness; they are mere fuel to the boundless ambition of a passion which knows no delight beyond the brief excitement of intrigue and sensual indulgence. He becomes the impersonation and supernatural genius of one of the holiest springs of human sentiment perverted, because denied; and he roams the earth a beautiful, terrible, resistless fallen angel, and victim after victim are quaffed up by his hot breath of all-devouring passion. And so he perseveres until Hell claims its own in the awful consummation of the supper scene. Art could not choose a theme more fraught with meaning and with interest.

The character of Don Juan, thus conceived, this splendid embodiment of the free, perfect, unmisgiving luxury of sense and passion, would be no character at all, but only an absurdity, an impossibility in the spoken drama. There is no prose about it; nothing literal and sober; take away the exaltation, the rhythmical nature of it, and it falls entirely to the ground. Only Music could conceive and treat it; Music, which is the language of the ideal, innermost, potential life, and not of the actual life. But music equally does justice to both sides of the fact. In this triumphant career of passion, inasmuch as it is among men and laws and sympathies and social customs, a fearful retribution is foreshadowed. But not in him, not in this Titan of the senses, this projected imagination of unlimited enjoyment and communion. It is through the music that the shuddering presentiment continually creeps. Through music, which in acknowledging the error, in laying bare the fatal discord, at the same time symbolizes its resolution. Through music, in whose vocabulary sin and suffering and punishment are never final; in whose vivid coloring the great doom itself is but a vista into endless depths of harmony and peace and unexclusive bliss beyond.

The splendid sinner's end is rather melodramatic in the opera; and yet there is a poetic and a moral truth in it; and the spectre of the Commendatore is a creation fully up to SHAKESPEARE. No man ever literally came to that; but many have come to dread it. Beings, as we are, so full of energies and of exhaustless passionate promptings to all sorts of union and acquaintance with the rest of being; urged, just in proportion to the quantity of life in us, to seek most intimate relationship all round, materially and spiritually, we dread the mad excess of our own pent up forces. Surrounded by set formulas; denied free channels corresponding to our innate tendencies and callings; plagued by traditions, and chafed by some social discipline, in which the soul sees nothing it can understand, except it be the holy principle of Order in the abstract, do we not often start to see what radicalism lurks in every genuine spring of life or passion, in every thing spontaneous and loveable? Who, more than the pleasure-loving, sympathy-seeking, generous, childlike, glorious, imaginative, sensitive, ecstatic, sad Mozart, would be apt to shudder in dreams, in the night solitudes of his overworked and feverish and wakeful brain, before the colossal shadow of what possibly he might become through excess of the very qualities that made him diviner than common mortals? This allegory can certainly be traced through "Don Giovanni." The old governor, or Commander, whom he kills, personates the Law. The cold, relentless marble statue, that stalks with thundering foot-fall into the middle of his solitary orgies after him, is the stern embodiment of custom and convention, which he defies to the end and boldly grasps the proffered stony hand, from an impulse stronger than his terrors.

It is an old Middle Age, Catholic story. Under many forms it had been dramatized and poetized as a warning to sinners, before DA PONTE* found it so much to the purpose of Mozart, when he wanted to do his best in an opera composed expressly for his dear and own peculiar public at Prague. Coarse as the story seems, perhaps the conflict between good and evil in the human soul was never represented in a better type. It was for Mozart's music to show that. That in adopting it for music he had any metaphysical idea at all about it, there is no need of supposing. His instinct found in it fine sphere for all his many moods of passion and of music. Here he could display all his universality of musical culture, and his Shakspearian universality of mind. Genius does its work first; the theory of it is what an appreciating philosophical observer must detect in-it when done. "They builded better than they knew." Love, if it was the ruling sentiment of Mozart's nature, was for that very reason his chief danger. If it was almost his religion and taught his soul its own infinite capacity, so also seemed the danger therefrom infinite, raising presentiments and visions of some supernatural abyss of ruin, yawning to receive the gay superstructure of man's volatile enjoyments here in time. Life, power, love, pleasure, crime, futurity and judgment,—and a faith left beyond that!—what dream more natural, what circle of keys more obvious to modulation, to a soul, whose strings are all attuned to love and melody; whose genius is a powerful demon waiting on its will, and whose present destiny is cast here in a world so false and out of tune that, to so strong a nature, there seems no alternative besides wild excess upon the one hand, or a barren sublimity of self-denial on the other!

In this old legend the worldly and the supernatural pass most naturally into one another. Don Juan, gifted with all the physical and intellectual attributes of power, urged by aspirations blind but uncontainable, full of the feeling of life, and resolved to LIVE, if possible, so fully as to fill all with himself and never own a limit, (and this is only a perversion of the true desire to live in harmony with all,) finds the tempting shadow of the satisfaction in the love of woman; and the poor bird flutters charmed and trembling towards his fascinating glance. Imagine now the elegant, full-blooded, rich, accomplished and seductive gallant on his restless rout of pleasures and intrigues. At his side his faithful knave, droll Leporello, expostulating with his master very piously sometimes, yet bound to him by potent magnetism, both of metal and of character, (for passion like Giovanni's will be served.) Leporello is the foil and shadow to his master; and adds to the zest of his life-long intoxication by the blending of the comic with his exquisite wild fever of the blood. Throughout the whole he plays the part of contrast and brings all back to reality and earth again, lest the history should take too serious possession of us. He is the make-weight of common sense tossed into the lighter scale. He justifies its original title of "Don Giovanni, un dramma giocoso;" for this opera is tragedy and comedy and what you please, the same heterogeneous yet harmonious compound that life is itself. He on the one side gives a dash of charlatany to Don Juan, just as on the other side he borders on the supernatural. Mark the poetic balance and completeness here: this passion-life of Don Juan has its outward and its inward comment; on the one side, Leporello; on the other, the supernatural statue and the bodily influx of Hell. On the one side it is comic, grotesque and absurd; on the other, it is fearful. Seen in one light, he is a charlatan, a splendid joke; seen in the other, he is an unfolding demon and a type of doom; while in his life he is but the free development of human passion in human circumstances. Man always walks between these two mirrors! One shows his shadow, as of destiny, projected, ever-widening, into the Infinite, where it grows vague and fearful. The other takes him in the act, and literally pins down all his high strivings and pretensions to such mere matter of fact, that he becomes ridiculous.

We come now to the Opera itself, which we can only examine very briefly and unequally, touching here and there. Were we to set about it thoroughly, our article would soon overflow all bounds, since there is not a scene, an air, a bit of recitative from the beginning to the end that would not challenge our most critical appreciation.

And first the overture, composed, they say, in the single night before the first public performance of the opera in Prague, his wife keeping him awake to his work by punch and anecdotes and fairy tales, that made him laugh till the tears ran down his cheeks; and only ready for the orchestra (which had not its equal in all Europe) to play at sight, without rehearsal. He may have written it that night, that is to say, have copied it out of his head. It was his habit of composition; his musical conceptions shaped themselves whole in his brain, and were carried about there for days until the convenient time to put them upon paper; and it is not possible that his brain that time could have been without an overture, since there the opera existed as a perfect whole, and in that glow-and creative mood, the instrumental theme and preface to the same must have floated before him as naturally as the anticipation of his audience. Moreover the first movement of it, the andante, is essentially the same music with the grand and awful finale of the opera, and is properly put first in the overture (whose office it is to prepare the hearers' minds) as the grand end and moral of the piece. Accordingly it opens with three stern, startling crashes on the chord of D minor, the sub-bass dividing the measure into equal halves, but the upper parts syncopated; then a pause, and then the same repeated in the dominant;—like the announcement of a power not to be trifled with. Then a series of wild modulations, full of terror, enhanced by the unearthly brass and low reed tones, surging through chromatic intervals, which make the blood creep, and presently overtopped by a pleading melody of the first violins, while a low, feeble whimper of the second violins is heard all the time like the moaning of the wind about an old house. Then alternate sharp calls and low, tremulous pauses; the ground quakes; the din becomes more fearful; the melody begins to traverse up and down all kinds of scales, through intervals continually shifting and expressive of all manner of uncertainty, like the quick and fruitless runs in all directions of a beast surrounded by the hunters. It is like the breaking up of the familiar foundations of things, that unsettling of the musical scale!—all this is brief, for it is but a synopsis and foreshadowing of the last scene in the opera. The string instruments then dash off, in the major of the key, into a wild, reckless kind of allegro, than which there could not be a better musical correspondence of the general subject, that is, of the restless, mischievous career of one outraging all the social instincts and defying all pursuit. This spends itself at leisure, softening at the close toward the genial F natural, the key of nature and the senses, where the overture is merged into the dramatic introduction.

* "Don Giovanni" was composed in 1787. The Abbé da Ponte, who wrote the book, and who enjoyed at Vienna the same distinction with Metastasio as a writer of musical poetry, died in New York, in December 1838, at the age of ninety years, in a state of extreme destitution. For thirty years he had sought a living in that city by teaching the Italian language.

The curtain rises. Scene, a garden in Spain. Time, just before daybreak. Leporello, cloaked, with a lantern, paces watchfully to and fro before a noble villa, and sings with heavy bass of his drudgeries and dangers in the service of his graceless master; kindling half seriously at the thought, how fine a thing it would be to play the gallant and the gentleman himself. The light and exquisite accompaniment of the instruments meanwhile is like the softness of a summer night, and seems to count the moments of pleasure. The dreams of the valet are soon disturbed. Don Juan, his face hid by his mantle, rushes from the house, struggling from the grasp of Donna Anna, who, pale and dishevelled, clings to him convulsively, and seeks to detain and to discover the bold mysterious man, who has dared thus to invade her privacy and her honor. Her hurried and accusing melody, in these snatches of recitative, is full of a dignity and a pure and lofty fire that characterize alike her person and the whole music of her part. With drawn sword in one hand, and a torch in the other, her old father, the Commendatore (Commander of a religious order,) rushes out and challenges the bravo, who deals him a death-thrust. The startlingly vivid orchestral picture, which accompanies and as it were guides these sword-thrusts, is followed by a slow, mournful trio of bass voices, in which are gloomily contrasted the scornful triumph of Don Juan, the dying wail and warning of the old man, and the comic terror of Leporello. Nothing could be more thrillingly impressive; that music could mean nothing else but death stalking suddenly into the very midst of life! Then comes the passionate outpouring of the daughter's grief, and that inimitable scene of the most musical as well as most dramatic dialogue in the whole range of the lyric drama. It is the perfection of recitative. What exquisite tenderness and sincerity of sorrow in that violin figure which accompanies her inquiry for her father (padre mio) when she first recovers from her swoon! How sweet and comforting that fall of the seventh where Ottavio tells her: Hai sposo e padre in me (Thou hast husband and father in me)! And how fiery and grand the passage where she inspires the tame lover, with that sublimely solemn oath of revenge; and the hot, scouring blast of their swift and wonderful duet which follows it! In all this there is no delicate touch of feeling, no spiritual token of great purpose, possible to voice or instruments, omitted; no note omisable or of slight significance. Here is an opening of most pregnant import. One scene of moderate length has impressed us as by the power of fate to the seeing through of the profoundest drama of life. Here we have witnessed, as it were, the first reaction of the eternal Law, the first hint of destiny in this splendid libertine's thus far irresistible career. Already is this almost superhuman pleasure-hunt of genius past its climax, and the dread note of retribution is already sounded.

The next scene introduces us to one of the personified reproaches of Don Juan's better nature. As the Don and his man are plotting new adventures, a lady passes, in hat and feathers, with excited air, and, as they retreat into the shade to note her, she pours out her most musical complaint against the traitor who has played falsely with her heart. The introductory symphony or ritornel, in E flat major, by its bold and animated strain indicates the high-spirited and passionate nature now before us, whose song of ever constant though wronged love, to words that would fain threaten terrible revenge, commences the Terzetto, mainly solo, to which the mocking by-play of the Don and Leporello, accompanied by a mocking figure of the instruments, supplies the other two parts. As he steps up to offer consolation to the lady, he recognizes his own simple, loving, poor deserted mistress, Donna Elvira; and while the same mocking instrumental figure leaves the song hanging in the air, as it were, without any cadence or any close, he slips away and leaves the task of explanation to the disconcerted servant. There is an ardent, passionate yearning in this as in all of Elvira's melodies, which climb high and are perhaps the most difficult in the opera. The character is seldom conceived truly by the actress. Interpreted by its music, its intention is distinct enough. Elvira is no half-crazed, foolish thing; but one of the highest moral elements in the personnel of the opera; next in dignity, at least, to Donna Anna. However she may appear in the libretto and in the common usage of the stage, Mozart in his music makes her the soul of ardent and devoted love and constancy, still fondly hoping in the deeper, better self of the man who has trifled with her; like a sweet genuine ray of sunshine always indicating to Don Juan a chance of escape from the dark labyrinthine fatality of crime in which he goes on involving himself; always offering him true love for false.

Let her not listen then, (like the silly girl we commonly see upon the stage, half magnetized out of a weak sorrow into a weaker involuntary yielding to the ludicrous) to the exquisitely comic appeal of Leporello, when the vain-glorious fellow unrolls his tremendous list of his master's conquests among the fair sex, enumerating the countries, ranks, styles of beauty, &c. The melody of this "Catalogue Song" is altogether surpassing. It is the perfection of buffo, as we have before had the perfection of serious recitative. After naming the numbers for Italy, Germany, &c., when it comes to the climax (Elvira's own land): Ma in Spagna mille e tre [But in Spain one thousand and three] it is ludicrously grave; the orchestra meanwhile has chopped the measure into short units, alternate instruments just touching different points of height and depth, till they seem at last to count it all up on the fingers, first downwards in the tripping pizzicato scale of the violins, then upward in gruff confirmation in the basses. In the slow time, where it comes to the specification of the different qualities of beauty, the grande maestosa, the piccina, &c., the melody is one of the most beautiful and pathetic that could be imagined. One wonders how Mozart could have expended such a wealth of melody upon so slight a theme; it seems as lavish a disproportion of means to end, as when we read of travellers roasting their eggs in the cinders of Vesuvius. But such was the musical fulness and integrity of Mozart; the genial vein, once opened, would run only pure gold; and his melodies and harmonies are not merely proportioned to the specialties of the subject, but are at every moment moulded in the style and spirit of the whole work. Besides, the comedy consists here in the contrast of a pathetic melody with a grotesque thought. Moreover the whole thing is truer in the fact, that not only Leporello's, but Don Juan's own melodies, as indeed the very nature of music, seem mournfully to rebuke the desperado. In the most comic, and most bacchanalian strains, the music saddens with a certain vague presentiment of the fearful denouement of the drama.

The Don's next adventure is the meeting of a gay group of peasants at a wedding festival, where he attempts to seduce away the pretty bride, Zerlina, whose naïve and delicious songs, right out of a simple, good, loving heart, a little coquettish withal, are among the purest gems of the piece, and have mingled their melody with the civilized world's conceptions of truth and nature and the charm of innocence. Those of our readers, who have enjoyed with us the privilege of hearing and seeing a worthy, indeed a perfect personation of Zerlina, by that refined and charming artist, Signora Bosio, will need no words to give them a just conception of the character, and of its music which is as individual as that of Anna or Elvira. Suffice it to say, that the simplicity, the tenderness and the coquetry of this pretty peasant, have the natural refinement of a superior nature. Mozart must have been in love with the part. The rustic chorus opening this scene, in which the bridal pair lead off, is one of perfect simplicity, (Allegro, 6-8 time,) and yet inimitable beauty. The duet: La ci darem la mano, in which Don Juan overcomes the hesitation of the dazzled, spell-bound girl, breathes the undoubted warmth of passion; few simple souls could be proof against such an eloquent confession. Indeed the sincerity of all this music is a great part of its charm; it has never the slightest symptom of any striving for effect, and yet it is consummate art; it flows directly out of the characters and situations and the dramatic tendency of the whole. The poor girl is rescued this time by the entrance of an experienced guardian angel, who sees through the case at once. It is Donna Elvira, who just as she is tripping away with the fascinator to the gay, consenting tune of andiam (let us go,) snatches the bird from his hands. Her song of warning to the simple one: Ah! Fuggi il traditor, is a strangely elaborate Handelian aria, so different in style from the rest of the opera, that it is never performed. As if all things conspired to confound the traitor, Donna Anna and her lover also enter (Zerlina having withdrawn) and here ensues that wonderful quartet: Non ti fida, in which each voice-part is a character, a melody of a distinct genius, and all wrought into a perfect unity. Elvira warns Anna and Ottavio against confiding in this generous looking Don, whose aid they have unwittingly bespoken in their search for the murderer of the first scene (namely himself); Don Juan declares that she is crazy and not to be minded; the others are divided between pity for her and respect for such a gentleman; and all these strands are twisted into one of the finest concerted pieces in all opera. It is one of those peculiar triumphs of opera, which make it so much more dramatic than the spoken drama; for here you have four characters expressing themselves at once, with entire unity of effect, yet with the distinctest individuality. The music makes you instantly clairvoyant to the whole of them; you do not have to wait for one after the other to speak; there is a sort of song-transparency of all at once; the common chord of all their individualities is struck. Especially is this achieved in the concerted pieces, the quartets, trios, and so forth, of Mozart, which are beyond comparison with most of those in the Italian opera of the day, since the harmony in them is not the mere coloring of one thought, but the interweaving of so many distinct individualities.

Zerlina is saved, but by arrangement with her protectors agrees to go up to the Don's palace, whither Leporello has conducted the whole wedding party and even coaxed along the jealous bridegroom. A scene ensues between Donna Anna and her lover. The orchestra in a few startling and almost discordant shrieks indicates the intense excitement of her mind, for, as Don Juan took his leave, she recognized the look and voice of one whom she had too much cause to remember; and in impassioned bursts of hurried recitative, alternating with the said spasmodic bits of instrumentation, she exclaims: Quegli è il carnefice del mio padre (This man is my father's murderer,) and in the same grandly lyric style, rising higher and higher, she tells Ottavio the story of her outrage. Having reached the climax, this magnificent recitative becomes melody and completes itself in the sublime aria: Or tu sai, "Now thou knowest who attempted my honor, &c." There can be nothing greater, more Minerva-like in dignity and high expression of the soul of Justice outraged, and at the same time full of all feminine tenderness and beauty, in the whole range of opera or drama. And it is music, it is Mozart that has done it all. We have here the character of Donna Anna in its most sublime expression, a character that transcends mere personal relations, that bears a certain mystical relationship with the higher power beginning to be felt in the development of this human history. In this song she rises, as it were, to the dignity of an impersonation of the moral principle in the play, and this high sentiment of her's is like a foretaste of the coming fate and supernatural grandeur, which are to form the never to be forgotten Finale of the piece. Elvira is entirely in the sphere of the personal; she loves Don Juan to the last, and like the simple good humanity that still appeals to him though still rejected. But Anna is superhuman and divine; she reveals the interworking of the Infinite in all these finite human affairs; to heaven, rather than to Ottavio, is her appeal; and from beyond this life look to see the vindicator of her cause appear. The loftiness of the music just considered, and the stately, trumpet tones of the orchestra, which always herald the entrance of Donna Anna and her party, connect her unmistakably with the marvellous elements of the drama; she is Feeling prophesying Justice; she is Faith in the form of woman; and the singer, who could perfectly present Donna Anna, would be worthy to sing Handel's song: "I know that my Redeemer liveth."

From one extreme we pass to its opposite. In strongest possible contrast with the high moral passion of this last is what now follows. We have a song embodying the very frenzied acme of Don Juan's zest of sensual pleasure. He directs Leporello about the feast and trolls off, like one possessed, his famous champagne song: Finch'an del vino, whose rapidity and glorious abandon are too much for almost all the baritone; those, in whose dragging utterance it does not become common-place, are apt to give it with a swaggering glibness and a coarseness that has nothing of the fine champagne enthusiasm about it. In this song and that last of Donna Anna's the two electric poles, as it were, of the whole play, have met. And now for the pretty episode of peasant life again; the inimitably sweet, insinuating, loving song in which repentant little Zerlina seems to invite chastisement from her offended, jealous lover: Batti, batti, O bell Masetto, (Beat me, beat me, dear Masetto)! With what soft tendrils of melody, enhanced by the delicious instrumentation, she steals around his senses and his heart! And to what unaffected rapture (to say nothing of a little coquettish triumph) the strain changes when he forgives her, as she knew he would! This seems a very simple song, but it is the perfection of Art. O that Mozart could go into ecstasies with his own pet Zerlina, hearing BOSIO sing this!

(Conclusion next week.)

A MUSICAL REMINISCENCE.—An agreeable Paris correspondent of the Boston Atlas says:—The oft heard and ever admired Il Barbiere di Siviglia, seems as new and gay as ever. Lazy Rossini's masterpiece, which has made the fortune of all the opera managers in the world—from San Francisco to St. Petersburg—would you know how much the great composer received for it? Four hundred dollars and room rent free! Here is the singular contract,—now published in English for the first time.

Nobil Teatro di Torre Argentina,
26 December, 1815.

By the present instrument, made privately between the parties, but which has none the less force and effect than a sealed instrument, and according to the agreements made between the contracting parties, it is stipulated as follows: If Signor Puca Sforza Cesarini, manager of the said theatre, engages the Signor Maestro Gioachino Rossini for the ensuing season of Carnival, of the year 1816; the said Rossini promises and binds himself to compose and put on the stage, the second buffo play which shall be represented in the said season, in the aforesaid theatre, and upon the libretto, which shall be given him by the said manager whether this libretto be old or new; the Maestro Rossini binds himself to have his partition ready by the middle of the month of January, and to adapt it to the voices of the singers; further binding himself to make all, any, or every change which may be necessary, touching the good execution of the music, as well as talents and the desires of Messieurs the singers. The Maestro Rossini further promises and binds himself to be in Rome to fulfil his engagement not later than the end of December of the present year, and to give to the copyist the first act of his opera, perfectly complete, the 20th January, 1816; the 20th January is determined on, so that the rehearsals and the general rehearsals may be made at once, and that the opera shall be played whenever the Manager pleases, the first performance being at present appointed about the 5th February.—And further the Maestro Rossini must also give to the copyist in the full time, his second act, so that there shall be time enough for all rehearsals sufficient to perfect the work by the aforesaid evening; otherwise the said Maestro Rossini exposes himself to all damages which may ensue, because it should be so, and not otherwise. The Maestro Rossini shall further be obliged to direct his opera according to custom and personally to be present at all the rehearsals of singing and orchestra, whenever it should be necessary, either in the theatre or elsewhere, according to the good pleasure of the Manager; he further obliges himself to be present at the three first consecutive performances, and to direct at the piano the execution of them, and this because it should be so, and not otherwise. In recompense of his fatigues, the Manager binds himself to pay to the Maestro Rossini the sum and quantity di scudi quatre cento romani, (four hundred roman crowns,) so soon as the three first performances, which he must direct at the piano, shall have terminated. It is further agreed that in the case of interdiction or close of the theatre by the authorities or any unforeseen contingency, the parties will conform to the usages which generally prevail in the theatres of Rome and of other countries, in the like cases. And to guarantee the full execution of this contract, it shall be signed by the Manager and the Maestro Gioachino Rossini; further the said Manager accords lodgings to the Maestro Rossini during the whole duration of this contract, in the same house assigned to the Signor Luigi Zamboni."

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

SPONTINI.

From the French of HECTOR BERLIOZ. (Continued.)

The Vestale could never have been performed, said they, without the numerous corrections which learned men condescended to make to this hideous score, in order to render it executable, etc., etc. Hence the laughable pretensions of many persons to the merit of having retouched, corrected, and purified this work of Spontini. I myself know of four composers who pass for having had a hand in it. When the success of La Vestale was well assured, irresistible, and incontestable, they went farther: it was no longer question of simple corrections, but of whole parts which each of the composers claimed to have composed for it; one pretended to have made the duo of the second act; another the funeral march in the third, etc. It is singular that in all the duos and marches of these illustrious masters none are to be found possessing the style and lofty inspiration of those of La Vestale. Can these gentlemen have pushed their devotion so far as to present Spontini with their finest ideas? Such an abnegation passes the limits of the sublime!—At last, according to the version long admitted into the musical limbo of France and Italy, Spontini had no hand whatever in the composition of La Vestale. Spontini was not even capable of producing this work, written in defiance of all good sense, corrected by every one, so crude and confused, and upon which scholastic and academic anathemas had so long been turned loose; he had bought it, already written, from a grocer, together with a mass of waste paper; it was from the pen of a German composer, who had died of misery in Paris, and Spontini had only to set the melodies of the unfortunate musician to the words of M. de Jouy, and to add a few measures in order to link the scenes well together. Such being the case, it must be confessed that he arranged them most skillfully—one would swear that every note was written for the word to which it is united. M. Castil-Blaze himself never surpassed this. It was frequently asked in vain, from what grocer Spontini had, sometime afterwards, purchased his score of Fernand Cortez, which we know not to be totally devoid of merit; no one could ever find out. How many persons there are to whom the address of this precious merchant would have been invaluable, and who would have hastened to provide themselves at his emporium. It must have been the same who sold to Gluck his score of Orphée, and to J. J. Rousseau his Devin du village. (The authorship of both these works, of merit so disproportionate, has also been contested.)

But a truce to these incredible follies! No one doubts but that envy is able to produce in the wretch whom it devours, a state bordering upon imbecility.

Master of a position disputed with so much obstinacy and now confident in his own strength, Spontini prepared to undertake another composition in the antique style. He was about to take Electre, when the emperor gave him to understand that he should be pleased to have him take as a subject for his new work, the conquest of Mexico by Fernando Cortez. This order the composer hastened to obey. Nevertheless the tragedy of Electre had deeply moved him: to set it to music was one of his most cherished projects, and I have often heard him regret that he abandoned it.

I believe, however, that the choice of the Emperor was a great piece of luck for the author of La Vestale, because it obliged him a second time to abandon the antique, and seek scenes quite as moving, though more varied and less solemn; to seek that strange and charming coloring, that proud and tender expression, and that happy hardness, which render the score of Cortez the worthy companion of its elder sister. The success of the new opera was triumphal. From that day Spontini ruled, lord over our first lyric stage, and could have exclaimed in the words of his hero:

"Cette terre est à moi, je ne la quitte plus!"

I have often been asked which of the two operas of Spontini I preferred; and have always found it impossible to reply to that question. Cortez only resembles the Vestale in the fidelity and constant beauty of its expression. As to the other qualities of its style, they are entirely different from that of its sister. But the scene of the revolt of soldiers in Cortez is one of those miracles almost impossible to find in the one thousand and one operas written up to this time; a miracle which I fear can only be matched by the final of the second act of La Vestale. In the score of Cortez all is energetic and proud, passionate, brilliant, and graceful; inspiration blazes and overflows, yet it yields to the direction of reason. All the characters are of an incontestable truth. Amazingly is tender and devoted; Cortez, passionate and impetuous, yet sometimes tender; Velasco, sombre, but noble in his savage patriotism. We find therein great eagle swoops, and lightning-flashes sufficient to illumine a world.

One year after the appearance of Fernand Cortez, Spontini was chosen director of the Théâtre Italien. He collected an excellent troupe, and to him the Parisians are indebted for the pleasure of having witnessed for the first time the Don Giovanni of Mozart. The parts were distributed as follows:

DON GIOVANNI,..... Tacchinardi.
LEPORELLO,..... Barilli.
MASETTO,..... Porto.
OTTAVIO,..... Crivelli.
DONNA ANNA,..... Mme. Festa.
ZERLINA,..... Barilli.

Nevertheless, notwithstanding the eminent services which Spontini rendered to art, during his direction of the Italian Opera, an intrigue, of which money was the nerve, soon obliged him to abandon it. Paër, moreover, director at the same time of the Court Opera, and little delighted at his rival's success upon the last stage of the Grand Opera, endeavored to disparage him, called him renegade by gallicizing his name Mr. Spontin, and frequently caused him to fall into those snares which the Signor Astucio was so skillful in spreading.

Now at liberty, Spontini wrote an opera de circonstance, entitled Pélage, ou le Roi de la Paix, long since forgotten; then, an opéra ballet, Les Dieux Rivaux, in collaboration with Persuis, Bertou, and Krentzer. At the revival of Les Dana- ides, Salieri, too old to quit Vienna, entrusted Spontini with directing the study of his work, authorising him to make all changes and alterations which he might deem necessary. Spontini merely retouched in his compatriot's score, the finale of the air of Hypermnestre: "Par les larmes dont votre fille," by adding a coda full of dramatic enthusiasm. But he composed several delicious dancing airs, and a bacchanale which will ever remain a model of burning animation, and the type of the expression of sombre and disordered joy.

To these various works succeeded Olympie, a grand-opera in three acts. Neither at its first appearance, nor at its revival in 1827 did it obtain the success which I think due to it. Different causes concurred fortuitously to arrest its flight. Politics declared open war against it. The Abbé. Grégoire was then in every mouth. There was thought to be discovered a premeditated intention of making allusion to this celebrated regicide in the scene of Olympie where Statira exclaims:

Je dénonce à la terre
Et voue à la colère
L'assassin de son roi.

From that time the liberal party evinced a great degree of hostility towards the new work. The assassination of the Duke de Berry, having caused a little while after the theatre of the Rue de Richelieu to be closed, interrupted the course of the representations, by violently turning the public attention from questions of art, and gave a last blow to the success which was struggling so hard to establish itself. When, eight years later, Olympie was again brought forward, Spontini, chosen in the interval director of music to the king of Prussia, found, on his return from Berlin, a great change in the tastes and ideas of the Parisians. Rossini, powerfully sustained by M. de la Rochefoucauld and by the entire direction of the Beaux Arts, had just arrived from Italy. The sect of pure dilettanti went delirious at the mere name of the author of the Barbier, and most unmercifully tore to pieces every other composer. The music of Olympie was considered sing-song, and M. de la Rochefoucauld refused to prolong for several weeks the engagement of Madame Branchu, who alone was able to sustain the part of Statira, which she played only at the first performance, for her farewell benefit,—and there was the end of it. Spontini, his soul ulcerated by other acts of hostility too long to mention here, set out for Berlin, where his position was, in every respect, worthy both of himself and of the sovereign, who was capable of appreciating him.

On his return from Prussia, he wrote for the court festivals, an opera-ballet, entitled, Nurmakal, the subject of which is borrowed from Moore's Lalla Rookh. To this graceful score he added his terrible bacchanale of les Danaïdes, having developed it and enriched it with a chorus. Afterward he re-wrote the last act of Cortez. I saw in Berlin this new denouement, which they did not deign to receive at the opera in Paris, at the revival of Cortez, six or seven years later. It is magnificent, and much superior to that known in France. In 1825 Spontini produced in Berlin a fairy-opera, Alcidor, which the enemies of the author ridiculed exceedingly, on account of its instrumental noise, said they, and also of an orchestra of anvils which he had made to accompany a chorus of blacksmiths. This opera is entirely unknown to me. I have been able, however, to indemnify myself by perusing the score of Agnès de Hohenstaufen, which succeeded Alcidor, twelve years later. This subject, called the Romantic, was of a style entirely different from those employed by Spontini up to that time. He has introduced therein for the morceaux d'ensemble some very curious and arduous combinations; such, among others, as that of an orchestral storm, executed while five persons sing a quintet upon the stage, and while a chorus of nuns is heard in the distance, accompanied by sounds imitating those of an organ. In this scene, the organ is imitated so as to produce the most complete illusion, by a small number of wind instruments and bass-voils, placed behind the scenes. Now-a-days, organs being found as frequently in the theatre as in the church, this imitation, interesting on account of the difficulty overcome, seems useless.

To close the list of the productions of Spontini, I must mention his Chant du peuple Prussien, and various compositions destined for military bands.

The new king Frederick William IV. has preserved the traditions of generosity and benevolence of his predecessor towards Spontini; notwithstanding the unfortunate éclat of a letter, doubtless imprudent, written by the artist, and which drew upon him a judgment and a condemnation. The king not only pardoned him, but allowed Spontini to settle in France, when his nomination to the Institute obliged him to remain there, and gave him an evident proof of his affection by permitting him to retain his title and salary of chapel-master to the court of Prussia, although he had renounced the fulfilment of his functions. Spontini was induced to seek repose and academic leisure, first by the persecutions and hostilities heaped up against him at Berlin; and afterwards by a strange disease of the ear, the cruel effects of which he suffered at intervals during a long space of time. During the periods of the perturbation of an organ which he had exercised to such an extent, his sense of hearing was almost extinct; yet every isolated sound which he perceived seemed to him an accumulation of discord. Hence an absolute impossibility for him to bear any music, and the obligation to renounce it, until his morbid period had passed away.

[Conclusion next week.]

THE VOICE.—The organ of voice or larynx, has been compared to a clarinet, and similar instruments. It is composed of a mouth-piece, the aperture of which admits of expansion or dilation, and of a tube, which is capable of being lengthened or shortened. The tube is situated upon the superior part of the trachea, so that, as the air passes out during expiration, it may cause the edges of the aperture, at the entrance of the larynx from the mouth, to vibrate. If the upper part of the trachea be divided, on looking into the larynx from below, the tube, from being cylindrical, is seen to assume abruptly a triangular prismatic form. The two long sides of the triangle extend horizontally inwards and forwards, to meet at the front of the larynx. The base of the triangular opening is short, and is placed transversely. The mouth or orifice of the larynx is called the rima glottidis; the two long edges that meet at its fore part are termed the chordæ vocales. On looking into the larynx from above, the epiglottis is seen. It consists of a thin flap of fibrous cartilage, held vertically by its elastic connections against the root of the tongue, but capable of being thrown down to cover the opening of the glottis, the lips of the glottis, or the reflection of the mucous membrane, from the edges of the epiglottis to the posterior margin of the larynx, and the ventriculus laryngis, as the shallow fossa is called, placed immediately above and to the outside of the chordæ vocales, which permits these parts to vibrate freely. The rima glottidis is the mouth-piece of the larynx, and corresponds in some measure with the reed of the clarinet, or with the lips of a person whilst playing the flute. In pursuing the same comparison, we observe a contrivance similar to the stops in these instruments by which the tube may be shortened or lengthened, in the alternate rising and falling of the larynx. When the larynx is raised, the vocal tube is shortened; when it is depressed, the tube is lengthened. Accordingly, when an acute note is uttered, the larynx is felt to rise, and to sink when the voice falls to a grave tone.—Curtis on the Deaf and Dumb.

PORPORA.—In the time of Charles the Sixth, the celebrated Porpora lived at Vienna, poor and unemployed. His music did not please the imperial connoisseur, as being too full of trills and mordenti. Hasse wrote an oratorio for the emperor, who asked him for a second. He entreated his majesty to permit Porpora to compose it. The emperor at first refused, saying that he did not like that capering style; but touched with Hasse's generosity, he at length complied with his request. Porpora, having received a hint from his friend, did not introduce a single trill in the whole oratorio. The emperor, surprised, continually repeated during the rehearsal—"Tis quite a different thing,—there are no trills here." But when they came to the fugue which concluded the sacred composition, he observed that the theme commenced with four trilled notes. Now every body knows that in fugues the subject passes from one part to another, but does not change. When the emperor, who never laughed, heard in the full height of the fugue this deluge of trills, which seemed like the music of crazy people in a play, he could no longer preserve his gravity, and laughed outright, perhaps for the first time in his life. In France, the land of jokes, this might have appeared out of place; but at Vienna it was the commencement of Porpora's fortune.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 14, 1853.

"DON GIOVANNI." As rumor indicates a prospect of our hearing Mozart's masterpiece, next week, presented by the Sontag troupe, reinforced with several new singers, we have thought to prepare some of the opera-goers for a juster understanding of the work, and to remove some common prejudices, by transferring to these pages a lecture, in which we embodied several years ago our own impressions, speculations and results of readings on the subject. The article is long, so that we divide it in the middle, promising the remaining half next week. It grew into its present shape and dimensions, by successive accretions and revisions, made from year to year, since the time that our first very imperfect acquaintance with the work inspired us with the deepest interest. Whatever "Don Juan" may be to the lovers of more modern music, or to mere moral critics of the libretto, who reject the subject beforehand, without considering in what spirit it is treated, to us it is full of meaning and one of the worthiest themes of study in the whole world of Art. No doubt, our feeling about it will to many seem extravagant, subjective, fanciful and transcendental. Yet we attribute to it not a particle more meaning than do all the many writers on the subject among Mozart's own countrymen, although our own view may not coincide entirely with any one of them. Certain we are that all these come necessarily nearer to the thought and true design of Mozart, than the literal, superficial view which sees in "Don Giovanni" nothing but a vulgar, grotesque, licentious, half comical, half tragical melodrama, with a vast deal of musical talent thrown away upon it. We believe no one will ever worthily appreciate or enjoy the work who looks upon it in that light.

While writing out these speculations in their present form for Graham's Magazine, a year or two since, we came across the admirable work on Mozart, by the Russian writer, Oulibicheff, and from his minute analysis enriched the detail of our description of the opera itself in several places, although his interpretation as a whole was not entirely reconcilable with our own pre-conceived idea of it. This we mention, because there treacherously appeared in "Graham," soon after our article, a malignant and ill-natured anonymous attack upon it, calling it not only "extravagant," "immoral," "transcendental," and "very Boston," but "plagiarized," especially from the German writer Hoffmann. Of this attack we never took the slightest notice,—not so much as to inquire the authorship: first, because we were too busy, having our hands full with the preparation and launching of this Journal, and, having said our say about "Don Juan," we were in no mood for controversy about it; secondly, because the attack was of too vulgar and flippant a character to render any notice except that of silence proper; and thirdly, because the only serious charge, that of passing off Hoffmann's writing for our own, professed to substantiate itself by adducing parallel passages, which we could safely leave to the common sense of any intelligent reader as anything but parallel in meaning; while at the same time it upset itself by the incompatible charge of perverting and altering the sense of Hoffmann. The only answer we have ever thought of making to this attack, we make now, having postponed it until a public performance of "Don Juan" should make our readers interested in the discussion of it. We simply republish, what we wrote, for better or worse (and our readers will see it lays no claim to originality, while it would have been wholly wrong to make Hoffmann or anybody else responsible for it as a whole), and design to follow it by as faithful a translation as we can procure of Hoffmann's article entire. Then whosoever cares enough to make the comparison, may do it for himself; and we shall be killing two birds with one stone; first, ridding ourselves of this shadow of an obligation to the past, and secondly helping (as we trust) to interest our readers and opera-goers more deeply and more worthily in one of the greatest monuments of lyric Art.

New York Normal Musical Institute.

This novel enterprise commenced its active existence, according to the announcement which has stood for some time in our advertising columns, at nine o'clock on Monday morning, April 25th. The ground was broken in an introductory lecture by Mr. LOWELL MASON, who had only a few days before arrived from Europe, and who may be considered as the father of the plan, as well as of the whole movement of popular musical instruction in this country. Among psalm-book makers and mass teachers there is no one like him; and the Normal Institute is probably to be regarded as his crowning effort, to concentrate and build up into some distinct form of permanency the results and methods of his extensive and in many respects original experience as a pioneer in choirs and public schools throughout our once unmusical New England.

We understand that about fifty pupils of both sexes appeared at the opening, designing to attend the classes and enjoy the privileges of the institution, through its session of three months. The scene of operations is Dodworth's large and beautiful Hall in the building upon Broadway next Grace Church. The class exercises occupy the hours from nine to one each morning. Mr. MASON lectures from 9 till 10 on the Art of Teaching; Mr. R. STORRS WILLIS from 10 till 11 (Tuesdays and Thursdays) on Harmony and Composition; Mr. G. F. ROOT from 11 till 12 on the Culture of the Voice; and Mr. W. B. BRADBURY from 12 till 1 on Part-Singing. Besides these, Mr. THOMAS HASTINGS, (author of a treatise just published upon "Musical Taste"), communicates "sound and experienced views as to the side-culture—mental and physical—of the musician." Private lessons in singing are given by Dr. BEAMES; and those who wish instruction in the use of instruments can be taught the organ by Mr. HOWE, and all sorts of band instruments by Mr. DODWORTH.

The original and distinctive feature of the Normal Institute is that it teaches the art of teaching. Its primary end is not, like that of the European Conservatories to train artists but rather to raise up and qualify teachers of the first elements of music for the masses, so that the whole rising generation of American society may grow up in some actual possession of the musical faculties implanted in our common nature. This certainly is a most worthy end; and to its speedier and truer realization the Normal School, or nursery of teachers, is as necessary to the popular musical culture as it has been found to be to our whole general system of Free Schools, so indispensable to a Republican society. It would be hardly reasonable to look to such an institution (at least in the outset) for the ripe artistic culture of the Conservatories in France and Germany, which are presided over by the greatest artists, composers and theoretic professors of the age. Probably our time has not yet come for that. But meanwhile here is a great and important work demanded by the times; and for its accomplishment, or for the first successful trial of the way thereto, we look with no small hope to the school so auspiciously commenced in New York.

A people must owe its musical culture to two main sources: first and principally, no doubt, to the inspiring influence of Art itself, to the presence of true artists and the frequent hearing and enjoying of true works of Art. Handel and Mozart and Beethoven and Mendelssohn, with fit interpreters, are of course our best educators. But there is also need of systematic, elementary teaching. The eye must be educated, to learn the whole lesson of beauty from nature or from Raphael. And the ear must be taught how to discriminate shades of tone, before the Mozarts can come home to us. Now it is notorious that musical artists, fine composers, men of genius, hate the drudgery of teaching. It needs to be proved and practically illustrated that teaching itself, even of the simplest rudiments, may be made an art; so that if any have an inborn talent for it they may find it as attractive and as enlivening an employment as the creation of poems, songs or pictures. Perhaps this Institute may do something to present the teacher's function in a more worthy and attractive aspect, to artists who in this country have to live by teaching, as well as by the practice of their art.

The Normal Institute may be regarded as the ultimate consolidation of those summer "Musical Conventions," which for many years have so stimulated the popular interest in music. It offers the best benefits, without the hurry and the crudities of the Conventions. The pupils remain together three months, in the company of those earnestly pursuing the same end with themselves, in a musical metropolis, where there are multitudes of opportunities of hearing such good music as they might never hear at home; and where they are likely to be thrown much in the way of artists and enter circles that are pervaded by an artistic tone: so that, besides learning the mere rudiments and how to teach them, those who are apt for it may possibly receive some deeper notions of artistic culture, and even unfold some germs of a creative talent as composers. Such a school, if liberally and wisely managed, might draw in more or less the aid of all the most accomplished musical teachers and musicians residing in or visiting the city. We see not why such a movement may not gradually grow and ripen into something quite as formidable as a Paris or a Leipsic Conservatory, while it should still retain its distinctive feature of the Normal School, or school for teachers. We shall be glad to receive reports from time to time of its progress.

SINGERS AND THEIR PRICES.—We think there is a great deal of justice in the following strong remarks of the N. Y. Tribune, apropos to the benefit given last week to manager Le Grand Smith, who has come off a loser by his liberality in the "Grand Combination (Marezek—Alboni) Opera," simply on account of the exorbitant demands of the principal singers. That a reformation is surely needed is most certain:—but how shall it be brought about, in a thoroughly competitive system of society? is the grand question. One would think, however, that the singers themselves might be taught to see their own interest to coincide with that of the music-loving public, in placing opera upon a permanent, regular and wholesome basis. Surely it were better for them all to be secured regular employment on good salaries, than to take such lottery chances as they now do, in brief seasons of excitement, which recklessly consume the soil, and disastrously for the managers, and destroy all hope of opera again perhaps until some new flaming meteor comes along and galvanizes the thing again into an equally baleful existence for a few weeks. But here is the extract. We say Amen to it all, except the coupling of the true artist name of Jenny Lind with "quackery and pharasaic parade."

We deem it creditable to Mr. Le Grand Smith and equally discreditable to the company he employs, that he should have lost money. It seems to us that in the illustration of Operatic art, which will here and now afford a reasonable recompense to all the performers, it borders on the morally hideous and religiously atheistic, that artists can be found whose sense of salary so far outweighs their sense of justice that they will see any worthy gentleman deliberately pay out more than they can draw into the house.

As much as we desire to see lyrical art flourish in the country, we would sooner a thousand times see it blasted from existence and consigned to oblivion, than to find it habitually connected with avarice, jealousies, quarrellings, and the bankruptcies of the high-minded and liberal. And if, in the maelstrom of trade, the public could arrive at an anchorage of ethical observation, they would see the necessity of setting the seal of terrible reprobation upon all grasping cupidity, and the quackery and pharasaic parade of a Jenny Lind crusade would never be repeated. The difficulties of Mr. Le Grand Smith arise simply from the fact that operatic art is not systematized with us. There is no combination among capitalists to set it in regular motion. There is no religious feeling among artists to save it from habitual wreck. The idea that the generous gifts of God may be rewarded by something else than gold in excess never appears to be felt on the operatic stage.

The divine fire which made Correggio devote himself to a single portrait for years, and be paid in pennies; the equally sacred enthusiasm that doomed Mozart to such a life of poverty that, at the time he was writing his Don Giovanni, he was arrested for a debt of five dollars—has no more existence than if human nature in creative genius was a different thing from the same quality in performing talent. The profanity of paying four, five, or six hundred or more dollars a night for a single voice, is submitted to by the public, who, if dignity were as pervasive as folly, would fully assert the claims of justice, and see that a right division of rewards was determined. They would even find out that at least one-half of the success of an opera depends upon the composer, and would not let singers prey upon his works without giving him the rights of authorship under an international law of Copyright.

We think the duty of this public is to support Mr. Le Grand Smith. We think that they should force the artists under him to come to reasonable terms, or not let them sing at all. We can never have any art in this country so long as crazy cupidity fires every artist, based on the Jenny Lind auctioneering, charity-giving, angelic charlatanism. Singers should be paid here as they are in Italy, so much per cent. only added for the voyage, and the public should refuse to give more; otherwise art can have epileptic spasms, but no continuous growth for the benefit even of the artists themselves.

ITALIAN OPERA. Night after night in the performances of the Sontag troupe, we feel how much pleasure may be given, even with limited means, when there is a presiding intelligence and good taste to lend character and unity to each performance as a whole. This has been the secret of the charm. As the centre and mainspring of the whole has been one of the world's most refined and thoughtful artists, who is always and thoroughly a lady, and who impresses her own artistic feeling and conception upon the whole drama that is moving and singing around her. The Lucia, which we did hear the second time, depends more than any opera almost on a robust, manly tenor; and here the tenor was light and feeble. Almost all the tenors we have ever heard have been sentimental, lacrimose, effeminate and overstrained. When shall we ever hear a tenor? Bettini's was manly, rich in volume, golden in quality, and he often carried the house by storm; but he relied too much on special outbursts, in the climaxes of passion, while all the rest was indifferent. Benedetti should have been, had it in him to be a great tenor, and there was a certain manly weight and dignity (not merely physical), a magnetism of genius in his Edgardo,—the first we ever heard—which still remains to us an ideal of the part to the disadvantage of his successors. But Benedetti abused his voice, and relied on native talent, without being in any thorough sense a musician. Pozzolini is not a man of weight enough for Edgardo. Yet the opera, as a whole, was better performed than we have ever heard it. Sontag's Lucia for the first time realized in some sense our ideal of the character. Her first appearance was wonderfully youthful, beautiful and maiden-like; we could not believe it was the Countess Rossi; and her singing and acting throughout, especially in the mad scene, were exquisite in conception, style and finish.

Maria di Rohan, as music, seems to belong to the bed-ridden period of Donizetti's creative faculty; but as a play it is intensely, terribly dramatic, with dread catastrophes foreshadowed, the hands of a clock creeping visibly toward the fatal twelve, duels impossible to prevent, manly friendship transformed into jealous fury, &c., &c.;—only the plot is too complicated and does not fully explain itself to the spectator. It was finely performed, especially by SONTAG, and by BADIALI, save that the latter rather overdid the furious frenzy of Chevreuse's jealousy in the last act; yet it was truly a magnificent display of power. Pozzolini sang and acted the part of Chalais with uncommon vigor, substituting for the confession of his love in the first scene the corresponding solo out of Il Giuramento, and with good effect. Pico's Armando di Gondi, (in which part there is some of the freshest and most piquant melody) was her best part thus far. But we are not partial to these intensely passionate, overstrained, tragical, loud, brassy operas. We like the exaggerations of humor better than those of serious passion.

Hence it was refreshing to come to the pretty, sparkling comedy of the Elisir d'Amore. Of course Mme. Sontag was perfectly felicitous in the charming little rustic coquette of an Adina; but she is too lady-like a rustic for such a perfect simpleton of a lover as that clownish Nemorino, the music of whose part by the way was just suited to the tenor of POZZOLINI. Rocco's Dr. Dulcamara was not quite imposing enough for such a mighty quack; its humor was too much like boy's play; and the real zest of the comedy did not begin to be felt before the barcarolle between him and Adina at the end of the second act. BADIALI, in the bully, gallant sergeant, Belcore, maintained the most military aplomb, and was as satisfactorily Badiali as the small part admitted.

¶ We request the attention of our Boston readers to the advertisement of Mr. KEYZER's Musical Soirée. We hope that after an absence of six years, he will find that his many friends have not forgotten his good services in those memorable concerts of the old Boston Academy. The artistic spirit shown in a Chamber Concert, which he gave us at that time, shortly before his removal to New York, will be remembered as a pledge of something true and genuine in whatever he may announce of the same sort now.

The pieces selected are, we understand, all of the highest classical order. Among others, Spohr's celebrated double Quartet will be heard for the first time in Boston. Also Mr. Lange will perform one of the choicest compositions of Chopin.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. (From the Chronicle of April 22.) Last night Grisi returned, in Norma, looking as well, acting as nobly, and singing as gloriously as ever. The house—the most crowded and brilliant of the season—welcomed the great prima donna with a succession of those long-continued bursts of greeting which few, save Madame Grisi, can evoke; and then there went round a universal huzz of satisfaction to the effect that "The Diva" looked younger, and that her figure had improved in slowness of symmetry since last season. The opening notes which Madame Grisi sung, added another source of gratification. The old voice—so pure, so sonorous, so sympathetic in its tone, so noble in its volume—stole on all bearers in its wonted freshness and power. * * * As she went on, her voice became, if possible, more and more rich, and more and more flexible, and her whole performance was one long triumph.

We have now obtained an Adalgisa superior, we think we may say, to any of the representatives of the character at the Royal Italian Opera since CORBARI. Mlle. BELLINI, who, the other night, took firmer ground than she had previously occupied—as Jenny in William Tell—made another and more decided advance still in Adalgisa.

TAMBERLIK was in excellent voice, and made a most artistically energetic pro-consul, managing to endow that unpopular Roman with more sympathy than he generally receives. FORNÉS resumed his old part of Oroveso, and, as usual, did the little he had to do characteristically and effectively.

The chorus and orchestra performed their duty manfully, only we think that Mr. COSTA detracted somewhat from the due solemnity of the rites of the Druids, by taking their hymns and marches too fast. The people who built Stonehenge would not have been likely to go about things in a hurry. The stones are too ponderous for the supposition.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—Of the third concert the Times reports as follows:

The selection was composed for the most part of works with which the Philharmonic orchestra is so familiar, that, under such a conductor as Mr. Costa, it would have been almost impossible for them not to go well. Haydn's symphony—No. 10 of the Salomao set of twelve, and Beethoven's No. 2—were both admirably executed. The nocturno of Mozart, for two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, and two horns, lost half its effect by being curtailed of its first and most important movement. It opened with the minuetto and trio, in both of which Mozart's wonderful command of the resources of counterpoint is exemplified in highly ingenious forms of canon. The performance was excellent on all hands, more especially of the last movement, a kind of air varié, in which the oboe playing of Mr. Nicholson, and M. Baumann's unrivalled execution on the bassoon, elicited constant marks of approval. The beautiful overture (to Lodoiska) of Cherubini—which, at one time the rival of Kreutzer's more familiar prelude to an opera of the same name, has found a place, denied to the other, in the "classics" of the art—deserved a better position in the programme. The great feature of the concert was the overture of Mendelssohn to Victor Hugo's play of Ruy Blas—in vigor and brilliancy of orchestral effect equal to any of the overtures of Weber. A performance entirely up to the Philharmonic mark roused the enthusiasm of the audience, and elicited an encore that there was no resisting.

The trombone concerto of M. David, of Leipsic, though better than such things in general, presented little to interest beyond the clever playing of Mr. Winterbottom, who was loudly applauded. The vocal music was good enough in its way; but Madame Clara Novello being "out of voice," the duets from Roberto and Fidelio, and the hacknied air from the former, fared worse than they would have fared had the lady been well-disposed. Herr Formes gave a vigorous German reading of Schubert's popular Erl König; and the orchestral accompaniments, by whomever supplied, were exceedingly clever. But Schubert intended them for the piano-forte; and his own version is decidedly preferable.

PESTH (HUNGARY.) A correspondent of the Transcript, writes thus of a concert given in this city in the early part of April by DREYSCHOCK:

The concert took place at 12½ M.—a very singular hour for a concert, you will think. The hall, which held 1500 persons, was very crowded, principally with the nobility of Hungary. On the appearance of Dreyschock, he was greeted with such applause as rarely falls to the lot of a pianist. The first piece was the Sonata patheticque, by Beethoven, which was played with a delicacy and smoothness of touch, and clearness of expression, and a tone so liquid and even, that the artist really seemed inspired. Then followed three pieces of his own composition, played as no one but himself can play them. The prelude and Fugue, composed and played by himself, was a very classical and effective composition, and received encores after encores, and every time it was repeated the applause seemed to increase. No. 3 was a Presto, Op. 28, by Mendelssohn, well known and admired by all musicians. This was received by a unanimous cry of "Bravo! Bravo!" "Da capo! Da capo!" The concert ended with his celebrated Rhapsodie, (Winter-märchen.) Taken either as a whole or separately, it was decidedly the best piano-playing I ever heard. He had no assistance from orchestra, but was the sole performer and attraction, and such has been his success that he has only to announce a concert to ensure a crowded house wherever he may go. N. R.

Advertisements.

WILLIAM KEYZER

WILL GIVE

A MUSICAL SOIRÉE,

ON SATURDAY EVENING, MAY 21st, 1853,

AT THE

Lecture Room of the Boston Music Hall.

Particulars in small bills. Tickets 50 cents each, to be had at the Music Stores, or of Mr. Keyzer, No. 5 Franklin St., and at the door.

A. W. FRENZEL,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC, and late Leader of the "SAXONIA ORCHESTRA," having made Boston his residence, is prepared to give Lessons on the Piano-Forte and in Singing, both in the English and German languages; also to accompany with the violin more advanced pupils in the Sonata-duos of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c. During the summer season, Mr. F. offers his services to classes out of town. Or he will receive scholars, from the city or the country, at his Music Rooms, No. 4 Pine Street, Boston, where he may always be found before 10 A. M., and between the hours of 1 and 3 P. M. iii 6

TO PRINTERS.

MUSIC COMPOSITOR WANTED. One who is thoroughly acquainted with the business. Apply at this Office.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

NEW YORK NORMAL MUSICAL INSTITUTE.

GENTLEMEN and LADIES, who design attending the first term of the NEW YORK NORMAL MUSICAL INSTITUTE, and who wish to have board procured for them, are requested to give early notice to that effect. This will be necessary, in order to secure suitable accommodations; especially, as there is prospect of a large class.

Applications have been made by some who desire to attend the courses of lectures and other class exercises of the Institute, omitting the private lessons embraced in the full course. Notice is therefore given that the price of a ticket admitting the holder to all the lectures and class exercises, will be twenty-five dollars. Including the course of private lessons, the price is fifty dollars.

The term commences on MONDAY, APRIL 25th, 1853, and continues three months, during which time daily lectures and instruction will be given in the various departments of music, the design being to furnish thorough instruction, and especially to qualify teachers of music.

The assistance of THOMAS HASTINGS, Esq., and other eminent musicians has been secured.

Circulars containing further particulars may be obtained on application to MASON BROTHERS, (late Mason & Law,) 23 Park Row, New York.

LOWELL MASON.
GEORGE F. ROOT.
WM. B. BRADBURY.

Mar. 5. tf

BEETHOVEN'S CELEBRATED MASS in C,
IN VOCAL SCORE:

With an Accompaniment for the Organ or Piano-Forte, by Vincent Novello. With Latin and English text. Just published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St. iii 4

THE SYMPHONIES OF BEETHOVEN—ARRANGED FOR THE PIANO-FORTE BY J. N. HUMMEL. The above excellent compositions are now in course of publication by the subscriber.

Symphony No. 7, in A, op. 92, is now ready.

Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St. iii 4

Sold by all Music Dealers.

—Edward L. Balch,

NEW EDITION OF CARCASSI'S GUITAR BOOK. New and Improved Method for the Guitar, by M. Carcassi. Price $2.50.

This new edition of Carcassi's celebrated method embraces much valuable matter not contained in those previously issued. These additions are those which have been made by the distinguished author after an experience which enabled him to determine what was actually needed by the pupil for a thorough understanding of the art. The whole has been carefully translated by a well known Professor of the Guitar, and is thereby rendered as free as possible from those slight but perplexing inaccuracies which sometimes become a part of translations and reprints. A number of popular songs in each of the different keys have been appended, which together with the masterly instructions of Carcassi, and his plain yet comprehensive course of Exercises, furnish all that is desirable to both teacher and scholar.

OLIVER DITSON, Publisher,
115 Washington St.
feb 26

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE,
No. 86 TREMONT STREET, BOSTON.

WHITE BROTHERS,
DEALERS IN MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS,

Best Italian, German, French and English Strings,

AGENTS OF

J. André, Offenbach; and G. André, Philadelphia,

FOR THE SALE OF FOREIGN CLASSIC MUSIC,
CHOIR MUSIC, &c.

Instruments Made, Repaired, Tuned, Bought, Sold, or Exchanged, on the most favorable terms.

IRA J. WHITE. A. WARREN WHITE.
iii 2 3m

THEODORE T. BARKER,
MUSIC STORE,
No. 381 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

Chickering's Pianos to let.

All Foreign and American Musical Publications received as soon as published. ii 23 3m

N. D. COTTON,

IMPORTER AND DEALER IN

English, French, and American Stationery,
DRAWING & PAINTING MATERIALS,
No. 13 Tremont Row, Boston.

 Wedding and Visiting Cards Engraved and Printed. 16 tf

BEETHOVEN'S ORATORIO OF EGEDI, or DAVID IN THE WILDERNESS, known as the MOUNT OF OLIVES, is this day published in a neat, convenient form for the singer or concert-goer by

Geo. P. Reed & Co., Publishers,
Jan. 8. 17 TREMONT ROW, BOSTON.

J. W. TAVERNER,
PROFESSOR OF ELOCUTION,

AT HIS RESIDENCE,

No. 30 CHARLES STREET, BOSTON.

J. C. WOODMAN,
ORGANIST AND CONDUCTOR OF MUSIC AT CENTRAL CHURCH,
Teacher of Singing, Piano Forte, &c.,

No. 94 Chestnut Street, Boston.
iii 2 3m.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.
FOREIGN MUSIC DEPOT,
GIRARD HOUSE BUILDINGS,
NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,
PHILADELPHIA.

N. B. The complete works, for Piano, (Quartets, Trios, Duets for Piano and Violin, Duets for four hands and Piano solo pieces,) of BEETHOVEN and MOZART, as also the Piano solo Works of CLEMENTI and HAYDN, as published by J. André, Offenbach, in sets, at very low prices. We have appointed

Messrs. WHITE BROTHERS,
TREMONT TEMPLE, BOSTON,

our Agents for the sale of the above Standard Editions of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, &c. &c. iii 2 tf

MRS. ROSA GARCIA DE RIBAS,
TEACHER OF THE
PIANOFORTE, SINGING & GUITAR,
2 Seneca St., corner Harrison Avenue.

MR. De RIBAS will give instruction on the Oboe and Flute. Also MUSIC ARRANGED, TRANSPOSED, &c. Boston, April 23. 3m

Letter-Press, Music and Job Printing-Office,

JONAS CHICKERING,

RESPECTFULLY gives notice to his friends and the public that, having recovered from the late disastrous effects produced by the destruction of his factory, he is now ready to receive orders for PIANOS, which he promises to execute with as much faithfulness and promptitude as heretofore.

379 Washington Street, Boston.

Mar. 5.

HEW'S PATENT

AMERICAN ACTION PIANO-FORTE.

THE MANUFACTURER is in possession of numerous testimonials from distinguished Musical Professors, who have used the greatly improved ACTION PIANO, commending it in high terms. The attention of purchasers and amateurs of Music to an examination of its superiority, is solicited.

GEO. HEW'S, 365 Washington St., Boston.

Apr. 10.

D. B. NEWHALL,
MANUFACTURER AND DEALER IN
PIANO FORTES,

No. 344 Washington Street, Boston.

PIANO FORTES REPAIRED, TUNED, & TO LET.

Apr. 10.

SIGNOR G. C. GUIDI respectfully informs his former pupils and the public, that he has resumed his instructions in SINGING, after the Italian school, with the intention to settle permanently in Boston. In order to accommodate those who may not wish to take private instruction, he will open classes for ladies and gentlemen, on moderate terms. None but good voices will be admitted. Terms liberal for persons intending to study for professional purposes.

Sig. G. can be consulted free upon any musical subject, daily, from 12 to 2, at Mr. Hew's Piano Manufactory, No. 365 Washington street, where terms and time for classes may be known.

Orders or notes for Sig. G. may be addressed to him at G. P. Reed & Co.'s Music Store, 17 Tremont Row, and at Oliver Ditson's, 115 Washington street. Feb. 5.

A CARD.

THE SUBSCRIBER respectfully offers his services to the public as Teacher of the Piano-Forte, the Violin, and of Singing, after a clear and easy method. He will also accompany pupils, both in seminars and in private houses, in the practice of Duets, Trios, &c.

Address for the present at 168 Tremont Street.

March 26. 3m.

CARL GÄRTNER.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
265 Washington Street, Boston.

Oct. 16.

3m

T. BRICHER,

Organist and Conductor of Music

At the Bowdoin Square Church.

OFFICE UNDER THE CHURCH. . . ENTRANCE ON CHARDON ST.

Jan. 22. 3m.

H. S. CUTLER,

Organist at the Church of the Advent, also of the Boston Harmonic Society.

ADDRESS—(Care of A. N. JOHNSON,) No. 90 Tremont Street, Boston. 22 tf

F. F. MÜLLER,

DIRECTOR OF MUSIC AND ORGANIST at the Old South Church; ORGANIST of the Handel and Haydn Society; ORGANIST of the Musical Education Society, &c. &c. &c. Inquire of Messrs. REED & Co., No. 17 Tremont Row, Boston. iii 7 tf

NATHAN RICHARDSON,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC.

Now in Europe; will return 1st of June. Letters may be addressed at 19 Hanover St. 25 tf

GEORGE F. WILLEY,

TEACHER OF MUSIC.

Private Tuition in the principles of Music and the Cultivation of the Voice.

MUSIC ROOM, THE LECTURE ROOM OF KIRK STREET CHURCH, RESIDENCE, 34 FRANKLIN SQUARE, SUFFOLK STREET, feb. 5. LOWELL, MASS.

Germania Serenade Band.

THE SERVICES OF THIS ASSOCIATION can be secured by applying to

G. SCHNAPP, Leader,
364 Tremont Street.

ii 14 tf

RATES FOR ADVERTISING.

For half a square, (8 lines,) or less, first insertion, . . . $0.50

For a square, (16 lines,) first insertion, . . . 1.00

On advertisements standing three months or longer, a discount of twenty per cent. on the above rates is allowed. (A column counts as seven squares.)

Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 School St.

DWIGHT'S Journal of Music.

A Paper of Art and Literature.

VOL. III.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 21, 1853.

NO. 7.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

TERMS....TWO DOLLARS PER ANNUM, (IN ADVANCE.)

CITY Subscribers can be served at their houses by the further payment of fifty cents per annum.

For Rates of Advertising, see last page.

POSTAGE, if paid in advance, for any distance within the State, thirteen cents a year; if not in advance, twenty-six cents. To all places beyond the State, double these rates.

J. S. DWIGHT,.....EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St.

By REDDING & CO., 8 State St.

GEO. P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row.

A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.

DEXTER & BROTHERS, 43 Ann Street, N. Y.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 483 Broadway, N. Y.

MASON & LAW, 23 Park Row, New York.

GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.

G. ANDRE, 229 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St., Balt.

HOLBURN & FIELD, Cincinnati, O.

HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Persons willing to become Agents for procuring subscribers, especially Music-Dealers and Teachers, are invited to correspond with the Editor, as above. Satisfactory references required, and liberal commissions allowed.

Back numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Also bound copies of Vols I and II, at prices varying from $2.50 to $3.50.

Mozart's Don Giovanni.

BY THE EDITOR.

(Concluded from last Number.)

We have now reached the musical Finale of the first act, though there is much shifting of scenes and characters before the last grand ensemble, which is the ball in the Don's palace. But these only suspend, wonderfully to enhance the final stroke. We can only enumerate the delicious series of ever new and characteristic musical ideas preliminary to the feast: (1.) Masetto urging Zerlina to hide herself;—how full of the bustle of approaching splendors is the music during this little hurried duet! (2.) the Don's voice stimulating the peasants to the coming mirth with their responsive chorus; (3.) then his discovery of the shy bird and half reclaimal of her love, with his blank surprise (so perfectly depicted in the sudden modulation of the music) as he leads her off only to meet the watchful bridegroom: Masetto! si, Masetto! (during all which the light twittering phrases of accompaniment make the whole atmosphere instinct with joys expected); (4.) then, as the instruments suddenly change to a cautious, half-hushed, tip-toe melody, unflagging in its speed, yet in the minor mood, (for these have no festivity in their hearts, that now come,) the entrance of Donna Elvira, Donna Anna and Don Ottavio, in black dominos, and masked to the outward eye, though each betrayed by a distinctive style of melody;—(5.) then the sounding (from within the house) of that stately Minuet, a strain which every body knows and loves, and still as fresh as when first written, here introduced as a mere foretaste of itself and of the ball, and made the musical ground-work of lordly courtesy and hospitality to the salutations of Don Juan and Leporello, who appear above at the window, and invite the maskers in;—(6.) the surpassing Trio, in which the three, lingering on the threshold, invoke Heaven's protection to innocence ensnared. Can any other opera show such an exuberance of musical ideas in the same space? And it is all en passant, all incidental to what follows, to what now bursts instantly upon the view as the back scene is withdrawn, and you see all the crowd and splendor of the ball-room, and are transported by the indescribably rich Finale, that ever-climbing, widening crescendo and accumulation of all musical effects, till the climax is reached in a general storm and inundation of harmony. The simple, gay, continuous six-eight melody, to which the whole brilliant spectacle moves at first, is the very soul of festivity. Suddenly there is a full chord in C, from the whole orchestra, with trumpets, and a stately, march-like strain, preluding the entrance of the three in masks, with the lordly welcome of the Amphytrion. He will have no time lost, however, for into this one high hour he has concentrated all the delights and harmonies of sense; short, bright and strong be the blood-quickenning chorus: Viva la Liberta! and now let the dance go on. And now are crowded into a brief but most capacious movement, the re-introduction of the minuet in a bolder key than before, to whose grave, deliberate measure the more elegant company begins to move, in antique, solemn steps; then presently, commingling with the minuet, but not disturbing it, two other tunes, to other rhythms, namely, a rustic contra-dance, and a most rapid waltz, inspiring the heels of the peasants; the droll attempts of Leporello to make Masetto dance, while his master has bespoken the arm and ear of the pretty bride, to win whom he has planned this whole array; the indignant observation of this game by Donna Anna, with difficulty moderated until due time by her companions; the piercing shriek of the music as Don Juan whirls Zerlina away out of the dance; the cry for aid; the general rush to the door, whence the sounds proceed, and when it is broken in, the grotesque brief diversion of the Don dragging Leporello by the ear, and trying to fasten his own crime on him; the incredulous and accusing phrase in which the voices of the trio, now unmasked, confront him successively in Canon style; and the outbursting of the general tempest of wrath upon the exposed deceiver, heightened, too, by the sweeping wind and hissing lightnings of an actual physical storm that is supposed to be passing without. The strength of the accusing chorus is splendidly terrific, and like the rush of a whirlwind where all the voices in unison swiftly traverse up and down several times the first five notes of the scale. But he of the dauntless will and the magnetic eye with one sword awes back and penetrates the maddened mob, escaping with a loud laugh of defiance.

Our very slight and hasty sketch has already grown to considerable length, and yet we have examined only one act of the three, into which "Don Giovanni" is usually divided in the performance. One act was enough to show, (if that were all our object), how this opera wells up as from an exhaustless fountain of musical ideas, all of which are of the inspired, enduring quality; we have listened to materials enough already for some twenty of the fashionable operas of our day. We must glance more hastily at the remainder.

Act II opens with one of those half humorous half serious conversations between the Don and Leporello, which ever and anon relieve the story. The servant, stung by the ungrateful and outrageous conduct of his master in the ball-room explosion, announces his determination to quit him; but they are too essential to each other, and the Don soon coaxes, laughs and bribes him out of that motion. This duet is in real Italian parlando style, a syllable to every note. Quick and brief, as it is comically expressive; for this enemy of woman's peace has new business on hand; the unlucky night is not too far gone to try one more adventure. So here follows the summer warmth and heanty of the serenade scene under Donna Elvira's window, who sits above there, pouring out her nightingale complainings under the stars, in a melody of ravishing sweetness and tenderness, forming the upper part of a terzetto, in which the sotto voce dialogue of the Don and his man below grotesquely blends. He changes garments with Leporello, and lending his own voice, while Leporello gesticulates, in strains of feigned repentance and returning love, entices the too easily persuaded lady down into the arms of his counterfeit; while he takes up his guitar to serenade, not Elvira, but Elvira's maid, now that the field is clear, in that most graceful little serenading air, which seems so easy and so off-hand, with its light arpeggio accompaniment by violins alone: Deh, vieni alla finestra. But the fortunate stars of our all-seducing hero seem this night to have forsaken him; again his business is balked. Mirth and melody, fun and sentiment are strangely mingled in this scene, and indeed in this whole act. The serenade gets finished; the tree as it were is climbed; but before the fruit can be gathered, the game is interrupted by Masetto and the peasants armed, hot from the ball-room scene, in search of the splendid scoundrel. Masetto gets the worst of it; and here we have one of the world's three or four very choicest and purest gems of melody, Zerlina's exquisitely tender and comforting song to her poor bruised and beaten bridegroom: Vedrai carino; so beautifully simple, in the homely key of C natural; so innocently voluptuous; so full of blissful love; so like the balsam (un certo balsamo), of which she hints with fond and arch significance! And as she makes him place his hand upon her heart, at the words: Sentilo battere (feel it beat) you seem to hear its glad and honest beating in the music. We cannot forbear inserting here the following interpretation of this song, which we have read since our analysis of the opera was made. It is from the pen of an intelligent Russian gentleman, who has written in French and German an admirable Life of Mozart, with a critical examination of his works. We translate from the German copy:

"Vedrai carino is, like so many pieces of our opera, super-dramatic music. When we hear it, we forget the text, we forget the person. There is no longer any Zerlina or Masetto. Something infinite, absolute, and verily divine announces itself to the soul. Is it perhaps nothing but love, represented under one of the countless modifications, by which it is distinguished in each individual, according to the laws of his nature and the peculiar vicissitudes of his fortune? No; the soul feels rather a direct effluence of the principle itself, from which all youth, all love, all joy, and every vital reproduction flows. The genius of the Spring's metamorphoses, he namely, whom the old theosophists called Eros, who disembroiled Chaos, who fructified germs and married hearts, this genius speaks to us in this music, as he has so often spoken in the murmurings of the brooks, that has escaped its icy prison, in the rustling of the young leaves, in the melodious songs of the nightingale, in the balmy odors which pervade the eloquent and inspiring stillness of a May night. MOZART had listened to and firmly held this ground-accord of this universal harmony; he arranged it for a soprano voice with orchestral accompaniment, and made of it the nuptial air of a young bride. Zerlina sings surrounded by the shadows of the marriage night, while just about to cross the threshold, at which virginity pauses, with prayer and trembling expecting the confirmation of the holy title of wife. In this place the Aria becomes a genuine Scena of Love, the source of life and of eternal rejuvenescence for all nature;—of Love, the Spring-time of souls and the most unstinted revelation of the all-goodness of the Creator. It is a marriage song for all that loves, conceived in the same spirit with the "Ode to Joy" by SCHILLER, allowing for the difference of tone and style between a Dithyrambic and an Eclogue. The theme, the image of the purest bliss, betrays none the less that inexplicable and seldom justified exaltation, which in the fairest, poetic hours of our existence leads us to that unknown good, whereof all other goods of earth are only shadows and foretastes. A rhythm without marked accent; a harmony without dissonances; a modulation, which rests in the tonics and forgets itself, as if held fast there by a spell; a melody, which cannot separate itself from its ineffaceable motif; this tranquil rapture, this soft ecstasy, fill out the first half of the air. After the pause hosts of nightingales begin to sing in chorus in the orchestra, while the voice with exquisite monotony murmurs: Sentilo battere, toccami qua. Then the same words are again uttered with the expression of passion; the heart of the young woman beats stronger and stronger; the sighs of the orchestra are redoubled, and the last vocal phrase, which bears the impress of chaste devotion, shows us the wife as she sinks softly upon the bosom of her husband. MOZART seems to have anticipated the desire of the ear, in that he lets the orchestra repeat the whole motif and the enchanting final phrases once again. He knew that the piece would be found too short, as it actually is the case."

Good night, then, to this happy couple, whom we leave, to trace the sequel of the comic vein just opened in the "Sartar"-ian exchange of personality between the master and the servant; but also at the same to receive still more distinct and solemn intimations (all the more significant for this very contrast of the comic) of the supernatural reaction that is preparing soon to burst upon the head of the magnificent libertine and outlaw. The Sextet, which now follows, is altogether unique and unrivalled among concerted pieces in opera. The music of this Sextet covers such an ever-shifting variety of action, and so much of a scene, that one may hear it once without thinking of its wealth and admirable structure as music. Yet for every point in all this action, and for all shades of relation between the persons, as well as for each separate personality, there is a correspondence in the music. The scene has changed to a bujo loco, or dark place, (the libretto says, a porch to Donna Anna's palace). First appear the counterfeit Giovanni and Elvira, who is too happy to walk with him, to the end of the world if need be; while he, (Leporello), tired of imitating his master's voice, is groping about to find an exit. In an andante melody, in the same key, and of a kindred character with that by which we first knew her, (Ah! chi mi dice mai), she utters her fear of being left alone in this bujo loco. Just as her companion finds the door, the groping, cautious music brightens into the bold key and trumpet style which always heralds Anna and Ottavio, who enter amid blaze of torches. Sweet is the consoling appeal of the tenore to his grief-stricken Anna, whose response, less fiery and commanding, but not less sublimely spiritual than her last great solo, even hints of death as the only solution of life's riddle for her. Meanwhile the first two, who have lurked unnoticed, are just making good their exit, when Zerlina and Masetto appear, who thinks that now he has the briccone at his mercy;

the bluster of Masetto, the surprise of Anna and Ottavio at the sight of the supposed Giovanni, the grotesque crouching plea of the valet, the intercession of still deceived Elvira for "her husband," then their recognition of her, then a new brandishing of Masetto's club, and then the ass throwing off the lion's skin and begging mercy, all are made thrice expressive by the music, which varies instinctively each moment, and yet ceases not to weave the unitary complex whole. At last all the six voices join in a swift and wind-like allegro, in which Anna's voice takes the highest and most florid part, Zerlina's the second, Elvira's the third, and so on, and in which there is now and then a wild Æolian-harp-like passage of harmony, which seems the fore-feeling of the higher powers which henceforth are to take part in the drama.

But first we have the masterpiece and model of all tenor solos. In it Ottavio commends his Il mio tesoro to the care of these friends, and in it he proves himself the truest, tenderest, most devoted and most religious of lovers, if Heaven has reserved it to a stronger force than his to crush the mighty sinner against whom he has taken such an oath of vengeance. But the opera could not rob itself of the statue and its last scene and its whole sublimity, to make him a hero, when it was enough that he should know how to love a Donna Anna.

Passing over a duet between Leporello and Zerlina rarely sung, in fact an after-thought of the composer, which he is said to have added to conciliate the lower taste of a Viennese manager or audience; and passing over (for we must be brief) a truly transcendent solo for Elvira: Mi tradi quell' alma ingrata, in whose fluid, ever-modulating melody, her musing sad soul seems dissolved in reverie, we come to the marvellous churchyard scene. Here glimmers the white equestrian statue of the murdered Commander in the background; and here the Don and Leporello seek a rendezvous after their new discomfiture, to re-exchange hats and mantles, and so forth. Their loud levity is suddenly hushed by a voice of warning from the statue, accompanied in strange chords by the unearthly tones of the trombones (which instruments, instead of being lavished, in VERDI fashion, upon all the strong passages, have been entirely kept back till now for this supernatural "beginning of the end,") mingled with the low reed tones. Di rider finirai, &c. (Thou shalt cease to laugh before dawn!) A short old-choral strain, in which "the voice ends, speech-like, upon the Dominant of the key (A minor), struck with the major third. This is a church cadence; it belongs to eternity, which knows no minor, no such type of earthly unrest." It freezes to the heart of Don Giovanni, who starts dismayed, but only for a moment; and soon the marble lips break silence once more to rebuke his mockery. So far it has been introductory recitative; but now the orchestra is all life and melody again for the luscious music of the duet in which Giovanni compels the trembling servant at the sword's point to salute the statue and invite him to sup with him. There is no more exquisite fairy-work in the whole opera than the instrumentation of this scene. It were hard to tell whether the impression left by it partakes most of the comic, of the supernaturally terrible, or of the beautiful. All these elements are grotesquely blended in it, yet without seeming incongruity. The beauty of the music harmonizes and idealizes the action; it lends its singular fascination to the marvellous; it makes the terror doubly real, by expressing the vague charm which every terror has after all to the soul, glad (even its terror) of the excitement of something altogether strange and infinite. MOZART knew better than to freeze the blood up here entirely with unearthly tones of horror, except during those brief utterances of the marble rider; that he reserved for the end of which this is but the beginning. He has lavished all the luxury of melodic invention upon the instrumentation of this duet; the music in the main still gushes warm and genial and human, and hence you feel the supernatural all the more inwardly and powerfully, when shudders of strange awe cross occasionally its placid, sparkling flow. O statua gentilissima:—cheerily and bravely the beautiful strain sets out, in the rich key of E major; but as the knave shrinks back in terror, crying padron! mirate! &c., the deprecating expression of his voice dropping through the interval of a seventh, with the instruments accompanying in unison, is alike droll and marvellous. Still the cheerful melody goes on, in spite of ghosts, until the statue nods acceptance, when the unearthly modulation and tremolo of the music, falling with sudden emphasis upon Leporello's "Ah--h! che scena! (ah! what a sight!)" gives the whole scene for the time the superstitious coloring of his soul. But when he comes to tell his master how the spectre nodded, and when his master repeats the strain and gesture with him, the fear has become subordinate to the charm of adventure and the music takes the gay and reckless tone of Giovanni. Life shall be all a feast, is his creed, ghosts and miracles to the contrary; and festally the bright strain dies away, softer and softer, as they depart, to the tune of Andiamo via di qua (let us quit this place), to which the servant's voice chimes in as second very heartily.

Here the curtain usually falls, closing a second act, although the composer covers the homeward flight of the pair, fatigued and hungry with that night's adventures and discomfitures, and the preparation of the supper, by a beautiful and elaborate recitative and aria of Donna Anna, addressed to her devoted Ottavio, whose urgent plea for the consummation of their union she tenderly puts off, as with a presentiment that her love is to know no earthly consummation, and that her life is already too much of the other world. This song: Non mi dir, bloomed one of the heavenliest and purest in the wreath of JENNY LIND.

Act Third is the grand Finale, with its tremendous music, its apparition, its supernatural vindication of the Law, and the splendid sinner's doom. Remember, day has not dawned yet since that other Finale, to the first act; their supper that time was stormily broken off, and they have little rest in the meantime. But they have got home at last, and Gia la mensa è preparata: now the supper is prepared; a smart and animated strain of full orchestra in the bold key of D. The Don has shut himself in by himself with all the harmonies of sense and appetite; it is the pure feast of egoism; there are no guests, but his own appetites and riotous imaginations, for whom all things are provided; and little thinks he of one guest whom he has invited! Droll Leporello, now all appetite, is in attendance, devouring furtive morsels of the rich dishes and uncorking the champagne, (a situation commonly too tempting to our buffo, who makes the fun excessively and disgustingly broad), and making broad allusions at the barbaro appetito of his master. There is a band of wind instruments, too, from whom all the while proceed the most enlivening appeals to composite enjoyment, in a succession of rare morsels of melody from well-known operas of the time, for which both master and man show an appreciating ear. The last of these is the famous Non piu andrai, from MOZART'S OWN "Nozze di Figaro," to which Leporello may well exclaim: "That I know too well." Through all this the Titian-like, voluptuous quality of MOZART comes out afresh. It is the music of pure, unalloyed sensuous enjoyment; not a shadow of aught serious or sentimental comes over its harmony, until once more his better nature makes one final appeal, entreating him to repentance, in the person of poor, constant Donna Elvira, who suddenly rushes in and kneels at his feet. But the Don laughs at her simple lecture, and preaches up to her his bacchanalian gospel.

Here mark a fine point in the action, a fine touch of poetic truth, worthy of Mozart's genius. It is she, his better nature, as we have said, his own rejected truer self, who loves him better than he loves himself;—it is she, Elvira, who, as she leaves the stage, is the first to meet the fearful apparition and by her shriek give warning. That shriek, thrown into the music, has suddenly changed its smooth sparkling surface into fierce boiling eddies, and stirred up the whole sea of harmony from its profoundest depths. The musicians on the stage have vanished. No time now for their toy melodies! Every chord now cleaves the dark veil of the supernatural, like lightnings in the blackest night; the syncopated rhythm tells of vague and wonderful foreboding. Che grido è questo? (What noise is this?) and Leporello is sent out to see. Wilder and heavier grows the music, as he returns white and speechless, and only able in his half-wittedness of terror to imitate with his feet the heavy ta, ta, the approaching foot-fall of the man of marble, who has descended from his charger in the grave yard. It requires the master's hardihood to open the door for him, and amid those solemn and terrific crashes of the orchestra, with which the overture commenced, the strange guest stalks into the middle of the scene.

With hard, ponderous, marble tones, like blows, falling whole octaves, the statue announces himself as good as his word in accepting Giovanni's invitation. The amazed unbeliever, trembling and yet summoning up his old pride of will, which never yet forsook him, would fain prove as good as his word, too, and orders Leporello, who has crawled away under the table, to get ready another supper. But "not on mortal food feeds" this guest from the other world; "graver concerns" have led him here; and the instruments are again traversing those unsettled scales, whose wonderful effect we noticed in the overture. Parla, parla, rings out the rich, fresh baritone of the dauntless Amphytrion, as much as to say: "talk on, old fellow! I listen; you are ghost, but I am a substance; I believe in myself, say what you will." All very brave! but listen to the orchestra, (as you cannot help listening), if you would know how nevertheless it goes with him in the inner workings of his soul, in those mysterious depths of consciousness which hitherto he has so wilfully refrained from sounding. That heavy, muffled tread of the sub-bass in triplets, making the ground quake, means more than the "tertian ague" of poor Leporello there, with head thrust out cautiously from under the table, and voice, automaton-like, moving in unison with the basso profondo of the orchestra. A pause is filled with a monotonous beat of the basses, when the crashing diminished-seventh chords begin anew, and louder than before, while the spectre again opens its marble jaws, to tender the Don an invitation in its turn, which he, stout-hearted to the last, in spite of Leporello's trembling, grotesque warnings, accepts. The statue asks his hand in pledge; he boldly gives it, starts as if an infinite pang and sense of death shot from the cold, stony hand through all the marrow of his bones; with an infinite audacity of will he refuses to repent; the spectre sinks through the ground; he is a doomed one; the flames of hell burst in on every side, with visions of the damned: a chorus of spectres: vieni! (come!) is heard amid the infernal whirl and tempest of the music; he wrestles with the demons and drops dead, the whole phantasmagoria vanishing, just as the other characters of the piece come in in search of the reprobate, who listen to Leporello's chattering story, dispose of their several destinies after the approved fashion of dramatic conclusions, and wind up with chanting a solemn canon over the Dissoluto punito to the words: "Such is the end of the evil-doer!"

It is usual, however, to terminate the performance with the fall of Giovanni. The parts which follow, although admirable as music, are plainly superfluous to the action, as a poetic and artistic whole, and must have been added by Mozart out of mere conformity to old dramatic usage, which assembles and disposes of all the surviving characters of a piece in the last scene.

There is great room for melodramatic nonsense and diablerie in this judgment scene, in which the theatres have full license. But if the orchestra be complete and efficient, there is no possibility of travesty-ing or perverting the sublime and terrible intention of the music, which from the moment that the statue enters is enough to freeze one's blood, and pre-occupies all avenues of sense or consciousness with supernatural and infinite suggestions. And yet does Music's sweet and faithful prophecy of reconciliation, like the "still, small voice" out of the inmost heart of things, still reach us somehow through it all!

The reader, who has followed us through this review of "Don Giovanni," clinging always to the musical thread of interpretation, will find himself as little able as ourselves to sympathize with the regret so frequently expressed, that Mozart should have prostituted his genius in this composition by the false marriage of so much divine music with an unworthy subject. We believe the marriage was a true one. He did not merely cater to a low, licentious taste, in the selection of this story. Never was a choice made more heartily. Or, if he did not himself choose the plot, yet he fell in most heartily, and as it were by a providential correspondence, with the invention of Da Ponte;—as heartily as he afterwards fell in with the terrific images of the old Latin hymn, when he composed his own "Requiem," in writing a Requiem to order for another. In these two works the life and genius of Mozart found their highest expression. "Don Juan," written in the hey-day of his genial faculties, in his hour and scene of greatest outward success, in the city of Prague, where he was understood and loved as no where else, surrounded by devoted friends, and with an orchestra and troupe of singers worthy to be his interpreters, represented his sunny side, his keen sensibility to all refined delights of sense and soul, and his great faith in joy, in ecstasy, in all material and sensual harmonies. The "Requiem" bears to "Don Juan," as a whole, the same relation that the last scene of that opera bears to the preceding parts; it expresses the religious awe and mystery of his soul, his singular presentiment of death, his constant feeling of the Infinite. The opera in its last scene rises to a sphere of music kindred with the "Requiem;" there vibrated the same deep chords of his nature. It was the very subject of all others for him to pour the whole warm life-tide of his soul and music into, and thus lift up and animate a poor old literal fiction, that somehow strangely kept its hold upon the popular mind, with all its weight of grotesqueness, extravagance, vulgarity and tomfoolery, into a vivid drama of the whole impetuous, bewildered, punished, yet far-hoping and indomitable experiment of human life.

Here are the two elements, which seem in contradiction. Here, on the one side, is this bold, generous passion-life, with its innate gospel of joy and transport and glorious liberty: how well could Mozart understand it, and how eloquently preach it in that safe, universal dialect of Music, which utters only the heart-truth, and not the vulgar perversion of any sentiment! Here, on the other hand, is the stern Morality of being, frowning in conflict with the blind indulgence of the first. The first is false by its excess, by losing Order out of sight; while Order, sacred principle, in its common administration between men, in its turn is false through its blind method of suppression and restraint, blaspheming and ignoring the divine springs of passion, which it should accept and regulate. The music is the heavenly and prophetic mediator that resolves the strife.

Hence the music of "Don Giovanni" presents two sides, two parts in strongest contrast. Love, joy, excitement, freedom, the complete life of the senses, are the theme of the first part, represented in the keen and restless alternation of the Don's intrigues and pleasures;—a downright, unmis-trusting, beautiful assertion of the natural man;—and you have it all summed up to one text and climax in the first Finale, in the brief champagne sparkle and stormy transport of the little chorus: Viva la LIBERTA! As the burden of that part is LIBERTY, so the burden of the last part, the counter-text and focus, is ORDER, the violated Law; and as the central figure here stalks in the supernatural statue, stony and implacable. It is the story of life, the one ever-repeated although ever-varied drama of dramas; and it is set forth here, both sides of it, most earnestly in this sincere and hearty music, which in its own exhaustless beauty hints the reconciliation of the two principles, and to the last is true to the divine good of the senses and the passions, and to the presentiment of a pure and perfect state, when these shall be, not dreaded, not suppressed, but regulated, harmonized, made rhythmical and safe and more than ever lifesome and spontaneous by Law as broad and deep and divine as themselves.

Do we defy the moral of the matter, when we feel a certain thrill of admiration as Don Juan boldly takes the statue's hand, still strong in his life-creed, however he may have missed the heavenly method in its carrying out, and somehow inspired with the conviction that this judicial consummation is not, after all, the end of it but that the soul's capacity for joy and harmony is of that godlike and asbestos quality that no hells can consume it?

[From Graham's Magazine.]

MOONRISE IN MAY.

BY SARAH HELEN WHITMAN.

"Pure lilies of eternal peace
Whose odors haunt my dreams."—Tennyson.

Long lights gleam o'er the western world
Kindling the brown moss into gold—
The bright day fades into the blue
Of the far hollows, dim with dew—
The breeze comes laden with perfume
From many an orchard white with bloom,
And all the mellow air is fraught
With beauty beyond Fancy's thought.

Outspread beneath me, breathing balm
Into the evening's golden calm,
Lie trellised gardens thickly sown
With nodding lilies, newly blown,
Borders with hyacinthus plumed,
And beds with purple pansies gloomed,
Cold snow-drops, jonquils pale and prim,
And flamy tulips burning dim
In the cool twilight 'till they fold
In sleep their oriflammes of gold.

With many a glimmering interchange
Of moss and flowers and terraced range,
The pleasant garden slopes away
Into the gloom of shadows grey,
Where darkly green the churchyard lies
With all its silent memories:
Where the first violets love to blow
About the head stones, leaning low:
There from the golden willows swing
The first green garlands of the spring,
And the first blue-bird builds her nest,
By the old belfry's umbered crest.

Beyond, where groups of stately trees,
Waiting their vernal draperies,
Stand outlined on the evening sky,
The golden lakes of sunset lie,
With many-colored isles of light,
Purple and pearl and crysolite,
And realms of cloud land floating far
Beyond the horizon's dusky bar,
Now fading from the lurid bloom
Of twilight to a silver gloom,
As the fair moon's ascending beam
Melts all things to a holy dream.

So fade the cloud-wreaths from my soul
Beneath thy solemn, soft control,
Enchantress of the stormy seas,
Priestess of Night's high mysteries!
Thy ray can pale the north lights plume,
And where the restless stars illumine
With their far-palpating light
The holy cloisters of the night,
Thy presence can entrance their beams
And lull them to diviner dreams.

To thee belong the silent spheres
Of memory,—the enchanted years
Of the dead past,—the shrouded woes
That sleep in sculptural repose.

Thy solemn light doth interfuse
The magic world wherein I muse
With something too divinely fair
For earthly hope to harbor there,—
A faith that reconciles the will Life's mystic sorrow to fulfill—
A benison of love that falls
From the serene and silent halls
Of night, 'till through the lonely room
A heavenly odor seems to bloom,
And lilies of eternal peace
Glow through the moonlight's golden fleece.

[From the London Times.]

Royal Italian Opera: Mario and Bosio.

[As rumor tells us that we may now expect the great MARIO, the following notice from the Times of April 27, will be interesting; and not less so will be found the notice of our old favorite, BOSIO, who seems destined to be no less a favorite abroad than she has been with us.]

The first appearance of Mario brought another overflowing audience to the theatre last night. The opera was Bellini's I Puritani. It was in Arturo that Mario made his earliest impression upon the English public. He was Rubini's legitimate follower in the part. Though at first decidedly inferior to his celebrated predecessor, in the process of time his improvement was so remarkable that in the general opinion of connoisseurs, the Arturo of Mario in many respects equalled, and in some even surpassed, that of Rubini. How great has been Mario's progress of late years need not to be told. As an actor he has attained an eminence to which few tenors on the Italian stage have ever aspired; while, though he cannot challenge comparison with Rubini as a bravura singer, or as a master of ornament and floritura, he has acquired a perfection in the art of phrasing, a command of vocal declamation, and what may be justly termed a manliness of style, to which, with all his accomplishments, Rubini could hardly lay claim. These qualities, united to a voice which has rarely been approached in richness of tone, and a person singularly well adapted to the purposes of scenic illusion, have helped Mario to the position he now maintains as one of the most admirable dramatic singers of whom the history of the art makes mention.

The reception given to MARIO by the audience last night was such as is only accorded to a special favorite. The applause continued for some minutes, until it was at length hushed by those anxious to hear the "A te o cara." The manner in which the first stanza of this renowned quartet was delivered by the great tenor, proved to the satisfaction of the audience, that the keen winds of Russia had not frozen up the springs whence the melody is drawn that imparts such power and beauty to his voice. It was sung by Mario in Mario's best style; and the result was an unanimous encore for the quartet, the second stanza of which was repeated. Throughout the whole of the first act the singing of Mario was worthy of his reputation. In the duet with Henrietta, his delivery of the passage "Sarai salvi, o sventurata"—where Arturo vows to save the Queen at the risk of his life—was full of passion, while in that where Arturo defies his rival, Riccardo, his acting was as dignified and noble as his singing was instinct with sentiment. In the second act Arturo does not appear; but in the third, the beautiful air, "Cerca il sonno a notte," and the well known phrase, "Vieni fra le mie braccia," in the last duet with Elvira, gave two more opportunities to Mario, of which he took ample advantage. A slight abuse of the falsetto tones might have been objected to in the air, but this was more than redeemed by the exquisite feeling and refined expression of the whole. At the conclusion, Mario was recalled upon the stage, and enthusiastically applauded. It is of no slight consequence to the Italian Opera that so great a favorite has come back to the entire possession of those resources to which the theatre has been indebted for so many of its successes.

Mde. Bosio appeared last season in the part of Elvira, and was greatly admired. The music which Bellini has allotted to the heroine, is extremely well suited to this lady's voice and means. While in other operas she has been readily acknowledged as a vocalist of more than common accomplishments, in the Puritani she almost rises to the highest rank. Her performance of last night revived the favorable impression previously created. Her singing was artistic and finished throughout; and in the favorite polacca: "Son vergin vezzosa," she created a real fuore. The facility with which she executed the florid passages, was not less to be admired than the agreeable freshness of her voice, more particularly in the higher tones, which were produced, for the most part, with an ease and certainty of intonation that endowed them with a special charm. In the popular air, "Qui la voce," the qualities we have eulogized were united to the still rarer one of expression; and after the cabaletta, "Vien, diletto," which was executed with great brilliancy, although a little too slowly, Mde. Bosio was deservedly honored by a recall. An occasional tendency to sharpness of intonation was the only drawback to Mde. Bosio's performance. This is worth the most arduous study to conquer, since, until it is eradicated, perfection is impossible. The Giorgio of FORMES, and the Riccardo of RONCONI were worthy of the Puritani in the meridian of its popularity. The famous duet which terminates with the noisy cabaletta, "Suoni la tromba," could hardly have been better sung; and it was not the less pleasant from the absence of that vociferation which many singers consider indispensable to the character of the morceau, but which may, nevertheless, be dispensed with to advantage. Mlle. BELLINI took commendable pains in the small, but not unimportant part of Henrietta; and POLONINI's Walton was, as usual, careful and correct. The opera was received with the warmest applause from beginning to end.

POWER OF MUSIC.—Passing a house wherein a lady was discoursing rich music upon her Piano, we observed a German gazing intently in at the window, and apparently so absorbed in the music as to be forgetful of time and locality. The music grew wilder and deeper, and the hearer became excited and restless, walking to and fro upon the walk and yet listening with all the intensity of his sense. Presently the grand and rolling strains subsided into a plaintive and rich cadence, and when the music died away upon the chords, the German's pent up heart found relief in a full gush of tears. He turned away, entirely unconscious of our presence, and murmuring in low words to himself, was soon gone in the darkness. We, too, turned away with a tear of sympathy for the foreigner, and thankfulness for the stranger who had so stirred the heart by her exquisite performance. We blessed God that there were those in the world who could so interpret the divinity of music as to stir the fountain of tears and recall the memories of the Past; and our prayer is that for our helpmate and heart's choice we may have such an interpreter to minister to our life.—Sandusky Register.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

From my Diary. No. XXVI.

NEW YORK, May 7. So we are to have the "Midsummer Night's Dream" read by somebody or other, with the music of Mendelssohn, at Metropolitan Hall—at least so runs the announcement. Could the public once see this adequately performed I fear the readings would be but slimly attended. Few performances—and I have in mind Don Juan, Fidelio, Der Freyschütz, Figaro's Hochzeit, Oberon, &c.—have left such lasting impressions of delight on my memory as two performances of the Midsummer Night's Dream, with Mendelssohn's music, which I attended in the winter of 1850-51. And yet it was a translation of the play into German—but Schlegel was the translator. Two things I learned at those representations: first, that I had never conceived to the full extent the marvellous beauty and delicacy of the fairy portion of the play, and the extreme comicality of the farcical portions; secondly, that though I had heard the music performed at concerts by one of the finest orchestras in Europe, I had never fully appreciated before its wonderful adaptation to the text which it is intended to, and does really illustrate. "There is no use in talking." Not only is the Dream as a drama one of the most exquisite ever written, but as a mere fairy spectacle, it surpasses all that I ever saw on the boards of — Theatre or the — Museum, as much as Shakspeare surpasses Mr. Poet Dash, or Mendelssohn, Mr. Composer Blank, and I never see an announcement of the last new fairy spectacle, with its gaud and tinsel without a sigh, that so much expense should be thrown away upon trash. The machinery of the play proved to be very simple as it was performed on those occasions referred to. The drama was divided into three acts. The first, of two scenes, the room in the Palace, and the forest. The second, third and fourth acts, all are played without a change of scenery. The introduction to the second act (in which the fairies first make their appearance) is the famous scherzo, and would any one hear this as it should be heard, let him hear it from an adequate orchestra, in front of the drop curtain! At the end of Shakspeare's second act, we have the nocturno while Titania sleeps; between the third and fourth acts, another symphony from the orchestra, but the drop does not fall until the close of the fourth act. Now simple as the scenery is, and beautiful and attractive as it might be made, what is there to prevent the Midsummer Night's Dream from being produced in our cities, with a decent orchestra? Nick Bottom, Puck, and Titania, decently played, to say nothing of the music, ought to fill a house.

May 11. I have been looking over and pondering upon, for the half dozentime, the list of classic compositions which, according to Dwight's Journal, the provincials of Boston have heard in public during the past winter. Such a list for a city, which with its "surroundings" can count hardly a quarter of a million of inhabitants—it is astonishing! I doubt if Berlin itself, now the headquarters of classic music in Germany, can show a list much beyond this. There are points of difference to be considered however; the American city has no established opera, and has had but two orchestras—the German capital has one of the finest operas in Europe, and two or three other theatres in which operas are given, and, besides the great orchestra, some half a dozen smaller ones, varying in size from thirty down to half that number of instruments—all of which play, more or less frequently, symphonic music. The American city affords audiences of from two to three thousand, to the Germanians—the German city as many hundreds to Liebigs Concerts. The Music Hall is filled at the Concerts of the Musical Fund, and so is the Music Room of the Royal Theatre at those of the Royal Orchestra—the former holds some 3000, the latter perhaps 1800 auditors. In chamber music Boston is behind. She has one Quintette Club. Berlin has half a dozen similar clubs. In Oratorio music the reverse is true—Boston is superior in the number of concerts, and in the number of auditors. On the whole as an American I am proud that the musical annals of an American city can show such a catalogue as that in the Journal. Of course London with its two and a half millions of people "within the bills of mortality," with its enormous wealth, and its musical cultivation of centuries puts all other cities in the shade in the enormous amount of music publicly performed—I may add also in the expense attending it. But excepting London and Berlin, I doubt—after a careful perusal of the English and German periodicals—political, literary and musical during the past winter—whether any city on earth's surface can show such a set of the winter's programmes as the City of Notions—and mighty good notions some of them are.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 21, 1853.

Musical Festivals.

We have taken occasion both in the editorial and other columns of our last volume, to speak a word in favor of what seems to us the only practical mode of cultivating the musical taste of those who reside out of large cities to something higher and nobler than the simple psalm-tune, glee or anthem. We need not repeat our conviction that no people possesses more natural taste and talent for music than our own. The article of a correspondent upon "American Voices," which we published some months since, has met with general approval, and the reports constantly reaching us from abroad of the success of some of our citizens in developing their vocal powers, confirms the impression that no climate furnishes better vocal organs than the clear, bracing American atmosphere. Time was, when this point needed argument—it is a mark of progress that it is no longer necessary.

We take it for granted then that our American people have the talent, the natural taste, the vocal powers necessary to place them in the front rank of musical nations, but they do not yet hold that position. What can be done towards its attainment?

In this article we shall indicate but one of the many methods which might be adopted, but which we are convinced is perfectly practicable, and which has accomplished marvels in Germany, Switzerland, Belgium and England. Throughout our Eastern and Middle States there is an interval of a few weeks toward the close of summer, in which our people have a period of comparative leisure, and which has been chosen in this and other cities for musical gatherings and conventions. These conventions have, however, hitherto been almost wholly confined to the A B C of the art; nor could it well be otherwise, since most of the members of these conventions have come to them for the purpose of conferring upon, and learning the best modes of teaching, and have made no previous preparation for taking any part in the study of works of the higher class.

Now, no one can by any possibility attain to the high artistic culture necessary to the full enjoyment of the lofty language of music without the opportunity of studying—of hearing, at least—some one great masterpiece of the Art. And this he must know from an adequate performance of it by a properly cultivated chorus, by fair solo singers, and an orchestra. And this it is, which we would have every real lover of music enjoy an opportunity of doing. There is no difficulty in finding an orchestra whenever it will pay; nor do we imagine there would be any difficulty in obtaining the assistance of our best vocalists in a performance at which the excellence of the choral parts would make it a pleasure to assist. But herein lies the difficulty. We have never had a convention chorus of which one of two things has not been true: either the whole practice has been devoted to perfecting the performance of a few detached pieces, or the attempt to perform an entire work has partially failed from the want of adequate time for rehearsal. We would urge in the strongest terms possible, a change in this respect. We would have the choral parts so well performed as to make it possible to secure the assistance of competent solo singers and instrumental performers, so that our conventions may be truly Musical Festivals, at which each one who takes a part can have the opportunity of learning to appreciate the magnificent power, beauty and lofty thought of the composer, of whatever great work should be undertaken.

How can this be done? It seems to us a simple matter. Some three months hence our annual musical gatherings will take place. Under whose auspices, with what arrangements, we as yet know not. Let, however, those who are to direct the matter decide at once upon some work, which can be obtained in this country, Elijah, the Messiah, Samson, (for all these can now be bought at a small price,) and give notice that this will be the grand study of the ten days' gathering. Let those, in our country towns, who wish to take part in the meeting supply themselves with the work, and in the family circle, the choir-meeting, and the social gathering, make themselves familiar with the choral parts. They will then come to the convention with the lesson learned, and a few general rehearsals will make all smooth, and to move like clock-work—and thus our friends in the country may enjoy those higher musical pleasures, which now they know of only from the descriptions of others.

The Opera.

Since our last, the Sontag troupe has given us Don Pasquale for the second time, with even more spirit and completeness than on the first representation. The bewitching Norina was as fascinating as before, carried out with the utmost perfection of look, of gesture and expression to the very life; nor was the execution of the music of the part less entirely charming and satisfactory. The other characters were presented with unusually good effect, and the performance was one of the best of the season. Pozzolini gave the Serenade remarkably well, judiciously curtailing its proportions in the encore which the audience insisted upon—taking no refusal.

Then we have twice had Don Giovanni, and this has been the least successful in its presentation, of any of the operas that the Sontag troupe has given us. We would make every allowance for the necessary imperfections of a first performance, as we learn that more than one of the singers appeared for the first time, in this opera. And, that a first attempt to present this greatest of operas should be, in some points, unsuccessful, is not more than we may reasonably expect. Still we cannot but look back on these two performances as having given high enjoyment and satisfaction. SONTAG gave the music of Zerlina with great beauty—very simply, as it should be—but with rare perfection of expression, and was on both evenings, in excellent voice. The dress of the Zerlina is not so becoming to her as that of some other characters, and we cannot help recalling the perfect adaptation of the whole style of Boston both musical, dramatic, and personal, to the requirements of this part. Signora Borghese as Donna Anna, was not very pleasing. Her voice is hard and thin, and frequently of false intonation, though of considerable power. She acted the part with considerable effect, but rather making points than giving a complete representation of the whole. Signora Costini was the Donna Elvira, perhaps the best whom we have heard. She has a pretty face and graceful figure; with a voice of good quality and power. Both these ladies showed a considerable improvement on the second performance which was in every respect, superior to the first, especially in the choruses and orchestra, which, on the first evening, appeared to halt somewhat, but, on the second were entirely satisfactory. Badiali surprised us with the excellence of his Don Giovanni; though it may be a little heavy, still his conception of the character is refined and correct and his delivery of the music all that could be wished save perhaps, the champagne song, which had hardly the unbridled freedom and life that one expects. But the many-sided veteran BADIALI, is great also as Don Giovanni. What does he not do well? Rocco's Leporello was exceedingly well done; perhaps a little grotesque at times, and different from other Leporellos whom we have heard; but always prompt, correct, and effective throughout the opera. Pozzolini sang Il mio tesoro very well on both nights, and in other portions of his rôle, manifested a great improvement in the second representation.

The bawling of the prompter, was, on both nights, intolerable. He cried aloud and spared not any one of the singers or audience, for there was no one who did not hear every word of the opera, from beginning to the end, from the mouth of this odious functionary. Can this incessant prompting be necessary? But with all faults, no opera has been so enthusiastically received, or given such delight as the Don Giovanni. Its glorious perfections cannot be clouded or obscured by any ordinary deficiencies in the performance, and we must thank Madame Sontag, in the name of many, for the pleasure enjoyed in the performances of Don Giovanni.

Our Correspondence from Germany.

LEIPSIK, April 28, 1853.

MR. DWIGHT:—Dear Sir,—I find myself again in this city, after having spent several days in Pesth, Vienna, Prague, and Dresden. Dreyschock gave his last concert in Pesth on Thursday evening, at the theatre, on which occasion he played the well known Concerto by C. M. von Weber. The newspapers of this morning give a short notice of the concert, state that the house was very full, and that the pianist retired amidst the greatest enthusiasm—far surpassing that ever accorded to any other pianist, at least in that city.

At Vienna I found music in a very quiet state,—the principal attractions being Aldridge, the American tragedian, (called the "African Roscius,"), black as the ace of spades,—and Milanollo, the celebrated female violinist. Aldridge was performing a round of Shakspeare's characters with considerable success, and the papers of that city ranked him in the first class of tragic actors. He plays his parts in English, while the others are given in German.

I received an invitation to hear Milanollo, and I must confess that her performance on the violin was astonishing. Her execution is wonderful, and her taste, so far as regards feeling and expression, is very superior,—but the compositions she selects are far from classical. She plays mostly light and brilliant pieces, which of course please the people generally, particularly those not practical musicians, and who do not possess cultivated ears; and perhaps it is to this style of pieces that she is indebted for her great popularity. Her tone is round, strong, and full, and she plays very even and clear; whatever she undertakes is performed in a masterly manner, that gives evidence of severe practice. She draws crowded houses, and I have been told that she has already fiddled quite a fortune, which no one will deny is fiddling to some purpose. She is about twenty-five years of age, not particularly beautiful, but intelligent—like all musicians—modest and retiring in her manners, &c., &c. . . . While in Vienna I attended an opera, written by a modern composer, whose name I have forgotten, and was much pleased with the performance, but not with the music. The orchestra, however, was very fine. The Emperor and other distinguished characters were scattered among the first circles and private boxes.

In Dresden I went to an evening musical party, at the residence of Professor Wieck, father of the well-known pianists, Clara Schumann and Marie Wieck. Among other musical entertainments of the evening Marie favored us with some select compositions from Chopin, Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Schumann, and others. She had just returned from Berlin, where she played with great success for several weeks. She possesses extraordinary talent; reads the most difficult compositions at sight, and transposes them into any desired key, with perfect ease and facility. Her touch is strong and distinct, and at the same time very elastic. She plays with much grace and expression, and with sureness and correctness; her great forte is in classical music, which she plays most beautifully. She also played several pieces arranged for four hands, assisted by a younger sister, who is also quite a lionne. Mr. Heller, the composer, was also present. During the evening we were much entertained by Prof. Wieck, who was full of his jokes and funny stories. On the whole, we had a very pleasant time, and heard as good music as can be heard anywhere. I only wish that I knew of an American lady who is capable of performing the music of our most classical and distinguished composers in the same style I heard it performed in the house of Prof. Wieck, by his truly talented daughters.

I arrived in Leipsic on the 25th inst, and found the city in perfect confusion, crowded with merchants from all parts of the world, who are present to attend the great annual Fair. The Book and Music Fair takes place this week, and there are few book or music publishers in Germany who are not here. Littolf, the pianist and composer, who is now a music dealer, is also here. I had the pleasure of meeting him at the house of Concert-Meister Raymond Dreyschock, where I heard him just run over the "old familiar chest," but did not hear him enough to enable me to form any opinion of his playing. He was much surprised, as well as pleased, to learn that his great concerto had been performed in Boston. I took the liberty of informing him that Boston was getting to be one of the most musical cities in the world, which opened his eyes with astonishment.

I also met Mr. William Mason, the American pianist, of Boston. He has now gone to Weimar, where he intends to remain several months, in company with the great Liszt.

Papita, the Spanish dancer, is creating quite an excitement in Leipsic. I saw her last evening, and I must confess that I never saw any one jump so high before,—more than that I was unable to appreciate, except her beauty, which is decidedly above par.

I remain sincerely yours,

NATHAN RICHARDSON.

FRANKFORT-AM-MAIN, April 25, 1853.

An opportunity of seeing a few numbers of your interesting paper afforded me by my friend H. reminded me of my promise to drop you a line now and then. This city is not one of the most musical in Germany, but as I did not arrive here until the musical season was nearly over, it will not make so much difference with me, as I do not intend to remain here but a few months. The two principal musical associations in Frankfort are the Museum and the Philharmonic Society. The former embraced originally in the plan of its organization, not only musical performances, but also lectures, recitations, and other literary exercises. The latter, however, have been almost entirely given up. At the last concert, between the parts an essay on Shakspeare's play of Coriolanus, illustrated by extracts was given. The society also presented the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven without the vocal parts. I took particular pains to tell some of my German friends that in Boston this Symphony had lately been brought out entire.

The Philharmonic Society is composed almost entirely of amateurs. Nothing new has been given by this association since I have been here.

The Cecilian Verein, an association of ladies and gentlemen, at their last concert performed the Oratorio of David by KLEINE. This composer has produced several others oratorios. He was a celebrated teacher of harmony. His Oratorio of David is founded on a different set of incidents from the oratorio of the same name by Neukomm. It turns on the battles between David and Absalom and the death of the latter. This piece has nothing very marked in its musical character; it lacks the brilliant instrumentation of the modern oratorio writers without having much of the originality and force of Handel and the older composers. The Cecilian Verein is the principal vocal society in Frankfort and numbers about one hundred members. The performance of the oratorio (as far as the choruses were concerned) was almost unexceptionable. These three associations, are conducted by Herr Messer, a very accomplished musician and director. Judging from what I saw at a rehearsal, he would be considered in America, rather severe in his manner of drilling the chorus and the orchestra—but the ability and thorough knowledge of his business which he shows in many different ways, would inspire great confidence in those who are under his direction.

The orchestra connected with the theatre, at a concert for their benefit, recently given, brought out in the first part a hunting symphony by F. Kettl, Director of the Prague Conservatory. The subject is a hacknied one and I am convinced that it will require more talent than this composer possesses to spiritualize a subject so inappropriate (as it seems to me) for a symphony. It is hardly necessary to give you an outline of the "incident!" it was the old routine of the departure, the hunt, the return, &c. In the finale, the composer, by a grand flourish on the trombones deliberately changed the time and introduced a movement in polka time: this was certainly a new feature to me in symphony movements, and it had almost a ludicrous effect. In the second part was presented a new concert-stück by Niels W. Gade for four solo voices with orchestra and piano forte. This Spring fantasie is bright and sparkling with beautiful thoughts and it has a freshness and naturalness about it which is truly charming. Judging from some criticisms in the English papers, it seems as if there was some effort to write down the composer. But from what I saw and heard of musical criticisms in London I suspect there may be some obstinacy in the matter.

The opera company at the Frankfort theatre is a very respectable one. However, the different members of the company from the chorus singers to the prima donna have a chronic tendency to sing out of tune. The primo basso has it badly. I have lately "sat through" the Tannhäuser by Wagner. This being my first experience in the "broken crockery school" of your Leipsic Correspondent, I must hear it again before I can make up my mind about it. My present impression is that I should like the piece much better without the music than with it. Herr Andre, the German tenor, has just commenced an engagement here. I have seen him once in the Prophète. He hardly comes up to my expectations, but is certainly a fine artist. He has since appeared in "Martha." The popular taste, even in Germany does not entirely reject taking melodies" like those in "Martha," for I should that Von Floßow was played more by the bands and whistled more by the boys than almost any other opera writer. G. W. P.

MUSIC ON THE COMMON. We observe that an order has at last passed the Common Council providing that there shall be music on the Common on two evenings a week during the months of June, July and August. The announcement will give great satisfaction to those of our readers who reside in the city; and, if the music is such as it should be, such as the present advanced state of the public taste demands and requires, it will be the means of attracting to the city not a few of the suburban inhabitants. But the music must be good; and not such as we had ten years ago, which was nothing but marches and quicksteps, and those not of the best. The opportunity must not be lost of giving the people an opportunity of hearing the very best music that can be given, in this way.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

MR. CARL GARTNER, (known as an effective orchestra player with the Germanians) gave, on Wednesday, the first of a contemplated series of Afternoon Rehearsals at the Music Hall.

His orchestra is composed of some twenty-four members, selected from our resident musicians, and the orchestra of the opera, and played some selections of popular music in a manner which gave promise of better things. Mr. Gärtner is by no means our beau ideal of a conductor: his gestures and attitudes being outré and extravagant to the last degree. The quiet composure of Bergmann or Eckert, is more agreeable to an audience, and more effective with the orchestra. The audience was small, but will no doubt increase at future performances.

MR. KEYSER'S CONCERT. We regret to state that in consequence of Mr. Keyser's indisposition, his Concert announced for Saturday evening, will be postponed for one week. But whenever it comes off, the veteran, we are very sure, will not be forgotten by his numerous friends.

On Monday last the members of the Dorchester Singing Society presented to their leader, Mr. CHAS. ANSORGE, a handsome gold watch. Appropriate speeches were made and several choruses were sung. This Society started last October with seven members, and consists now of fifty-seven singers and about thirty honorary members.

Miscellaneous.

MORE OPERATIC ROBBERY.—It seems that Mario and Grisi have contracted with Mr. Hackett to visit this country in the autumn.—The engagement is for the cities of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington. The performances are to be three in each week—probably two operas and one concert. It is stated that the two together are to receive $2,500 for every night of their performance, and it will take over $1,000 more for additional force; and the contractor will want to make another $1,000, so that from $3 to $5 a ticket must be charged. We enter our protest in time, to this extortion. It is time the American public should stop the ridiculous system which originated with the Lind mania under Barnum.—Newark Mercury.

Let Mr. Hackett take a timely warning from the fate of Mr. Le Grand Smith. The remedy for this extortion must be found in having larger theatres, large enough to hold audiences which shall be paying audiences at moderate prices; and singers must be paid like other people. The European standard is not for us, and not to be followed by those who come among us, and we believe that the time has arrived for a thorough change to be brought about in this matter.

PORTLAND.—The Portland Transcript announces that SONTAG will not visit that city, as expected, and consoles itself thus:—

"And so we have to add the name of Sontag to the list of delinquent songstresses.—Lind, Alboni, and Sontag—a melodious trio of promise breakers. Well, if the great singers give Portland the go-by, we have the consolation of knowing that we have singers of our own, whose notes are everywhere at premium. If they can live without us, we can without them."

A new Musical Society, called the "Sangerbund," composed entirely of Germans, has been established at Alexandria, Va. Mr. Rasche is Director; Mr. Pfluger, President; Mr. Fuchl, Secretary; Mr. Shierstein, Treasurer.

The "Prophète" was given at St. Petersburg, for the first time, on the 5th of March. The whole of the court was present. Mario and Viardot Garcin exerted themselves to the utmost, and made the representation pass on in the most brilliant manner. The skating scene was very remarkable. It would have been thought, in this land of ice, it would have been managed to perfection; not so, scarcely any of the corps de ballet being able to keep upon their legs, and tumbling about in the most ridiculous confusion.

London.

The sixth concert of the Harmonic Union took place last night at Exeter Hall, under the conductorship of Mr. Benedict. The following programme was performed:—

PART I.
Cantata—"Leonora".....	Macfarren.
Overture—"Demetrius".....	Cusins.
Selection—"Acis and Galatea".....	Handel.
Concerto: Pianoforte—Miss A. Goddard.....	Benedict.
PART II.
Ode—"Alexander's Feast".....	Handel.

Mr. G. A. Macfarren's musical version of Burger's celebrated ballad of Leonora, which was so finely translated by Mr. Taylor, of Norwich, in the Monthly Magazine, and subsequently by the Hon. Mr. Spencer, Scott, and others, was a production highly creditable to the directors of the Harmonic Union. It would have been performed last year at one of the Philharmonic Concerts had not circumstances prevented the fulfilment of the pledge which was made in the programme of intentions. The nature of the ballad, which has not only been frequently translated into English, but as often pictorially illustrated, is well known, and the apostrophes of the unhappy heroine, whose chagrin at the non-appearance of her lover finds vent in rebellious imprecations against the justice and wisdom of Heaven, are as familiar as "household words" to the readers of Sir Walter Scott, whose William and Helen is as popular in this country as the original poem is in Germany. At one of the concerts last year of the Royal Academy of Music, Mr. Macfarren's cantata was attempted, but with cruel wrong to the composition, for it was performed with the most mischievous and execrable inaccuracy, the students knowing very little of what they were about or else too inexperienced to deal with such a labor. The ballad is set for solo voices, with choruses, most of them of a complicated and elaborate character, full of Mendelssohnian color, and highly picturesque and suggestive. Mr. Benedict, who appeared to have taken considerable pains in the preparation of last night's performance, deserves, in many respects, to be praised for the results which he achieved; though much still remained undone. The difficulties of the cantata are very onerous. The chorus singers are often charged with passages of great intricacy, requiring a very intimate knowledge of the notes, as well as that immediate promptness of delivery from which the sentiment of the moment derives its force and meaning. The task both upon the vocalists and the instrumentalists is immense, and it was hardly to be wondered at if the first delivery was more or less wanting in clearness and intelligibility. The music is purely dramatic; and its character in this respect we have already indicated. It consists of an overture, or rather introduction, in F minor, followed by choruses in C and E flat, of which the advent of the soldiery, the rejoicings of the crowd, and the restless search of Leonora for her lover, are the themes. The dialogue between the heroine and mother in which the former imprecates and the latter soothes, is expressed in a duet graphically alternating between D minor and G major. A nocturne in B flat, deliciously written for the instruments, forms an episode of great beauty, and prefaces the arrival of Wilhelm, and introduces a duet for bass and soprano voices, chiefly in A, in which the spectre invites the maiden to accompany him. The principal section of the cantata then takes place—namely, that devoted to "the ride." In this Mr. Macfarren's powers as a musical scenist are very happily disclosed. The chorus, principally in F sharp minor, which describes the onward rush of the spectral horseman, with all its fantastic concomitants, is highly characteristic, and replete with felicitous strokes of wild and supernatural imagery—the short chorus in D flat, the dirge of the phantom mourners, intercepting the ghostly progress of the "ride" with striking effect. The final apparition of the skeleton is portrayed in a choral recitative, in which the terrible phenomena conjured up by the poet are painted by a series of chromatic modulations, followed by a soprano solo and chorus, in F, the more open and purer complexion of which typifies the influence of the heavenly grace, and close the cantata with grandeur and sublimity. The principal vocalists were Madame Macfarren, Herr Standigl, and Miss Louisa Pyne. Mr. Macfarren, who was seated in the body of the hall, was loudly called for, and upon ascending into the orchestra was received with the most deafening and enthusiastic cheers.—Herald, April 26.

THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—Gulielmo Tell was repeated on the 16th, with increased effect; and won even new honors upon its third representation on the 19th. On the 21st, the Opera was Norma; and this was the occasion for the re-appearance of the universal favorite, Mad. Grisi. She met with the welcome which was to be anticipated from a crowded house. On the 26th, Mario appeared in I Puritani (his first appearance this season)—on the 28th, the first extra night, William Tell. Verdi's new opera Rigoletto is announced.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—It was decided yesterday that Her Majesty's Theatre will not open this season. Everything was arranged up to the last moment. Lord Ward, the noble and spirited entrepreneur, had come forward with the utmost liberality; Signor Puzzi, his representative, had secured a first-rate company on the most advantageous terms; and everything began to look well and encouraging for the speculation, and for the four or five hundred people, the great majority of whom depended upon it for their daily bread, when, at the eleventh hour, the whole plan was rendered abortive by the self-opposition of certain individuals less wise than short-sighted.—London Mus. World, Apr. 30.

DWIGHT'S Journal of Music.

A Paper of Art and Literature.

VOL. III.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1853.

NO. 8.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

TERMS....TWO DOLLARS PER ANNUM, (IN ADVANCE.)

CITY Subscribers can be served at their houses by the further payment of fifty cents per annum.

☞ For Rates of Advertising, see last page.

POSTAGE, if paid in advance, for any distance within the State, thirteen cents a year; if not in advance, twenty-six cents. To all places beyond the State, double these rates.

J. S. DWIGHT,.....EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

☞ OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St.

By REDDING & CO., 8 State St.

" GEO. P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row.

" A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.

" DEXTER & BROTHERS, 43 Ann Street, N. Y.

" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 722 Broadway, N. Y.

" MASON & LAW, 23 Park Row, New York.

" GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.

" G. ANDRE, 229 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St., Balt.

" HOLBURN & FIELD, Cincinnati, O.

" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Persons willing to become Agents for procuring subscribers, especially Music-Dealers and Teachers, are invited to correspond with the Editor, as above. Satisfactory references required, and liberal commissions allowed.

☞ Back numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Also BOUND copies of Vols. I. and II. at prices varying from $2.50 to $3.50.

SPONTINI.

From the French of HECTOR BERLIOZ. (Concluded.)

His entrance into the Institute was most nobly done, and, it must be confessed, one that reflected great honor upon the French musicians. All those who might have taken a position in the ranks felt that they must yield to this great genius, and on retiring joined their votes to those of the entire Academie des Beaux Arts. In 1811, Spontini married the sister of our celebrated manufacturer of pianos, Erard. The attentions with which she surrounded him, contributed not a little to calm the irritation and to soothe the sorrows of which his nervous nature, and too real motives had rendered him the prey during the latter years of his life. In 1842, he made a pious pilgrimage into his native land, where he founded, with his own funds, several benevolent establishments.

Latterly, in order to escape the sorrowful thoughts which beset him, he determined to undertake another journey to Marjolati. He arrived there, and stood beneath that deserted roof where seventy-two years previous he had first seen the light; he reposed there several weeks meditating upon the long agitations of his brilliant but stormy career, and suddenly breathed his last, loaded with glory, and covered with the benedictions of his compatriots. The circle was closed; his task was accomplished.

Notwithstanding the honorable inflexibility of his artistic convictions, and the solidity of the motives of his opinions, Spontini, whatever may have been said of him, allowed of discussion up to a certain point; into which he entered with that ardor manifest in every production of his pen; yet he sometimes yielded with much philosophy, when he was at the end of his arguments. One day, reproaching my admiration for a modern composition, which he esteemed but little, I succeeded in giving him some very good reasons in favor of this work of a great master who was not a favorite of his. He listened with surprise; then with a sigh, he exclaimed: Hei mihi, gratis est! Sed de gustibus et coloribus non est disputandum. He wrote and spoke the Latin language with great fluency, and frequently employed it in his correspondence with the king of Prussia.

He has been accused of egotism, violence, and harshness; but, taking into consideration the incessant hatred of which he has been the butt, the obstacles which he has had to overcome, the barriers which he has been obliged to break through, and the tension which this almost continual state of warfare must have produced in his mind, it may be, perhaps, permitted to evince some astonishment that he should have remained as companionable as he was; particularly if one bear in mind the immense value of his creations, and his conscience with regard to them; in comparison with the inferiority of most of his adversaries and the lack of elevation in the motives which guided them.

Spontini was not a musician properly speaking; he did not belong to the class of those who produce music from themselves, and who write without finding it necessary that an idea emanating from another should give rise to their inspiration. Therefore, he would not have succeeded, I think, in quatuor, nor in symphony. The grace and charm of his dancing airs; the majesty and the brio of certain parts of his overtures are, doubtless, incontestable; but they do not prevent one from seeing that he never attempted high instrumental composition.

He was, above all, a dramatic composer, whose inspiration increased with the violence of the passions which he had to depict. Hence the pale coloring of his first scores, written to puerile and vulgar Italian libretti; hence the insignificance of the music which he applied to that mean, cold and false style of which the opera-comique of Julie is so perfect a model; hence the ascendant movement of his thought in the two fine scenes of Milton—that in which the blind poet deploras the misfortune which has deprived him forever of contemplating the marvels of nature; and that in which Milton dictates to his daughter his lines upon the creation of Eve, and her appearance amid the calm splendors of Eden. Hence, in fine, the prodigious and sudden explosion of the genius of Spontini in La Vestale, that shower of burning ideas, those heartfelt tears, that rippling of noble, touching, proud and threatening melody, that so warmly colored harmony, those modulations so new in the theatre, that young orchestre, that truth, that profoundness of the expression, (I always insist upon this point), and that luxury of grand musical images, so naturally presented, imposed with so magistral an authority, and clasping the thought of the poet with so much force, that one cannot believe that the words to which they are adapted could ever be separated from them.

There are, not involuntary faults, but certain harmonic harshnesses intentionally introduced into Cortez; in Olympie, this style of harshness is, to me, very magnificent. Only, the orchestra, so richly sober in La Vestale, becomes complicated in Cortez, and is overburdened with various and useless designs in Olympie, so much so as, at times, to render the instrumentation heavy and confused.

Spontini had a certain number of melodic thoughts for every noble expression; when once he had scanned the circle of ideas to which these melodies were predestined, their source became less abundant; and this is why there is not so much originality to be found in the melody of the works, both heroic and passionate, which succeeded La Vestale and Cortez. But what are these vague reminiscences, compared with the barefacedness with which certain Italian masters reproduce the same cadences, the same phrases, and the same pieces, in their innumerable scores? The orchestration of Spontini, the embryo of which is to be found in Milton and in Julie, was a pure invention of his; it proceeded from none but him. Its special coloring is owing to a use of wind instruments, if not technically skilful, at least very learnedly opposed to that of the stringed instruments. The part, new as well as important, confided by the composer to the altos, sometimes taken together, and sometimes divided like the violins into first and second parts, contributed greatly to characterize this instrumentation. The frequent accentuation of the feeble times of the measure; dissonances, turned aside from their path of resolution in the part in which they were heard, and resolving themselves into another part; broad designs of bass arpeggios, of all sorts of dimensions, majestically modulating beneath the instrumental mass; the moderate, but excessively ingenious use of the trombones, trumpets, horns, and cymbals; the almost absolute exclusion of the extreme notes of the sharp scales of octave flutes and clarinets, impart to the orchestra of the grand works of Spontini a majestic physiognomy, an incomparable power and energy, and often a most poetic melancholy.

As to modulations, Spontini was the first who introduced into dramatic music enharmonic modulations, and those called foreign to the principal tone. But if they are frequent in his works, they always originate in, and are put forth with an admirable art. He never modulates without plausible subjects. He is not like those restless and sterile musicians who weary with tormenting in vain a certain tone, change it in the hope of better luck. Several of the eccentric modulations of Spontini are, on the contrary, lightning-flashes of genius. I must place at the head of all, the abrupt passage from the tone of E \flat to that of D \flat in the soldiers' chorus in Cortez: "Quittons ces bords, l'Espagne nous rappelle." At this unexpected change of tone, the listener is suddenly impressed in such a manner, that his imagination clears, in a leap, an immense expanse, that it flies, so to speak, from one hemisphere to another, and, forgetting Mexico, it follows in Spain the thought of the revolted soldiers. Let us cite another, which occurs in the trio of prisoners, in the same opera, at these words:

Une mort sans gloire
Termine nos jours,

the voices pass from G minor, to A \flat major: and also the astonishing exclamation of the high-priest, in la Vestale, where his voice suddenly falls from the tone of D \flat major to that of C major, at these words:

Vont-ils dans le chaos replonger l'univers?

It is also Spontini who invented the colossal crescendo, of which his imitators have only given a very microscopic diminutive. Such is that of the second act of la Vestale, when Julia, raving, and no longer resisting her passion, feels terror join and increase with her love in her distracted bosom:

Où vais-je?... ô ciel! et quel délire
S'est emparé de tous mes sens?

Un pouvoir invincible à ma perte conspire;
Il m'entraîne.... il me presse.... Arrête! il en est temps!

This progression of groaning harmony, interrupted by dull pulsations, increasing in volume, is an astonishing invention; the whole value of which can only be appreciated at the theatre, and not at the concert. It is the same in the first finale of Cortez, when the Mexican women, wild with terror, fling themselves at the feet of Montezuma:

Quels cris retentissent!
Tous nos enfants périssent!

I have already mentioned the finale of la Vestale. How shall I speak of the duo between Telasco and Amazily, which commences with, perhaps, the most admirable recitative ever written; of that between Amazily and Cortez, in which the warlike flourishes of the Spanish army are so dramatically mingled with the passionate adieux of the lovers; of the majestic air of Telasco: "ô patrie! ô lieux pleins de charmes!" of that of Julia, in la Vestale; "Impitoyables dieux!" of the funeral march; of the air at the tomb, in the same opera; of the duo between Licinius and the high-priest, a duo which Weber declared to be the most wonderful he ever knew? How shall I speak of the triumphal and religious march, in Olympie; of the chorus of priests of Diana, in consternation when the statue veils itself; of the extraordinary scene and air in which Statira, sobbing with indignation, reproaches the hierophant with having given her for a son-in-law the assassin of Alexander; of the choral march of the cortege of Telasco, in Cortez: "Quels sons nouveaux," the first and only one ever written in $\frac{3}{4}$ time: of the bacchanale of Nurmahal; of those innumerable recitatives, as fine as the finest airs, and of a truth sufficient to drive to despair the most skilful masters; of those slow dancing airs, which by their soft and dreamy inflections, invoke the sentiment of voluptuousness by poetizing? I am lost in the meanderings of that great temple of expressive music, in the thousand details of its rich architecture, in the dazzling fouillis of its ornaments.

The unintelligent, frivolous or vulgar crowd abandons it now, and refuses or neglects to sacrifice therein; but for certain persons, artists and amateurs, in greater numbers than one would believe, the goddess to whom Spontini raised this vast monument is always so beautiful, that their fervor knows no cooling. And I do as they do, I prostrate myself, and I adore! w.

Julius Knorr's Instructive Works on Playing the Piano.

II.

After so very many Methods for the Piano have appeared, the complaint, that there exists no real method for the teacher, may seem almost ridiculous to many. And yet so it was. There was no guide for the teacher of music on the Piano.

The teacher of languages finds prepared for his use works, containing rule and example in close connection. Series of readers and selections made up with the greatest care from the works of the best writers give the teacher ample opportunity to use the course thus laid out for the more effective explanation of the theoretical rules of the grammar and at the same time for awakening and fostering the taste, the moral and mental capacities of his pupils. And so, from teaching the A B C, and spelling, up to composition, and artistical declamation of mother or foreign tongue, the teacher finds prepared for him a rational method, and the pupil a progressive, well-ordered series of studies and exercises. And yet almost nothing of the kind has been done for the teacher of music on the Piano. All the methods leave off at a certain point. Scarcely any tells the teacher which pieces of musical composition to employ as repetition of and supplement to the mechanical exercises. None tells the teacher how to use them in order to awaken and foster the taste of the student, &c. The methods of the different periods were almost nothing but a collection of finger-exercises or trash pieces. And those few that cover their entire ground belong to a former period, as for instance, C. Ph. Em. Bach's "Essay on the true manner of playing the Piano," or S. Adam's "Methode pour le Piano." Hummel in his great Method, has recommended the practice of some few compositions at different stages of the instruction. But this fragment of a guide for the teacher has not even found a place in the French edition of the book (and whether it has in the Italian and English the writer does not know). Czerny's "Letters to a Young Lady" also contain some hints as to certain works to be studied at certain times. But a complete guide for the teacher, where the young teacher would find laid out for him a course of instruction, from the first beginning up to final perfection, has not existed. Such a guide, to be valuable, must not only give a list of finger-exercises and of pieces, but it must mark out the time when exercises and pieces, what exercises and pieces, and how they should be studied by the pupil to the greatest advantage. It is only valuable also when it is complete; reaching up to and including the modern school; when it gives a full and clear synopsis of all the material which in course of time has accumulated to be conquered by the student.

Such a guide for the teacher was perhaps not needed, some one might say, otherwise the want might have been supplied long ago. True, it was not needed for a certain class of teachers, among whom as in one of the old Indian and Egyptian castes, the science of teaching with all the appurtenances of thorough knowledge of the material was hereditary from teacher to pupil. And this may be one of the main reasons why such a guide has not been written long ago by one of the many, yet comparatively few, who could have done it. Just those did not feel the need of such a compendium of knowledge which they possessed in full.

We have not room to prove why such a guide was more necessary for instruction in music, and most particularly for the Piano, with its vast literature, with its enormous mechanical difficulties than for any other art or science. It may be sufficient to consider for a moment the actual state of things. Look over almost any of the music books of pupils that have taken lessons on the Piano for some time and in ninety out of a hundred cases the contents will be almost essentially the same common-place music, waltzes and polkas and reels and cotillons and marches and quicksteps, composed by people so obscure and in a manner so puerile, that one might pity the paper that was blotted by them. And when we find this state of things prevailing all over the country, with few, very few exceptions, is there any one yet that asks, whether such a guide for the teacher is necessary? When the pupil, after expending time and money for years in many, very many cases, does not number one single good piece in all his music books, when his abilities are not sufficient to play even an easy piece of Mozart or Haydn at sight; when Beethoven is a name unknown entirely except perhaps by his "Desir-waltz" (which is not by him); when the pupil's taste does not appreciate anything above a "Salut à Washington" or F. Beyer's "Rondinettes Americaines," &c.; when—but how many whens could be added—is it not evident that something is wanting to remedy such a crying evil? An evil for which, and the writer says it unhesitatingly, the teachers alone are to be held responsible? Indeed, for a great number of our teachers the works of Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Weber, not to mention the great Johann Seb. Bach, seem not to be in existence.

The above facts are strong enough to prove to every teacher and amateur, that some guide was and is necessary to give a more rational, methodical view of their profession to a great number of teachers. Such a guide exists, written in German by JUL. KNORR, under the title: "Methodischer Leitfaden für Klavierlehrer," (Methodical guide for teachers of music on the Piano.)* And Jul. Knorr, a perfect musician, a logical thinker and an experienced teacher was, if any one, the fit person to write such a work.

This work guides the teacher from the very outset of instruction up to the time when his pupil has attained the highest degree of ability, and gives him a list of pieces and études in successive order as to difficulty up to the most difficult finger feats of the modern virtuosi. The whole little book (it contains only 64 pages 16 mo) is divided into five divisions. The first treats in 17 sections, on 12 pages, of the very rudiments, much in the same manner as the first thirty-nine sections of A. E. Müller's Method, edited by J. Knorr (see first paper on J. K.'s instrumental works).

The sections 18–29 contain on page 13–36 the second of these divisions, the "First Period," in which the pupil is taught the notes and at once introduced to a series of instructive works (34 in all) by Diabelli, Czerny, Clementi, C. M. von Weber, Kähler, Moscheles, J. Schmitt, Beethoven, Haydn, &c., with practical notes to many of them. The whole is interspersed with the preparatory finger exercises for each progressive stage of difficulties; most of which are taken from the author's edition of "A. E. Müller's Method," or his "Materials." And it may be remarked here that the little book in question alone contains the key to the proper use of both those works. When we add, that the finger-exercises of the first period cover exercises on thirds, double trill, chord of the tonic played simultaneously, and as arpeggios, all the major scales in four different ways, as contained in the Method (see first paper), minor scales, &c., the intrinsic merit of such a method will appear the more clearly. And here we may also remark, that there is nothing to be found in the pieces recommended which has not been prepared by previous exercises. A very favorable contrast, when compared with the too common way of teaching, where the pupil never having enjoyed sufficient mechanical preparation is compelled to practice such mechanical difficulties from the pieces, the playing of which is thereby made a perfect drudgery instead of being an agreeable task and recreation.

The third division in sections 30–32 on pages 36–45 forms the transition to the "Second Period," and contains finger exercises with constant reference to Knorr's edition of A. E. Müller, Vol. II., and a list of pieces (17 in all) by Pleyel, Beethoven, C. Mayer, Czerny, H. Bertini, H. H.

Heller, &c. These three divisions contain everything calculated to ensure a thorough foundation of the pupil in the mechanical part of playing the Piano.

The Fourth division in sections 33–37 on pages 45–54, the "Second Period," opens with remarks on this subject, recommending the recapitulation and study of the whole of the author's "Materials" in order fully to prepare the pupil for his subsequent studies, musical elocution henceforth being the main object of instruction. An extensive list, mostly of valuable compositions by Hüntten, Herz, Czerny, C. Mayer, Hummel, Dussek, Mozart, Haydn, Clementi, Ries, Beethoven, Spohr, &c., (54 in all) gives an idea of the first (easier) part of the compositions of medium difficulty. The section 36—second (more difficult) half of the compositions of medium difficulty—contains in progressive order a list of the better études, which, as the author says, "are in general to be regarded as special supplements to the Method," by Al. Schmitt, Cramer, A. E. Müller, Czerny, C. Mayer, H. Herz, and of pieces (48 in all) by Weber, Field, Kalkbrenner, Henselt, Liszt, Döhler, Chopin, Robert Schumann, Moscheles, &c., with practical remarks to many of them.

The Fifth division in sections 38–40, on pages 34–64, the "Third Period," again opens with a list of pieces and études (47 in all.) Of études, only the best by Cramer, Al. Schmitt, Kalkbrenner, Ries, Clementi, Moscheles, which are to be preparing the way for Beethoven's (easier and first) works are recommended. The list goes on embracing compositions by F. Schubert, Onslow, Hummel, Moscheles, Czerny, Beethoven; sinfonies by Beethoven, Spohr, R. Schumann; and a number of overtures by Cherubini, von Weber, Spohr, Beethoven (Egmont, Fidelio, Coriolanus,) Mendelssohn (Midsummer-night's Dream, and Hebrides) in arrangement. The next section, after some introductory remarks contains another list of concert pieces with and without the accompaniment of an orchestra (39 in all) preparing the way again by Chopin's, Henselt's, Döhler's and Thalberg's Etudes, and comprising pieces by Liszt, Thalberg, H. Herz, Hummel, Beethoven, C. M. von Weber, J. S. Bach, Kalkbrenner, Moscheles, Dussek, Field, &c. In section 40, the little book closes with some valuable hints as to finishing touches which the pupil requires both in the mechanical and intellectual part of his Art.

This short synopsis will show that the work, however prominently the mechanical part of the Art is treated, is altogether unparalleled in musical literature. A thorough acquaintance with it will be found expedient to all teachers, and necessary to very many of the profession. If the pieces recommended are not all of the highest order, they are infinitely better than the trash called "sheet music," which is almost exclusively used in this country. And if the writer should have wished for more extensive selections from Haydn, Mozart, Clementi, Bach, Weber, &c., he is well aware that only the few would have been satisfied by such proceeding. Progress comes by degrees.

The writer therefore can only repeat his wish, expressed in the first paper, with regard to Knorr's edition of A. E. Müller's Method, viz: to see an English edition soon preparing by some enterprising publisher, and the work itself in the hands of every teacher. The writer feels sure, that this little book will work a revolution in the present manner of teaching. G. A. S.

WITH A GUITAR.

SHELLEY.

The artist who this idol wrought
To echo all harmonious thought,
Fell'd a tree, while on the steep
The winds were in their winter sleep;
Rock'd in that repose divine
On the wind-swept Apennine,
And dreaming, some of Autumn past,
And some of Spring approaching fast,
And some of April buds and showers,
And some of songs in July bowers;
And all of love; and so this tree—
O! that such our death may be!
Died in sleep, and felt no pain,
To live in happier form again;
From which, beneath Heaven's fairest star,
The artist wrought this loved guitar,
And taught it justly to reply
To all who question skillfully,
In language gentle as thine own,
Whispering, in enamored tone,
Sweet oracles of woods and dells,
And summer winds in sylvan cells:
For it had learnt all harmonies
Of the plains and of the skies,
Of the forests and the mountains
And the many voiced fountains,
The clearest echoes of the hills,
The softest notes of falling rills,
The melodies of birds and bees,
The murmuring of summer seas,
And pattering rain, and breathing dew,
And airs of evening, and it knew
That seldom-heard mysterious sound
Which, driven on its diurnal round,
As it floats through boundless day,
Our world enkindles on its way;—
All this it knows, but will not tell
To those who cannot question well
The spirit that inhabits it:
It talks according to the wit
Of its companions, and no more
Is heard than has been felt before,
By those who tempt it to betray
These secrets of an elder day.
But, sweetly as its answers will
Flatter hands of perfect skill,
It keeps its highest, holiest tone,
For our beloved friend alone.

HAFIZ.

[The recent re-appearance of our correspondent "Hafiz," suggests to us that it may not be amiss for us to prove his claim to the title which he assumes, and tell our readers who "Hafiz" is. We find in Cocks's Musical Miscellany the following article exactly to our purpose.]

Hafiz is a name of mystery to European ears. Who or what was Hafiz?

Hafiz is in fact a sort of generic term, meaning, amongst other significations, "a man of great memory,"—although, as generally used, it refers to one individual, whom we shall afterwards notice.

But, in order to define the bearer of this name, it will be necessary to premise some particulars respecting the Persian poets and their mode of writing; even at the risk of encumbering our columns with uncouth and unintelligible words.

There was, no doubt, a period when Persia had its national and patriotic songs like other countries; but the effect of oriental despotism is to extinguish that sentiment of ardent nationality in which such productions have their origin: and the songs of Persia have long been dedicated to the enervating topics of love and wine. The style and manner of the Persian poets have also extended to Hindostan, and entirely displaced those nobler productions, remains of which are to be found in the literature of the north-western parts of that country where freedom and independence found their last asylum.

* There is at present extant in English only a manuscript translation.

The poems of the Persian writers take the form of an ode, which is called, in the Eastern tongue, a Ghazel. In these Ghazels we find moral sentiments and complimentary allusions mixed up with the predominating themes before referred to. The Ghazel, it is said, should never consist of less than five beits or distichs, and should never exceed eighteen. If it exceed the latter number, it is called an elegy—in oriental phrase, a kasside. The term rabat or quatrain is applied to a composition of less than five lines. According to some, the Ghazel ought never to exceed eleven distichs.

The rhymes in these poems are under a very singular restriction. All the distichs of each Ghazel must rhyme throughout with the same letter; and this singularity is followed up, in the productions of the poets, by the still more quaint affectation of completing a series of Ghazels, or odes, to end in each of the letters of the alphabet in succession; thus the distichs of the first poem end all in alif (or a), of the second, in be (or b); and so on through the thirty-two letters of their alphabet.

A series of poems completed as described, with the distichs ending in every letter successively, is called a dican. This term dican, however, is not restricted to the sense just given, but is sometimes used to mean a complete collection of one author's works.

Now, when a poet had taxed his ingenuity and industry so far as to complete a dican or series of odes, with all the alphabetic endings as described, he was then deemed worthy of an honorary title; and the title by which he was distinguished was that renowned name we first referred to, namely, Hafiz. Several authors, Persian, Arabian, or Turkish, have been distinguished by this title; but, as we before said, it is generally understood to refer to one specific individual.

This individual—the Hafiz of fame—was named Mohammed Shems-ed-din. He was a native of Shiraz (the capital of that province which was the ancient Persia), a city whose name is familiar to readers of English poetry, from Col- lin's pathetic eclogue of the Camel-driver—

"Sad was the hour and luckless was the day,
When first from Shiraz' walls I took my way."

Shems-ed-din was contemporary with the warlike Timur or Tamerlane, and was much honored by the princes and great men of his time. He is said, however, to have been of a retiring disposition, and to have resisted the attractions of a court. His death is stated to have occurred in the 797th year of the Flight (the Hejira, or epoch of the Mohammedans), which corresponds with the year 1394, circa of the Christian era. A splendid monument was erected upon his tomb by the preceptor of the then reigning prince.

His poems were collected into a volume after his death. They are much admired in the East for "the sublimity of style, the variety of thought, the brilliancy of sentiment, and the elegance and ease of expression."

Persian poetry abounds in allegorical and complimentary allusions; and the Mohammedan readers of the poems of Hafiz (Shems-ed-din) pretend to find such a superabundance of obscure light in them, that they call them "the language of mystery."

The poets of the East are all distinguished by similar characteristics. "The style," says M. Villotier (who went to Egypt with Napoleon Bonaparte), "partly figured, partly simple, of their artificial language, injures materially the clearness of ideas, which, besides, are drowned in an ocean of useless words."

The late Thomas Moore had the most exquisite perception of the genuine beauties of Persian poetry, without any particular fondness for those defects enumerated above—unlike imitators in general, who are possessed with a morbid affectation of imitating those idiotisms which are real blemishes, and entirely ignore the spirit, wit, or judgment of their models. Moore, on the other hand, wrote poems which were so truly Persian, as, when translated, to be sung

"By moonlight in the Persian-tongue, Along the streets of Isfahan,"* being recognized as possessing all the sound characteristics of Eastern poetry, with few of the defects incident to the oriental style.

With regard to the music of the Persians, its tonality is identical with that of the Arabians. Indeed, M. Fétis says, justly enough, that it would be impossible to discern a difference between the one and the other but for the style of performance, which gives the Persian music a certain softness or sweetness, wanting in that of the Arabs, and which is due exclusively to the more advanced civilization of the former beyond the latter. On the subject of the music of the Arabs and other orientals, we may be able to throw together a few thoughts for some future occasion.

In the meantime, a translation de verbo ad verbum, of one of the odes or Ghazels of Hafiz may be not without interest to the writer of English songs.

Each verse consists of eight feet, alternately Iambes and Spondees—that is, it consists of one short syllable followed by three long syllables throughout.

Ela ya eiyuh es-saki edar kasan we nawilha
Ke ishk asan numud ewwel weli eftadi mushkelha

We give, next, the literal translation of the whole ode. Every one of the seven distichs of the ode ends not only in the letter alif, but also in the syllable ha.

Ho! come! O cup-bearer, carry round the cup and present it,
For love appeared pleasant at first, but difficulties have happened,

In hopes of the perfume which at length the zephyr shall diffuse from that forehead,
From her waving musky ringlets, how much blood will flow into our hearts.

Stain the sacred carpet with wine, if the master of the house commands thee,
For a traveller is not ignorant of the ways and manners of houses of entertainment;

For me, what room is there for pleasure in the bowers of beauty, when every moment
The bell proclaims "bind on your burdens."

The darkness of the night, and the fear of the waves and whirlpool are so dreadful,
How can they know our situation, the bearers of light burdens on the shore?

All my voluntary actions have tended finally to a bad name.

How can that secret remain concealed of which they make conversation?

If thou desirest tranquility, neglect not this advice, O Hafiz;

When thou shalt possess her thou lovest, bid adieu to the world and abandon it.

To understand these poems, some knowledge is requisite of Oriental customs. It must be understood all along that the use of wine is forbidden to Mohammedans: therefore, the whole ode is according to the religious sentiments of the writer himself impious. The first line is Arabic, and is borrowed entire from the Caliph Yezid, who, besides being a prince and a conqueror, was, like many of his distinguished countrymen, also a poet. This plagiarism on the part of Hafiz, a subsequent poet describes as "the lion snatching a bone from a hungry dog." The bell proclaiming "bind on your burdens," alludes to the signal for the departure of the caravan, which signal, before the use of bells, was given by the voice of a crier. The sacred carpet is the carpet used for prayer. The deference claimed for the commands of the master of the house is explained to refer to the etiquette which was observed in houses of entertainment, the heads of which were jocularly called "old wise men," or Peeri-Mughan—this being the name given, in the time of the fire-worshippers, to the priests who had the care of the sacred fire.

In order to illustrate the use made by the western poets of the poems of Hafiz, we subjoin, farther, a paraphrase of the first distich which we have given above.

Fill, fill the cup with sparkling wine,
Deep let me drink the juice divine,
To soothe my tortured heart;
For Love, who seemed at first so mild,
So gently looked, so gaily smil'd,
Here deep has plunged his dart.

Not much like the Persian original, it will be said; but such are the affectations (not to assume too much to ourselves) of our Western poetry.

The poem, of which we have given the translation above, is not without poetic merit; yet, after reading it, we can scarcely wonder that such lines as

There's a bower of roses by Bendemeer's stream,
And the nightingale sings in it all the day long, should, when translated into Persian, successfully compete with the indigenous poetry.

The licentiousness which the poetry of Hafiz suggests, seems, so far as at this distance of time we can judge, to have been in sentiment only, and not to have affected the life or manners of the poet. Indeed, his Eastern admirers find only mystical allusions to subjects of virtue and religion in his praises of love and wine. Still, on the ground of the character of his writings, an attempt was made to prevent his body being deposited with the remains of the faithful. It was finally resolved to open his poems for an augury, and to be guided by the passage first met with. The distich opened upon was

Oh! turn not your steps from the obsequies of Hafiz;
For, though immersed in sin, he will enter into heaven.

Mohammed Shems-ed-din was accordingly interred with due honors.

Ole Bull and his Colony.

OLE BULL'S Norwegian Colony is situated in Potter County, Pa. The principal town in the Colony, Oleona, contains already 700 inhabitants; the extent of the Colony embraces 140,000 acres. New-Norway is about 80 miles from Dunkirk, on Lake Erie; and by connecting it to Condersport by railroad, the branches of the Erie Railroad take you to Pittsburg, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York. OLE BULL has built himself a beautiful Norwegian cottage for his Summer residence. He proposes to establish a Polytechnic school in his Colony for the advancement of the arts and sciences generally, to be conducted by the most scientific men of Europe. His plan is to make it a civil and military school, to be open for the youth of the Union, and to connect the sciences with the arts. He desires to graduate an efficient corps to be devoted to the manufacture of arms, to draft new plans, and make reports concerning the improvements in arms and fortifications, to be enabled to inspect arms and cannon, and to know that they are made of the proper materials; and thoroughly to understand the science of pyrotechnics. An armory and a foundry are to be erected for practical purposes; and the best soldiers, artisans, and professors of Europe, employed for conducting the works. The corps, when graduated, to be received into the regular army as a new corps. The Government is to have the benefit of the result of all the discoveries in the arts and sciences, in return for which he asks the preference in all contracts for cannons, arms, ammunition, &c. The Institute is to be supported by a moderate sum in payment for the tuition of the students, and the professors, artisans, and workmen, besides receiving a salary, will be allowed to take shares in the joint stock company to be raised for building the works, and who will share pro rata in all contracts with the Government. This idea of the Norwegian is certainly a good one, and the Government should willingly lend its aid to the establishment of such an institution as would be open to every one, and in the power of all to receive its benefits and advantages. West Point has become an exclusive and aristocratical institution, and we greatly want an institution as proposed by OLE BULL, for the people at large. OLE BULL is a man of extraordinary talent and resources. He has that indomitable perseverance and energy which enables him to overcome all impediments which may be cast in his way, and contrary to the general opinion, his knowledge of the sciences extends vastly beyond horse hair and fiddle strings. He was born in Bergen, Norway, in 1810, and spent a portion of his youth in the mountains of his country, where he learned the wild mountain music, and during the war between Norway and Sweden, became familiar with guerilla warfare. His uncle, who was then the only editor in Bergen, was a great musical amateur, and soon discovered OLE BULL's musical talent. After studying at the Academy at Bergen, he was sent to the University of Christiania, where he received a classical education, and prepared himself for the legal profession. His musical talent was already wide spread at the University, and being persuaded to play at a charitable concert, on one occasion, he made his first debut before a public audience, and was triumphant. For this his professors set him back in his examination, and just before his second turn came to graduate, the leader of an orchestra and manager of a theatre, who was very ill, sent for OLE BULL, and told him that if he could not procure him to lead the orchestra the coming night, he was a ruined man. The appeal was not in vain—his sympathy and enthusiasm carried him away—he left the University to lead the orchestra, and never return. His father was a celebrated chemist, and a pupil of the distinguished Professor TROMSDORFF. He has also a brother, a celebrated chemist, who graduated at Bergen; and a younger brother who graduated with distinguished honors at the Polytechnic School at Hanover, Germany, receiving the highest diploma over eight hundred students.

* See p. 18, of Vol. I. enlarged, C. M. M.

OLE BULL participated in the revolution in Paris, in June 1832, and was badly wounded. He was also with Gen. JUSSUF, in Algiers, in 1846, and in the skirmishes with the Kabyles, mountain tribe of Arabs. JUSSUF was the French General who fought and won the battle of Smala, in Africa, against ABD EL KADER, and which the Duke D'AUMALE took the credit of. OLE BULL was also in the revolution in Paris of 1848. He has a magnificent residence on the Island of Andoe, near Christian Sand, the South point of Norway, which island he owns, with eight others near it. Some fifteen miles from Christian Sand is a beautiful valley of 160 miles long, which on account of the difficult means of access, has only of late years been discovered. It is inhabited by a semi-civilized people, who speak a different language from the Norwegians, and who dress in the wildest and rudest manner. They are well skilled in the arts, however, and their jewelry and silver ware are of the most ingenious make, resembling the old fashions of centuries ago. The climate is said to be as charming and as mild as Italy.

[From the London Musical World.]

Mendelssohn's Quartet in F Minor.

This Quartet, one of the most interesting, from circumstances no less than from beauty, of the enormous legacy of unpublished works that Mendelssohn left for his tardy executors to dole out to the world, with, to consider it at the best, the seeming indifference of ceaselessly lingering, uselessly protracted delay—this Quartet, that must be peculiarly dear to all who understand, and therefore necessarily love the music of Mendelssohn, since it is an epitome of whatever is most individual to, and therefore most fascinating in, the master—this Quartet is said to have been written at the time of the death of the composer's much-loved sister, a very few months before his own. All the spontaneity that is most eminently a characteristic of our author's music, all the passionate fervor in which no one that ever wrote has exceeded him, are evinced in this composition to an extent scarcely equalled in any of his other productions; while we see that the power of development, and the facility of construction, which essentially distinguish a master, in the beauty and originality of his ideas, prove his genius was exercised with that accustomed fluency which might be supposed to spring less from educational acquirement than from original instinct. The work presents every intrinsic evidence of being the result of impulse rather than of design, of having been written without premeditation or purpose, and because the ideas rather forced themselves upon the composer, and demanded of him expression, than were sought by him in fulfillment of a foregone intention. Such indication is corroborated by a story that prevails of the Quartet having been written with the electric velocity, that is proverbially called the speed of thought, but which is a speed that, practically, thought rarely attains,—namely, within some eight-and-forty hours; and it may therefore be regarded as the result of one of those sudden inspirations—no more material expression will compass my meaning—one of those inspirations by means of which a mind capable of great thought, with the means under control to mould such thought into form, even produces its greatest works the quickest. The complete unity of feeling that assimilates the several portions of the composition, the entire absence of research throughout the whole, the conciseness yet comprehensiveness of the plan of each movement,—these are among the characteristics to which I have referred, that give the work the character of being an improvisation; and it is this effect that most closely appeals to our sympathies, making us feel that the music is an unrestrained, unstudied outpouring from the innermost heart of one whose passion was as a fire intense and irresistible, igniting the sense of all whom it touches, and making us to burn with his emotion. In Italy, where modern art took its rise, Music was placed at the head of the sisterhood,—a supremacy that, however she be deprecated by such as cannot understand her, she more and more worthily asserts, especially as she is more and more successfully employed for the medium of expression of such subtleties of feeling as are without the scope of words, and, since they are not defined in our books, are beyond the power of graphic imitation. To this most exalted purpose is music, the chief of the fine arts, devoted in the work before us; in which the unsayable, the intangible, the invisible, the else-incommunicable, deepest emotions of the human heart are rendered, not with cold, severe nakedness of a metaphysical anatomy, but with the warm and truly genial glow of poetry, which, like the sunrise, beautifies all that it irradiates. The keenest anguish in every phase of our experience, from despair to resignation,—the two extremes of love that join in their mutual renewal—this is the train of emotion that the music we are now to hear embodies. It was written under the poignancy of the grief occasioned by a much-loved sister's loss; it is heard under the regret, which nothing but the brightness of his genius that evokes it can dissipate, for the loss of Mendelssohn; it may be strictly called her Monody; it must be felt to be his own. By the power of his genius the great musician stimulates, enforces our sympathies; our appreciation of this power defines their object; we cannot but feel all the beauty and all the pathos it embodies of his music; that we feel it and that we know it to be him who causes us to feel it, makes him the subject of the sorrow that it sings. Thus, let us believe that in listening to this Quartet we especially pay a tribute of feeling to the memory of the master; we heave a sigh on reading his epitaph—the epitaph of which himself is the author; in his own grief—accents let us acknowledge the tones of our regret, and our regret will wear the color of his beauty.

Haydn's Ox Minuet.

TRANSLATED BY CHARLES GROBE.

Joseph Haydn was surprised one day by the visit of a butcher. This man, who perhaps appreciated Haydn's music quite as much as any one else, said to him, artlessly and with all the grace he could assume, "Sir, I know that you are a good and obliging man, therefore I apply to you with confidence. You have, in every variety of composition, written exquisite things; you stand pre-eminent among all composers; but very particularly do your Minuets delight me. Well, I have need of one—pretty, lively, and entirely new, for the wedding of my daughter, which will be consummated in a few days. I can, in my extremity, address myself to no one better than the illustrious Haydn."

The kind-hearted Haydn smiled a quiet smile at this very new demonstration of respect, and promised the Minuet upon the next day, at which time the butcher did not fail punctually to make his appearance, and thankfully to take possession of the valuable present. After some time Haydn heard a noise of instruments; he listened and thought he recognized his new Minuet. He went to the window, and saw thence a magnificent Ox, with gilded horns, and adorned with ribbons and garlands of flowers. Surrounding him was a walking orchestra, which stopped under his balcony. The butcher advanced from among them, expressed once more the magnitude of his obligation to the great man, and concluded his speech with these words: "I thought that on this day I could not in a more appropriate manner than this, evidence my gratitude for so beautiful a Minuet. I have, therefore, brought you the finest of my oxen." He would not depart until Haydn, moved by his ingenuousness and gratitude, accepted the ox. Since that time has this Minuet been always known by the name of the "Ox Minuet."

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 28, 1853.

The Opera.

The opera season of fifteen nights closed with a brilliant triumph on Friday evening. Il Barbiere di Siviglia was worthy, as but few operas are, to follow the Don Giovanni. For, in the Barber, we have the same impression forced upon us, in every note we hear, whether from orchestra or singers, that we have in Don Giovanni—the impression of the work of a great genius, who introduced nothing into any part which is not essential to the completeness of the whole. One would lose no single note of such music, of principals, of orchestra, or of chorus, for each part is necessary to the full development of the perfection of every other. We thought the first performance of Il Barbiere to be far beyond any that we had ever heard of it, but the last was a triumph, throwing that entirely in the shade, as well as all the other performances of the Sontag troupe. It was a fitting and brilliant termination to what has been to us, on the whole, the most perfect and complete series of operatic representations that we have ever had in Boston. True, we have had rather much of Donizetti and Bellini to boot a very little of Rossini or Mozart, but we are to consider on the other hand, that nothing has been attempted that has not been most successfully accomplished, because nothing has been undertaken (save perhaps the Don Giovanni) which the number and powers of the company were not entirely competent to give in the most satisfactory manner. The principal parts have been such as were well adapted to Madame Sontag's powers as they are, and have consequently lost nothing in the representation, and in the other characters, the watchful eye of a true artist has evidently taken care that none should attempt to fill a part who could not satisfactorily carry it out. Il Barbiere then, was most excellently given. SONTAG, as Rosina, was more fascinating, more arch, more lovely than before. The Barber, the glorious Figaro, was given by BADIALI with more spirit and life than before and sung magnificently. We never cease to wonder at the masterly versatility of this most delightful of baritones; so good in every thing that we cannot tell in what to prefer him, unrivalled in some parts, good in all, indifferent in none. The magnetism, the life and spirit of the principals pervaded the whole company, and whether ROCCO, GASPARONI or POZZOLINI did the best, it were indeed hard to say. Pozzolini seemed to be roused to unusual efforts and by his animated acting and excellent singing of Count Almaviva, won, on that night, the applause of all. The orchestra played with uncommon spirit and delicacy, and the effect of the whole performance has not been surpassed by any. Rarely have we seen an audience so thoroughly delighted—an audience too, the most intelligent and critical that our city can give. So ends our opera season for this year. Next year, if rumors are true, we shall hear CRIST and MARIO!

Mrs. Eastcott.

From the Gazzetta Musicale di Napoli of March 5th, (for a copy of which we are under obligations to a correspondent) we translate the following account of the début of Mrs. Eastcott, the American prima donna, in Rossini's Barbiere. After giving some account of the performance of the Medea at the San Carlo, it proceeds:—

"Il Barbiere di Seviglia was put upon the stage with better auspices at the Teatro Nuovo and obtained better success; it was performed at the benefit of the EASTCOTT, a singer who now is the delight of all beholders, and the enthusiastic ovations which were given to this most beautiful music of Rossini were not at all diminished in four successive representations. The baritone, of a fine robust voice of large compass, Signor MASTRIANI, in the part of FIGARO, GRANDILLO as Don Basilio, BIANCHI in that of Lindora, and SAVOIA as Dr. Bartolo, well deserved the applause of the public; and we should have occasion to give praise also to the orchestra had we not noticed that, neglecting to observe the requisite delicate gradations of color, it played throughout with a force entirely improper. The EASTCOTT then was distinguished among all.

Signora EASTCOTT, in sustaining so well the part of Rosina in the Barbiere, has confirmed the favorable opinion which the Neapolitan public had begun to form of her. No one believed that the American cantatrice could so succeed in executing with precision the difficulties of the Italian comic music, and in animating it with all the graces of expression. No one believed that the EASTCOTT could sing the cavatina of the Barbiere with that facility of vocalization and that propriety of accent for which the most celebrated singers of Italy are so distinguished; but no sooner was the voice of Signora Eastcott heard, than every one admired her power and musical intelligence. This singer has also given a still greater proof of the extent and facility of her sympathetic voice in her singing of the Il mio Valzer of Venzano, as she has shown her tragic power in singing with CEDRONE, with BIANCHI and with MASTRIANI, Verdi's Quartet, Puoi tu figlia dell' amor."

The same paper also announces the arrival in Naples of a young American tenor, HENRY SQUIRES and says of him that "his voice and musical aptitude give already the finest hopes, and when they shall be corrected and improved by the severe Neapolitan training, his name will surely occupy a place in the history of singers." Shall we not some day have an American opera troupe?

Ball's Statuette of Webster.

MR. T. BALL, has just completed a full length statuette of DANIEL WEBSTER, of which we can speak with the highest admiration. It is one of the most successful; we are not sure but it is decidedly the most successful of the thousand attempts that have been made recently to portray the face and figure of the great statesman. The head is in our opinion even more faithful to the original than that of the large bust by Mr. Ball, and has, we think, the very expression and air of life. The figure is not so entirely satisfactory as the head, though, from some points of view it is, in its whole effect, a very perfect representation of the noble and imposing presence so familiar to us all. The costume is that which Mr. Webster used to wear, and is as successfully treated by the artist as so ungainly a dress could be. The attitude is dignified and graceful, giving us, to the very life, the best idea of Mr. Webster, as he appeared in the Senate and at the Bar, that we have ever seen. Mr. Ball's statuette is worthy the especial attention of the Committee who have in charge the Webster Memorial, and of all who desire to possess a faithful portrait of the deceased statesman and a work of Art of very uncommon excellence. The original model, (which is about two feet in height) is now on exhibition at the store of Mr. WM. Y. BALCH, in Tremont Street (next to the Tremont Temple).

We take this opportunity to call attention to a pleasing collection of pictures by HINCKLEY, HUNT, GERRY, CHAMPNEY, and others of our native artists, which may be seen at the same place.

Fétis' Biographie Universelle des Musiciens.

The students of musical history and biography will be glad to learn that M. Fétis is about to prepare for the press a Supplement to his valuable Biographie Universelle. This book is one of the most complete works of the kind, as far as it goes; but, commenced in 1837, the last of the eight volumes already published comes down only to the year 1844, and in the ten years that have since elapsed, many stars and comets have appeared in the musical firmament, whose movements have not been computed and of which we have no record, save the more or less unreliable accounts to be found in the periodicals of the day. Many, whose names are hardly mentioned in the published volumes, have since risen to celebrity, and are among the brightest in the annals of music. It is therefore a matter of congratulation that M. Fétis is at length to complete, as far as possible, his musical history down to the present day, and his forthcoming volumes will be looked for with uncommon interest. A translation of the entire work into English would, we doubt not, be a most acceptable addition to many musical libraries.

MR. KEYZER'S CONCERT, postponed from last Saturday, takes place this evening, as will be seen from the advertisement in another column. The programme is a choice one, and we need no other guarantee than that of Mr. Keyzer's name, to say nothing of the gentlemen who are to assist him, that the Concert will be one of unusual excellence, well worthy the attention of the lovers of classical music. Mr. Keyzer has done us good service here in the times of the Boston Academy, and his claims must not be now forgotten.

JESSE HUTCHINSON.—The telegraph announces the death of Jesse Hutchinson, at a Water Cure establishment, near Cincinnati, on Monday. Many hearts will feel sadder for the news. Jesse was about 40 years of age, and the eldest of the "Band of Brothers"—(and sisters) known as the Hutchinson family. He was a genius in his way. Gentle-hearted, artless and honest, he wrote and sang his songs, preaching brotherhood and peace wherever he went. Just previous to his embarking for California, full of high hopes, he called on us with a poem address to his friends at large, in which he promised them all lumps of gold.—Alas, California was to him a land of shadow and death. He is now, doubtless in a land of sweeter songs and fairer joys than he ever knew on earth.—N. Y. Eve. Mirror.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

Hardly was the ink dry last week with which we announced that the City Government had voted to provide music on the Common during the summer months, than we found in the daily papers, that the measure had been defeated, on its final passage, because East and South Boston could not also have music. We regret the fate of this measure, and if it be dictated by economy, would suggest that the expenses of the junketings of Committees and other city functionaries be retrenched somewhat, during the next year, and that the amount so saved shall be appropriated for the improvement and pleasure of the citizens generally.

The Annual May training has called out all the military bands, and the streets are echoing with brass. We notice a slight improvement in some of our city bands, and can especially speak with favor, of a very noticeable improvement in the performances of the Brigade Band, reminding us somewhat of its former days. But one weariness of the everlasting monotonous sound of brass, and longs to hear a full, well proportioned military band, such an one as we might have in Boston. In pleasing contrast to this brass music was the music given by the Germania Serenade Band at the Inauguration of President Walker, at Cambridge, where we heard again the pleasant tones of the wood instruments. The number of the band was too small for a reed band, and the effect was somewhat thin; impaired, too, by the position in which it was placed, but we are glad to see that those having charge of the college music on public days, have made this change. The vocal music on this occasion was performed very acceptably by a select choir from Boston, to the accompaniment of an organ for which a respectable hand-organ might to advantage have been substituted.

We learn from the daily papers that Mr. GEORGE F. HAYTER will give an "Organ Entertainment" at Williams Hall this evening, assisted by Miss ANNA STONE, (vocalist.) The excellence of the performer and the superior quality of the instrument, promise well for those who attend.

Signor GUIDI is delivering in Philadelphia a course of lectures on the cultivation of the voice.

SUNDAY EVENING CONCERTS.—We learn from the Portland Transcript that the announcement by the Sacred Music Society of that city of their intention to give a series of Sacred Concerts on Sunday evenings, has given rise to some discussion in the papers; some being disposed to look on the proposition as a most dangerous innovation upon the Puritan customs of that place in regard to the observance of the Sabbath, and others very properly, maintaining the other side of the question, urging upon the religious part of the community the propriety of giving their countenance to the undertaking. The Transcript says,

"There certainly can be no sin involved in performing or listening to the sacred music of Handel, Haydn, and Mozart, on the Sabbath, but if the religious portion of the community discountenance the concerts, if they scrupulously abstain from attending them; if only the fashionable, the gay and thoughtless, are left to frequent them for purposes of amusement and gossip, their influence cannot be for good. On the other hand, if the members of our churches, entering into the spirit of the compositions, attend their performance as a fitting after-part to the public worship of the day, if they carry to the concert room—as they certainly may—the same devout feelings with which they enter the sanctuary, they cannot fail to diffuse a Sabbath influence over the occasion, to give its tendencies a healthful, religious direction, and to make the concert a very profitable improvement of the Sabbath evening."

We question much whether anything more sublime or more elevating in its influences can be found than to listen to the performance of the "Messiah," for example, or any of the great Oratorios or Masses of the composers named above, nor do we imagine that such performances can be looked upon as any desecration of the Sabbath hours. How can it be that the most sublime words of Scripture, wedded to the most glorious of music, should be any other than an inspiring and truly elevating religious service, if listened to in a proper spirit?

MILWAUKIE. From the third Annual Report of the Milwaukee Musical Society, we learn that during the past season this Association has successfully performed Haydn's oratorio of the "Creation," entire; the "Seasons;" and more recently the entire opera Czar und Zimmermann, which seems to be very popular with German audiences. The performance of this opera we understand to have been extremely successful and satisfactory. The Society numbers over 160 active members furnishing the principal singers, orchestra and chorus. With a very few exceptions, these are all amateurs and receive no compensation for their services; but we are told their performances are of a degree of excellence (especially in the orchestra and chorus) that are seldom heard even in our cities. We should suppose that such intelligence from this most distant of our inland cities must excite the emulation of musical societies nearer home, for there is no city of any size in which the same thing might not, with a little pains-taking, be successfully accomplished.

London.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. The programme of the fourth Concert was as follows:—

PART I.

Sinfonia, MS. Cherubini.
Scena, "Alcandro,"—Herr Staudigl. Mozart.
Concerto, MS., violoncello,—Signor Piatti. Molique.
Aria, "Sento mancar mi,"—Mrs. Enderssohn. Crescentini.
Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber.

PART II.

Sinfonia Pastorale. Beethoven.
Aria, "Der Kriegerstust,"—Herr Staudigl. Spohr.
Concerto in E flat, pianoforte,—M. Hallé. Beethoven.
Duet,—Mrs. Enderssohn and Herr Staudigl. Spohr.
March in "Athalia," Mendelssohn.
Conductor, Mr. Costa.

The symphony, in D, of Cherubini, the only one from his pen which is known, was written for the Philharmonic Society during the composer's residence in London, performed once, and assigned to the library, to be forgotten until the present time, when it suddenly came into the heads of the seven directors that such a work existed, and might possibly be worth a hearing. It is not, like the imperishable models of Mozart and Haydn, a work for all time; though, at the period of its composition, it may have successfully represented the actual state of the arts. What Cherubini himself thought of this symphony may be judged from the fact that, many years after it was written, he turned it into a quartet for stringed instruments, transposing it a note lower, and changing many parts of it. In its second form it was introduced, last season, by Messrs. Sainton, Cooper and Piatti at the Quartet Association, and gave much greater pleasure than in its symphonic shape on Monday night. That it shows the hand of a master in every movement, and that its instrumentation is admirable for strength and clearness, may be readily believed. The name of the author is a guarantee for such excellencies. But on the other hand, a general absence of fancy, a monotony of coloring, and a certain prevalent staleness in the themes, render it dull in spite of its cleverness. The vigor, and fine orchestral painting, if the expression may be allowed, observable in the operatic overtures of Cherubini, are nowhere manifested in his symphony; and, though it was played with great spirit, the apathy with which it was received by the audience, renders it unlikely that we shall hear it again. It was, nevertheless, a wise step on the part of the directors to introduce it; and its performance on Monday night will be remembered as an interesting fact in the annals of the society.

The new composition of Herr Molique was unequivocally successful. It has supplied what has long been wanted—a concerto for the violoncello equal in importance and interest to the concertos of the great masters for the violin and the pianoforte. Mendelssohn had projected such a work for Signor Piatti, but did not live to finish it. The concerto of Herr Molique is divided into three movements—an allegro moderato, an andante and a rondo. The longest is the allegro; but the beauty and strong contrast of the principal subjects, the effective character of the bravura passages for the principal instrument, and the masterly variety of the orchestral accompaniments invest the whole with a powerful interest. The introduction of an elaborate cadenza on the tonic pedal is also a new and happy idea, which, among others, helps to establish the originality of this movement. The andante is chiefly remarkable for its exquisite melody.

The rondo, written in the form of a regular movement, affords a grateful relief by its playful and animated character, which is carried out in the orchestra with unceasing spirit and ingenuity. In Signor Piatti, Herr Molique found an executant capable of giving the best effect to his concerto. Seldom has this unrivalled player appeared to greater advantage. His execution of the passages and tours de force was perfect, while his tone and expression in the cantabile phrases might have afforded a useful lesson to any vocalist. The concerto was received with enthusiasm. It was a consolation to the subscribers to be enabled to hear Molique as a composer, now that they are allowed so few opportunities of applauding him as a performer at the Philharmonic Concerts, notwithstanding that he is one of the greatest of violinists, and, moreover, resides in this metropolis.

Another complete and well-deserved success was achieved by M. Charles Hallé, whose performance of Beethoven's incomparable concerto in E flat was an exhibition of pianoforte playing of the very highest class. This great pianist first came to England in 1844. He did not appear, however, at the Philharmonic Concerts until 1852 (eight years afterwards), and would probably not have appeared then but for the repeated admonitions of the press, which put the subscribers on the qui vive, and forced the tardy directors to give M. Hallé a chance that so many players of mediocre talent had, for special reasons, been allowed to enjoy. Better late than never. M. Hallé's superb reading and execution, on Monday night, of Beethoven's longest and most difficult concerto, and the profound sensation it created—although, owing to the unusual length of the programme, he did not come forward till very late in the evening,—justify us in referring to the remonstrances we have felt it our duty to address to the directors of the Philharmonic Concerts, who, year after year, while M. Hallé was delighting the audiences of the Musical Union by his performances of the works of the great "classical" composers, obstinately persisted in depriving their own subscribers of the advantage of hearing him. At the eleventh hour, M. Hallé was invited to the Philharmonic Concerts (having already appeared almost everywhere else, even in Manchester, Liverpool, and Dublin); and his success was so great in 1852, that he was again invited in 1853. What will be the issue of Monday night's performance may be readily guessed. The subscribers have twice listened to M. Hallé and twice paid a just tribute to his merits. It is unlikely, therefore, that any special reason can henceforward prevent his appearance in the Philharmonic orchestra being an annual event.—Times, May 4th.

The third meeting of the Musical Union took place on Tuesday morning at Willis's-rooms, when Haydn's quartet in E, No. 69, was performed; followed by Beethoven's quintet in E flat, Op. 16, and Beethoven's quartet in D. The executants were Vieuxtemps, Goffrie, Hill, Piatti, Barret, Lazarus, Baumann, and Jarrett, whose playing throughout fully sustained the reputation of these fashionable concerts. Vieuxtemps, at the termination of the pieces we have named, played a pair of violin solos, and Hallé a selection from Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte. The rooms were crowded.

The Creation was given last night at Exeter Hall, under the auspices of the Harmonic Union. The solos were delivered by Miss Louisa Pyne, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Herr Staudigl, who were assisted in the concerted pieces by F. F. Rowland and Mrs. Dixon. Vocalists so accomplished as these, coupled with a large and experienced chorus, could not fail to produce, under the able direction of Mr. Benedict, the best results, and notwithstanding the fact that by this selection the society departed in some measure from the principles upon which it originally proposed to govern itself, the performance appeared to be a welcome incident to the subscribers. The evening commenced with Mr. Henry Leslie's Festival Anthem, a work which we have more than once taken occasion to praise as the production of a very clever amateur, not very original certainly, but reflecting the prepossessions of the writer for Mendelssohn and Handel, without altogether concealing his ability to think for himself. The anthem is well and solidly put together, and is evidently growing in favor with choral societies. Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. Sims Reeves were the leading vocalists. The concert was well attended, and the programme which he selected manifested no decadence of the good taste for which we have frequently given him credit. Among other morceaux, we had a quintet by Spohr and Mendelssohn's Andante and Rondo Capriccioso, the intervals being occupied by violin and violoncello solos at the hands of Vieuxtemps and Hausmann and a few choice vocalities. But not only as a performer but as a composer, has Mr. Aguilar earned distinction. With his usual anxiety to give novelty and interest to his programme, he introduced on this occasion a new trio for the pianoforte, violin, and violoncello. This composition merits all the praise due to grace and variety of idea, and sound and ingenious scholarship. The feeling and the knowledge of the musician are evidenced throughout, the vein of thought being thoroughly classical, and the technical resources to which the composer appeals, those of the most refined art. The trio was beautifully rendered by Vieuxtemps and Hausmann, in conjunction with Mr. Aguilar, whose playing was remarkably able and effective. The vocalists were Mme. Doria, Mme. Anna Zerr (who was encored in each of the songs which she contributed), and Herr Reichart.

Standard, May 5th.

A concert was given last night at the new Beethoven-rooms, by Mr. Holmes, for the purpose of introducing his two sons to the public as violinists. These youths, who are aged respectively some 13 and 15 years, performed in various pieces, both solo and concertante, and each exhibited on his instrument talents which are rarely met with in players of much more advanced age. Haydn's Quartet in B flat (No. 69) was led by the elder of the brothers, the younger playing the second violin, Mr. Webb the viola, and Sig. Piatti the violoncello, with a firmness, precision, and delicacy which would have done honor to a veteran Quartet-player. The same youth (Alfred Holmes) also took the violin part of Beethoven's Sonata in F (seconded by Mrs. Crook as pianist); and moreover, performed a solo by Vieuxtemps—a fantasia abounding in the greatest difficulties of the instrument. These, however, were surmounted by the youthful artist with a facility, certainty, and self-possession that could be surpassed by but few of the established solo players of the day. Double stops and octave passages were rendered with such exact intonation and certain execution as to satisfy the most critical ear. The younger performer (Henry Holmes), who displayed talents scarcely inferior to those of his brother, led a trio of Hummel's (Mr. Lindsay Sloper being the pianist), and also played Mayseder's variations, Op. 49, in a style, that had no traces of juvenility or pupillage.

Daily News, 6th May.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. On Saturday Puritani was repeated for the second time. Mario sang better than on the first night, and Madame Bosio was no less excellent than on her first essay.

Donizetti's serious opera, Maria di Rohan, on Tuesday night, introduced two new debutantes—Mademoiselle Albini as Maria, and Mademoiselle Nantier Didiée as Armando di Gondi. The former is an artiste of considerable pretensions. She has a pleasing face and a pleasing voice, but expression is wanting in both, and her tragic talents are below mediocrity. Her singing is occasionally striking for its brilliancy, and the quality of the voice is for the most part agreeable; but Mlle. Albini is completely out of her line in such a part as Maria, and the management did not display its usual tact in submitting the lady to such an ordeal. It is a pity—Ronconi and the drama considered—that no first-rate artist will condescend to undertake the part of Maria. Though the situations are so fine, and the character itself is prominent and boldly drawn, the music is of the weakest and most ineffective, and would require a Grisi or a Crivelli, but still we think justice and fair play demand they should have another trial—but not in high tragedy—perhaps not even in the serious line at all—but something in the semi-seria, leaving her two chances to creep through.

Mademoiselle Nantier Didiée—the new contralto—is no contralto at all. She has a good resonant mezzo-soprano voice, and is a practised singer and up to all the business and traditions of the stage. Self-possession is one of the marked characteristics of Mlle. Nantier Didiée. If Mlle. Nantier Didiée fail in producing her best effects, it will certainly not be for want of confidence. The new lady was decidedly successful and justly so. She sang well and acted manfully, as it were, and did everything required of her in a satisfactory and creditable manner. If she did not enchant, she pleased. If she displayed no genius, she showed skill and schooling. So much for the new contralto—who is no contralto.

The first performance of Lucrezia Borgia on Thursday night attracted the fullest attendance of the season. Grisi and Mario for the first time in combination were loadstars too powerful to be resisted.

Lucrezia Borgia we have always considered to be one of Grisi's very finest parts,—perhaps her very finest. This glorious artist is greater when the tragic passions are interwoven with the softer and more feminine emotions, indicating that her peculiar power lies in realizing mixed feelings, rather than in sustaining, like Pasta, a single passion, undiversified to the end. For this reason Grisi is pre-eminently grand in Lucrezia Borgia, and her genius therein has its fullest and most home scope for its broadest display. Every phase of the character, on Thursday night, was rendered with life-like reality, and the whole was wrought into a picture of intense beauty and truthfulness. Nor was Grisi herself in the acting only. She sang splendidly and was in fine voice, so that they who heard her that night, if they had not heard her previously—but who has not heard Grisi?—were fortunate indeed in hitting upon a time when she was in the very height of her force and magnificence.

But what of Mario? What shall we say of Mario? What shall we say of Mario on Thursday night? Why, that he, who surpasses all the tenors who ever reigned and ruled in song, surpassed himself. Yes, hear then, all ye who feared Mario was losing his voice; hear and learn, that Mario was in finer voice than we have heard him for years on Thursday night! His singing always transcendent, was transcendent on Thursday night; but his voice, not always transcendent—since for two or three seasons past, he was suffering from some slight affection of the epiglottis—was transcendent on Thursday night. Yes, hear it, all ye admirers of the glorious tenor, your name is legion! Mario's voice is as fresh, as limpid, as penetrating—more penetrating—as sympathetic—more sympathetic—as touching, and as powerful as ever. His singing and acting on Thursday night literally defy description. He was consummately great from the very commencement, and in his death-scene, might have challenged comparisons with Macready himself. To say, then, that Mario produced a furor, is to say what was inevitable. He was recalled twice after the two first acts, and thrice with Grisi at the end. Thursday night was a glorious night for the Royal Italian Opera. Mario is himself again!—Lond. Mus. World, May 7.

Advertisements.

WILLIAM KEYZER

WILL OIVE

A MUSICAL SOIRÉE,

ON SATURDAY EVENING, MAY 28th, 1853,

AT THE

Lecture Room of the Boston Music Hall.

Particulars in small bills. Tickets 50 cents each, to be had at the Music Stores, or of Mr. Keyzer, No. 5 Franklin St., and at the door.

FOURTH EDITION.

MARX'S MUSICAL COMPOSITION.

WE have just published the Fourth Edition of the THEORY AND PRACTICE OF MUSICAL COMPOSITION, by Dr. A. B. MARX, translated from the third German edition, by HERMAN S. SABONL. Price $2.50.

Copies will be sent by mail, prepaid, to any part of the country, on the receipt of THREE DOLLARS.

Published by MASON BROTHERS, 23 Park Row, New York. For sale by OLIVER DITSON, 115 Washington Street, Boston.

ZUNDEL'S NEW ORGAN BOOK,
THE AMATEUR ORGANIST.

A Collection of Opening and Closing Voluntaries, original or arranged from the works of the most celebrated composers, the whole forming an excellent course of study for the Organ or Melodeon. By JOHN ZUNDEL, Organist of St. George's Church, &c. Price $1.50.

Published by MASON BROTHERS, 23 Park Row, New York. For sale by OLIVER DITSON, 115 Washington Street, Boston.

NEW EDITION...JUST READY.

THE GENTLEMAN'S GLEE BOOK,

Consisting of a Selection of Gleees, for Men's voices, adapted principally from the most admired German composers. By LOWELL MASON. Price $1. This Collection has heretofore been very popular. It contains nearly one hundred Gleees, the words of which are mostly original, or especially translated from the German, and is the only work of the kind published in the country.

Published by MASON BROTHERS, 23 Park Row, New York. For sale by OLIVER DITSON, 115 Washington Street, Boston.

HASTINGS ON MUSICAL TASTE.

THIS DAY PUBLISHED.

A DISSERTATION ON MUSICAL TASTE... By THOMAS HASTINGS, Esq. 12mo. cloth. Price $1.25. This work is comprised in seventeen chapters, and is very thorough, treating of Principles of Style in Execution; Practical Distinctions in regard to Selection and Execution; Union of Voices and Instruments; Management of the same in Church Music; Observations on Composition; Melody and Harmony; Lyrical Themes; Church Music; The Opera and Oratorio; Specific Claims of Devotional Music; Methods of Improvement in Devotional Music, &c.

Published by MASON BROTHERS, 23 Park Row, New York. For sale by OLIVER DITSON, 115 Washington Street, Boston.

A. W. FRENZEL,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC, and late Leader of the "SAXONIA ORCHESTRA," having made Boston his residence, is prepared to give Lessons on the Piano-Forte and in Singing, both in the English and German languages; also to accompany with the violin more advanced pupils in the Sonata-duos of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c. During the summer season, Mr. F. offers his services to classes out of town. Or he will receive scholars from the city or the country, at his Music Rooms, No. 4 Pine Street, Boston, where he may always be found before 10 A. M., and between the hours of 1 and 3 P. M.

iii 6

Pianos and Melodeons to Let.

OLIVER DITSON,

Music Dealer, 115 Washington St., Boston.

HAS a good variety of Piano Fortes, Melodeons, Seraphines, and Reed Organs, to let, for city or country, on low terms. If, within one year from the time of hiring, the party should conclude to purchase the instrument, no charge will be made for rent of it, except the interest on its value.

25 tf

JUST PUBLISHED,

THE STABAT MATER, by Rossini, at the low price of 75 cents.

iii 9

Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

BEETHOVEN'S CELEBRATED MASS in C,

IN VOCAL SCORE:

With an Accompaniment for the Organ or Piano-Forte, by Vincent Novello. With Latin and English text. Just published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

iii 4

Sold by all Music Dealers.

THE SYMPHONIES OF BEETHOVEN—ARRANGED FOR THE PIANO-FORTE BY J. N. HUMMEL. The above excellent compositions are now in course of publication by the subscriber.

Symphony No. 7, in A, op. 92, is now ready.

Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

iii 4

Sold by all Music Dealers.

—Edward L. Balch,

NEW EDITION OF CARCASSI'S GUITAR BOOK.

New and Improved Method for the Guitar, by M. Carcassi. Price $2.50.

This new edition of Carcassi's celebrated method embraces much valuable matter not contained in those previously issued. These additions are those which have been made by the distinguished author after an experience which enabled him to determine what was actually needed by the pupil for a thorough understanding of the art. The whole has been carefully translated by a well known Professor of the Guitar, and is thereby rendered as free as possible from those slight but perplexing inaccuracies which sometimes become a part of translations and reprints. A number of popular songs in each of the different keys have been appended, which together with the masterly instructions of Carcassi, and his plain yet comprehensive course of Exercises, furnish all that is desirable to both teacher and scholar.

feb 26

OLIVER DITSON, Publisher,
115 Washington St.TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE,
No. 86 TREMONT STREET, BOSTON.WHITE BROTHERS,
DEALERS IN MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS,
Best Italian, German, French and English Strings,

AGENTS OF

J. André, Offenbach; and G. André, Philadelphia,
FOR THE SALE OF FOREIGN CLASSIC MUSIC,
CHOIR MUSIC, &c.

Instruments Made, Repaired, Tuned, Bought, Sold, or Exchanged, on the most favorable terms.

IRA J. WHITE.
iii 2 3m

A. WARREN WHITE.

THEODORE T. BARKER,
MUSIC STORE,

No. 381 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

Chickering's Pianos to let.

All Foreign and American Musical Publications received as soon as published.

ii 23 3m

N. D. COTTON,

IMPORTER AND DEALER IN

English, French, and American Stationery,
DRAWING & PAINTING MATERIALS,
No. 13 Tremont Row, Boston.

 Wedding and Visiting Cards Engraved and Printed.

16 tf

BEETHOVEN'S ORATORIO OF ENGEDI, or DAVID IN THE WILDERNESS, known as the MOUNT OF OLIVES, is this day published in a neat, convenient form for the singer or concert-goer by

Geo. P. Reed & Co., Publishers,
17 TREMONT ROW, BOSTON.J. W. TAVERNER,
PROFESSOR OF ELOCUTION,

AT HIS RESIDENCE,

No. 30 CHARLES STREET, BOSTON.

J. C. WOODMAN,

ORGANIST AND CONDUCTOR OF MUSIC AT CENTRAL CHURCH,

Teacher of Singing, Piano Forte, &c.,

No. 94 Chestnut Street, Boston.

iii 2 3m.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.

FOREIGN MUSIC DEPOT,
GIRARD HOUSE BUILDINGS,

NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,

PHILADELPHIA.

N. E. The complete works, for Piano, (Quartets, Trios, Duets for Piano and Violin, Duets for four hands and Piano solo pieces,) of BEETHOVEN and MOZART, as also the Piano solo Works of CLEMENTI and HAYDN, as published by J. André, Offenbach, in sets, at very low prices. We have appointed

Messrs. WHITE BROTHERS,
TREMONT TEMPLE, BOSTON,

our Agents for the sale of the above Standard Editions of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, &c. &c.

iii 2 tf

MRS. ROSA GARCIA DE RIBAS,

TEACHER OF THE

PIANOFORTE, SINGING & GUITAR,
2 SENECA ST., corner Harrison Avenue.

MR. De RIBAS will give instruction on the Oboe and Flute. Also MUSIC ARRANGED, TRANSPOSED, &c. Boston, April 23.

3m

Letter-Press, Music and Job Printing-Office,

JONAS CHICKERING,

RESPECTFULLY gives notice to his friends and the public that, having recovered from the late disastrous effects produced by the destruction of his factory, he is now ready to receive orders for PIANOS, which he promises to execute with as much faithfulness and promptitude as heretofore.

379 Washington Street, Boston.

Mar. 5.

tf

HEWS' PATENT

AMERICAN ACTION PIANO-FORTE.

THE MANUFACTURER is in possession of numerous testimonials from distinguished Musical Professors, who have used the greatly improved ACTION PIANO, commending it in high terms. The attention of purchasers and amateurs of Music to an examination of its superiority, is solicited.

GEO. HEWS, 365 Washington St., Boston.

Apr. 10.

tf

D. B. NEWHALL,

MANUFACTURER AND DEALER IN
PIANO FORTES,

No. 344 Washington Street, Boston.

PIANO FORTES REPAIRED, TUNED, & TO LET.

Apr. 10.

tf

SIGNOR G. C. GUIDI respectfully informs his former pupils and the public, that he has resumed his instructions in SINGING, after the Italian school, with the intention to settle permanently in Boston. In order to accommodate those who may not wish to take private instruction, he will open classes for ladies and gentlemen, on moderate terms. None but good voices will be admitted. Terms liberal for persons intending to study for professional purposes.

Sig. G. can be consulted free upon any musical subject, daily, from 12 to 2, at Mr. Hews's Piano Manufactory, No. 365 Washington street, where terms and time for classes may be known.

Orders or notes for Sig. G. may be addressed to him at G. P. Reed & Co.'s Music Store, 17 Tremont Row, and at Oliver Ditson's, 115 Washington street.

Feb. 5.

A CARD.

THE SUBSCRIBER respectfully offers his services to the public as Teacher of the Piano-Forte, the Violin, and of Singing, after a clear and easy method. He will also accompany pupils, both in seminaries and in private houses, in the practice of Duets, Trios, &c.

Address for the present at 168 Tremont Street.

March 26. 3m.

CARL GÄRTNER.

L. H. SOUTHARD,

TEACHER OF MUSIC,

265 Washington Street, Boston.

Oct. 16.

3m

T. BRICHER,

Organist and Conductor of Music
At the Bowdoin Square Church.

OFFICE UNDER THE CHURCH... ENTRANCE ON CHARDON ST
Jan. 22. 3m.

H. S. CUTLER,

Organist at the Church of the Advent, also of the Boston Harmonic Society.

ADDRESS—(Care of A. N. JOHNSON,) No. 90 Tremont Street, Boston.

22 tf

F. F. MÜLLER,

DIRECTOR OF MUSIC AND ORGANIST at the Old South
Church; ORGANIST of the Handel and Haydn Society;
ORGANIST of the Musical Education Society, &c. &c. &c.
Inquire of Messrs. REED & Co., No. 17 Tremont Row, Boston.

ii 7 tf

NATHAN RICHARDSON,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC.

Now in Europe; will return 1st of June. Letters may be addressed at 19 Hanover St.

25 tf

GEORGE F. WILLEY,

TEACHER OF MUSIC.

Private Tuition in the principles of Music and the Cultivation of the Voice.

MUSIC ROOM, THE LECTURE ROOM OF KIRK STREET CHURCH,
RESIDENCE, 34 FRANKLIN SQUARE, SUFFOLK STREET,
feb. 5. LOWELL, MASS.

Germania Serenade Band.

THE SERVICES OF THIS ASSOCIATION can be secured
by applying to

G. SCHNAPP, Leader,
364 Tremont Street.

ii 14 tf

RATES FOR ADVERTISING.

For half a square, (8 lines,) or less, first insertion, . . . $0.50
each additional inser. 25
For a square, (16 lines,) first insertion, 1.00
each additional insertion, 50
On advertisements standing three months or longer, a discount of twenty per cent. on the above rates is allowed.
(A column counts as seven squares.)
Payments required in advance: For yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 School St.

DWIGHT'S Journal of Music.

A Paper of Art and Literature.

VOL. III.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1853.

NO. 9.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

TERMS....TWO DOLLARS PER ANNUM, (IN ADVANCE.)

CITY Subscribers can be served at their houses by the further payment of fifty cents per annum.

For Rates of Advertising, see last page.

POSTAGE, if paid in advance, for any distance within the State, thirteen cents a year; if not in advance, twenty-six cents. To all places beyond the State, double these rates.

J. S. DWIGHT,.....EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St.

By REDDING & CO., 8 State St.

GEO. P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row.

A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.

DEXTER & BROTHERS, 43 Ann Street, N. Y.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 722 Broadway, N. Y.

MASON BROTHERS, 23 Park Row, New York.

GEORGE DUTTON, Jr., Rochester, N. Y.

G. ANDRE, 229 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St., Balt.

COLBURN & FIELD, Cincinnati, O.

HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Persons willing to become Agents for procuring subscribers, especially Music-Dealers and Teachers, are invited to correspond with the Editor, as above. Satisfactory references required, and liberal commissions allowed.

Back numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Also bound copies of Vols. I. and II. at prices varying from $2.50 to $3.50.

DON JUAN.

A FABULOUS EVENT WHICH HAPPENED TO A TRAVELLING ENTHUSIAST.

[From the German of HOFFMANN, by B. Roelker.]

The loud ringing of a bell and the words of a shrill voice, "the theatre begins," awoke me from a gentle sleep. Double-basses were growling in great confusion—now came a stroke on the kettle-drums and then a blast from a trumpet—a clear A from an oboe was heard and violins fell in between. I rubbed my eyes. "Has, perhaps, the always busy devil?" No! I was in the room of the hotel where I had arrived the day before almost as if broken on a rack. The rope of a bell hung just over my nose; I gave a good pull, and the servant appeared.

"What, for heaven's sake, is the meaning of this confused music here close by me? is there a concert to be given in the house?"

"Your excellency" (I had drunk champagne at dinner) "does not know perhaps that this hotel is connected with the theatre. This paper door will lead you into a small corridor from which you can enter box No. 23, reserved for strangers."

"What?—theatre?—stranger's box?"

"Yes, the small stranger's box holding two or at most three persons—it is reserved only for persons of rank; it has green paper hangings and Venetian blinds, and is close to the stage. If your excellency should choose—we play to-day 'Don Juan,' by the celebrated Mr. Mozart, from Vienna. We can put the price for the ticket on your bill."

The last words were spoken while he opened the door of the box, so quickly had I stepped, upon hearing the word 'Don Juan,' through the paper door into the corridor. The house was, for this middle-sized place, spacious, tastefully decorated and brilliantly lighted. All the boxes and the parterre were crowded. The first accords of the overture convinced me that a most excellent orchestra would afford me the most exquisite enjoyment of this masterpiece, even though the actors should perform indifferently.—During the Andante the horrors of the terrible subterranean regno al pianto came over me; presentiments of something awful filled my mind. The joyous fanfara in the 7th bar of the Allegro sounded to me like villainy in high glee. I saw fiery demons stretching forth their glowing claws from deep darkness to catch some of the gay mortals who were merrily dancing on the thin cover of the abyss. The conflict of man's nature with the unknown direful powers that surround him and lie in wait for his destruction, stood clear before my mind.

At last the storm subsided and the curtain rose. Freezing and out of humor, Leporello, wrapt in his cloak, paces, in dark night, up and down before the pavilion: "Notte e giorno faticar."—Ah! Italian? thought I, here in this German town. "Ah che piacere!" I shall hear the recitatives and all just as the great master felt and thought in his mind. Now Don Juan came rushing out and after him Donna Anna, holding the villain by the cloak. What an aspect! She might have been taller and more slender, and more majestic in her walk; but what a head, and eyes from which love, anger, hatred and despair shot as from one focus, a shining pyramid of bright sparks, which like Greek fire, unquenchable, burned to the very core. The loose braids of her dark hair float in ringlets down her neck. Her white night-dress traitorously discloses charms that are never looked upon without danger. The heart in which the pangs of the horrid deed are buried, was yet beating in violent pulsations.—And now what a voice! "Non spera se non m' uccidi." He notes, as if cast of ethereal metal, flash like glaring lightning, through the storm of the instruments.—Don Juan tries in vain to free himself.—But does he wish it? Why does not he thrust the woman aside with his strong hand? does the wicked deed enervate him, or is it the struggle of hate and love within his breast that deprives him of all courage and strength?—The old father has now paid with his life for his folly in attacking the vigorous opponent in the dark; and Don Juan and Leporello approach the proscenium in the recitative conversation.

Don Juan disengages himself from his cloak and is standing there in a costly dress of velvet embroidered with silver. His figure is strong and beautiful, his face of manly beauty; his nose of a Roman cast, his eyes penetrating and his lips softly formed. The singular play of a muscle on the forehead gives his physiognomy, for a moment, something of the expression of Mephistopheles, which without marring his beauty of face, excites an involuntary shudder. It seems as if he could exert the magic power of a serpent; it seems as if woman, after having once gazed upon him could no longer escape from him, and must complete her ruin, being once seized upon by this invisible power.

Leporello, tall and slim, with a red and white striped vest-coat, a short red cloak, a white hat with a red feather, is tripping round him. His features have an expression strangely mingled of good nature, roguishness, lustfulness and ironic pertness; his dark eyebrows form a strange contrast to his grizzly hair and beard. One sees at once the old fellow is a fit assistant and servant of Don Juan. They have now made their fortunate escape over the wall. Torch-bearers, Donna Anna and Don Ottavio appear. The latter is a delicate, nicely dressed and smooth mannikin of twenty-one years at most. Being the betrothed of Anna, he no doubt staid in the same house, as he could not have been called so soon. At the first alarm he might no doubt have hastened to the spot in time to save the father; but he had first to dress himself, and besides he did not venture out in the night,—

"Ma qual mai s' offre, o dei, spettacolo funesto agli occhi miei!"

More than despair in consequence of the cruel outrage is expressed in the terrible heart-rending notes of this Recitative and Duet. But it is not alone Don Juan's violent attempt, threatening ruin to her and causing death to her father, which forces these notes from the anguished heart: it is a destructive deadly struggle in her heart which can produce them.—The tall, lank Donna Elvira, who has still visible traces of great beauty which has now faded, had just chid the traitor Don Juan: "Tu nido d'inganni," and the compassionate Leporello had very archly observed, parla come un libro stampato," when I thought I perceived somebody near or behind me. It was easy for a person to have opened the door and stolen in, and at this thought a pain shot through my heart. I had felt so happy at being alone in the box, entirely undisturbed, and clasping with all the fibres of sensation, as with polypus arms, this masterpiece, now produced to such perfection, and absorbing it. A single word, which moreover might be silly, might have cruelly snatched me from this glorious state of poetico-musical exaltation. I resolved to take no notice of my neighbor, but, entirely wrapt up in the playing, to avoid every word and look. With my head resting on my hands and my back turned toward my neighbor, I looked on. The further continuation of the play corresponded with the excellent beginning. The little roguish, amorous Zerlina comforted, in sweet notes and airs, the good-natured dolt Masetto. Don Juan distinctly expressed his broken soul and his scorn at the mannikins around him, put there merely for his pleasure, that he might break in upon and destroy their faint-hearted doings, in the wild aria, "Fin ch'han dal vino." The muscle on his forehead moved more violently than before.—The masks now appear. Their terzetto is a prayer that in pure and shining rays ascends to heaven. The middle curtain now flies suddenly up. There is a feast going on in a merry crowd of peasants, goblets ring and all kinds of masks are moving round, attracted hither by Don Juan's feast.—The three persons sworn to take vengeance now appear. The scene grows more solemn, till the dance begins. Zerlina is saved; during the loud thundering Finale Don Juan, undaunted, with sword in hand meets his enemies. He strikes the fancy sword of the bridegroom out of his hands, and makes his way through the crowd which he throws into entire confusion, as the brave Roland did the army of the tyrant Cymort, so that all fall comically one over the other.

I often seemed to perceive behind me a warm, gentle breath, and to hear the rustling of silk. This made me suppose that a woman was present, but wholly wrapt up in the poetical world which the opera disclosed to me, I took no notice of it. Now that the curtain had dropped, I looked round for my fair neighbor. No words can express my astonishment: Donna Anna, in the very costume in which I had shortly before seen her on the stage, stood behind me, and fixed upon me the penetrating look of her animated eyes. Entirely speechless I fixed a steady gaze on her; her mouth (as it seemed to me) contracted into a light, ironical smile, in which I mirrored myself and discovered my silly figure. I felt the propriety of my accosting her, and yet I could not move my tongue which seemed to be lamed with surprise and even fright. At last, almost involuntarily the words escaped me: "How is it possible, to see you here?" whereupon she answered at once in the purest Tuscan, that unless I understood and spoke Italian, she would be obliged to forego the pleasure of my conversation, since she spoke no other tongue. The sweet words sounded like singing.

The expression of her dark blue eye was heightened while she spoke, and every glance flashing from it poured a stream of fire into my heart, which made every pulse beat quick and every fibre quiver. It was Donna Anna herself. The thought that it was possible for her to be on the stage and at the same time in my box, did not occur to me. As a happy dream combines the strangest things, and a pious faith understands what is supernatural, and brings it in a seemingly natural manner into harmony with the so-called natural phenomena in life, so fell I also, in the presence of the wonderful woman, into a kind of somnambulism, in which I saw the secret relations which so closely joined me to her that she could not go away from me even when she was on the stage. How gladly would I write down for you, my dear Theodore, every word of the remarkable conversation which was carried on between the Signora and myself! but while I try to write down in German what she said, I find every word stiff and cold, every phrase awkward, to express what she spoke in Tuscan with all ease and grace. When she spoke of Don Juan and her own part, I felt that now for the first time the depths of this masterwork were laid open to me, and I could distinctly look into and recognize the fantastic forms of a foreign world. She said that her whole life was music, that she often seemed to comprehend, while singing, many things, mysteriously hidden in her inner soul, which no words could express. "Yes, then indeed, I comprehend them," continued she with a burning eye and higher tone of voice, "but all around me remain cold and dead, and while they applaud a difficult rondo and a successful cadenza, icy hands seem thrust into my glowing heart. But you seem to understand me; I see that to you also has been revealed the wonderful romantic world, where the heavenly charm of tones dwell."

"What, you glorious, wonderful woman, is it possible you know me?"

"Did not the enchanting frenzy of ever yearning love pour forth from your heart in the part of — in your new opera. I have comprehended you; your soul has been revealed to me in singing. Yes indeed (here she called me by my Christian name) I have sung you; as are your melodies, so I!"

The stage bell rang; a sudden pallor spread over Donna Anna's unpainted face; she pressed her hand on her heart as if she felt a sudden pain, and while she said in a low tone: "Unhappy Anna, thy most fearful moments are now coming," she left the box.

The first act had delighted me, but after this singular event, the music affected me in an entirely different and strange manner. It seemed as if the long promised fulfilment of the fairest dreams were now realized in another world, as if the most mysterious forebodings of the enchanted soul were made to stand forth in notes and could be recognized in these forms. In the scene where Donna Anna appears, I trembled with excess of delight while a gentle warm breath stole over me. My eyes involuntarily closed, and a glowing kiss seemed to burn upon my lips; but this kiss was a note long drawn out as if by an ever thirsting, yearning desire.

The Finale now commenced in tones of reckless merriment: "Gia la mensa è preparata." Don Juan sat caressing between two girls, and opened bottle upon bottle to give to the fermenting spirits, hermetically closed within, free sway over him. The room was small, with a large Gothic window in the background, through which one looked upon the dark night without. Already while Elvira reminds the faithless one of his former vows, one can see lightning through the window, and the low grumbling of an approaching thunder storm is heard. At length comes the violent knocking. Elvira and the girls fly away, and amidst the fearful accords of the subterranean spirit-world, the huge marble colossus stalks in, opposite to which Don Juan appears like a dwarf. The floor shakes under the thundering footstep of the giant. Don Juan, through storm, thunder and the howling of demons shouts his terrible "No!" The hour of his destruction is at hand. The statue disappears, dense smoke fills the room, out of which horrible spectral forms are developed. Then an explosion takes place as if a thousand thunder bolts struck at once; Don Juan and the demons have disappeared, one knows not how! Leporello lies fainting in a corner of the room.

How refreshing now is the entrance of the other persons who in vain look for Don Juan, who has been withdrawn by the subterranean powers of earthly vengeance. It seems as if we had but just escaped from the fearful company of hellish spirits. Donna Anna appeared wholly altered; deathlike pallor was spread over her face; the eye was without lustre, her voice was trembling and uncertain, but, for that very reason, of a heart-rending effect in the short duet with the sweet bridegroom, who, since heaven has fortunately saved him from the dangerous office of an avenger, wishes to hold at once his nuptials.

The fugued chorus rounds off the work to a whole most masterly.

I hastened to my room in the greatest state of excitement which I ever experienced. The waiter called me down to supper, and I followed him mechanically. The company was large, as it was the time of the fair. The representation of Don Juan was the subject of conversation. The people generally praised the Italians, and the true conception of their playing, yet the slight remarks that were here and there thrown out showed that hardly any one had but a faint glimmering idea of the deep meaning of the opera of all operas. Don Ottavio had pleased much; Donna Anna had been too passionate for one. He thought that persons ought to moderate themselves and avoid everything too affecting. Her relation of the surprise had almost overwhelmed him. Here he took a pinch of snuff, and looked with an indescribably wise and stupid expression in his neighbor's face, who maintained that the Italian woman was, however, quite beautiful, only too careless in dress and finery. Just in that scene a lock of hair had got unfastened and shaded the half profile of the face! Now another began to hum "Fin ch'han dal vino,"—whereupon a lady observed that she had been least satisfied with Don Juan; the Italian had been too gloomy and grave, and had not represented the frivolous, volatile character lightly enough. The last explosion was praised very much. Weary of this shallow talk, I hastened to my room.

In the Stranger's Box, No. 23.

I felt so stifled in the close and sultry room!—About midnight I seemed to hear your voice, my Theodore! You pronounced distinctly my name, and there seemed to be a rustling near the paper door. What should detain me from visiting once more the place of my singular adventure? Perhaps I shall see you and her who fills my whole being! How easy it is to carry the little table in there—and lights and my writing utensils! The butler is looking for me with the punch I ordered; he finds the room empty and the paper door open and he follows me into the box and casts a doubtful look upon me. At my sign he puts the beverage upon the table, and withdraws with a question on his lips, looking round after me. Turning my back upon him, I lean upon the edge of the box and look into the empty house the architecture of which, magically illuminated by my two lights, projects in curious reflexions strangely and fairy-like. The curtain is moved by the keen draft of air blowing through the house. What if it should rise? if Donna Anna, tormented by direful ghosts, should appear?—Donna Anna! call I involuntarily; my voice dies away in the void space, but the spirits of the instruments awake in the orchestra—a singular tone comes trembling upward; it is as if the beloved name were whispering on it!—I cannot repress an inward trembling, yet pleasantly it thrills through my nerves.

I became master of my mood and feel disposed at least to point out to you, my Theodore, how I now seem to comprehend for the first time, the glorious work of the divine master in its deeper characteristics. Only the poet understands the poet; only a romantic mind can enter into the romantic; only the mind poetically exalted, that has received the consecration in the temple, can understand what the consecrated one speaks in the moment of inspiration. When we look upon the poem (Don Juan) without giving to it a deeper meaning, when we only look upon the historical part, we can hardly comprehend how Mozart could invent and set such music to it. A bon-vivant who loves wine and women beyond measure, who wantonly invites to his merry supper the man of stone, representing the old father he had killed in defending his own life—certainly there is not much poesy in this; and plainly spoken, such a man hardly deserves that the subterranean powers should select him as a choice specimen of hell, and that the marble statue, animated by the departed spirit, should take the trouble to dismount to exhort the sinner in his last hour to repentance, and that at last, the devil should send out his best fellows to effect the transportation into his dominion in the most horrible manner!

[Conclusion next week.]

Julius Knorr's Instructive Works on Playing the Piano.

III.

With every teacher of music on the piano, who labors faithfully to introduce his pupils as soon as possible into the sanctuary of true music, it has no doubt long been a wish to possess a collection of pieces of classical worth and yet easy enough to be used for beginners. Such a want has been supplied by our untiring Julius Knorr, in a collection called: "Classische Unterrichtsstücke für Anfänger auf dem Piano" (Classical pieces for the instruction of beginners on the Piano). We cannot do better than translate here the preface to this collection, in order to show the author's intention:

"Little pieces for beginners exist in such numbers that any addition to them might appear superfluous. Yet many a teacher no doubt has found most of them insufficient and not fully answering their purpose.

"For some of these pieces are composed in a shallow and uninteresting manner; others are stitched together out of dry finger-exercises, which one may find in any method for the piano, so that they can only be tiresome to the beginner. In others the melodious tinkling from operas (mainly of the latest epoch) only flatters the ear, and thus they soon spoil it, producing a distaste for simple and true music. Others again are written in a modern style, too artificially, and therefore less adapted to the understanding of the beginner. Indeed, if the pupil were kept at them some time, they would soon make him lose his feeling for real and original music. Besides, in all of those different little pieces, difficulties peculiar to the strict style are interspersed much too sparingly, as if they were intended to save the teacher trouble. And yet without being thoroughly familiar with the strict style, a correct manner of delivery cannot possibly be attained afterwards.

"In consideration of this state of things, I resolved to make a collection of such pieces, in as perfect a form and as progressive an order as possible, from the original works of Mozart, Haydn, Clementi and Cramer. These I have edited and, in order to make them more useful, furnished them with fingering and with instructive remarks. The unaffected and noble music of Mozart, the natural and humoristic of Haydn, the substantial of Clementi and the graceful of Cramer, will, I am confident, only tend to improve the taste and ear of the beginner.

"Hummel and Beethoven have been excluded from this collection on account of the greater mechanical difficulties attending their works. The latter one moreover might be too difficult for the understanding of the beginner. And Joh. Seb. Bach stood too far off from our present world"

" . . . Every one will perceive that these pieces are not intended for the first beginning of instruction on the piano and consequently they require a preparation by other means"

These are the main contents of the author's preface.

The most suitable preparation will be found in the exercises and pieces recommended in the author's "Guide" &c. in §§ 1—23, which include Czerny's op. 139, Nos 1—30. After these pieces this collection will be found about difficult enough, with only few exceptions. And it forms an excellent substitute for the following two books of Czerny's op. 139, which, eminently practical as they are, lack that deeper unction and inspiration with which the works of Mozart, Haydn, &c. abound.

The author recommends in the same preface another collection under the title: "Anfangsstudien auf dem Pianoforte als Vorläufer zu den klassischen Unterrichtsstücken" (elementary studies on the Piano, precursory to the classical pieces), which however would not answer at all, as they do not contain exercises sufficient to a thorough preparation. In fact since Knorr has written his "Materials," and more especially his "Guide," &c., and edited A. E. Müller's "Method," there can be found no sufficient reason for editing a collection as incomplete as these "Elementary Studies."

Every teacher who has any love at all for his calling should introduce these classical pieces to his pupils and thereby create and foster a taste for true music; thus gathering, as early worshippers, around the altar of the Beautiful, the Good and the True, all the young hearts confided to his care. It will aid him materially in fulfilling his noble vocation.

G. A. S.

PERGOLÈSE.

JEAN BAPTISTE JESI, (surnamed PERGOLESE because he was born at Pergola, a little town in the Duchy of Urbino, a few leagues from Pesaro,) was born in 1707. Having hardly attained the age of ten years, the young Jesi was taken to Naples, where, in the noble families of Stigliano and Maddaloni he found protectors, who caused him, in 1717, to enter the Conservatory of St. Onofrio (not that of the Poveri di Gesù Cristo, as Boyer says, in his account copied by all biographers). Gaetano Grecco, who had gone from the latter Conservatory to that of St. Onofrio, directed all the musical studies of Jesi, who received from his fellow students the name Pergolèsi, under which he has become celebrated. Although the style of the Neapolitan School was not less severe than that of the old Roman masters, still Grecco, a pupil of ALESSANDRO SCARLATI, had preserved the tradition of a pure and elegant harmony and of scientific forms which were neglected by the generation which followed. Pergolèse followed the traditions of his master in his earlier productions; but later, influenced by the example of VINCI, formerly his fellow student, he looked upon dramatic expression as the principal end of the art and introduced this expression even into his Church Music.

Leaving the Conservatoire after nine years of labor and study, he composed for the Fathers of the Oratory of the Gerolimini, the oratorio entitled San Guglielmo, considered his first work. The prince of Agliano, having heard this production, employed him to write for the Theatre dei Fiorentini, the intermezzo, Amor fa l'uomo cieco, which however did not succeed, and was followed, at the theatre of St. Bartholomew, by the serious opera, Rocimero, which succeeded no better. Pergolèse, discouraged, seemed to renounce the theatre after this second failure and devoted himself during nearly two years to instrumental and religious music. It was at this time that he composed nearly thirty trios (for two violins and bass) which the prince of Stigliano, first Equerry of the King of Naples, had requested of him, of which twenty-four have been published in London and Amsterdam. In 1730 he wrote for the theatre of St. Bartholomew his hitherto opera, la Serva padrona, a chef d'œuvre of spiritual melody, elegance and dramatic truth, in which the genius of the composer triumphed over the monotony of two characters, who hardly ever leave the stage, and of an orchestra, reduced to the proportions of a quartet. The success of this opera was almost the only complete success that Pergolèse obtained in his whole life. Il Maestro di Musica and Il Geloso, which followed it, did not at first succeed, and were only prized at their real worth, after the death of the author. In the month of May, 1734, Pergolèse obtained the title of Chapel Master of the Church of Our Lady of Loretto, and went to take possession of this post. The following year he went to Rome to write the Olympiad for the Tordinone theatre. The bad luck which persecuted him followed him there also, for his opera experienced a dismal failure, although there were in it two airs and a duet of a remarkable and penetrating expression. DUNI (who supplied Boyer with the greater part of the anecdotes for his biography of Pergolèse) relates also the following concerning the Olympiad. Having been summoned to Rome, to write an opera, called Nero, which was to be played after the opera of Pergolèse, who was his fellow student at the Conservatoire at Naples, he did not dare to write a single note of his work till he had heard the Olympiad; but after one performance he reassured himself, seeing that the beauties which were scattered throughout that opera, would not be understood.

"There are too many details entirely above the comprehension of a common audience," said he to Pergolèse, "they will pass unnoticed, and you will not succeed. My opera will not be worth so much as yours; but, more simple, it will prove more successful." The event justified his prediction, for the Olympiad, performed in the spring of 1735, was ill received by the Romans. Overwhelmed by this failure, Pergolèse, renouncing the theatre forever, returned to Loreto, where he henceforth occupied himself wholly in the composition of Church Music. But his dissolute habits had already impaired his constitution; a disease of the chest appeared, and physicians decided that a change of climate was necessary. The composer, wishing to try that of Naples, went to Puzzoli, near that city on the sea shore; and it was here he composed his famous Stabat Mater, the beautiful cantata Orpheus, and the Salve Regina, which was the last of his works. The uncertainty which prevails in regard to many of the important circumstances relative to this great musician exists also in respect to the time of his death, most of the biographers fixing it in 1737, though Maffei assures us that he died in 1739, at the age of thirty-two. Rumors of poison were circulated, and obtained some credit, but were proved to be without foundation. The decline of his health, of which the cause has been given above, was slow and gradual. But no sooner had his eyes been closed, than the indifference with which he had been treated by his countrymen gave place to the keenest regrets. From that moment his reputation began to spread; his operas were played in all the theatres; Rome revived his Olympiad, applauding it with transport; and finally, even in the churches, into which it would seem fashion should not enter, for several years hardly any other music was heard than that of the author of the Stabat. In France, where an almost complete ignorance of the existence of the great artists of foreign countries prevailed, the music of Pergolèse was introduced fourteen years after the death of the composer, by an Italian troupe of ordinary singers, and excited transports of admiration. La Serva padrona and Il Maestro di Musica were translated into French, represented on the stage, and the parts engraved. In Sacred Concerts, also, the Stabat Mater obtained an enthusiastic success, and several editions of it were published. At last nothing more was wanting to the glory of Pergolèse, and, as always happened in a reaction against injustice, his merits were exaggerated, in considering him as the master of masters, although he is inferior to SCARLATTI and LEO in dramatic force, and although in his church music there are characteristics ill adapted to the character of the words.

The Padre MARRINI accuses the Stabat of containing passages more appropriate for an opera than for a penitential hymn, and he even makes citations which recall analogous passages of La Serva padrona; and, though one must confess that his criticism is not entirely without foundation, it is just to say, that examples of this kind are rare, and that few religious compositions in the concerted style are of more touching expression than the first verse of the Stabat and the Quando Corpus. The Salve Regina for a single voice, two violins, bass and organ, is also a model of expression; although less celebrated than the Stabat Mater, it may be considered as a most perfect composition and of superior merit. His compositions for the church are sixteen in number, including beside the Stabat Mater and Salve Regina two entire Masses, and several Kyries, Dixits, Laudates and other compositions. His operas and other secular compositions, most of the titles of which have been given above, are ten in number, including trios already mentioned.

THE SPHERE OF DREAMS.

BY C. P. CRANCH.

Sweet Dream, that shimmered o'er me in the night
And stole my heart away,
Warmer wert thou in pulses of delight
Than this return of day:—
Day—usher of the cheap and vulgar life
Lived, brooded o'er and o'er—
The weary knot that seeks the severing knife;
The crowd about the door,
That roars and frets, until we turn the key
In stolen solitude,
And in the spirit's inmost privacy
Escape the ruffian brood.
Sweet dream-world! Cradled in thy dawning hour
We lose one life, but find
The wild aroma of some long lost flower
In days that once were kind.
Life's murky clouds are tipped with golden ray,
And harshest circumstance
Transfigured stands—or reels and fades away
As in a spectral dance.
Nor reck we of the customs, creeds and laws
That hem yon mortals in;
But live as lives the budding rose, because
Child-conscience knows no sin.
O wild, strange dreams, some truthful texts ye give
For nature's free dominion:
Why should we not be maskers all and live
Above the world's opinion?
Children of sleep—illuminated letters
Amid our dusky leaves—
Angels who smite in twain the iron fetters
In which the spirit grieves—
O come as ye have come—like festivals,
And hang your flower-festoons
Around the columns of the heart's wide halls;
And let the brightest moons
Flood all the windows, while the orient
Breathes in a spicy breeze,
And all the calm of summer time is sent
From shadows of the trees.

Improvement of the Ear.

The first step for improving a musical ear is the correct appreciation of the intervals of notes, which is most speedily and effectually accomplished, according to our experience, by learning to tune any stringed instrument with accuracy. A minuteness of tact is thus acquired, which no other exercise can ever produce. The violin, the harp, the guitar, &c., may be made choice of for this purpose, and the tuning taught and practised independent at first of any efforts to play; for we think it quite possible to teach tuning separately from playing, and think that this would be a great improvement on musical education.

Madame Mara was originally taught the violin, which, we have no doubt, accounts in part for her fine delicacy of ear. "Had I a daughter," said she, "I would have her taught the violin before she sung a note; for how," continued she, "can you best convey a just notion of slight variations in the pitch of a note? By a fixed instrument? No. By the voice?—No. But by sliding the finger upon the string, you instantly make the most minute variation visibly as well as audibly perceptible." The principle is unquestionable, and we must urge the practice to be carefully followed up by all who are anxious to improve their musical perceptions and their ear for music.

The exercises for improving the ear will be best pointed out by a master; but without the accurate and persevering practice of tuning, we are of opinion that even the finest natural ear will be deficient in delicacy and accuracy. Intonation, as Mr. Bacon remarks, is the highest possible requisite of a singer; and the main impediment that stands in the way of obtaining this is ignorance of the desired interval. It is indeed a received opinion, that to sing the scale in perfect tune is, as it were, an act of simple uninformed nature; whereas, in truth, it is purely an act of imitation. There can be no doubt, consequently, that to blend the tuning of an instrument with the practice of the first elements, must be useful, if not indispensable. We have observed the effect so often that we cannot hesitate in thinking that a variation from the pitch frequently proceeds from an erroneous notion of the interval, rather than from any failure in the organ to obey the will. This, from habit, becomes inveterate, and confirms occasional errors, so that even good singers sometimes find it impossible to correct an original misapprehension of a particular passage or note caught from first learning the air by an instrument out of tune.

Much depends on the communication of the first principles in the first few lessons. Most amateurs are destroyed at the outset. Some assistance in attaining the knowledge of intervals may be afforded by the power of numbers and an acquaintance with the arithmetical differences between the notes of the scale. Figures, indeed, will convey no accurate sensible idea through the ear; but a knowledge of the precise relations will instruct the mind and act as coadjutor to that organ. In the same way a general notion of temperament may be given, and the beautiful effects of particular keys upon a fixed instrument, illustrated, and the necessary compliances and deviations pointed out. We may admit the general truth of the common rule, that all keys are alike to a singer; but we must also admit that a conformity to temperament is both frequently necessary, and that it often heightens the expression of a song. For, if this is not the case, why do composers select particular keys; why prefer A with flats, to A with sharps, and the contrary? The melancholy effect of the one and the brilliancy of the other are entirely produced by the temperament. It should seem, therefore, that a defect may be softened into a beauty, though the possession of this power can only consist with an accurate understanding of the differences, which can be communicated by no other means, so rapidly and so certainly as by practically tuning some stringed instrument, as has just been recommended.

The counting of time, in its various modifications, is considered a criterion of the correctness of the ear. All knowledge of sound is acquired by imitation and comparison; no verbal definitions of time, unassisted by practical demonstration, can ever convey any precise ideas, nor does the ear arrive at the power of distinguishing without much practice. This faculty is, therefore, scarcely to be considered simply as an act of the ear. We compare two sounds, indeed, by means of the ear; but we remember certain rules by which we are to determine, and which must be founded on ideas acquired from art. A singer never fails to adopt the scale of that instrument by which he has been taught. Scholars are addicted even to the faults of their masters. It is, therefore, apparent that in the formation of the ear, as much depends upon instruction as upon nature; and the excellence or defect of the ear can only be ascertained during the progress of tuition, by careful and repeated trials.

The just appreciation of harmony is a more advanced step in the process of cultivating the ear. An uninstructed person, however fine his natural ear for music, can have no proper relish for the music of the full orchestra; for this plain reason, that he cannot understand it, and is confounded rather than delighted. It requires both practice and much observation and experience to acquire a taste for this; for we think it quite possible to have an exquisite taste for simple melody, without the least relish for the complicated harmony of a full concert, or the display of the art of counterpoint.

A Visit to Mozart.

[From the "Reminiscences of Michael Kelly."]

I went one evening to a concert of the celebrated Kozeluch's, a great composer for the piano-forte, as well as a fine performer on that instrument. I saw there the composers Vanhall and Baron Dittersdorf; and, what was to me one of the greatest gratifications of my musical life, was there introduced to that prodigy of genius—Mozart. He favored the company by performing fantasias and capriccios on the piano-forte. His feeling, the rapidity of his fingers, the great execution and strength of his left hand particularly, and the apparent inspiration of his modulations, astounded me. After this splendid performance we sat down to supper, and I had the pleasure to be placed at table between him and his wife, Madame Constance Weber, a German lady, of whom he was passionately fond, and by whom he had three children. He conversed with me a good deal about Thomas Linley, the first Mrs. Sheridan's brother, with whom he was intimate at Florence, and spoke of him with great affection. He said that Linley was a true genius; and he felt that, had he lived, he would have been one of the greatest ornaments of the musical world. After supper the young branches of our host had a dance, and Mozart joined them. Madame Mozart told me, that great as his genius was, he was an enthusiast in dancing, and often said that his taste lay in that art, rather than in music.

He was a remarkably small man, very thin and pale, with a profusion of fine fair hair, of which he was rather vain. He gave me a cordial invitation to his house, of which I availed myself, and passed a great part of my time there. He always received me with kindness and hospitality.—He was remarkably fond of punch, of which beverage I have seen him take copious draughts. He was also fond of billiards, and had an excellent billiard table in his house. Many and many a game have I played with him, but always came off second best. He gave Sunday concerts, at which I never was missing. He was kind-hearted, and always ready to oblige; but so very particular, when he played, that if the slightest noise were made, he instantly left off. He one day made me sit down to the piano, and gave credit to my first master, who had taught me to place my hand well on the instrument.—He conferred on me what I considered a high compliment. I had composed a little melody to Metastasio's canzonetta, "Grazie agl' inganni tuoi," which was a great favorite wherever I sang it. It was very simple, but had the good fortune to please Mozart. He took it and composed variations upon it which were truly beautiful; and had the farther kindness and condescension to play them wherever he had an opportunity.

Encouraged by his flattering approbation, I attempted several little airs, which I shewed him, and which he kindly approved of; so much indeed, that I determined to devote myself to the study of counterpoint, and consulted with him, by whom I ought to be instructed.—He said, "My good lad, you ask my advice, and I will give it you candidly; had you studied composition when you were at Naples, and when your mind was not devoted to other pursuits, you would perhaps have done wisely; but now that your profession of the stage must, and ought, to occupy all your attention, it would be an unwise measure to enter into a dry study. You may take my word for it. Nature has made you a melodist, and you would only disturb and perplex yourself. Reflect, 'a little knowledge is a dangerous thing';—should there be errors in what you write, you will find hundreds of musicians, in all parts of the world, capable of correcting them; therefore do not disturb your natural gift."

"Melody is the essence of music," continued he; "I compare a good melodist to a fine racer, and counterpointists to hack post-horses; therefore be advised, let well alone, and remember the old Italian proverb—'Chi sa più, meno sa'—Who knows most, knows least.'" The opinion of this great man made on me a lasting impression.

My friend Attwood (a worthy man, and an ornament to the musical world) was Mozart's favorite scholar, and it gives me great pleasure to record what Mozart said to me about him; his words were, "Attwood is a young man for whom I have a sincere affection and esteem; he conducts himself with great propriety, and I feel much pleasure in telling you, that he partakes more of my style than any scholar I ever had; and I predict, that he will prove a sound musician." Mozart was very liberal in giving praise to those who deserved it; but felt a thorough contempt for insolent mediocrity.

SINGING AND PRAYING.—In a small country town, located in the vicinity of the junction of the Chenango with the Susquehanna river, there is a church in which the singing had, to use their own phrase, 'run completely down.' It had been led for many years by one of the deacons, whose voice and musical powers had been gradually giving out. One evening, on an occasion of interest, the clergyman gave out the hymn, which was sung even worse than usual—the deacon of course, leading off. Upon its conclusion, the minister arose and requested Brother — to repeat the hymn, as he could not conscientiously pray after such singing. The deacon very composedly 'pitched' it to another tune, and it was again performed with manifestly a little improvement upon the first time. The clergyman said no more, but proceeded with his prayer. He had finished, and taken the book to give out a second hymn, when he was interrupted by Deacon — gravely getting up, and saying, in a voice audible to the whole congregation, 'Will Mr. — please make another prayer? It will be impossible for me to sing after such praying as that!'—Knickerbocker.

ANTIQUITY OF THE SACKBUT, DULCIMER, &c.—A well known passage in Daniel puts it out of all doubt, that music was cultivated and brought to a considerable degree of perfection amongst them, if we may judge by the number and variety of the instruments mentioned in it, of which the names of two occur for the first time in the sacred writings, viz: the sackbut and dulcimer. "Nebuchadnezzar the King made an image of gold, whose height was three-score cubits, and the breadth thereof six cubits. Then an herald cried aloud, to you it is commanded, O people, nations and languages, that at what time ye hear the sound of the Cornet, Flute, Harp, Sackbut, Psalter, Dulcimer, and all kinds of music, ye fall down and worship the golden image which Nebuchadnezzar the King hath set up." There are various conjectures concerning the Sackbut and Dulcimer; it is thought that the Sackbut was a wind instrument, formed of the root of the tree, and played upon by stops like a Flute. An ancient Sackbut was found in the ruins of Pompeii, and appears to have resembled our modern Trombone, which was formed by the Italians, from the one they discovered in the ashes of Vesuvius, where it had been buried nearly two thousand years. Whether the Sackbut was ever lost, or only fell into disuse, is not certain. The ancient one, found at Pompeii, was presented to his late Majesty King George the Fourth, by His Sicilian Majesty. It is made of bronze, with the upper and mouth-piece of gold, and its tone is said to be unrivalled. The Dulcimer is supposed by the Padre Martini to have signified a concert of instruments or voices, rather than any single instrument. The possession of these instruments, and the reference of several passages in the sacred writings, are sufficient proofs that music was cultivated amongst the Babylonians, and the Padre Martini naturally supposes that, as this people were everywhere celebrated for luxury and splendor, their music partook of the character. The Assyrians invented a Trigonum or Triangulum, a stringed instrument of a triangular shape, played upon with a plectrum. The Trigonum is supposed to have been the instrument which King David played upon, but that is a fact which cannot be easily decided, on account of the difference in the numbers of the strings; for David is mentioned as playing upon the ten-stringed harp, whereas the one we have just described contains twelve strings. The Phœnicians had several musical instruments, one called after their own country, Phœnices, and another called Nablum or Nebel, which was played upon at the feasts of Bacchus. There were also a number of other tribes in Asia, such as the Edomites, the Moabites, the Phrygians, the Lydians, the Etruscians, the Ionians, and the Dorians, of whose manners and customs we know very little, but we may presume that they studied and promoted the science of music, for we find that several of the Grecian modes derived their names from some of these countries, as the Lydian, Phrygian, Dorian, &c.—(From T. H. Tomlinson's Lectures on Oriental Music.)

HOW VERDI COMPOSES.—When Verdi has an opera to compose, he waits patiently until the midnight bell has tolled. He then enters his study, in which there is a piano placed between a big drum and cymbals, and seating himself at the piano, he first bangs the drum on the right hand, then crashes the cymbals on the left hand, then thumps the piano in the midst, and while the air is reverberating with the mingled sounds, he commences the first chorus. This is the way Verdi composes. Can anybody have a doubt on the subject?

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JUNE 4, 1853.

A Fortnight in New York.

It was no musical pilgrimage which tempted us away this time—at least not the hope of hearing music; for the great metropolis of our Western world, like our own smaller, but not less music-loving city, had got through its "season;" and this year's May was not made musical, like last year's, with the departing glories of a Jenny Lind. This time Art offered us no human voice more fresh, and more inspiring and more full of the soul's summer than the birds and breezes of the green woods to which the weary fast-livers of the town are now all busily making or planning their escape. There were no fine public concerts or operas in New York in these last weeks of Spring; only some dregs of the feast remained,—a few scattering third-rate concerts, of the miscellaneous order, from which category even we reluctantly found ourselves unable to except (as a whole) the farewell concert of ALBONI, who has now looked as well as sung her last to a country which, though fairly prizing the unrivalled sensuous beauty of her voice and execution, and glad to witness such a large and luscious bit of nature, has not been magnetized into any high state of enthusiasm or made to feel much lasting influence therefrom. This bird has flown, back to its own sunny clime; but the rest, of all degrees, still linger and flutter doubtfully and idly about New York, as if waiting for some movement, some new Napoleon manager to re-organize their orchestra and give them occupation. The experienced opera-goer meets on Broadway the disjecta membra of every opera that has visited the States for the last ten years or more. The well-known black-mustachioed baritones and basses and tenors, principals and chorus-singers, lately prominent or long since superseded, are seen upon hotel steps smoking, and on all corners discussing, with vehement gesticulation, as it were the wrongs wherewith they smart from cruel managers and shockingly ungrateful publics, that could hesitate about repaying the luxury of such voices with the state of princes.

The courtly Badiali and others of Sontag's principals appear upon the streets, and there is rumor or suspicion of cheap summer operas preparing in cool Castle Garden. Max Maretzek is seen too, quickly moving through the crowd, who read in his bright face of recent Southern success and wonder whether something new is in the wind, now that the operatic field is clear. There are even strong hints that he has already organized a company, with Steffanone as the prima, though no official announcement of such fact appears. Salvi too was named, but the newspapers are down upon the spoiled favorite for sullen airs and wilful misdemeanors not so easily forgotten, and threaten trouble should he try to sing; so that one is puzzled to know where the elements of a successful opera may come from.

Mme. ALBONI drew out of course a large and warmly disposed audience at her farewell, quite filling the lower part of Metropolitan Hall. There was abundance of applause, bravos, bouquets and all that, with every sign of hearty respect and good will; and yet, with the exception of a small class of indomitable enthusiasts, we think there must have been a general disappointment in the concert. It certainly was got up in a slipshod, miscellaneous manner. The orchestra, under the lead of ARDITI, in compliment to whom Alboni gave the concert, was abominably noisy, blundering and out of tune. How much to allow for the peculiar hon-resonance of that large and showy hall we knew not; but the fortissimos of the hacknied overtures to Martha and Masaniello seemed to bang and thump upon our tympanum, rather than to vibrate musically and strongly through the room. STRAKOSCH, the "unrivalled pianist," played banjo tunes and "Old folks at home," with extraordinary variations, naturally followed by volleys of senseless hand-clapping, the chief success which such things seek. ROSA DE VRIES sang her parts well, though with a voice hard and worn, and ROVERE with—we forget now which other basso, gave but a passable rendering of the Cenerentola duet. Alboni herself was not herself. There was evident displeasure and lack of interest in her face and manner for some time, nor did the voice renew all the luscious charm of former hearings. Casta Diva we have always thought a poor selection for her, conceived as it is wholly in the spirit of a pure soprano and requiring to be lowered to her compass; you wonder at the talent that can make such easy conquest in spheres not native to it, more than you enjoy the music thus appropriated. Another absurd freak of ambitious talent was the assuming with her soft contralto of the part of Carlos in the splendid Carlo Magno finale to Ernani, whose harmonies all pivot so essentially on the manly and sonorous baritone; it made the whole thing baseless and top-heavy;—think of those soaring unisons of soprano and tenor, sung by DEVRIES, and Sig. FORTI, who here singularly "turned up" again after a silence of three years! But the Di tanti palpiti so admirably suited this peculiarly Rossinian singer, that one wondered why it had not before figured in her American programmes, and still more why she left off the fine introductory recitative: O! patria. The Ah non credea and Ah non giunge closed the evening in the true Alboni style. On the whole, the last impression of the great contralto would have been better had this concert not been given.

There were other concerts, which we did not witness;—one by Mrs. BOSTWICK, aided by that modest, excellent young Belgian violinist, M. APPY, and the flutist, SIEDE,—not very well attended; another by Madame FERENCZY, of unfortunate Musical Fund memory in Boston, whom even little JULLIEN'S magic bow, with TIMM and EISFELD and a nice orchestra, saved not from a complete failure. Pity that the hundreds which Hungarian sympathy sank for the singer in these preparations, could not have been given directly to the lady, without the awkward prestige of an abortive concert. Exacting as the public taste now is, it is a grave matter to announce a concert on one's own account, and we would gladly believe that not many more indifferent artists would rush forward in this way to burn their fingers, before learning to estimate their own powers and position rightly. The concert-giving mania is the ruin of many respectable but mediocre talents, who must learn to be content not to shine in the foreground before they can thrive even according to their measure. And for the listening public is it not well, that only eminent and real artists should attract full houses? For talents of inferior degree less arduous spheres are open; but the great occasions, where the multitudes go out as one man, should be those that invite and hold us under the influence of great Art. It is a sin for mediocrity to speculate on the prestige of genius.

But the lack of public musical opportunities was most agreeably supplied, in our case, by choice private feasts of harmony. New York is rich in the possession of several accomplished, genial, genuine artists of the piano, who have scrupulously kept their talent safe above the corrupting influence of concert-playing and the temptation to resort to cheap effects, after the example of the fleet-fingered adventurers who came one after another to astonish and to spoil the (musically) childish public. Superior teachers, they earn their livelihoods by days of hard and faithful toil, and when called upon to enrich now and then a concert, they do not have to stoop from the true dignity of Art, but play sound and inspiring music such as their own souls love, and sink themselves in the beautiful or grand thoughts of the master tone-poets whom it is their privilege and joy to interpret. But it is in sweet private hours, in the select circle of friends, that their music flows out most willingly and most inspiringly. Think of two evenings with our friend Herr Tonwacker, if you can do so without envying us, O reader! That "studio," already celebrated in these pages, was richer than ever with fine busts and statuettes and rare engravings from the noblest old and modern artists, cases of well-read volumes of German and English poets, &c., conspiring with the grand piano to make unitary harmony through all the senses to the inmost soul. Eight years of the best joys of art and friendship have consecrated this happy bachelor abode of Tonwacker;—verily he deserveth one joy more, man's sweetest blessing, in which all art and poetry and fine sympathies do culminate and concentrate and grow perpetual!

Like tastes, like friends. There were poets and painters, as well as musical artists and amateurs, in the little company. Such kindred spirits, by the force of instinct and innate attraction, congregate about a musician who can express their loves and longing, their ideals and enthusiasms like this man. If there is one thing finer than another in the great city, redeeming the noise and rush and worldliness of its fast and feverish life, it is the social intimacy of its artists. These form the nucleus of "our best society," in a sense opposite as possible to Putnam's irony. For Art creates an atmosphere of true and genial life; Art blends and reconciles the spiritual and the material in the social element of artists as well as in their works. It takes the freedom and cosmopolitan multitudinous variety of a great gathering place of all the nations, like New York, to make such genial society possible; for freedom is the first essential of all grace and geniality. Would there were time to take our readers to the galleries of pictures and the studios of some of the most promising of New York artists! "Hafiz" shall do that for us, if opportunity shall favor his good will. Mean while, much as we saw to admire in these young artists' works, it was the life, the social atmosphere of Art around them, that interested us even more, and made us long for the time when this spell of Art shall, by the influence of poetry and painting and architecture, and above all Music, be thrown over this whole people, to give tone and depth and spirituality and harmony to our whole American life, and make known and felt, as so few know and feel it now, the meaning of the word genial.

Literary.

PUTNAM'S MONTHLY. The June number completes the first volume of this eminently successful Magazine. The six numbers form a book rich with light and serious papers as well worth preserving, as they were refreshing on their first appearance to readers who had long thirsted for something fresh and vigorous in our native periodical literature. The very sight and name of American magazinery had become sickening. We were driven to reprints of foreign matter, as the only reading. But at last we have a monthly supply of miscellany that is all original and full of life and character. The best and boldest thought of the times, tempered with good taste and genial humanities, appears in Putnam. Its tone is generous and earnest, even when under a playful garb. Its poetry is select, printed because it is poetry, and not because would-be poets must be rushing into print. Its notices of Art and Music are wholesome and appreciating. It speaks a true word of culture to our busy, heterogeneous population. Pleasantly it mirrors the times and scenes and activities amid which we live, viewed in the light of the best thought and purpose of the times. It is a good, wholesome American sort of literature,—not in that narrow and absurd sense of the word American, which must have a red Indian or a raw Kentuckian in every poem, tale or picture,—but in the only sense distinctive of this gathering place of all the races, the sense of universality, of cosmopolitan large sympathies, to which mere nationalities are as vulgar as provincialisms.

The success of Putnam is truly a refreshing sign. A circulation of near 40,000 copies has been gained in six months. Were it the namby-pamby, small-beer sort of literature, this would not be so astonishing. But the testimony of the 40,000 is for the strong meat and generous wine of the best intellects. The editors have been alike exacting of their contributors and of themselves. Out of 500 pieces volunteered, (many with famous names appended) not more than twenty have passed muster, we are told. And they still adhere to the wise plan of the anonymous, which places every article on its own merit, so that obscure talent has an equal chance before the public with the most renowned.

The present number is one of the most solid, rich and readable that has yet appeared.

Music in the West.

[One of the "Germanians" has been kind enough to write us of their experiences out West. The principal paragraphs will interest our readers. The letter bears date St. Louis, Mo., May 29th, 1853.]

"Speaking of the standard of music in the West, in general, I am pleased to say, that people are further progressed than I was aware of, and that good music is very much desired, and also greatly appreciated. We have been called upon in every city, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati and Louisville, to perform a Symphony; and you know that we are not slow in complying with so sensible a request. We have given three concerts in Pittsburgh to full houses, six in Cincinnati, including one we gave in connection with the "Amateur Musical Association." Speaking of this Society, I cannot omit to express our opinion, for they really do deserve to be encouraged. This company, consisting of about 150 singers, ladies and gentlemen, belonging partly to some of the first families in Cincinnati, have been studying Oratorios and Cantatas under the direction of Mr. VICTOR WILLIAMS, a thorough musician, for the last year or two, and have several times given concerts, largely attended by the music-loving community of Cincinnati. I witnessed Haydn's "Creation" and was much pleased as far as the chorus was concerned; the solos, however, with the exception of Mlle. LEHMANN, who sang the principal airs, left much to wish for. The orchestra was made up of different associations and was very poor. The "Germanians," in connection with the "Amateur Association," performed Romberg's "Power of Song" and Ries's "Morning," two productions of an ancient character and although full of pleasing melodies, scarcely worthy of being produced where we can hear Handel's, Haydn's or Beethoven's masterly works. The impression which the "Germania" has left in Cincinnati, I can safely assert, is not easily wiped out, for we have now, this morning, for the fourth time, received letters from enthusiastic admirers of music imploring us to pay them another visit. The Concerts were generally very well attended.

"From Cincinnati we visited Louisville. Our expectations of this city were rather high, and I am sorry to confess, that to a certain degree, we were rather disappointed. We have met with some gentlemen amateurs in this place, who, from a visit to Europe or the Eastern cities, carried with them a recollection of good and solid music, and who have done everything possible to make our stay pleasant and agreeable, and have not ceased in bestowing their praises on the productions of our Society; they have also, by their influence, succeeded in gathering crowds in the Concert Hall. But as for the public in general, they are scarcely ripe to appreciate what is offered. We have played there two Symphonies, Beethoven's C minor and Spohr's "Consecration of Tones;" but I am afraid that they thought strange of such music; a Waltz, Polka, &c., I guess, would have been more pleasing; at least, their conversation during our performance annoyed us very much. The first evening, during the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture, Mr. Bergmann had actually to stop the orchestra until conversation ceased. Another very annoying custom seems to prevail all over the Western country, perhaps Cincinnati excepted. People come to the concert, either just at the hour of commencement, or 15 to 30 minutes later, which naturally is a great disturbance to those who come for the sake of enjoying the music. The general impression we left in Louisville is very favorable and everybody there seems to think our audiences numbered more than they are used to see in the Concert room, although we do not complain of the immense lot of money that we brought away.

"Last night we gave our second concert in St. Louis, and are very well satisfied with the attendance; the first was well filled, but the second was crowded; and people here are more enthusiastic than in any of the previous places; they encore nearly every piece and do not cease to express their delight. However I must add, that one half of the audience is composed of Germans.

"I send you enclosed some programmes, from which you perceive that we have thus far performed the C minor Sinfonie, the "Pastoral," and the "Consecration of Tones," to the Western people, and thus have, (it being the first time they ever heard a sinfonie) given them an idea of the good and true in Art.

"Before closing my letter, I cannot omit to speak of some resident music bands here and in Louisville; they are as good, if not better than many in the East and add much to the refinement of musical taste. We have listened to arrangements from operas and even overtures, which were well executed and only lacked strength and unity to be pronounced really good. The orchestras in Pittsburgh and Louisville favored us with serenades and it gave us much pleasure to listen. JAELL and URSO have everywhere created the greatest sensation and added much to make our concerts attractive."

MR. KEYZER'S CONCERT, on Saturday evening, was not so fully attended, as we had hoped that it would be and as its merits deserved; and we believe that if it had been known what a grateful refuge could be found in the Lecture Room of the Music Hall from the sultry July heat of the evening, many more would have attended this concert. We did not hear the Mozart Quartet (No. 1 in C Minor) with which the concert began.

MR. LANGE played a very pleasing piano piece of his own composition, "A Night in the Tropics," in a very pleasing manner; but we were less satisfied with his performance of CHOPIN's "Fairy Dance," and still less with that of one of MENDELSSOHN's Lieder ohne Worte (No. 6 in Part 5) which he gave in answer to an encore; this was heavy and wanting in the spirit and brilliancy with which Jaell and Dresel have given it. Messrs. RYAN and RIBAS gave a clarinet and an oboe solo, in their usual excellent style and received deserved applause. The great feature of the concert, however, though it was made up of good things—indeed, of the best—was the Double Quartet of SPOHR. This was excellently well given, and well received, though it is one of those elaborate and learned compositions which one wishes to hear many times to appreciate, and should be played many times to be given as it should be. To us it was new; but exceedingly pleasing and interesting, and played with unusual spirit and accuracy, so far as we could judge. We hope that it may be played again in the course of the next season. Mr. Keyzer played two violin solos—an Adagio religioso by Spohr, and a fantasia by Rodé. Mr. Keyzer is one of the old school of players, and makes no pretence at giving us the miracles of execution of the later school of the present day, but we know few who give with truer expression and more correct and pleasing style and intonation the substantial classic violin music of an earlier period. Beside this, we never hear Mr. Keyzer, without recalling the days of the old Academy and the Concerts at the Odéon, where we were first initiated into the love of Beethoven and first taught many things now familiar to us as household works. It is pleasant to recall those days, and we wish that more of Mr. Keyzer's friends of that time could have been present at his concert.

Musical Intelligence.

The annual meeting of the Stockholders of the Boston Music Hall Association will be held at the Music Hall (Winter street entrance) on Wednesday, the 8th day of June, 1853, at half-past three o'clock in the afternoon.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.—At a large meeting of the Handel and Haydn Society, at the ware-rooms of Mr. Hews, May 30th, the following officers were chosen for the ensuing year: Silas P. Meriam, President; John Dodd, Vice President; J. L. Fairbanks, Secretary; Matthew S. Parker, Treasurer; Trustees, O. J. Faxon, C. P. Adams, John A. Nowell, H. L. Hazleton, John F. Payson, John H. Pray, George Hews, J. Haskell Long, and L. B. Barnes.—Transcript.

The Germania Musical Society have re-engaged the Boston Music Hall for the next musical season, commencing about the 20th of October.

MME. ALBONI sailed for Europe in the Africa, last Wednesday.

Master PAUL JULLIEN is about to accompany the pianist STRAKOSCH, on a concertizing tour.

We had the pleasure, while in New York last week, of passing an hour in the new "Normal Music Institute." Mr. Lowell Mason, with characteristic tact, was teaching the class to appreciate the value of light and shade in the delivery of tone in choral masses; and right eagerly was the lesson devoured by as earnest and intelligent a looking body of young men and women as we have often seen assembled. There were about fifty of them, who had come from all parts of the country, to spend three months in New York, at an expense of some two hundred dollars each, for the pure sake of getting better ideas of music, which they might teach when they go home.

PHILADELPHIA.—The City Item says:

On Monday evening the directors of the Harmonia Sacred Music Society held a very full meeting, at which a committee was appointed to procure the plans and specifications necessary to construct an immense concert room, in Broad street, at the cost of $100,000. Of this sum a large amount is already pledged by some of our leading capitalists and merchants. The intention is to have four first class stores on the ground floor, and three halls on the second, one of which will seat between four and five thousand persons. In this hall will be placed the great organ of the society, now building, and we would mention that very recently a fourth row of keys has been added to this instrument, making it still larger than was at first intended. The Hall is to be commenced during the present season, if the ground can be cleared in time, and by next spring Philadelphia may rely upon possessing the largest concert room in the United States.

The past season has been one of great profit to this young society, and the prospects for next Fall are still more promising. An arrangement has been made with the composer of the Cantata of Belshazzar to write another for the Concerts of the Society to be given next winter.

Advertisements.

FOURTH EDITION.

MARX'S MUSICAL COMPOSITION.

WE have just published the Fourth Edition of the THEORY AND PRACTICE OF MUSICAL COMPOSITION, by Dr. A. B. MARX, translated from the third German edition, by HERMAN S. SARONI. Price $2.50.

Copies will be sent by mail, prepaid, to any part of the country, on the receipt of THREE DOLLARS.

Published by MASON BROTHERS, 23 Park Row, New York. For sale by OLIVER DITSON, 115 Washington Street, Boston.

ZUNDEL'S NEW ORGAN BOOK, THE AMATEUR ORGANIST.

A Collection of Opening and Closing Voluntaries, original or arranged from the works of the most celebrated composers, the whole forming an excellent course of study for the Organ or Melodeon. By JOHN ZUNDEL, Organist of St. George's Church, &c. Price $1.50.

Published by MASON BROTHERS, 23 Park Row, New York. For sale by OLIVER DITSON, 115 Washington Street, Boston.

NEW EDITION...JUST READY.

THE GENTLEMAN'S GLEE BOOK,

Consisting of a Selection of Glees, for Men's voices, adapted principally from the most admired German composers. By LOWELL MASON. Price $1. This Collection has heretofore been very popular. It contains nearly one hundred Glees, the words of which are mostly original, or especially translated from the German, and is the only work of the kind published in the country.

Published by MASON BROTHERS, 23 Park Row, New York. For sale by OLIVER DITSON, 115 Washington Street, Boston.

HASTINGS ON MUSICAL TASTE. THIS DAY PUBLISHED,

A DISSERTATION ON MUSICAL TASTE... By THOMAS HASTINGS, Esq. 12mo. cloth. Price $1.25. This work is comprised in seventeen chapters, and is very thorough, treating of Principles of Style in Execution; Practical Distinctions in regard to Selection and Execution; Union of Voices and Instruments; Management of the same in Church Music; Observations on Composition; Melody and Harmony; Lyrical Themes; Church Music; The Opera and Oratorio; Specific Claims of Devotional Music; Methods of Improvement in Devotional Music, &c.

Published by MASON BROTHERS, 23 Park Row, New York. For sale by OLIVER DITSON, 115 Washington Street, Boston.

A. W. FRENZEL,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC, and late Leader of the "SAXONIA ORCHESTRA," having made Boston his residence, is prepared to give Lessons on the Piano-Forte and in Singing, both in the English and German languages; also to accompany with the violin more advanced pupils in the Sonata-duos of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c. During the summer season, Mr. F. offers his services to classes out of town. Or he will receive scholars, from the city or the country, at his Music Rooms, No. 4 Pine Street, Boston, where he may always be found before 10 A. M., and between the hours of 1 and 3 P. M.

Pianos and Melodeons to Let.

OLIVER DITSON,

Music Dealer, 115 Washington St., Boston,

HAS a good variety of Piano Fortes, Melodeons, Seraphines, and Reed Organs, to let, for city or country, on low terms. If, within one year from the time of hiring, the party should conclude to purchase the instrument, no charge will be made for rent of it, except the interest on its value.

JUST PUBLISHED,

THE STABAT MATER, by Rossini, at the low price of 75 cents.

Oliver Ditson, 115 Wash'g'on St.

BEETHOVEN'S CELEBRATED MASS in C, IN VOCAL SCORE:

With an Accompaniment for the Organ or Piano-Forte, by Vincent Novello. With Latin and English text. Just published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

Sold by all Music Dealers.

THE SYMPHONIES OF BEETHOVEN:—ARRANGED FOR THE PIANO-FORTE BY J. N. HUMMEL. The above excellent compositions are now in course of publication by the subscriber.

Symphony No. 7, in A, op. 92, is now ready.

Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

Sold by all Music Dealers.

Edward L. Balch,

NEW EDITION OF CARCASSI'S GUITAR BOOK.

New and Improved Method for the Guitar, by M. Carcassi. Price $2.50.

This new edition of Carcassi's celebrated method embraces much valuable matter not contained in those previously issued. These additions are those which have been made by the distinguished author after an experience which enabled him to determine what was actually needed by the pupil for a thorough understanding of the art. The whole has been carefully translated by a well known Professor of the Guitar, and is thereby rendered as free as possible from those slight but perplexing inaccuracies which sometimes become a part of translations and reprints. A number of popular songs in each of the different keys have been appended, which together with the masterly instructions of Carcassi, and his plain yet comprehensive course of Exercises, furnish all that is desirable to both teacher and scholar.

Feb 26

OLIVER DITSON, Publisher,
115 Washington St.

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE, No. 86 TREMONT STREET, BOSTON.

WHITE BROTHERS, DEALERS IN MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS,

Best Italian, German, French and English Strings,

AGENTS OF

J. André, Offenbach; and G. André, Philadelphia,
FOR THE SALE OF FOREIGN CLASSIC MUSIC,
CHOIR MUSIC, &c.

Instruments Made, Repaired, Tuned, Bought, Sold, or Exchanged, on the most favorable terms.

IRA J. WHITE.
iii 2 3m

A. WARREN WHITE.

THEODORE T. BARKER, MUSIC STORE, No. 381 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

Chickering's Pianos to let.

All Foreign and American Musical Publications received as soon as published.

iii 23 3m

N. D. COTTON,

IMPORTER AND DEALER IN

English, French, and American Stationery,
DRAWING & PAINTING MATERIALS,
No. 13 Tremont Row, Boston.

 Wedding and Visiting Cards Engraved and Printed.

16 tf

BEETHOVEN'S ORATORIO OF ENGEDI, or DAVID IN THE WILDERNESS, known as the MOUNT OF OLIVES, is this day published in a neat, convenient form for the singer or concert-goer by

Geo. P. Reed & Co., Publishers,
17 Tremont Row, Boston.

J. W. TAVERNER, PROFESSOR OF ELOCUTION,

AT HIS RESIDENCE,

No. 30 CHARLES STREET, BOSTON.

J. C. WOODMAN,

ORGANIST AND CONDUCTOR OF MUSIC AT CENTRAL CHURCH,

Teacher of Singing, Piano Forte, &c.,
No. 94 Chestnut Street, Boston.

iii 2 3m.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.

FOREIGN MUSIC DEPOT,
GIRARD HOUSE BUILDINGS,
NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,
PHILADELPHIA.

N. D. The complete works, for Piano, (Quartets, Trios, Duets for Piano and Violin, Duets for four hands and Piano solo pieces,) of BEETHOVEN and MOZART, as also the Piano solo Works of CLEMENTI and HAYDN, as published by J. André, Offenbach, in sets, at very low prices. We have appointed

Messrs. WHITE BROTHERS,

TREMONT TEMPLE, BOSTON,

our Agents for the sale of the above Standard Editions of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, &c. &c.

iii 2 tf

MRS. ROSA GARCIA DE RIBAS,

TEACHER OF THE

PIANOFORTE, SINGING & GUITAR,
2 Seneca St., corner Harrison Avenue.

MR. De RIBAS will give instruction on the Oboe and Flute. Also MUSIC ARRANGED, TRANSPPOSED, &c. Boston, April 23.

3m

Letter-Press, Music and Job Printing-Office,

JONAS CHICKERING,

RESPECTFULLY gives notice to his friends and the public that, having recovered from the late disastrous effects produced by the destruction of his factory, he is now ready to receive orders for PIANOS, which he promises to execute with as much faithfulness and promptitude as heretofore.

379 Washington Street, Boston.

Mar. 5.

tf

HEWES' PATENT

AMERICAN ACTION PIANOFORTE.

THE MANUFACTURER is in possession of numerous testimonials from distinguished Musical Professors, who have used the greatly improved ACTION PIANO, commending it in high terms. The attention of purchasers and amateurs of Music to an examination of its superiority, is solicited.

GEO. HEWES, 365 Washington St., Boston.

Apr. 10.

tf

D. B. NEWHALL,
MANUFACTURER AND DEALER IN
PIANO FORTES,
No. 314 Washington Street, Boston.
PIANO FORTES REPAIRED, TUNED, & TO LET.

Apr. 10.

tf

SIGNOR G. C. GUIDI respectfully informs his former pupils and the public, that he has resumed his instructions in SINGING, after the Italian school, with the intention to settle permanently in Boston. In order to accommodate those who may not wish to take private instruction, he will open classes for ladies and gentlemen, on moderate terms. None but good voices will be admitted. Terms liberal for persons intending to study for professional purposes.

Sig. G. can be consulted free upon any musical subject, daily, from 12 to 2, at Mr. Hewes's Piano Manufactory, No. 365 Washington street, where terms and time for classes may be known.

Orders or notes for Sig. G. may be addressed to him at G. P. Reed & Co.'s Music Store, 17 Tremont Row, and at Oliver Ditson's, 115 Washington street.

Feb. 5.

A CARD.

THE SUBSCRIBER respectfully offers his services to the public as Teacher of the Piano-Forte, the Violin, and of Singing, after a clear and easy method. He will also accompany pupils, both in seminaries and in private houses, in the practice of Duets, Trios, &c.

Address for the present at 168 Tremont Street.

March 26. 3m.

CARL GÄRTNER.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
265 Washington Street, Boston.

Oct. 16.

3m

T. BRICHER,

Organist and Conductor of Music
At the Bowdoin Square Church.

OFFICE UNDER THE CHURCH... ENTRANCE ON CHARDON ST

Jan. 22. 3m.

H. S. CUTLER,

Organist at the Church of the Advent, also of the Boston Harmonic Society.

ADDRESS—(Care of ROLAND CUTLER, No. 4 Market Square, Boston.)

22 tf

F. F. MÜLLER,

DIRECTOR OF MUSIC AND ORGANIST at the Old South Church; ORGANIST of the Handel and Haydn Society; ORGANIST of the Musical Education Society, &c. &c. &c. Inquire of Messrs. REED & Co., No. 17 Tremont Row, Boston.

iii 11 tf

NATHAN RICHARDSON,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC.

Now in Europe; will return 1st of June. Letters may be addressed at 19 Hanover St.

25 tf

GEORGE F. WILLEY,

TEACHER OF MUSIC.

Private Tuition in the principles of Music and the Cultivation of the Voice.

MUSIC ROOM, THE LECTURE ROOM OF KIRK STREET CHURCH,

RESIDENCE, 34 FRANKLIN SQUARE, SUFFOLK STREET,

Feb. 5. LOWELL, MASS.

Germania Serenade Band.

THE SERVICES OF THIS ASSOCIATION can be secured by applying to

G. SCHNAPP, Leader,
364 Tremont Street.

iii 14 tf

RATES FOR ADVERTISING.

For half a square, (8 lines,) or less, first insertion, . . . $0.50

each additional inser. 25

For a square, (16 lines,) first insertion, 1.00

each additional insertion, 50

On advertisements standing three months or longer, a discount of twenty per cent. on the above rates is allowed.

(A column counts as seven squares.)

Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 School St.

DWIGHT'S Journal of Music.

A Paper of Art and Literature.

VOL. III.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 11, 1853.

NO. 10.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

TERMS....TWO DOLLARS PER ANNUM, (IN ADVANCE.)

CITY Subscribers can be served at their houses by the further payment of fifty cents per annum.

For Rates of Advertising, see last page.

POSTAGE, if paid in advance, for any distance within the State, thirteen cents a year; if not in advance, twenty-six cents. To all places beyond the State, double these rates.

J. S. DWIGHT,.....EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St.

By REDDING & CO., 8 State St.

GEO. P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row.

A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.

DEXTER & BROTHERS, 43 Ann Street, N. Y.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 722 Broadway, N. Y.

MASON BROTHERS, 23 Park Row, New York.

GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.

G. ANDRE, 229 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St., Balt.

COLBURN & FIELD, Cincinnati, O.

HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Persons willing to become Agents for procuring subscribers, especially Music-Dealers and Teachers, are invited to correspond with the Editor, as above. Satisfactory references required, and liberal commissions allowed.

Back numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Also bound copies of Vols. I. and II. at prices varying from $2.50 to $3.50.

THE COOPER'S SONG.

I am the cooper: I bind the cask;

The sweat flows down, as I drive my task:

Yet on with the hoop, and merry's the sound,

As I featly pound

And with block and with hammer go travelling round

And round and round.

I am the cooper: I bind the cask;

And gay as play is my nimble task;

And though I grow crooked with stooping to pound,

Yet merry's the sound

As, with block and with hammer, I journey round

And round and round.

I am the cooper: I bind the cask;

Am healthy and happy, what more shall I ask?

Not in king's palaces, I'll be bound,

Such joy is found,

Where men do nothing and still are going round

And round and round.

So I'll still be a cooper, and bind the cask,

Bread for wife and children is all I ask;

And glad will they be at night, I'll be bound,

That, with cheerful sound,

Father went all day long hammering round

And round and round.

German Lyrics, by C. T. Brooks.

DON JUAN.

A FABULOUS EVENT WHICH HAPPENED TO A TRAVELLING ENTHUSIAST.

[From the German of HOFFMANN, by B. Roelker.]

[Concluded.]

You can believe me, Theodore: nature endowed Juan, as her darling child, with all that lifts man into nearer relationship with the divine, above the common herd, above the manufactured products which are tossed from the workshop like mere cyphers, that require another figure before them to make them of any value; with all that fitted him to conquer and to reign. A vigorous and splendid body; an organization from which shone forth the spark, that fell into his breast, kindling presentiments of the highest; a deep feeling and a quickly grasping understanding. But such is the terrible consequence of the fall, that the enemy retained the power of lurking in man's path, and laying wicked snares for him in that very striving for the highest, in which he manifests his god-like nature. This conflict of the divine and the demonic powers produces the idea of the earthly, just as the victory won produces the idea of the super-earthly life. Don Juan was keenly alive to the claims upon life which his physical and mental constitution involved; and an ever-burning longing, with which his blood ran seething through his veins, urged him on, eagerly and with no rest, to seize upon all the shows of the earthly world, in the vain hope of finding satisfaction in them! No doubt there is nothing here on earth, which so intensifies man in his inmost nature, as love; she it is that, working so mysteriously and powerfully, deranges and transfigures the inmost elements of our existence. What wonder, then, that Don Juan hoped to quench in love the yearning that so rent his breast, and that just here the devil threw the coil around his neck!

Through the arch-enemy's stratagem, the thought arose in Don Juan's mind, that through the enjoyment of woman might, even here on earth, be realized what dwells in our breast only as a heavenly promise, and what constitutes that infinite longing which puts us in immediate communication with the super-earthly. Flying from one beautiful woman to another; enjoying their charms with intensest passion, to very satiety, intoxication and distraction; ever believing himself mistaken in his choice, and ever hoping to reach the ideal of final contentment,—Don Juan could not but find all earthly life at last insipid and shallow; and having generally a contempt for men, he rose up in war against that which had been esteemed by him the highest of life's appearances, and which had so bitterly deceived him. Every enjoyment of woman was now no more a sensual gratification, but a wilful, impious scorn against nature and the Creator. A deep contempt for the common views of life above which he felt himself exalted, and a bitter scorn for men, who, in happy love and in the civil marriage union could at all expect fulfilment of the higher wishes which nature placed, with hostile purpose, in our breast,—instigated him, especially when such a relation was in question, to make war against it, and by bringing ruin, boldly oppose the unknown, over-ruling power, that he looked upon as a malicious monster, carrying on a cruel play with the pitiable creatures of his mocking humor. Every ruin of a beloved future bride, every violent and total overthrow of the happiness of lovers, is for him a triumph over that hostile power, and carries him ever more beyond this narrowing life—above nature—above the Creator.

And indeed, he actually seeks to get beyond this life—but only to plunge into Orcus. The ruin of Anna, with the circumstances attending, is his crowning achievement.

Donna Anna is, as regards nature's greatest favors, the counterpart to Don Juan. As Don Juan was originally a wonderfully vigorous and glorious man, so is she a divine woman, over whose pure mind the Evil One had no power. All the arts of fiendishness could destroy her only in an earthly point of view. As soon as Satan had accomplished this ruin, hell, by the decree of Heaven, could no longer defer the execution of the office of vengeance. Don Juan mockingly invites the statue of the slain old man to a merry feast, and the glorified spirit, only now seeing through the fallen man and feeling pity for him, does not disdain, in terrible form, to exhort him to repent. But his soul is so corrupted and distracted, that heaven's bliss itself throws no ray of hope into his soul, to kindle it for a better life.

You no doubt were surprised, my Theodore, that I spoke of Anna's ruin. As well as I can at this hour, when thoughts and ideas, springing from my deepest soul, far out-soar all words, I will tell you briefly, how the whole relation of these two contending characters (Don Juan and Donna Anna) presents itself to my mind through the music, without any reference to the text. I mentioned before, that Anna presents herself as the counterpart to Don Juan. What, if Donna Anna had been intended by Heaven, to make Don Juan recognize in love, which through Satan's arts destroyed him, the divine nature within him, and so rescue him from the despair of vain endeavors? But he saw her too late, at the time of his deepest corruption, when he could only conceive the fiendish desire of destroying her. She was not saved. When he fled, the deed was done. The fire of superhuman passion, flames from the infernal deep, coursed through her veins and made all resistance vain. He alone, only Don Juan, could kindle in her the voluptuous frenzy, with which she received him in her arms, and which through the overpowering, destructive rage of fiendish spirits, committed the sin in her soul. When after the accomplishment of the deed, he wanted to flee, then the thought of her ruin, like an awful monster breathing poisonous death, seized upon her with torturing pangs. Her father's death by the hand of Don Juan, her union with the cold, unmanly and ordinary Don Ottavio, whom she at one time fancied that she loved,—even love, raging in the depths of her soul with consuming fire, which flickered high at the moment of highest enjoyment, and is now burning like the glowing fire of destructive hatred;—all this lacerates her breast. She feels that Don Juan's destruction alone can give rest to her soul, anguished by deadly torments; but this rest is also her own earthly death. She, therefore, does not cease to call upon her ice-cold future bridegroom for vengeance; she herself pursues the traitor, and not until the subterranean powers have drawn him down to Orcus, does she grow calmer;—but she cannot yield to her future bridegroom, who urges their marriage; "lascia o caro, un anno ancora, allo sfogo del mio cor!" (Leave, dear friend, one year to the peace of my soul.) She will not survive this year; Don Ottavio will never possess her whose pure mind saved her from remaining the doomed bride of Satan.

How keenly in my inmost soul I felt all this through the heart-rending accords of the first recitative and in the narration of the midnight surprise! Even the scena of Donna Anna in the second act: "Crudele," &c., which apparently only refers to Don Ottavio, expresses, through secret insinuations and the most wonderful allusions, that state of mind which consumes all earthly happiness. And what is the meaning, even in the text, of the singular additional sentence, perhaps unconsciously thrown out by the poet: "forse un giorno il cielo ancora sentirà pietà di me," (Perhaps Heaven will yet take pity on me some day)?

The clock strikes two. A warm electric breath glides over me,—I perceive the delicate odor of fine Italian perfume, which made me yesterday first discover my fair neighbor; a feeling of delight, which I think I could only express by notes, comes over me. The air sweeps keener through the house—the strings of the piano in the orchestra are sounding. Oh heavens! I think I hear Anna's voice: "Non mi dir, bell' idol mio!" as if at a great distance, born aloft on the wings of swelling notes from an aerial orchestra. Rise up before me, thou distant, unknown spirit-world,—thou Dschinnistan full of glory, where all that has been promised here on earth is fulfilled to the enchanted soul in inexpressible heavenly pain as well as the most ineffable joy! Let me enter into the circle of thy beatific visions! Would that the god of dreams whom thou hast chosen, now as a terrible, and now as a friendly messenger to earthly men,—would that, when sleep holds my body in leaden bonds, he might lead my spirit to the ethereal fields!

POSTSCRIPT.—Conversation at the Table d'Hôte at noon.

Wise man with a snuff-box, (giving it a loud rap): It is indeed provoking, that we shall have no true opera any more for some time to come! But that is the consequence of this detestable over-acting.

Mulatto-face: Sure enough! I often told her so. The rôle of Donna Anna always affected her very much; and yesterday, she was, indeed, as if possessed. I hear she lay in a swoon during the whole of the entr'acte, and that in the scene in the second act she even had attacks of hysterics.

Insignificant man: You don't say so!

Mulatto-face: Yes, indeed, and still would not leave the stage.

I: For goodness sake, I hope the attacks are not dangerous! I hope we shall soon hear Signora again.

Wise man with the snuff-box, (taking a pinch). Hardly, for Signora died exactly at two o'clock this morning.

Social Significance of the growing taste for Music.

There is a Musical Movement in this country. Our people are trying to become musical. It has been discovered to the satisfaction of many, that neither the dull solemnity of psalms, nor the training up and down of drums and fifes, nor the ear-tickling, foot-lifting, fiddling out of old tunes, innocent of all meaning except release from care and ceremony, can be deemed true musical experiences; and that no very just idea of the worth of Music in the scale of social influences and of individual pursuits, can properly be predicated upon these three forms of the art. It is seen that to a musical soul these are thin sustenance; and (thanks to the myriad-minded activity which is exchanging all the products, both material and spiritual, of all the nations, and so preparing the way for all to become ONE!) tones have reached us from those ancient shores, where the Goddess of Harmony herself dwells, and inspires her Mozarts and Beethovens with great emotions and great art to utter them in strains that haunt all souls with never dying hopes and aspirations.

Yes! the practical American begins to respect Music as an Art, as a language of the soul, as part of the permanent revelations of God, and as one of the great divine agencies by which Humanity even now, is led on toward the fulfilment of its glorious destiny. Once it was only as an amusement, (more or less refined it is true; but still as an amusement), or as a mere church ceremony, that men thought of music. It is beginning to be esteemed as Art. And (whatever moralists may say against the German fashion of using the term "artist" and "artistic" to denote the highest accomplishments of man in his creative sphere), we maintain that when anything is taken up and pursued in the spirit in which a true Artist always lives and works, that thing becomes the most earnest, the most elevating, the most religious occupation of which man is capable, and the most productive of permanent blessings to mankind. We are beginning to respect the Art, to look to it for such influences as we do to Poetry, to Eloquence, to any thing that comes from the most religious depths of Man. That is something, when we have not the genius to create. Musical as yet we are not, in the true sense. We have no composers; no great performances in our churches; no well-endowed and thorough academies to train the artist, or to educate the public taste by frequent hearings of the finest compositions, except in a very limited degree. Our concerts are attended more from fashion, it may be, than from real love. Our daughters are taught the piano as an accomplishment, to make them "ladies," rather than to inspire their womanhood with that Music which has been termed "the feminine principle in the Universe." Yet there are fine beginnings. Some excellent societies in our cities are learning the love of what is great and permanent, by their attempts to perform it; the number of appreciating listeners is sure to grow; singing-schools "for the million" are unlocking the outer musical sense for all, that, if they have a soul, this channel to it need not be obstructed; the real virtuosos come from Europe to give us a touch of their quality, having in their turn discovered that Jonathan has learned how to spend money for music; and finally, much excellent music is printed here, which our young ladies (and young men, too—they learn the piano), study in lieu of the "Battle of Prague," and other trash in which the music masters dealt so long.

This we have called a musical movement; for we believe it to be one of the outward accompaniments, expressions and instrumentalities of the greatest movement which ever yet engaged Humanity; of which this our America, the common gathering place of all nations, is destined to become the theatre. Whenever the life of a people is deep; whenever broad and universal sentiments absorb and harmonize the petty egotisms and discords of men; whenever Humanity is at all inspired with a consciousness of its great destiny; whenever Love gives the tone to the feelings, the thoughts, and the activity of an age; whenever a hundred reforms, all springing from so deep a source, all tend, in the very antagonism of their one-sidedness, in the very bigotry of their earnestness, to one grand thought and aim, the Unity of the race; in short, whenever there is a movement, then, too, as by a law of correspondence, there should be a new development of the passion and the art of music. It gives out music, (such a movement) as it is said the spheroid planets do. Because Music is the natural language of Sentiment. Speech is the language of Thought; but underlying all articulate speech there is a basis of pure Tone; just as every thought of the understanding is prompted by a feeling. Sentiment seeks analogies, resemblance, and has a constant tendency to Unity. Thought analyses and insists upon distinctions, differences, individualities; it gives birth to creeds and doctrines, to theories and schemes of life, to artificial laws and expedients, and effects no inward, but only outward union. It is only when men are moved by some great sentiment, (and all great sentiments are in some way forms of the cardinal and highest principle of Love,) that they become inwardly united; then only is there any society; and then society becomes a living conscious whole, one body harmoniously compacted of many members. The spirit of such a union is already felt, and will demand a language, even before it can have an organization. Speech alone will not content; Tone, through all its infinite shades of Modulation, Melody and Harmony, becomes indispensable to the utterance of the full soul. For it would speak a universal language, which Asia and America alike may comprehend, with no interpreter and no dictionary but the heart, out of which and to which proceedeth all music.

If it be true, then, that Humanity is now on the verge, nay in the midst of a grand onward movement; that society is inspired, not with dreams merely, but with most earnest, energetic strivings after the realization of a Divine Order, (strange, and ultra, and conflicting as may be the forms which that inspiration often takes,) then there is great significance in this growing interest now felt in music. Call it fashion, if you will, and call fashion an ape; still it is the ape of something, and not of nothing. It is in this light mainly that we would interest our countrymen in Music, as the language of that deeper experience in which all men are most nearly ONE; the language of those central fires, great heaven-born Passions of the soul, which prompt to holy ties of Love, of Friendship, of Family, of Social Order; which through these blissful foretastes of union steadily invite and draw us on to everlasting Unity with God; and which impel us to seek a type of his perfections, as well as of what our life should be, in the harmonies of outward Nature. We consider Music both as one of the expressions, and as one of the inspiring causes of the restless, but prophetic spirit of these times. Of course, then, it becomes us to waste few words upon mere musical trifles. It is our business constantly to notice and uphold for study, and for imitation, music which is deep and earnest; which does not merely seek to amuse; but which, (be it in the form called Secular, or Sacred, be it song, or opera, or oratorio, or orchestra), is the most religious outpouring of the composer's life. We feel that we shall do most good by speaking most of the great masters, even when the theme is old, and by measuring the new, not so much by their standard, as by the standard by which they measured themselves. And yet so far as time permits, we trust that humbler efforts, conceived in a true spirit and with any promising signs of talent, shall not be beneath our criticism. However, it is not so much the composition, as the performance of music, which invites attention now. To guide public taste in its selection, to inspire artists in their performance, and above all to exhort the musician to a high sense of the dignity of his profession and teach others to respect it, too, must be our aim in criticism.

We shall never say more than we owe to music. Could we only share the blessing, as we would, with others! It would be a worthy contribution to the great work of the times. Ever grateful let us be to music, then, that in times when there seemed almost no sincerity, no faith, no earnestness; when the religion of society seemed its dearest manifestation; when every thought of the Ideal was damped by the triumphant sneers and the experimental arguments of worldliness; when no doctrines, no philosophies, no spheres open to young activity looked in any way inspiring, but altogether barren of promise and fatal to self-respect; when nothing satisfied, and the whole framework of society gave the lie to the voice of the preacher and of the heart;—ever grateful let us be, those of us whom an early passion for music seized upon with power, that this idle boy's love, as the elders called it, this wayward, impracticable enthusiasm, this besetting sin of indulgence, became our initiation into the great hopes of the Future; haunting us with a faith, most irresistible though indistinct, that better days shall come, that the destiny of Man is Unity and Harmony, and Brotherhood; that the Law of Necessity must yield at length to the holier Law of ATTRACTION, under which each shall labor, artist-like, in just the sphere of Use he loves, to which his nature fits him, with the religious and sweet consciousness that he entirely serves the interests and has the sympathies of all mankind. Harbinger, 1845.

THE POET'S WORK.

To set this age to Music—the great work
Before the Poet now—I do believe
When it is fully sung, its great complaint,
Its hope, its yearning, told to earth and heaven,
Our troubled age shall pass, as doth a day
That leaves the west all crimson with the promise
Of the diviner morrow, which even then
Is hurrying up the world's great side with light.
Father! if I should live to see that morn,
Let me go upward, like a lark, to sing
One song in the dawning!

Alexander Smith.

On Numeral Notation.

[Translated for The Musical World & Times, from the German of KOCHER, by R. STORRS WILLIS].

It was in the year 1742, that the genial, but always reform-ready Rousseau first presented to the Parisian Academy of Sciences his project "concerning new characters for music," in which he substituted, for the eight notes of the musical scale, the first eight numerals, and for such other characters as represent pauses, time, &c., points, cyphers, etc., admirably—according to his own enthusiastic estimate of his system—provided.

He had anticipated everything, and no difficulty could possibly present itself which might not be met. This system, said he, comprises important advantages, far superior to any that have gone before. Music will be twice, yes thrice as easy to learn; and this, because 1st, it will contain much fewer characters: 2d, because these characters will be simpler: 3d, because these characters will indicate at once the intervals, and further hard study, as by the old system, will be spared: 4th, because the characters are always the same, and the confusion of clefs is remedied: 5th, because the time, pauses, etc., are indicated by much simpler and more universal signs: 6th, because the difficulty of the various keys is avoided. Further, also, music is more conveniently and easily written—it occupies less space—every kind of paper, and the materials of every printing office are available—music will become much cheaper, &c., &c.

Why was it, that the novelty-loving French did not respond to these sanguine representations, and up to this day have never attempted to realize them? The simple opinion of the distinguished musical scholar and composer RAMEAU may answer: "THE READING OF NUMERALS IS AN INTELLECTUAL OPERATION, WHICH CANNOT KEEP EVEN PACE WITH THE RAPIDITY OF EXECUTION." And this the truth-loving and truth-seeking Rousseau, after twenty-two years of subsequent study, comprehended, and—what is more—acknowledged. In his admirable "Dictionary of Music," published 1764, in an article on the characters of music, he thus makes open confession: "Guido von Arezzo invented the lines and the peculiar characters, which under the name of notes have prevailed, and at this day are acknowledged all over the world as the universal musical notation. But as these characters—although universally adopted and somewhat perfected—are still to a great degree imperfect, (Anno 1764,) many have attempted to substitute other characters for them. Among such have been PARRAN, SOUHAITI, SAUVEUR, DUMAS and—MYSELF. But, as these systems throughout, while their intent is to correct old defects, to which all are accustomed, only substitute new defects to which one has yet to become accustomed, so my opinion is, THAT THE PUBLIC BEHAVED VERY WISELY TO LEAVE THINGS JUST AS THEY WERE, AND TO SEND US AND OUR SYSTEMS ALL HOME AGAIN, INTO THE LAND OF IDLE SPECULATIONS." What would the ingenious Jean Jacques have said, had he seen the straddling "Volk's-note" (so-called) with its thousand dashes, stars and small flags, in the multiplied and yet not adequate figures of which we see sufficient proof, that numerals never can be substituted for notes. Of a truth, he would directly have dispatched this, also, into the land of idle speculations. And lo!—the people, who never had once commissioned any one to increase their musical difficulties by a single note, in their singing clubs and music-festivals definitely and practically decided for the right musical characters.

But aside from this, there are many considerations which militate directly against the substitution of figures for notes: of these I will now name but a few.

1st—Figures are not ideal characters, they have nothing poetically-symbolical about them: nothing artistic: they belong altogether to prose: they do not by a visible rising and falling of the melody, animate one to singing, but only call to a calculation of the distance of tones. Now, every correct and felicitous reproduction in Musical Art pre-supposes a spiritual mastery and oversight of what is to be performed, which is communicated with lightning rapidity to the organs of execution. Hence it comes, that children (in our every day experience) who have learned well a melody by figures, as soon as a text is added find it impossible to sing without renewing again their practice.

2d—Numerals are a superficial medium of instruction, because that acquaintance with the distinctive peculiarities of different keys, so important and indispensable in vocal culture, cannot be attained.

3d—Inasmuch as numerals are only partially applicable, no free and unimpeded progress in Art is by numerals possible.

4th—The old church modes cannot at all be presented by numerals. The minor scale, also, which underlies the national music of every people, can only with the greatest difficulty be managed. For those numeralists who base the fundamental tone of the minor scale on 1, confound their own system, and those who base it upon 6, annihilate the minor scale.

5th—Numerals, according to the candid confession of their most enthusiastic advocates, are entirely useless in instrumental music. Therefore scholars who are taught by numerals are entirely cut off from general musical culture. Can this be excused, and can such superficiality be reconciled with the spirit of our laws respecting school education?

6th—The numeralists are not agreed among themselves as to a system of figures; and cannot become agreed, because the right system has not yet been discovered (as it probably never will be) and because, naturally enough, no one of them likes to exchange the imperfections of his own system, to which he has become accustomed, with the defects of another's system to which he is not accustomed.

7th.—Our school-law enjoins vocal music as one of the chief tasks. But what can result from all the quarrelling, which, by this numeral question, has been associated with this task? For, in consequence of the frequent change of teachers, now a numeralist of this method, and now a numeralist of another method, then again a note-ist, together drive the unfortunate scholars into the utmost perplexity and despair.

But in conclusion, let us hear what the admirable pedagogue, DIESTERWEG, says about numerals:—

"Notes are everywhere preferable to numerals. Without enumerating here all the arguments which have been brought forward, for and against numerals, I will only give the following statement. Children of more than ordinary capacity, some of whom are to be found in every school, sing with equal ease from notes and from figures. Quite different is the case with others of less talent, for whom notes (whatever may be said to the contrary) have very great advantages; particularly when, instead of mere vocal exercises, genuine songs, with a variety of intervals and rhythm, are put before them. Indeed in all cases, notes are much preferable to numerals. For so long as a pupil has not the power to imagine a tone in connection with every written character of a melody, so that he knows exactly how the music will sound, numerals express nothing at all to him: he loses himself in an indefinite guessing. Notes, on the other hand, offer yet one additional assistance to him: they picture to him the relations of tone; he has only to open his eyes and he immediately recognizes the outlines of a melody. And what an assistance such a pictorial presentation of a melody renders, to one endeavoring to retain the same! As soon as the eye has scanned the various groups of notes, the musical memory immediately associates with them the tones appertaining: and a single glance at these groups is often alone necessary, to recal entire strains which had entirely escaped the memory.

"Numerals, on the other hand, afford no such assistance. One row of figures looks like another; and the scholar must over and over again spell along from figure to figure, and tediously delve out every individual tone, before he can determine what it is these figures have to say to him. Therefore—NO NUMERALS!"

C. KOCHER.

Music as a branch of Commerce.

The N. Y. Musical World & Times is informed that the music trade of this country, for 1852, amounted to twenty-seven millions of dollars.

The same journal says:

"The Piano-Forte Trade of this country amounted last year to upwards of twelve millions of dollars : and should it increase in as great a ratio for twenty years to come as it has for twenty years past, the Piano-forte crop of the North will exceed the Cotton crop of the South. Then, political economists will have a less discordant subject upon which to expend their learning and eloquence, and perhaps our national counsels will present the pleasing spectacle of "honorable gentlemen," from all parts of the country, engaged in acoustical, melodic and harmonious discussions and experiments. When these tuneful days shall arrive, it is to be hoped that many of, if not all the discords which now rack the public tympanum, will be so "prepared" and "resolved" that they will no longer mar the harmony of our Federal organization, and sectional strifes be superseded by national concord—results which could probably be achieved by a proper distribution of the "flats" and "sharps" of the nation, or better, perhaps, by dispensing with them altogether."

THE RING.

FROM ANASTASIUS GRUN.

I sat upon a mountain,
From home-land far away,
Below me hills and valleys,
Meadows and cornfields lay.

The ring from off my finger
In reverse I drew,
The pledge of fond affection
She gave at our adieu.

I held it like a spy-glass
Before my dreaming eye,
And, through the hooplet peeping,
The world began to spy.

Ah, bright, green, sunny mountains,
And fields of waving gold!
In sooth a lovely picture
For such fair frame to hold!

Here many a neat, white cottage
Smiles on the wooded steep,
There scythe and sickle glisten
Along the valley's sweep!

And farther onward stretches
The plain the stream glides through,
And, (boundary guards of granite)
Beyond, the mountains blue.

Cities, with domes of marble,
And thickets, fresh and green,
And clouds that, like my longings,
Toward the dim distance lean;

Green earth and bright blue heaven,
The dwellers and their land—
All this, in one fair picture,
My golden hoop-frame spanned.

Oh, fairest of fair pictures,
To see, by Love's ring spanned,
The green earth and blue heaven,
The people and their land!

German Lyrics, by C. T. Brooks.

Letter from New York.

NEW OPERATIC COMPANY—MR. NIBLO IN THE FIELD—
PROSPECT OF THE NEW OPERA HOUSE.

NEW YORK, June 7, 1853.

MR. EDITOR:—Since you were here a little event has transpired in the operatic world that may not be uninteresting to your readers. Mr. Niblo has sent an agent to Europe to engage an Opera Company of the first magnitude. His aim is to secure Grisi and Mario and "head off" the new Opera House project. His late purchase of many of the fixtures, scenery, &c., at the Astor Place auction, was also with the view of converting his beautiful "Garden" into an Opera House and thus making his establishment what he has ever designed it should be—the most popular and at the same time the most aristocratic place of amusement in this country. The Evening Express informs us on the "best authority," that the late report that Mr. Niblo was intending to give a few nights of opera with Steffanone, De Vries, Salvi, &c., is untrue, that no such thing was thought of. With all due deference to the musical informant of the Express, I beg leave to state most emphatically that such a project was thought of, and all the arrangements consummated—the night was appointed, though not advertised. But Maretzek faithfully promised Mr. Niblo that "Roberto il Diavolo" should be given by a certain time, and it was only some three days before the time set, that Signor Salvi found something in the arrangements did not suit him and again had the pleasure of disappointing his manager—thanks to Mr. Niblo's forethought and good judgment that he did not have the opportunity to give the public another specimen of his amiability and high-toned sense of honor! In less than twenty-four hours after this "flare-up," Mr. Niblo's agent was on his way to England, with both money and authority to organize a company that can appear after Sontag's, and the Grand Combination Co.

Mr. Niblo is not a man to be trifled with, and when he takes hold of anything in earnest he seldom fails of accomplishing his object. You may rest assured he is in earnest this time.

He estimates that it will cost less than $10,000 to convert his Theatre into an Opera House, with every convenience that could be had at the proposed People's Opera House. I have never had any faith in this Opera House project as already started in this city. You in Boston will succeed with yours—so will they in Philadelphia; but there is too little public spirit and too much self-interest in New York to carry out such an undertaking. Five years hence such a thing may be accomplished here—but at present all such projects must be based on individual enterprise, and that too with strict reference to the investment as a paying one. Mr. Niblo is the only man who can carry out such an enterprise and make it pay.

Sontag is rusticated at Staten Island.

FERNANDO.

Marco Spada.

A correspondent of the Evening Bulletin, Philadelphia, translates from the French of P. SCUDO the following critical analysis of Auber's last opera, as recently produced at Paris.

It is a new edition, considerably weakened, of Fra Diavolo, Diamans de la Couronne, La Sirène, and Zampa. Under the pseudonyme of Baron de Torrida—one of those heroes of the highway so often sung by M. Scribe—Marco Spada lives in the vicinity of Rome, where, for fifteen years, his name has been a sound of terror. Born in France, where he saw all his family massacred in a civil war, of the date of which we are left in ignorance, Marco Spada expatriates himself, raises the standard of rebellion against society in general, but particularly against the government of the States of the Church, whose functionaries he maltreats and whose treasures he carries off. Rich, loving luxury and the superfluities of life, Marco Spada inhabits a sumptuous and impregnable castle at some distance from Rome, where he hides from all eyes his most precious treasure, a charming daughter, an only child. Angela is her father's idol. To surround her with luxury he braves the laws and exposes himself to destruction. Nurtured with care, endowed with beauty and fine arts, the gentle Angela never asks nor thinks what are the pursuits of her father or from whence comes all this splendor that surrounds her; but although she lives in such complete solitude, her heart has been touched by an unknown lover.

During one of Marco Spada's long seasons of absence, which he tells his daughter are devoted to the pleasures of the chase, in order to silence any suspicions she may ever have, a traveller who has lost his way comes to the castle of the Baron de Torrida and receives hospitality from the beautiful Chatelaine. This stranger is Count Fredericci, nephew of the Governor of Rome, and, as might be expected, he becomes the lover of the robber captain's daughter.

Such is the pleasant state of affairs when the curtain rises, giving a view of the interior of the castle of the Baron de Torrida and three guests, who like the Count Fredericci have also lost their way and come to the castle for shelter. These strangers are no less than the Governor of Rome himself, La Marchesa, his niece, and Count Pepinelli, her cisibeo. They are surprised to find so much splendor and luxury in an isolated castle, when suddenly appears the lovely Angela, who with the sweetest grace in the world, offers the strangers a gracious welcome.

After numerous improbable incidents, all managed by the magic wand of M. Scribe, the robber Baron, who does not know how to deny his daughter anything, consents to accompany her at the risk of his life to a ball, which is to be given by the Governor of Rome on the next day.

All the second act lies in the palace of the Governor of Rome. The Governor, in order to render his administration brilliant, has sworn he will capture the celebrated Bandit, Marco Spada. A chance appears near at hand, for he has heard by some means that the terrible robber captain has conceived the audacious project of exercising his cleverness right in the midst of his guests at the ball in his own palace. There is a mendicant friar, Frère Borroméo, who formerly belonged to Marco Spada's band, but who had repented and left his evil ways: through him the Governor hopes to discover the Bandit among his guests. The scene where Frère Borroméo presents his request to each one of the guests successively, in order to find the Bandit, is very adroitly managed; and the manner in which Marco Spada escapes the danger which threatens him forms a coup de théâtre very striking.

The denouement takes place in the third act in the usual manner. Marco Spada flies, and in order to save the honor of his daughter and to render possible her marriage with the nephew of the Governor, declares she is not his child, which is to be regarded as a pious falsehood, and of course to be forgiven by the audience.

The fine scenic effect, the whole getting up of the piece, the music of M. Auber, and the grace of Mlle Duprez, contributed more to the success of this opera than any merits of the libretto, for Scribe's compositions never recommend themselves by probability of events or fidelity of character. So much for the mere story; now for a more particular notice of the music.

The Overture of Marco Spada opens with an andante of well sustained harmony, abounding with incidental modulations, which flit before the ear like those pretty little sparkling glow worms that appear and disappear in the atmosphere on a clear dark night. Mr. Auber excels in the lulling soft harmony which, like twilight, is neither day nor night; that is, he produces by turns a major and minor sensation, without deigning to characterize either with a strongly marked phrase. The allegro, founded on a well-known Tarentelle, leads back several times to the theme in a very ingenious manner, and the symphony closes with a warm peroration, which shows nothing new to those who are already acquainted with the charming overtures in Mr. Auber's repertoire. The Romance "Ne grondez pas," which Angela sings in the first scene, where she thinks she is addressing her father, whose features she is not able to discover, as it is night, and ignorant of being in the presence of the Governor of Rome, La Marchesa, his niece, and Count Pepinelli—this Romance, in two couplets, is graceful and very well adapted to the delicate voice of Mlle. Duprez.

The quartette which follows is not properly a concerted piece, but rather a soprano air with an accompaniment for the voice. It is rapid, and managed with spirit. The tenor Romance which the unknown lover Fredericci sings behind the scenes, and which is terminated by a codu for two voices, bears some resemblance to the pretty serenade, L'Amant jaloux, of Grétry. The basso air, in which Marco Spada expresses to his daughter all the tenderness he feels for her, contains an adagio sostenuto, which M. Bataille sang with much taste. In the allegro movement could be seen some reminiscences of the Rossini style, but M. Bataille added a closing cadenza—of his own, perhaps—which gave a common-place sound to this otherwise piquant morceau. The duo for basso and soprano, between Marco Spada and his daughter, is written in the true Italian style, and the finale of this act is remarkable for some pretty vocalises, for two soprano voices, accompanied by the whole chorus.

The couplets of the second act—

"Vous pouvez soupirer, Vous pouvez espérer,"

which La Marchesa permits to escape from her mocking lips and which are full of the delicate tone of feminine coquetterie, are delicious, and Mlle. Favel expressed them with much spirit. The entrée of the guests at the Governor's Ball is announced by a very pretty chorus which is repeated when the noble company leave the stage to go to supper.—In the interval during which the Governor is shut up in his Cabinet, where he receives the important news that the famous Marco Spada is concealed among his guests—the ladies and gentlemen appear again and, having nothing better to do, entreat their new friend, the daughter of the Baron de Torrida, to sing something for them. Then it is that Mlle. Duprez sings a declaration of love in four languages—in Russian, English, Italian, and French—a sort of proverb which the young actress plays with much spirit and which clever idea she probably suggested. The prayer of the monk who comes to beg something for his convent of the guests, scrutinizing each one closely in order to accomplish the Governor's design, is in good keeping, as well as the Basso air of Marco Spada, when his daughter faints on hearing the real name of her father. The unaccompanied Trio between Marco Spada, his daughter and Count Fredericci, is a very difficult passage ingeniously managed, but better suited for a concert of wind instruments than to describe a dramatic situation. In the third act is a beautiful soprano air, the andante of which is remarkable, but the allegro exacts from Mlle. Duprez some exertions which are a little imprudent. In this act is also a charming trio for Soprano, Tenor and Basso.

Mlle Caroline Duprez contributed much to the success of "Marco Spada." Daughter of an accomplished artist, whose name will live in the musical history of the present day, young, pretty and spirituelle, possessing that perfect air of good breeding which is not the least valuable of her merits—musical to the very tip of her pretty fingers, and filled with that divine fluid which torments and consumes those who possess it, Mlle. Caroline Duprez is of the smallest number of the elect—a true child of genius. But though we do not wish to imitate the wicked fairy who placed in the cradle of gifted children cabalistic words of bad omen, we must warn her of danger she incurs in over-exerting her delicate voice. We noticed certain inflexions, certain tones evidently borrowed from Mlle Rachel, and which are no better in the mouth of the celebrated tragedienne than in the young cantatrice, for in both it is a counterfeit, not an imitation, of simple nature. In her great air in the third act we were startled at some leaps she gave over frightful intervals, which almost tempted us to cry out with Madame de Sevigne,

"Oh ma fille, j'ai mal a votre poitrine."

This opera of Marco Spada, without containing anything entirely new, is a pleasing production not discreditable to the charming and delicious composer who has amused France for thirty years. His instrumentation, always elegant, abounds with pretty details, piquant and brilliant rhythms, where can be recognized the esprit and dexterity of the author of "Domino Noir," whose graceful taste aims rather at propriety and elegance than depth of expression—the skillful and clever musician whose delicate harmony, sparkling with modulation is always subordinate to the melody. The whole thing is a happy melange of gaiety, delicacy and elegance.

M. Auber became a dramatic composer under peculiar circumstances. He had been a man of the society of fine gentlemen, who amused his leisure by leading the life of a musical dilettante. He studied music as a mere matter of taste and pleasure—was a pupil of Cherubini and a disciple of Mozart; and had acquired among artists a reputation for ability far beyond that which an amateur generally attained, when some sad family event forced him to make use of his fine talents as a means of support.

He made his début as a composer at the Theatre of the Opera Comique in 1830, in La Bergere Chetelaine, an opera in three acts, whose success augured well for the future. Emma, ou la Promesse imprudente, an opera in three acts, followed the next year, and confirmed the good opinion formed by the public of the new composer. La Neige, opera in three acts, which came out in 1823, and La Concert a la Cour, in 1824, showed that the lively genius of M. Auber had been touched with the grace of the grand renovation of dramatic music. Since then this ingenious and charming composer has trodden the same path and produced works which give abundant proof that the author of La Muette de Portici and Domino Noir is truly the son of Voltaire and Rossini. Such indeed is the double character of M. Auber's works—the esprit, delicacy, and dramatic sentiment of the French school, united in just proportions with the rich coloring and brilliant melody of the great Maestro. In La Muette, a grand opera in five acts, brought out in 1828, and Domino Noir, opera comique, in three acts, represented in 1837, can be found the most striking marks of M. Auber's talent and manner. L'Enfante prodigue, a grand opera in five acts, and Zerlina, an opera in three acts, composed for the admirable voice of Mlle. Alboni, have not added to M. Auber's reputation, and in order to make amends for this double failure, he has brought out "Marco Spada," whose success has repaired his character.

The opera of "Marco Spada," which may be regarded as an anthology of M. Auber's works, should close, it seems to us, the brilliant and illustrious career of this composer. M. Auber has labored enough for glory, let him rest and enjoy in peace the eminent position he has acquired and which no one contests with him. One work more would add nothing to his reputation, and might disturb the repose this last success has brought him. If Boieldieu had stopped at La Dame Blanche, he would never have written Les Deux Nuits, the failure of which saddened his last days.

CARL MARIA VON WEBER. This most popular German composer (we translate from the New York Staats Zeitung) was born in Eutin (Holstein) in the year 1786. Weber was one of the most genial heads that ever lived among the coryphæi of musicians. Besides his great talent for composition, he was an excellent piano-forte virtuoso, and in a certain measure the wonder of modern piano playing. His "Freyschütz" and "Oberon," his "Preciosa" and "Euryanthe," are masterworks of the first rank; his sonatas too, and other piano-forte and song compositions make him immortal in the annals of German music;—he was in every sense a classical people's composer, who died, alas! too early, namely, in 1826, in London.—On the 21st of August of this present year a monument is to be erected to this incomparable composer, in Eutin, and the occasion will likewise be celebrated by a musical festival of three days.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JUNE 11, 1853.

Opening of the Great Exhibition in Dublin.

DISPLAY OF THE FINE ARTS—THE MUSIC OF THE INAUGURATION—ACOUSTIC QUALITIES OF THE BUILDING, &c.

DUBLIN, May 15, 1853.

DEAR DWIGHT:—You are not accustomed to look to this quarter for much of interest in connection with music and the fine arts. But it has fallen to my lot to be present at the opening of the great Industrial Exhibition of Ireland, which took place on the 12th inst., and it has occurred to me that a brief account of the ceremonial would not be out of place in the pages of your Journal. This is a project purely national in its character, having for its object to revive the drooping spirit of the people, and wake them to self-reliance and hope. Hence it has warmly enlisted the sympathy of the Irish nation, and nothing has been spared to give it magnitude and importance worthy the end in view.

The display in the department of the Fine Arts is particularly brilliant and imposing, the noblemen and gentry from all parts of the country contributing freely their choicest gems of painting and statuary. And in the possession of works of high order and merit Ireland is by no means deficient. Indeed, in this department, as is admitted by all, the Dublin Exhibition far exceeds that of its great prototype held a couple of years since in London. Something of its extent may be inferred when it is stated that the picture gallery or "Fine Arts Court," as it is called, is an apartment 325 feet long, 40 broad, and 20 high, to the springing of the arches which support the roof, the whole of the area of which is filled with statuary, and its walls crowded with the chefs-d'œuvre of Art of all ages and every land. With great good sense, the committee have entrusted the arrangement of this Hall to a man of acknowledged taste and a genuine artist, so that the eye and the feelings are not pained by the incongruous proximity of color and of subject.

Of course there is not space here for detailed description. Most prominent among the statuary are McDowell's "Eve," and a singularly beautiful representation of a "Child borne by a Dolphin," attributed, I know not with how much truth, to Raffaele, as being one of the only three productions of his chisel. "In this," says an enthusiastic critique, "he is considered to have equalled the antique, and yet, so overshadowed was he by the glorious achievements of Michael Angelo, that Lanzi is the only chronicler of art who has bestowed a passing allusion on Raffaele's sculpture."

In painting, the Dutch, Italian, French, Spanish and modern German schools are well represented. To modern Art ample justice has been done. The Berlin specimens include Begas, Bierman, Achenbach, Meyer and Levin. The Belgian contributions are principally of sacred and legendary subjects. In the British collection are some of Hogarth's caricatures, Vandyck's and Lely's portraits. Danby and MacIse personify the perfection of native Irish Art. The "Deluge" of the former artist possesses a terrible interest, and exhibits undoubted genius of the highest order.

There are many old works exceedingly valuable and curious, among the most interesting of which is a Head of Christ, of the Byzantine type, on a gilt ground, a thirteenth century panel piece.

But it is not my intention to enter upon a description of the contents of this Temple of Industry of all nations. It was the inaugural evening of this great national enterprise, or rather, I should say, the grand musical festival on that occasion, to which the opening ceremonial was but an adjunct, which claims our special attention. Nothing of the kind had ever before been attempted on so gigantic a scale in this country, and but upon two or three occasions only in England. The band consisted of a thousand performers, all told, comprising about two hundred instruments and a chorus of 800 strong. The orchestra was formed of 18 contra basses, each with its accompanying cello, and a proportional army of violins and violas; the wind department being sustained by 6 flutes, 8 clarinets, 4 oboes, 4 bassoons, 8 horns, 4 trumpets, 2 cornets, 2 ophicleydes, 6 trombones, with drums, cymbals, etc., and an organ of immense power. The vocal parts were well balanced with each other, and the whole in admirable proportion to the orchestral force employed. The musicians, vocal and instrumental, had been selected with much care from various parts of the kingdom (but from Ireland more particularly). For several weeks they had studied and rehearsed, in small bodies, the pieces given out for the occasion, and a day or two previous to the opening ceremonial had been brought together for careful rehearsal in the building itself. It will be seen that the number of performers here engaged exceeded that of the famous Abbey Band on the occasion of the commemoration of Handel in 1783, as also that of the great musical festival at York Minster in 1826. The instrumental department was led by Lovey. Dr. Stewart presided at the organ, and the whole was conducted by Mr. Joseph Robinson, a gentleman entirely competent to the arduous task.

But before alluding to the music itself and its effect, it may be well to describe briefly the interior of the apartment in which it was given. This was the great central hall of the exhibition building, in length 425 feet, by 100 feet in width, and 100 feet high, covered, in one span, by a semi-cylindrical roof upon trellis ribs. The ends of this main apartment being joined at the top by a regular curve to the arched roof present the appearance of the interior of an immense dome whose base, 100 feet in diameter, rests upon the capitals of the columns which support the sides of the building, some fifty feet above the floor. On each side of the centre hall, and running parallel to it for the same length, are two halls fifty feet wide with domed roofs, similar to that which covers the main nave of the building. These are connected by passages with the centre hall. Around the sides of the main hall runs a gallery, supported by the rows of columns before mentioned. Its ceiling, being divided into panels by the trellis ribs and other constructive parts of the building, provides ample opportunity for effective decoration. The materials of the building are wood and iron. Light is admitted from above in one unbroken and equally distributed body. The framing of the orchestra occupies the whole of the western end of the hall, its platform being raised some 8 or 10 feet above the floor, from the level of which are carried tier on tier of vocalists and instrumentalists, rising abruptly, in a semi-circular form, till the farthest are seated just beneath the springing of the dome, some sixty feet high.

The whole arrangement of the band seemed to me most excellent for the regulating, combining and solidifying such masses of sound. Occupying the centre of the stage was the orchestra, flanked on either side by the contra-basses and violoncellos; the violins composed the front and middle of the phalanx, behind which were placed the instruments of wood and brass. In the rear of the orchestra the huge organ towered up to the roof of the building. This organ is one of surpassing excellence. It was built by Telford, of Dublin, for the Oxford University, and has been brought thence to grace the national display. On either side of the instruments, extending from the front of the platform back to the wall, filling every inch of the unoccupied space on the immense stage, were ranged the chorus, with due regard to order and position. In front, and facing the band, sat the conductor, so placed as to command at once with his baton his whole forces.

The hour of twelve o'clock was that appointed for the commencement of the ceremonial, at which time the hall was filled with about 10,000 persons. The programme then opened with the grand old choral of Martin Luther, the 100th psalm, which now revealed to my ears, for the first time, its gigantic proportions in their true sublimity. A pleasing and curious effect was produced by the mode of performance adopted in this piece, it being given first by the orchestra, then by the voices unaided, and afterwards by both combined, to which was added the full power of the organ. Then followed, in succession, the Coronation Anthem of Handel, with the appropriate copyright words; Mozart's Motet, No. 1, with the words: "O God, when thou appearest;" the Hallelujah chorus from the "Mount of Olives;" Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise;" "The Heavens are telling," from the "Creation," and Handel's grand Hallelujah chorus from the "Messiah." It is impossible, in the brief space I am willing to appropriate here, to speak in detail of each of these performances. Throughout the whole the effect fully realized my expectations, which, I assure you, had been raised to a high key.

The prelude to the Coronation Anthem, given by the instruments, was particularly fine. Here, in the subdued strains of so vast an orchestra, there was such pathos of expression and breadth of intonation as gave the best possible preparation for the dignified movement of the opening choral, which, culminating gradually, burst upon the phrases, "God save the Queen," "May the Queen live forever," with wonderful effect. In the Motet of Mozart the instrumentation, for which, in accompaniment, this great master, so much excels, was most exquisite, the number of the stringed instruments giving, even in the softest passages, a volume of tone which reached to the remotest parts of the building, and hushed the noise and bustle of the vast assembly as by magic.

Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was entirely new to me. It is a work demanding large orchestral and vocal resonance, and was rendered with surprising accuracy and power. As in all his sacred works, the composer here aims at the highest grandeur of effect. This he has surely accomplished in the gorgeous chorus commencing "All men, all things, all that hath life and breath, sing to the Lord." The Hallelujah from the "Mount of Olives," "The heavens are telling," and Handel's Hallelujah chorus (this grand triad in oratorio which must outlive all music) were fitly glorified in the praise of a thousand voices and instruments. The only purely instrumental performance was a March from the "Athalia" of Mendelssohn, with the execution of which I was by no means so well pleased. This piece, in its general characteristics, resembles the "Wedding March."

The ceremonies were closed by the performance of the national anthem, in which the full power of the instruments and voices was engaged and, in addition to which, the instruments of five military bands, stationed in different parts of the building, poured in their brazen music with stunning effect, filling the vast building with a sea of sound.

Much has been said, by the local authorities, in praise of the acoustic properties of the building, as developed on this occasion. But, whatever merit a structure so peculiar in its mechanism may be found to possess in this respect must be regarded as purely accidental, and, so far as I can judge, all that has been said of it, in this particular, is inaccurate and has no claim to scientific regard. That it surpassed in acoustic fitness the huge temple of glass in which the music was performed at the opening of the London exhibition, is no doubt true; but to say it is a building well adapted to the conveyance and development of musical sounds is simply absurd. By main strength, indeed, the sound from the vast band and chorus forced itself into every part and corner of the mighty space, but was distorted and modified, injuriously, in various ways, by the uncouth form and improper material (in acoustic particulars) of the structure. The same performance, if given in the open air and favorable conditions would, I am convinced, have produced effects far surpassing in sublimity those experienced on the present occasion.

But I have already much more than occupied the space I had intended in your columns, and, therefore, will abruptly close, craving your indulgence for my quantity. Ever yours, ERIN.

American Students of Music in Europe.

Our readers will be interested in the following extracts from a letter, dated London, May 20th, which we have received from our townsman, Mr. Nathan Richardson. Only a few days after its arrival we had the pleasure of welcoming the writer back in person.

"At Leipsic I called on Mr. C. C. PERKINS and also Mr. J. C. D. PARKER; the former I did not have the good fortune to find at home, as he had already left to attend the great annual Musical Festival at Düsseldorf; but I was informed by many professors of music in that city that he was still pursuing his studies with much diligence and has recently finished another Quartet for stringed instruments, which is considered above par. Mr. Parker is still making rapid progress in playing, as well as in composition. It will interest his friends to know that he has also composed a Quartet for strings, which is pronounced very clever. A Quartet is one of the most difficult things to compose, requiring pure musical talent, as well as a thorough knowledge of the power and effects of the several instruments for which it is written. It costs genius and much study to write the parts so that they harmonize effectively and melodiously and are at the same time expressive; comparatively few are written that are worth playing through."

Mr. WILLIAM MASON is in Weimar, under the instruction of LISZT. He is located in a very pleasant part of the city, under every possible advantage, and I am sure America will feel proud of him as a pianist when he returns, as he has made wonderful improvement and is still going on with great perseverance. He played several pieces to me, and among others two of his own composition, which are about to be published by Schott in Mayence. I was much pleased with the improvement he has made in composition as well as in playing the piano-forte. Mr. Mason possesses a touch which is certainly very rare, an execution which is wonderful, and an undoubted musical talent. To say he is a pupil of Liszt is proof enough that he possesses all necessary qualifications to become a thorough pianist and an eminent composer. He is soon to play before the Grand Duke of Weimar and I fear not that he will give perfect satisfaction.

"On my arrival at Frankfort I had the pleasure of meeting Mr. LEVI P. HOMER and Mr. G. W. PRATT. Mr. Homer has given most of his time to Harmony, Composition and Instrumentation, for the past four years, and is considered in Frankfort to be a thorough musician. If I am a judge, he understands the science very thoroughly. He commenced to study from the very foundation, and as he is one of those who never leaves anything undone, your readers may be assured that he is quite at home in his profession. I had the pleasure of hearing some of his compositions such as Fugues, Chorals, &c. which were very fine. Among other pieces of his I saw a simple melody which he had varied in one hundred and thirty-three different ways, and still seventeen more variations must be composed to complete the composition. Mr. Homer intends to go to Leipsic ere long to continue his musical studies.

"Mr. Pratt, well known as music teacher in several seminaries in and about Boston, is pursuing his studies under several celebrated teachers, and with his ambition, perseverance and determination will certainly accomplish his great object with credit to himself and satisfaction to his many Boston friends.

"While at Paris I was favored with an invitation to call upon Miss ELISE HENSLE. Her talent and beautiful voice have given her a place in the Conservatory, of which it is considered a great honor to be a member. This lady evidently studies very diligently, and with her sweet and musical voice cannot but become a fine singer and thorough artiste. She has sung at many private circles and has been very highly complimented. I heard her sing several pieces from the most classical composers, with much taste and expression, that is to say for one so young in the Art. She has made a decided improvement since I last heard her in Boston.

"Miss Hensler gave me a letter of introduction to Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS. This young lady left Boston, some two years since, to visit Europe for the purpose of cultivating her voice and studying the different branches of music, in order, I believe, to become a thorough and accomplished artiste. Since that time she has been under the tuition of GARCIA, the most eminent living teacher. I called on her, and when I arrived at the door, I heard some one practising scales, trills, turns, and other difficulties. I listened with attention; at first thought she was taking a lesson; but after hearing her make several difficult running passages, chromatic scales, &c., I made up my mind that I was at the wrong door, as it sounded more like an artiste than a pupil. However, I ventured to ring and found that I was really at the residence of the lady in question who received my card and invited me in. I delivered my letter and immediately informed her my object in calling. As I had never heard her before this morning, I am unable to say whether she has improved or not. I can only say that Miss Phillips is the finest and most accomplished American singer I have ever heard. She possesses a fine mellow soprano voice, the compass of which is two octaves and five notes, the highest being B flat, which she produces with ease and clearness. Her low tones are very fine; her execution is wonderful for one of her age, and considering the short time she has already practised. Her delivery, taste and expression in singing display real talent, and I am convinced that this lady is destined to be a great artiste. She intends to study the German, Italian and French schools thoroughly, and consequently will probably leave London in the fall for either Germany or Italy. Our people must feel proud to learn that all the above named are from Boston."

We have also just received an interesting letter from our friend Salomonski, in Florence, which we must reluctantly withhold from our readers until next week.

THE MUSIC TRADE. From some statistics, copied in another column, it would seem that Music in this country has attained to a very considerable commercial consequence, whatever may be thought of us as an unmusical people. Twenty-seven millions of dollars in one year! Would that music as an Art bore any proportion to music as a trade among us! But the truth is, the divine Art, or rather the name of the divine Art has been most terribly and profanely traded upon. The manufacture and distribution of instruments, especially of organs and pianos, is all very well and marks the spread of musical culture. But when one contemplates the namby-pamby song and psalm-book making, the ceaseless publication of vile "variations" and "arrangements," and much of the teaching and "professor"-izing that spreads its drag-nets over town and village, one feels that it is mostly wooden nutmegs set to music. Your sharp-set, speculating Yankee is as ready to profess fine arts as scissors-grinding, if there be money to be made by it; and our goodly land is overrun by musical "professors," who are simply peddling speculators. In the "rural districts" every ear is pre-occupied with their soulless productions, and the finer sense shut against genuine music. The work of years must somehow be undone, and the market-brawl and tumult of this music trade be swept away, before the sweet, sincere tones of the heavenly Cecilia can become appreciable to the general ear.

Pictorials.

The Illustrated Magazine of Art, published in New York by A. Montgomery, 17 Spruce St., still maintains its pre-eminence among the pictorials of our country. Its beautiful engravings are mostly the production of French and English artists, and its editor, Mr. John Casswell, has superintended a similar work in England, with a circulation of 60,000 copies. Each monthly part contains sixty-eight large octavo pages of excellent reading matter, with upwards of thirty finely executed engravings. These give us representations in each number, (1) of the portrait and leading works of some great master; (2) of the foremost men and women of the age, including American; (3) of great architectural works, cathedrals, palaces, &c.; (4) historical events; (5) of animals, birds, fishes, &c.; (6) machinery, inventions, manufacturing processes, &c., illustrated throughout their several stages; (7) patterns of useful and ornamental work for ladies, &c. All this variety, with solid, well-written papers accompanying, gives the subscriber a good monthly supply of amusement and instruction for the small pittance of twenty-five cents. The present June number completes the first volume of six parts, and is even richer than its predecessors. It leads off with an article on Sir Edwin Landseer, with half a dozen capital engravings from his sketches of animal life. Scenes in Ireland, on the Danube, in Naples, in the life of Columbus, in the interior of a French artist's studio, in the London post-office, a portrait and memoir of Henry Ward Beecher, a minute description with wood-cuts of House's printing telegraph, and other interesting matters, follow. We understand it is the determination of the publisher to increase the interest of the Magazine still further, and to incorporate into it the principal matter of his other sumptuous serials, the "History of the Painters of All Nations," by Charles Blanc.

This splendid publication also has reached its sixth monthly part; six parts more will complete the volume. Each part gives, on sixteen elegant quarto pages, an account of the life and works of some great master, with the portrait of the master and engravings of several of his most famous works. Thus far we have had Albert Durer, Velasquez, Vandervelde, Rembrandt, Ruysdael and David Teniers the younger. Price of each part, fifty cents.

Musical Intelligence.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL ASSOCIATION.—The annual meeting of the Stockholders took place on the 8th inst. The Directors' Report showed the gross income of the first six months to be $6,871 54. Two donations to the Corporation were made within the past year. The one, a beautiful clock for the Hall—the other the handsome sum of one thousand dollars. The former by Timothy C. Leeds, Esq., and the latter by Hon. Jona. Phillips. Mr. Phillips' donation, together with the nett proceeds of the "Opening Concert" in Nov. last, ($923.26) have been placed at interest as an accumulating fund destined to purchase an organ worthy of the Hall one of these days. A munificent present from Mr. Charles C. Perkins of Boston, now in Europe was also announced. It is a statue in bronze of Beethoven, to be placed in the Hall, the order being already in the hands of the distinguished American sculptor, Crawford. The report concluded with a congratulation to the Stockholders on the very gratifying success of the Hall, which has thus far yielded an income considerably in advance of the estimates on which subscriptions were originally solicited. The Treasurer's report was also read in detail and both were unanimously approved. The last year's board of directors was retained unchanged by an unanimous vote, and the meeting was dissolved.

MUSICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY. At the annual meeting of the Musical Education Society, Monday evening, the following officers were chosen for the ensuing year; President, William F. Goodwin; Vice President, Geo. A. Lord; Secretary, H. L. Keyes; Assistant Secretary, S. G. Parsons; Treasurer, Alden Spaul; Librarian, Wm. F. Smith; Directors, J. D. Kent, H. A. Ball, Oliver Edwards, Joseph Sherwin, Jas. W. Bailey.

Summer brings a strange and appalling change over the musical aspect of our fair city; "for behold! darkness covers the earth." Negro minstrelsy occupies every hall. In the Boston Music Hall it is the "Campbells" that are come; at Williams Hall, it is "Mason's Serenaders;" at the Howard, "Bryant's;" at Ordway's Hall it is a permanent institution; while at the Museum and the National, l'Oncle Tom nightly receives crowds of friends.

The annual MUSICAL FESTIVAL OF THE GERMANS is to take place this year in Philadelphia, commencing on the 25th of June, and lasting until the 29th. The vocal societies of all the principal cities and towns will be present, and, with those of this city, will make a chorus of about one thousand male singers. There will probably be some additional thousands, not musicians, attracted by the festival. On Saturday evening, the 25th, the visiting societies will arrive, and be escorted by a torch-light procession to Independence Square, where a Welcome Song will be sung by the Philadelphia Societies. A collation will afterwards be served up at the Chinese Museum, which will be the general headquarters. On Monday there will be a grand procession, and a Jubilee Concert in the Museum. Tuesday will be spent at Lemon Hill, where there will be an oration, music, dancing and games; and in the evening a meeting will be held to determine on the place for holding the next festival. This is the fourth of these annual festivals, the first having been held in Philadelphia four years ago, the second in New York, and the third in Baltimore.

Phil. Evening Bulletin.

GERMANY. We translate the following items from Meyer's Monatshefte:

At Düsseldorf, preparations were making for the great Rhine music festival, to take place at Whitsuntide. On the first day Robert Schumann conducts in the performance of his own symphony in D minor, and of Handel's "Messiah." On the second day, Ferdinand Hiller conducts in the overture to "Euryanthe," the first act of Gluck's "Alceste," and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven. On the third day, for which the programme was not determined, the two conductors were to alternate. Of the solo-singers who have consented to take part, are named Clara Novello from London, Fräulein Schloss and Hartmann, and Herr von der Osten and Tichatschek.

The old clavichord, that belonged to MOZART, and whose existence in Salzburg was not long since mentioned, has passed into the possession of LISZT at Weimar, who also has as a pendant to it the old piano that Beethoven used in his last years.

FLOROW is composing two comic operas for Vienna: "Rübezahl," and "die Studenten von Bologna," to which Pultitz is writing the libretto.

JOHANNA WAGNER was to employ her leave of absence from Berlin, beginning the 1st of June, by 'starring it' in the opera at Dresden, Frankfurt, and Aix la Chapelle.

Verdi's "Rigoletto" seems to be going the round of Germany. It has already been produced with good success in several cities, and is in preparation in several theatres.

OUR JOURNAL IN NEW YORK. Mr. JOHN CUMMING is our authorized canvasser and collector in New York; and we trust that he will meet with a cordial reception wherever he may call to present the claims of the Journal to the regard of the true friends of music.

Subscribers in New York, who have not paid for the present year, may enclose their subscription to our address, 21 School Street, Boston, or pay it at the music store of Messrs. Scharfenberg & Luis, opposite the New York Hotel, in Broadway.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC, A Paper of Art and Literature, PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY, AT 21 SCHOOL STREET, BOSTON, $2 per annum, in advance.

ITS CONTENTS relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time,—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music published at home and abroad. 3. A Summary of the significant Musical News from all parts; gathered from English, German, French, as well as American papers. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, Architecture, Poetry, Esthetic Books, the Drama, &c.—8. Original and Selected Poems, short Tales, Anecdotes, &c.

Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished. Address, (post paid,) J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School Street, Boston.

Advertisements.

A. W. FRENZEL,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC, and late Leader of the "SAXONIA ORCHESTRA," having made Boston his residence, is prepared to give Lessons on the Piano-Forte and in Singing, both in the English and German languages; also to accompany with the violin more advanced pupils in the Sonata-duos of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c. During the summer season, Mr. F. offers his services to classes out of town. Or he will receive scholars, from the city or the country, at his Music Rooms, No. 4 Pine Street, Boston, where he may always be found before 10 A. M., and between the hours of 1 and 3 P. M.

Pianos and Melodeons to Let.

OLIVER DITSON,

Music Dealer, 115 Washington St., Boston,

HAS a good variety of Piano Fortes, Melodeons, Seraphines, and Reed Organs, to let, for city or country, on low terms. If, within one year from the time of hiring, the party should conclude to purchase the instrument, no charge will be made for rent of it, except the interest on its value.

JUST PUBLISHED,

THE STABAT MATER, by Rossini, at the low price of 75 cents.

Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

BEETHOVEN'S CELEBRATED MASS in C, IN VOCAL SCORE:

With an Accompaniment for the Organ or Piano-Forte, by Vincent Novello. With Latin and English text. Just published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

Sold by all Music Dealers.

THE SYMPHONIES OF BEETHOVEN:—ARRANGED FOR THE PIANO-FORTE BY J. N. HORNEL.

The above excellent compositions are now in course of publication by the subscriber.

Symphony No. 7, in A, op. 92, is now ready.

Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

Sold by all Music Dealers.

Edward L. Balch,

NEW EDITION OF CARCASSI'S GUITAR BOOK.

New and Improved Method for the Guitar, by M. Carcassi. Price $2.50.

This new edition of Carcassi's celebrated method embraces much valuable matter not contained in those previously issued. These additions are those which have been made by the distinguished author after an experience which enabled him to determine what was actually needed by the pupil for a thorough understanding of the art. The whole has been carefully translated by a well known Professor of the Guitar, and is thereby rendered as free as possible from those slight but perplexing inaccuracies which sometimes become a part of translations and reprints. A number of popular songs in each of the different keys have been appended, which together with the masterly instructions of Carcassi, and his plain yet comprehensive course of Exercises, furnish all that is desirable to both teacher and scholar.

OLIVER DITSON, Publisher,
115 Washington St.

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE, No. 86 TREMONT STREET, BOSTON.

WHITE BROTHERS, DEALERS IN MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, Best Italian, German, French and English Strings,

AGENTS OF

J. André, Offenbach; and G. André, Philadelphia,
FOR THE SALE OF FOREIGN CLASSIC MUSIC,
CHOIR MUSIC, &c.

Instruments Made, Repaired, Tuned, Bought, Sold, or Exchanged, on the most favorable terms.

IRA J. WHITE. A. WARREN WHITE.
ii 2 3m

THEODORE T. BARKER, MUSIC STORE, No. 381 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

Chickering's Pianos to let.

All Foreign and American Musical Publications received as soon as published.

ii 23 3m

N. D. COTTON,

IMPORTER AND DEALER IN

English, French, and American Stationery,
DRAWING & PAINTING MATERIALS,
No. 13 Tremont Row, Boston.

 Wedding and Visiting Cards Engraved and Printed.

16 tf

BEETHOVEN'S ORATORIO OF ENGEDI, or DAVID IN THE WILDERNESS, known as the MOUNT OF OLIVES, is this day published in a neat, convenient form for the singer or concert-goer by

Geo. P. Reed & Co., Publishers,
Jan. 8. 17 Tremont Row, Boston.

J. W. TAVERNER, PROFESSOR OF RECITATION,

AT HIS RESIDENCE,

No. 30 CHARLES STREET, BOSTON.

J. C. WOODMAN,

ORGANIST AND CONDUCTOR OF MUSIC AT CENTRAL CHURCH,

Teacher of Singing, Piano Forte, &c.,
No. 94 Chestnut Street, Boston.

iii 2 3m.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.

FOREIGN MUSIC DEPOT,
GIRARD HOUSE BUILDINGS,
NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,
PHILADELPHIA.

N. B. The complete works, for Piano, (Quartets, Trios, Duets for Piano and Violin, Duets for four hands and Piano solo pieces), of BEETHOVEN and MOZART, as also the Piano solo Works of CLEMENTI and HAYDN, as published by J. André, Offenbach, in sets, at very low prices. We have appointed

Messrs. WHITE BROTHERS,

TREMONT TEMPLE, BOSTON,

our Agents for the sale of the above Standard Editions of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, &c. &c.

iii 2 tf

MRS. ROSA GARCIA DE RIBAS,

TEACHER OF THE

PIANOFORTE, SINGING & GUITAR,
2 Seneca St., corner Harrison Avenue.

MR. De RIBAS will give instruction on the Oboe and Flute. Also MUSIC ARRANGED, TRANSPOSED, &c. Boston, April 23.

3m

Letter-Press, Music and Job Printing—Office,

JONAS CHICKERING,

RESPECTFULLY gives notice to his friends and the public that, having recovered from the late disastrous effects produced by the destruction of his factory, he is now ready to receive orders for PIANOS, which he promises to execute with as much faithfulness and promptitude as heretofore.

379 Washington Street, Boston.

Mar. 5.

tf

HEWS' PATENT

AMERICAN ACTION PIANO-FORTE.

THE MANUFACTURER is in possession of numerous testimonials from distinguished Musical Professors, who have used the greatly improved ACTION PIANO, commending it in high terms. The attention of purchasers and amateurs of Music to an examination of its superiority, is solicited.

GEO. HEWS, 365 Washington St., Boston.

Apr. 10.

tf

D. B. NEWHALL, MANUFACTURER AND DEALER IN PIANO FORTES, No. 314 Washington Street, Boston.

PIANO FORTES REPAIRED, TUNED, & TO LET.

Apr. 10.

tf

SIGNOR G. C. GUIDI respectfully informs his former pupils and the public, that he has resumed his instructions in SINGING, after the Italian school, with the intention to settle permanently in Boston. In order to accommodate those who may not wish to take private instruction, he will open classes for ladies and gentlemen, on moderate terms. None but good voices will be admitted. Terms liberal for persons intending to study for professional purposes.

Sig. G. can be consulted free upon any musical subject, daily, from 12 to 2, at Mr. Hew's Piano Manufactory, No. 365 Washington street, where terms and time for classes may be known.

Orders or notes for Sig. G. may be addressed to him at G. P. Reed & Co.'s Music Store, 17 Tremont Row, and at Oliver Ditson's, 115 Washington street.

Feb. 5.

A CARD.

THE SUBSCRIBER respectfully offers his services to the public as Teacher of the Piano-Forte, the Violin, and of Singing, after a clear and easy method. He will also accompany pupils, both in seminaries and in private houses, in the practice of Duets, Trios, &c.

Address for the present at 168 Tremont Street.

March 26. 3m.

CARL GÄRTNER.

L. H. SOUTHARD, TEACHER OF MUSIC, 265 Washington Street, Boston.

Oct. 15.

3m

T. BRICHER, Organist and Conductor of Music At the Bowdoin Square Church.

OFFICE UNDER THE CHURCH. . . ENTRANCE ON CHARDON ST.

Jan. 22. 3m.

H. S. CUTLER, Organist at the Church of the Advent, also of the Boston Harmonic Society.

ADDRESS—(Care of) ROLAND CUTLER, No. 4 Market Square, Boston)

22 tf

F. F. MÜLLER,

DIRECTOR OF MUSIC AND ORGANIST at the Old South Church; ORGANIST of the Handel and Haydn Society; ORGANIST of the Musical Education Society, &c. &c. &c. Inquire of Messrs. REED & Co., No. 17 Tremont Row, Boston.

ii 7 tf

NATHAN RICHARDSON, PROFESSOR OF MUSIC.

Now in Europe; will return 1st of June. Letters may be addressed at 19 Hanover St.

25 tf

GEORGE F. WILLEY, TEACHER OF MUSIC.

Private Tuition in the principles of Music and the Cultivation of the Voice.

MUSIC ROOM, THE LECTURE ROOM OF KIRK STREET CHURCH, RESIDENCE, 34 FRANKLIN SQUARE, SUFFOLK STREET, Feb. 5.

LOWELL, MASS.

Germania Serenade Band. THE SERVICES OF THIS ASSOCIATION can be secured by applying to

G. SCHNAPP, Leader,
364 Tremont Street.

ii 14 tf

RATES FOR ADVERTISING.

For half a square, (8 lines,) or less, first insertion, . . . $0.50
each additional inser. 25

For a square, (16 lines,) first insertion, 1 00
each additional insertion, 50

On advertisements standing three months or longer, a discount of twenty per cent. on the above rates is allowed. (A column counts as seven squares.)

Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 School St.

DWIGHT'S Journal of Music.

A Paper of Art and Literature.

VOL. II.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 18, 1853.

NO. 11.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

TERMS....TWO DOLLARS PER ANNUM, (IN ADVANCE.)

CITY Subscribers can be served at their houses by the further payment of fifty cents per annum.

☞ For Rates of Advertising, see last page.

POSTAGE, if paid in advance, for any distance within the State, thirteen cents a year; if not in advance, twenty-six cents. To all places beyond the State, double these rates.

J. S. DWIGHT,.....EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

☞ OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St.

By REDDING & CO., 8 State St.

" GEO. P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row.

" A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.

" DEXTER & BROTHERS, 43 Ann Street, N. Y.

" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 722 Broadway, N. Y.

" MASON BROTHERS, 23 Park Row, New York.

" GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.

" G. ANDRE, 229 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

" MILLER & BEACHAM, 151 Baltimore St., Balt.

" COLBURN & FIELD, Cincinnati, O.

" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Persons willing to become Agents for procuring subscribers, especially Music-Dealers and Teachers, are invited to correspond with the Editor, as above. Satisfactory references required, and liberal commissions allowed.

☞ Back numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Also bound copies of Vols I. and II. at prices varying from $2.50 to $3.50.

Hector Berlioz.

[The second visit of Berlioz to London, to conduct there his Opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," gives interest to the following remarks, which are found in an article entitled The Music of the Season, Present and Prospective, in the May number of Fraser's Magazine.]

In speaking of this extraordinary composer and of his opera, which was attended during its representations at Weimar, last autumn, by a concourse of musicians from the surrounding cities, and received triumphantly, notwithstanding great imperfections in the chorus, the principal singers, and especially of a tenor, who was obliged to omit the best piece of his part, the air in the third act, we are not so occupied with curiosity respecting his treatment of the promised work as with the feeling that he is now on the eve of receiving such a public demonstration in England as befits the master composer of the age, and the efforts of a life devoted to the highest objects of the musical art. Though we know no note of the music of Benvenuto, except the beautiful overture to the Roman carnival which introduces one of the acts, we conclude that the work is excellent, because, having heard many other compositions of its author, we know his mode of writing—that he aims not to excite the lively impressions of the vulgar ear by recalling forgotten forms of melody, and ideas no sooner familiar than they are decayed; but, on the contrary, to gratify musical taste of a high standard, by creations which gradually work their way among all. The failure of this opera at Paris, years ago, and the lively reversal of the judgment then pronounced, within a few months, in Germany, alike confirm our opinion that Benvenuto is composed of the same durable materials as the other compositions of Berlioz.

The misfortune of living to instruct and advance an age has been in turn common to the greatest benefactors to music, whose names illustrate the principal epochs of its modern history. Mozart did not live to see the full success of Don Juan, nor Beethoven the popularity of Fidelio; and up to the present time the world only seems to be somewhat more instructed and somewhat more widely musical, to have its judgment and appreciation of excellence more severely tasked. Relatively the position of composers is the same: the life of solitude and pensive meditation is still their inalienable heritage: they have the 'riches fineness' of the imagination, but their banking account is still in Utopia. We look anxiously for the time when high composition shall bring to its author some solid worldly recompense, and when enraptured audiences shall think that the clamor of their approbation and the certainty of posthumous fame for the composer do not entirely balance the mutual obligations of the pleasure-giver and the pleasure-receivers. When we think of the modest households of the great musicians of the last seventy years, and of the small fortunes which they accumulated, we must most conscientiously say, that we believe composers to be, of all artists, the least considered. They please greater masses, and by a more extended electric sympathy, than either painters or poets; and yet for music, this pulse of our exalted life, people give no thanks—considering it philosophically as only the air set in motion by some ingenious and privileged individual. If the gift of taste which sometimes descends upon people of fortune in this country, and confers a reputation which is often easily and amiably supported by the purchase of pictures and the giving of occasional dinner-parties and literary levees, should ever glow in the impassioned breast of a rich lover of music, he would be the Mæcenas who would have to 'lay out.' His park would contain the ornate residence of his orchestral musicians and Maestro di Capella; his chorus would be duly provided for; his concert-room and lyric theatre would exhibit the completest design and decoration; an Esterhazy of the last age, living on his Hungarian estate, would be his model and prototype. Here is a field for elegant extravagance, if one had but the means, which far outstrips our rural taste for hounds and horses—for taking five-barred gates and rasping fences. But music is still too unsubstantial an investment; its patron on this scale would only be thought 'to sow the wind,' and deserve to 'reap the whirlwind.' As we cannot inflate a set of puppets with air, and make them give it out in music, but require, both for opera and oratorios, a legion of pensionaries in the shape of men and women, who must have food and shelter, and some of the comforts of existence, before they can emit pleasurable tones, we turn over the costly and dangerous responsibility of supporting them to some enterprising manager and the uncertain favor of the public.

We are perhaps able to say that music has at last reached the limits of expense, and that a modern opera, supported with the highest talent in all its departments, cannot now by mechanical additions increase the gorgeous effect of sound upon the human senses. In such a condition of music lived neither Bach nor Handel, neither Mozart nor Beethoven; the art was in their time within the scope of private patronage, and a composer of genius could almost hold it in his hand. But the luxuriant scale of musical performances which has been gradually approached during the last twenty years, has so increased the difficulties of composers, that few oppose them successfully. Some, after many struggles, get heard once, and descend plump into the abyss of obscurity; others swim well for a season or two, and sink more gradually; but the names of modern composers, when we recall them, appear for the most part like the fitting visions in Dante's Inferno. While these are dismissed with indifference, others, discovered at rare intervals, show an elevation of purpose, a power of accomplishment, a consistency, and a determination of character which win for them, even in retirement, feelings of admiration and respect.

Some months have now elapsed since Hector Berlioz brought the last season of the New Philharmonic Concerts to such a triumphant conclusion, as all who attended them will testify, and we have had leisure in the interval to 'chew the cud' upon his merits. As a practical musician and conductor he then showed some things which, independently of the gradually increasing interest manifested by our public in his compositions, will not soon be forgotten in the annals of English Concerts. He gave the first example of long performances carried through without a flaw, and accustomed the public ear to a perfection which had not been reached. He established, and in a manner popularized Beethoven's Choral Symphony, which, though attempted elsewhere, has never been heard in England except in Exeter Hall. The teacher as well as the guide of the orchestra, he showed in this work, by its unity of effect, with what completeness the original existed in his own mind, and how successfully he could transmit and realize it. Zeal in preparation and consciousness of purpose were followed up in him when at the head of the orchestra by such lively faculties, such tact and self-reliance, as enabled him to meet every difficulty, and to take to himself unreservedly the responsibility of the most onerous works. The men of the orchestra relied with certainty upon many movements of this accomplished chief, unseen by the audience, to carry them successfully over the perilous difficulties of the modern symphony.

As a composer, the path of Berlioz is so extraordinary, and has been from the outset so free from traditions, that it forms one of the most interesting considerations in the modern history of the art. His music, as Vieuxtemps once characterized it to us, is 'music from an entirely new point of view.' To see how a composer could come effectively upon the scene after Mozart and Beethoven, and maintain himself there with honor during life, and bequeath works to posterity which they would cherish, was hardly to be expected of a young man; and yet the instinct of genius taught the pupil of Lesueur and Reicha, while yet in the Conservatoire, that fame to be permanent must be individual, that in this pursuit, imitation and scholastic rules are vain and illusory aids, and that time does not fail to redistribute borrowed inventions to their rightful owners. Possessed with this idea, from his earliest work, the Sinfonia Fantastique, or even before, he appears to have resolved to obtain the powers and position of the great classical masters by means entirely his own; and to the surprise of all who have looked on, he has accomplished his object—opening by the way new sources of beauty, and extending in a manner equally honorable to the art and to himself the mysterious power of sound. While such a composer lives, who shall pronounce music itself effete and exhausted? Rather let us say that brains are sterile, and that the art in its several departments wants capable men.

When we see this master, unbacked by powerful or adventitious influence, placed before a metropolitan audience, with all the support in a chorus and orchestra that money can give, it is to us a pure victory of opinion and progress, which atones for much that is discouraging in the eventful life of genius. The friends of Berlioz, Liszt the pianist, Griepenkerl of Brunswick, editor of the organ works of Bach, H. Romberg of Petersburg, and others, have written with the same disinterested simplicity and personal regard in behalf of his cause as he himself composes. Free from selfish or party motives, their testimony, and the better testimony of his works, have inspired a general interest in Berlioz, and England has effectually caught the flame.

We have reason to know that his absence from the post of conductor of the second season of the New Philharmonic Society spread a general regret and a coldness to its interests among the subscribers. The labor of giving popularity to a young and important musical institution is immense; and in founding it, he might rationally have hoped to effect a favorable opening in London for his own works. But the composer is the constant sport of fortune. In a moment these hopes were dissipated; and the audience, who hoped to greet Berlioz annually, had to reserve their gratulation for some more favorable meeting. The constancy which endures such perverse accidents without blenching is part of the heroic temperament of the artist, and it is a character which may be read legibly in the noble style of his compositions. His own life forms to these works the most interesting accompaniment and commentary.

In full assurance that Benvenuto Cellini, if fitly produced, will succeed,—the Philharmonic audience of last season, reserving their special acknowledgments for a due ovation to Berlioz on this occasion,—should not the manager prepare to take advantage, and the public to profit by the favoring gale? The season will then be probably advanced to June, the town will be gay with equipages, and country ladies residing at hotels will be consulting over the breakfast-table where best they may spend their money. Let concerts be organized, and let them contribute to the prosperity of good music. We have yet to hear of Berlioz, and with all convenient speed after Benvenuto Cellini, his Requiem, a majestic work, of which we have only heard the Offertorium; Faust, with its triumphant Hungarian march; his Romeo and Juliet symphony complete: his Sinfonia Funebre, his Harold symphony, and other works, which from association and experience we cannot name without a secret emotion of pleasure.

At a certain time of life composers know feelingly that they are but "mortal men," of frailer stuff, perchance, than most others. With a due foresight of contingencies, Berlioz has published his principal works in score, revised and corrected by himself, at an expense, we should think, which not a little evinces his attachment to his art. He would set himself right at any price with the growing public of music who, in future, will more appreciate him. The recollection of what he has accomplished makes us earnestly desire the full consummation of his artistic ambition—and the verdict upon him is all but universal. When he dies, a powerful individuality will be lost to the world: but we trust that there is yet reserved for his life of labor and desert a victor's wreath, and the mead of complete success.

[From the London Athenæum, May 21.]

Verdi's Opera of Rigoletto.

Some account of Signor Verdi's "Rigoletto," which work travels Italy as "Viscardello," was offered in a letter written to this journal from Rome in 1851. The opera was, at first, received there with the most violent contumely of Italian disapproval—though, subsequently, as we have been informed, it grew into a certain favor.—Throughout Italy it has been generally popular. It was produced this day week at the Royal Italian Opera; and, to judge from appearances, may possibly prove more profitable to the treasury than any of the six operas by Signor Verdi which have already been brought out in this country. But should "Rigoletto" keep our stage for a time, we think that it will be owing partly to the strength of the cast, and the scope afforded by the principal part to Signor Ronconi's acting—partly to the craft of Mr. Beverly, who made in it his début as scene-painter to Covent Garden, and who has produced a pair of night pictures, the first of which is effectively original, the second deliciously beautiful—partly because the story proves delightful to English play-goers of fashion. These scenes now, like the girls in Miss Austen's "Northanger Abbey," to have eyes, ears and hearts only for something "very horrid." It is the golden age for "Corsican Brothers," "Vampyres," and such dismal tales—for Quasimodo hurling Claude Frolo from his belfry, and for Triboulet, the king's humpbacked fool, dragging the body of his murdered daughter across the stage in a sack—which last incident forms the choice catastrophe of the work of art before us. On the night in 1832 when M. Victor Hugo's play, "Le Roi s'amuse," was performed for the first and only time at the Théâtre Français, this revolting novelty was received with a storm of censure. That, however, which is not tolerated when spoken, may be forgiven when it is sung. The very situation at the cross at Chaillot which drove Sir E. Lytton's "La Villière" off the English stage, was received with shouts of applause in the Italian opera of "Malek Adhel."

That we may not take our readers' acquaintance with the French "drama of despair" too much for granted, let us indicate slightly the four divisions into which the opera drawn from M. Hugo's suppressed tragedy is divided.—The scene is transferred from the Louvre to the Court of Mantua. The first act is devoted to a court ball, at which the Duke (Signor Mario) amuses himself somewhat in the style of Don Juan,—while his Fool, the hunchback Rigoletto (Signor Ronconi), "moralizes" his master's gallantries, by taunting the fathers and husbands who are insensible to such marks of court favor.—In the second act the shame is brought home to Rigoletto's own house: his daughter Gilda (Madame Bosio), who has been cautiously secluded by him from the rakish eyes of the Court, and is believed to be the Fool's mistress by those cognizant of her existence, is dragged from home at night by a party of young nobles, the Duke having fixed upon her as one of those whom he delights to honor.—Act the third brings Rigoletto to court again; where after some vain entreaty, he discovers his daughter, and learns from her what her fate has been.—In act the fourth, the Duke, out roving in the suburbs, is beguiled by Madelena (Mlle. Nantier Didiée) into the house of Sparafucile (Signor Tagliafico), a mercenary bravo, whom Rigoletto hires to assassinate the Duke. Magdalen, however, takes a fancy to the fly in the web; and the fact of the poor out-cast Gilda arriving in boy's attire enables the assassin to earn his fee by substituting one victim for another. Her half-murdered body is placed in the sack, which Rigoletto has undertaken to fling into the river. While the buffoon is dragging his hideous load thitherward, he is astounded by the voice of the heartless Duke, who leaves the haunt of crime, singing gaily as he goes. The Fool opens the sack, discovers therein his dying daughter, and with his frenzy over his direful mistake the tale of horror concludes.

Now—apart from the fact that when the terse and poignant, though extravagant, dialogue of Victor Hugo is stripped from this tale, it becomes a bald melodrama of coarse and bloody quality, as such unfit for music—"Rigoletto" is, on the other hand, made difficult to treat for the Italian theatre by the complexity of its situations and the number of secondary characters required to work out the plot,—there being no fewer than six persons in addition to the five principal artists. Signor Verdi, therefore, seems to have attempted to be dramatic in the French style. As, however, was stated in the account of "Rigoletto" already referred to—while we perceive the attempt, in no place can we accept it as having been fulfilled. Such effect as "Rigoletto" produces, is produced not by its dramatic propriety of sound to sense. There is hardly one phrase in the part of the buffoon which might not belong to Signor Verdi's Doge in "I due Foscari," or to his "Nabucco." The music of combination and dramatic action, again, is puerile and queer: odd modulations being perpetually wrenched out with the vain hope of disguising the intrinsic meagreness of the ideas—and flutes being used for violins, or vice versa, apparently not to charm the hearer, but to make him stare. Thus the opening ball scene, accompanied throughout by orchestras on the stage—the abduction finale—the scene betwixt Rigoletto and the courtiers—and the storm in the last act, are alike miserable in their meagre patchiness and want of meaning. It is a merit that, in performance of a promise made in one of his prefaces, Signor Verdi is less violent in his instrumentation in "Rigoletto" than he was in his earlier operas; but he has not here arrived at the music of intellect and expression—which is French or German—as distinguished from the music of melody, which is Italian.

Tried with reference to prettiness of melody—for originality we have long ceased to bargain in Italian opera—"Rigoletto" must be pronounced weaker than "Ernani" or "Nabucco." The subject of the last movement to the duet betwixt Rigoletto and Gilda, in the second act, (which was encored), is distinct, and not unpleasing. The air of display for Gilda, in the garden scene,—called in the published copies of the music, a Polacca, though in common tempo,—is as ineffective a mixture of common-place and eccentricity as it ever fell to the lot of prima donna to deliver. There is animation in the stretta, "Si vendetta," to the second duet betwixt Rigoletto and Gilda, closing the third act. The Duke's waltz, "La Donna é mobile," got its encore, owing to the enjoyment thrown into it by Signor Mario, and owing to there being some motion in its rhythm; but as a tune it will bear no comparison even with the "Brindisi" in "Lucrezia Borgia." The gem of the opera comes soon after this ballata: this is the quartet "Bella figlia," founded on a melodious phrase, with clever grouping and neat contrast of the voices,—in which the climax is naturally wrought up, and by which are excited those genial sensations of pleasure which admit of no doubt, and require neither proof nor apology. On the strength of this quartet, we would still hope that Signor Verdi has not "said his last word;" and that he may even now one day come to see more clearly than he has heretofore seen, that thought is not antagonistic to beauty—nor dramatic effect to musical symmetry. This quartet was deservedly encored, and may become a stock favorite among pieces of its form and order.

A word remains to be said concerning the principal artists who appeared. Signor Ronconi put forth his power to the utmost as Rigoletto. We cannot, however, rank it among his best personations; but this lies in the nature of the part, which is too abrupt and naked in its transitions in opera, and which, moreover, is made superfluously difficult by the lugubrious characterlessness of its music. Madame Bosio appeared to more advantage as Gilda than she has yet done in London; not merely because in her new part she is exposed to no comparison, but because her style of execution precisely suits Signor Verdi's music. By him the singers are invited, not forbidden, to slacken tempo; and the hearer is compelled to wait for the note, not driven on by the energy of a voice ready and powerful. Signor Mario as the Duke, looked seductive and galliard to a wish; musically, however, the part is not one of his best. The performance throughout had been perfectly prepared and was highly finished, and the impression on the subscribers seemed to be satisfactory. How far beyond their circle the popularity may spread—how long it will endure even in our present dearth of Italian operas—time must show.

THE ABIDING AND THE FLEETING.

FROM GOETHE.

Early joys, how false and fleeting!
Vanishing within the hour;
Envious, murky west-winds beating,
Come and wither every flower.
Can I in the verdure gladden,
Casting now its grateful shade,
Which the autumn storms must sadden,
And whose fairest leaves must fade?

Seekest thou life's fruits to win?
Quickly snatched the moment's share!
These to ripen will begin,
Let the others blossom there.
Think! thy vale, of joy the giver,
Changes with each shower of rain;
In the same transparent river
Thou wilt never bathe again.

Thou thyself art ever changing!
Forms that now before thee rise,
Palaces and walls high ranging,
Thou beholdest with other eyes.
Vanished are the lips that gladly
Once bestowed love's fond embrace,
And the foot that boldly, madly
Trod the hunter's mountain-chase.

And the hand that for thy brother
Nobly worked in weal and woe,
Everything is now another;
Swift they come and noiseless go.
All the form that bears thy name,
Standing now where thou hast stood,
Like a wave of ocean came,
And rejoins its native flood.

To beginning let completion
Follow in harmonious rhyme;
Let thy spirit's swift fruition
Yet outstrip the flight of time.
Gifts for aye thou mayst inherit,
Mortal of the Muses blest!
The ideal before thy spirit,
The reward within thy breast.

THE SLOW MARCH OF THE TEAM.—The stranger in Devonshire will not fail to notice the peculiar intonations employed in driving a team there. It is not the words used to encourage the animals (though they are in a great measure peculiar to the country) that will arrest attention, but the tone or tune in which they are delivered, resembling with great exactness, says an observer, the chantings or recitative of the cathedral service. "The plough-boy chants the counter-tenor with unabated ardor through the day, the ploughman throwing in, at intervals, his hoarser notes. It is understood that this chanting march, (which may sometimes be heard at a considerable distance,) encourages and animates the team, like the music of a marching army, or the song of the rowers."

A Few Facts.

NEW YORK, June 3, 1853.

MR. EDITOR:—A German friend, to whom I showed your lecture upon Don Giovanni, has furnished me with some facts relative to it, which, as nothing can be amiss which shall tend to a better understanding of such a work, I take occasion to send you. First comes a list of the different works, mostly dramas, in which this plot has been treated.

1. El Curlador de Sevilla y convidado de piedra, by Gabriel Teller, 16th century.
2. Le festin de Pierre, ou le fils criminel; Villiers, 1659.
3. Don Juan, ou le festin de Pierre; Moliere, 1669.
4. Le festin de Pierre, ou l'athée foudroyé; Dumesnil, 1669.
5. "The Libertine;" Shadwell, 1676.
6. Giovanni Temerario, ossia il dissoluto punito; Goldoni, 18th century.
7. Il convitato de piedra, ossia il dissoluto. 1777. Opera composed by Righini.
8. 1787. Lorenzo da Ponte.

As to the number of acts of this opera, he writes, "I have seen Don Juan at Prague, Vienna, Dresden, Breslau, Berlin, always in two acts. Every edition, score and piano, has no otherwise than 'Oper in 2 Akten.' I have heard that in small theatres (for instance, Nuremberg, Mannheim) they made the finale of the second act to a third act, because they could not get the scenery ready so fast for the hell."

On another point, he writes, "In most of the German Theatres Don Giovanni is given as a lückenbüßer, that is when no other piece can be given, and always performed in very bad style, (liederlich). The lovers of Mozart complain at this, and the old ones remember with regret the splendid way it was given in Mozart's time; especially some of them have mentioned to me that the supper in the last scene was a well attended one, with many guests, &c. So said Mr. Gardigida, teacher of singing in the Prague Conservatorium of Music, that his father was an impresario (manager) at Florence, about the year 1801, and that they always performed Don Giovanni with a full set of guests in the supper scene." You will remember, too, that in Hoffmann's "Don Juan," the last scene represents a feast, and that Don Giovanni is described as sitting with a girl on each side of him. A.

ROSSINI A MUSICIAN BY ACCIDENT.—A correspondent of the Daily News (London), supplies the following, which takes a place among recent on-dits: "When the Emperor sent the ribbon of a commander in the Legion of Honor to Rossini, he wrote a highly complimentary letter, in which he expressed a hope that the great composer would gratify him and the world by writing a new opera. Rossini, who since he has reposed upon his laurels, passes for one of the most idle as well as the most independent men in Europe, assured his Majesty that he was only a musician 'by accident'; that he had never composed for the love of composition, but for the sake of a livelihood; and now that he was above the world, he desired rest. At the end of his letter, however, Rossini offered to compose a mass for the coronation. The Emperor's answer to this proposal is not yet known."

ROUGH APPLAUSE AND ECCENTRIC HABITS. In the extracts from the Duchess of Orleans' Letters, we find that Queen Christiana, of Sweden (who was as peculiar in her night-dress as in almost everything else, and who, instead of a night-cap, made use of an uncouth linen wrapper), having spent a restless day in bed, ordered a band of Italian musicians from the Opera to approach near to her curtains, which were close drawn, and strive to amuse her. After some time, the voice of one of the performers striking her with singular pleasure, she suddenly thrust her homely, stern, ill-dressed head from behind the curtains, exclaiming loudly, "Mort Diable! comme il chante bien!" The performers were terror-stricken, and the concert was for some minutes at a stand.

VOCALITY WITH A VENGEANCE.—The Christian Copts of Egypt (the descendants of the Egyptians of the period of the Pharaohs) occupy, says M. Fétis, more than twenty minutes in singing the words 'Alleluiah' once, in their profusely ornamented style. M. Fétis thinks it impossible but that the Copts, who have preserved their ancient language, should not also have retained their ancient music, and considers that their actual music is the same to which Plato refers, when he tells us that the priests of Egypt sang hymns on the seven vowels to the honor of Osiris.

INVENTION OF HINDOO MUSIC.—(From Tomlinson's Lectures.)—The Hindoos believe, that music was invented by Brahma himself, or by his active power Sereswati, the Goddess of Speech; and that their mythological son, Nared, invented the vina, the oldest musical instrument in use in Hindostan.

The vina or been is a fretted instrument of the guitar kind. The finger-board is $21\frac{1}{8}$ inches long. A little beyond each end of the finger-board are two large gourds, and beyond these are the pegs and tail-piece which hold the wires. The whole length of the instrument is three feet seven inches. The first gourd is fixed at ten inches from the top, and the second is about two feet eleven and a half inches. The gourds are very large, about fourteen inches in diameter. The finger-board is about two inches wide. The wires are seven in number, and consist of two steel ones, very close together, on the right side; four brass ones on the finger-board; and one brass one on the left side. The instrument is held over the left shoulder, the upper gourd resting on that shoulder, and the lower one on the right knee.

Among inspired mortals the first musician is believed to have been the sage Bharat, who was the inventor of natacs, or dramas, represented with songs and dances, and the author of a musical system that bears his name. Almost every kingdom and province had a peculiar style of melody, and very different names for the modes, as well as a different manner of arranging them. It is said their ancient system of music is preserved in the sacred books of the Hindoos, but as these have not been translated, nor if they were would it repay the time and trouble required for such a task, therefore it appears the theory of the art is known, although the practice is entirely lost.

There is perhaps no nation that takes greater delight in music than the Hindoos; they make use of it on all occasions, in their festivals and processions, and many of their religious ceremonies; and it is astonishing to see the excitement that is produced by their harsh minstrelsy. The effect is said to be electrical. Their eyes, which before relaxed into a languid expression of half consciousness, become suddenly kindled with a blaze of enthusiasm, and they join in the procession, which the minstrels are enlivening with their discordant strains, with gestures of frantic delight.

Mozart's excellent pianoforte duet in F minor (an eternal piece of music, if there is such a thing) was written for a piece of machinery attached to a clock. European musicians are now potentates and princes, given to curl the lip and speak of 'the shop,' if asked to accommodate themselves to circumstances, and to oblige as well as to dream. But, somehow, they are not Haydns and Mozarts. Athenæum.

Fine Arts.

A Splendid Engraving.

We have had the privilege of examining the proof impression of a most elaborate and beautiful engraving, soon to be published by Messrs. J. P. Jewett & Co., of this city. It is no less than the whole of Bunyan's Allegory, with all its scenes and characters, pictorially combined into one plate of thirty by twenty-four inches. The design is by BILLINGS, and is graven on steel by JOSEPH ANDREWS, who has been engaged five years in the operation. It contains two hundred and eighty human figures, including of course the reproduction of the same principal figures times enough to be fatal to all ordinary attempts to avoid monotony and secure unity. Pilgrim's road is represented, starting from the City of Destruction, in the right hand lower corner of the picture, and crossing and recrossing the plate several times, so as to bring in all the different adventures, till the whole culminates, as in serene, light summer cloud-scenery, with the Celestial City shining above the Delectable Mountains.

One is incredulous at the bare mention of such an undertaking, and looks rather for an elaboration of mechanical ingenuity, than for a work of art, in such an extraordinary combination of many pictures into one. Indeed, it is no less than the whole story of man's moral struggle portrayed, step by step, in distinct, individual pictures, and yet blended into one before the eye. Unity and general beauty of effect would seem impossible. Yet these artists seem to have made it possible. The picture charms you as a graceful and harmonious whole; the form unfolds as easily and naturally, as Bunyan's vision, from its germ. There is nothing stiff, constrained, mechanical, or crowded in its aspect; it is only rich with details admirably subordinated; and the conditions of light and shade, and other general artistic effect, are as successfully preserved, as if the long-winding series of special topics all along had opportunely kept pace with the pencil, just by way of peopling and ornamenting its free sweeps of space. This statement, absolutely taken, is too strong, perhaps; but not at all so when compared with what any one would expect from so seemingly impossible an undertaking.

It is really a beautiful, a surprising work, and does great honor to both draftsman and engraver. As a family picture, thousands must be eager to possess it; for it combines instruction with a high degree of artistic pleasure, and will be like the unrolling of John Bunyan's great dream as a whole before the eyes.

We forgot to mention that several subjects, difficult to manage in the body of the picture, such as the seven sights which Pilgrim saw in the Interpreter's house—are ingeniously placed as medallions in the margin beneath, in the centre of which appears also a finely engraved portrait of Bunyan, in medallion.

American Artists in Italy.

"You may," says Mr. Bryant, in one of his late letters from Rome to the Post, "like some notices of what the American artists are doing in Rome. Crawford is occupied with his equestrian statue of Washington, designed for the city of Richmond. Around the principal figure, which is not yet fully modelled, will be placed statues of the cotemporary great men of Virginia. Two of these, the statues of Jefferson and Patrick Henry, are already modelled, and plaster casts of them have been obtained. They are of colossal size, and are designed with a manly vigor and a disdain of minor grace which quite delights me. If the rest of the monument shall be conceived in the same spirit, it will greatly raise Crawford's reputation. He has a small work under the chisel, the Babes in the Wood, which I hear has been ordered by a gentleman of New York. The children are lying hand in hand, and the redbreast has just begun his pious office of covering them with leaves. The subject seemed to me to be beautifully treated.

The other American sculptors at Rome, Mozier, Richard S. Greenough, Rogers and Ives, are all zealously pursuing their art, and occupied with works which show that there is not one of them who is not likely to surpass what he has already done. Mozier has a statue of Silence, which does him much credit; it is a female figure, standing in an attitude of command, with a calm severity of aspect, the forefinger of the left hand pointing to the lips. Greenough is modelling a figure of a shepherd attacked by an eagle, which promises well.

Page is here, analyzing the manner in which Titian produced his peculiar coloring, and reproducing some of his heads in excellent copies. But he has done what is better than this; he has painted a portrait of Charlotte Cushman, a fine, solid painting, richly colored, with which not only his friends, but everybody who sees it, is charmed. Terry, a universal favorite with his countrymen, is occupied with a picture of "Samuel and his Mother." C. G. Thompson, who arrived here not long since, is looking at the works of the great Italian painters, and now and then making a clever copy of a head or a single figure. Nichols has very successfully transferred the calm glow of Claude's landscapes into some fine copies which he is making. Wotherspoon is luxuriating on the sylvan beauties of Nemi. For my part, I can hardly understand what an American landscape-painter, after satisfying a natural curiosity to see the works of the great masters of his art, should do in Italy. He can study nature to quite as much advantage at home—a fresh and new nature as beautiful as that of Italy, though with a somewhat different aspect of beauty.

I was the other day in the studio of Gibson, the English sculptor. He showed our party a work in basso-relievo, representing Phaeton attempting to guide the chariot of the sun. It equals in fire and spirit anything the imagination could conceive of such a subject. The horses, with distended nostrils, plunge madly forward through space, seeming as if they would leap out of their harness and the young charioteer holds the reins with an aspect of uncertainty and alarm. In another part of Gibson's studio was placed a statue on which he had been trying an experiment that has long occupied his thoughts. The ancients, you know, colored or painted their statues, and this is supposed to have been done by persons who made it their particular profession. Gibson has a statue of Venus, a very pleasing figure, the hair of which has been colored of a very light warm brown, and bound with a fillet of the most delicate blue; he has stained the eye with a dim azure, with a tint of a crimson vein or two at the corners, laid the faintest possible bloom on the cheeks, touched the lips slightly with scarlet, and suffused the skin, over the whole form, with a carnation just perceptible, through which the blue stains of the marble appear like wandering veins. The drapery of the figure is left in the original color of the marble, except the border, along which runs a double stripe of pale blue, with another of pale crimson next to the edge. The effect is agreeable far beyond what I should have expected. The marble is deprived of all its appearance of hardness, and the statue has the look of a human figure seen through a soft mist; the outlines seem to blend with the atmosphere.

On my way hither, stopping at Florence, I visited the studio of our countryman Powers. He had several busts lately executed with his usual skill in giving the expression of character and life, and was then occupied with a figure intended as a representation of our new State, California. In her left hand she holds a divining rod pointing downwards to the mines in her soil, and in her right she conceals behind her back a scourge, intended as an emblem of the calamities which follow the eager search for gold. Powers at present models his figures in a peculiar manner. He builds them up with fragments of dry plaster, cemented by the same material in a liquid state. When any part of the figure requires to be made rounder or fuller, he lays on the plaster with a flexible gutta percha trowel; when it is to be reduced in size, he applies a kind of file or rasp, of which he is the inventor, which never becomes clogged, and is pierced with holes, through which the plaster shoots in a shower. In this manner he completes the model in a shorter time than it could be moulded in clay, and avoids the trouble of taking a cast."

☞ We congratulate the subscribers to the AMERICAN ART UNION that they may now obtain the series of plates promised them so long since. They may be had of Mr. William Y. Balch, No. 92 Tremont Street.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JUNE 18, 1853.

Church Music.

Every one feels how fitly music intervenes in all the public acts of worship; how poorly the common piety that unites us all as members of one family and children of one Parent can express itself without it. Every one complains of the unsatisfactory condition of church music all around. Why does the complaint continue, when books and professors of sacred music are so plenty? What are the formidable obstacles to better fruits? Their name is Legion, we suppose; but it is safe and reasonable also to suppose that they may all spring from a few grand roots. Three or four main causes, therefore, from which Sacred Music suffers, we will briefly state, before undertaking to say what is desirable and practicable.

1. The first, and by many looked upon as the root of the whole difficulty, is the popular lack of taste and appreciation for true music; or in other words, the want of musical cultivation. Good music, high, artistic music, composed by genius and performed by artists, is thought too good for the congregations; hence the demand for the more cheap and vulgar article, which is most cheaply and abundantly, nay superabundantly supplied,—trust to the Yankee psalm-smiths for all that! But it is the fault of the Church—we use the word here in the most liberal sense, as the outward organization of the religious sentiment in all its existing forms,—it is the fault of the church itself, if people love not pure and lofty music in the church. The church itself should educate, inspire the taste for it. To this end, it is only necessary to employ good music in its public services; for as surely as we grow familiar with good music, do we grow to love it. The church was the place of all others where the high examples should have been set, and made to speak with ever-renewed vitality, to the hearts of the people. If music have that vital affinity with all holy feelings, with all heavenward aspirations, with all spiritual experiences too far-reaching, too profound and subtle to find utterance in speech, which we have all been accustomed to suppose,—then the church should have seen to it that this glorious property of tones was duly and practically demonstrated, till it had created in the general mind the taste that could appreciate it. One church has done that. The old Catholic church has owed a vast deal of its hold upon the population of all Europe to its practical faith in the potency of music; and its music has been, not of the so-called cheap and popular, not plain, routine psalmody, but the most masterly productions of genius attempting its possible with every aid of science. It has not proscribed real, inspired Art, by stigmatizing its works, with the absurd term of "scientific music," as if that were tantamount to soullessly ingenious and profane. The Catholic Church has done it; why cannot the Protestant? And here arises the second fatality to the prevalence of a high order of church music:

2. Namely, sectarianism, exclusivism. The Protestant church is not one, but divided into many. Each separate church insists on its peculiarity, in musical service, as well as in creed and discipline.

The Church of England, for instance, has a rich legacy of its own peculiar, native music; this is full of intrinsic merit, as music; but it excludes the benefit of other kinds of music, products of other schools, and all inspiring and religious in their way; while it excludes itself from a more general reception out of its own pale, because it is so much of it inseparable from the Episcopalian form of worship. Some limit themselves to the extremely painful conformity to a mere traditional type of the most primitive and, as they fancy, only truly sacred music. They have a right to their partiality, if they find satisfaction in it; but to get the full spiritual good of music (and no less is our problem), we must take a more generous and accepting view than that.—On the other hand, the plain, psalm-singing of our congregational churches, shows a sectarian avoidance of the sublimest, richest and most beautiful compositions ever written, partly because they are rich, and partly because they are Catholic. A high and all-prevailing standard of good music we can never have, until we recognize that music is neither Catholic nor Protestant, neither high church nor low church, neither traditional nor new light; and in no sense a prescribed formality; but a living and divine voice of the best aspirations and emotions in the bottom of all souls, and quite unsectarian, reconciling and universal in its meanings.

Religion, as it is outwardly organized around us, that is, the church visible, lacks unity. The Roman church has at least an outward and compulsive unity; what we, who are not of it, regard as a false unity, a mere outward type and shadow of inward and true oneness; yet even this mere shadow gives it its immense advantage. In the matter of artistic aids,—whereby the spirit impresses itself, as through vibrating media, upon the eye and ear, and through these on the responsive soul within,—it trusts and uses all that art and nature offer, and is not afraid to touch aught, lest it shall have done service in some other church. The principle of the Protestant movement is individual liberty of judgment; this leads to many intellectual theories of things human and divine, to different theories often of the same internal facts,—and hence to many separate communions or sects. But if the principle of liberty, in spite of all these divergencies, implies no deep and inward principle of unity of some sort, it must be false; for the first and deepest passion in the human soul, indeed life itself, considered as one undivided impulse, is a craving after unity with all other life. Protestantism, however, does imply this. All worshippers of all sects, who are in any degree in earnest, feel and know that the real living religious sentiments, which impart all the glow and rhythmical heart-beat to an act of worship, are sentiments too large and universal to be circumscribed within any creed or form. Granting each separate church its own peculiar virtue (and perhaps each presents a certain side of truth more clearly than all others to those who need to have it so presented), still all churches build upon a certain undercurrent, or basis of a religious sentiment inherent in humanity, upon certain great religious instincts in the soul that only need to be educated into the light and into full, beneficent activity. It is precisely of these that music is the natural, the only perfect language. Music is chained down from her most benign, most heavenly function, and becomes a "Pegasus in Harness," when she is converted into the mere slave of traditional formality, and made to wear the livery of sect.

No doubt, in this attempt to gain a foothold for the most generous and edifying use of music in our public worship, we betray more of our own peculiar views or idiosyncracies than it concerns our musical readers to know. Of course, we must frankly own our stand-point, while we respect that of every other. But ours is at least a reconciling view; and music may be employed to greater advantage than ever in worship, as a language of the most simple and universal religious sentiments, so as to engage in worship thousands of hearts which know not and cannot learn to know the obligation of a peculiar creed; at the same time that it leaves each in the undisturbed enjoyment of whatsoever there may be most sectarian about him.

But leaving this consideration, (for at present we are only pointing out great obstacles to the general possession of a satisfactory church music; and this last obstacle is one so dangerously suggestive that we must only lift a corner of it into sight and then drop it), we pass on to a third obstacle of a very different nature.

3. It is that Sacred Music, in this country, has been and is so vigorously and profanely, even if it seem sometimes so sanctimoniously, traded upon. We have more than once alluded to the enormous multiplication and sale of new collections of psalmody in this country. The lover of good music, to whom there is religion in music, looks upon all this with loathing and dismay. It is said, to be sure, that we Americans are essentially a psalm-loving and psalm-singing people; that this has been our initiation into the glories and the joys of music, and that this is the field in which the popular sensibility to melody and harmony must be principally met and ministered unto and elevated. To psalms and chorals in themselves we make no sweeping objection; we too have loved them and have helped to sing them, and shall not have the folly to ignore their sublimity in fitting circumstances. But because they are simple, and because they smack of our puritan origin, and because the people grew up, generation after generation, with no other ideas of music, as a serious matter, and because the sense of monotony would set in after long singing of the same old set of short and simple tunes: was this good cause for varying and multiplying this short rhythmical pattern in infinitum, and overspreading the broad land, cubits deep, with this questionable manna, this dry and tasteless pabulum mechanically ground out and diffused through annual Conventions? Good cause or not, no matter, when the trading spirit was awakened, and saw that it could manufacture the demand by the mere act of manufacturing the supply.

A psalm-loving people we may be by habit, by force of our past circumstances; but a psalm-singing people essentially we doubt if we or any people can be; for we hold it to be just as certain as that a Beethoven symphony will by frequent hearing supplant the polka in the affections of an audience, that it only needs the opportunity to grow familiar with higher and more artistic models of sacred music, to make the people forget their passion for perpetually new changes on the old humdrum pattern of a psalm-tune. It is the trading spirit of the "professors" that has so long pre-occupied the popular ear and mind with these things, that it may be long before anything better can begin to make impression on them or arrest attention. Observe, it is only of the overdoing of the matter that we complain.

4. As we began with mentioning the want of taste for music as the first obstacle to the full religious efficacy of music, perhaps we had best end with suggesting that all these obstacles resolve themselves into this one: namely, that however much music is employed and loved, there is still every where in the matter of public worship a great lack of faith in Music. Music is far from being fully respected and trusted. Her's is the case of Woman in respect of civil rights. Honored she is after a fashion, and admired and courted. But the implication always is that she has no right or virtue in herself. In worship, Music is not listened to as if it had something to say, of a deeper and more subtle meaning than words can convey. But it is used to add measure and rhythm to a ritual, or simply as a sweetened liquid to wash down one dry pill after another of didactic verses in a prosy hymn; all the virtue being supposed to reside in the ritual or the verses, and the music to be wholly secondary. Let the hint suffice. We say, that until Music shall be better trusted, until it shall be understood and owned that in lofty or tender music, by itself considered, the most spiritual states and most profound prayers and longings and praises of the heart can find fuller utterance than in any outward forms or words, Music can never perform the tithe of her holy office for mankind.

These few leading difficulties we simply drag to sight for a moment, upon a first survey of the ground, by way of preliminary.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Letters from Germany.

I.

LEIPSIK, April, 1853.

On Palm Sunday, we had a splendid concert in Dresden—consisting of Mozart's Requiem and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony—performed by the musicians of the King's Chapel, and the chorus and solo singers of the Royal opera. As usual, in Germany, the vocal were far beneath the instrumental performers. Fraulein MAYER from Cassel, and MITTEWURZER, a baritone singer of some reputation, were alone worthy of mention; and the chorus, though well drilled, was hardly strong enough for the orchestra, with its nine double basses as foundation, and a superstructure of corresponding strength. The Ninth Symphony was however very finely performed, and produced, as it cannot fail to do, upon him who has a key to its mysteries, an effect of vast and unapproachable grandeur; it is the Mount Blanc of music;—the greatest expression of the noblest of ideas which poetry and music could be called upon to express—universal, world-wide, all-embracing charity, complete happiness of the noblest sort—arrived at through danger and doubt, and long seeking—"music married to immortal verse," when its own unassisted incompetency led it to seek for aid.

On my return to Leipzig, I walked to Gohlis, a village about an English mile distant from the city, and looked with increased reverence upon the little tumble-down two story house with the arched gateway, upon which is written in large letters, "so that he who runs may read," "Here lived Schiller—and wrote the Hymn to Joy." And in the second story over the window, which is perhaps a foot square, is also inscribed: "Schiller's Stube."

To return to the Dresden orchestra, it is perhaps superior to that at Leipzig in the wind department, but hardly its equal in the string. With Herr David as first violin, the whole band seem inspired by his fiery enthusiasm, and follow him like one man, whithersoever his great playing leads them. The difference was as clear as the sun at noonday, between the first ten Gewandhaus Concerts, with David as director, and the last two, when, by Gade's arrival, David was restored to his original place as leader of the violins. Take it altogether, I prefer the Leipzig orchestra, so constituted, to any I have heard—not by any means excepting the famous Conservatoire orchestra in Paris, which lacks the love that can alone kill personality, and give unity to the whole. In Paris you hear a set of the best drilled musicians in the world—and you know it, and think of it all the time. In the German orchestra the musicians disappear, and the music of Beethoven or Mozart, which they are interpreting to your delighted ears, is not troubled in its effect by individual strivings to shine. Each man feels himself a part of the whole, and blends his instrument with those of his comrades so that the picture has no spots to mar its beauty.

At the twentieth and last Gewandhaus Concert we were to have had the Ninth Symphony, but most unfortunately Herr David was taken ill, thus also postponing the last of the quartet series at which the ottet of Mendelssohn was to have been performed. Professor MOSCHIELES had also promised to play a concerto of Bach's with violin and flute obligato and quartet accompaniment. The quartet soirée being indefinitely put off, Professor M. played the concerto at the Gewandhaus Concert, the quartet parts being doubled. This concerto in D major has been lately published, for the first time, by Professor Dehn of Berlin from the original manuscript in the Royal Library. The first movement, concertante during the first half, becomes a piano solo, a sort of cadenza, until the short "tutti" at the end. The second movement is an Adagio, written as a trio between the basso, flute and obligato violin; and the last movement is again throughout its length, concertante, with quartet accompaniment. Now in order to give unity to this last movement, with the first Allegro, Professor M. composed a most admirable cadenza, which he played with great effect (as indeed he did the whole concerto) and in the purest style possible. In his performance of Bach's music, the peculiar characteristics of manner are admirably brought out. There is no hurrying of tempos beyond the composer's intention, in order to show off rapidity of finger—and though the text is strictly and religiously rendered, there is no baldness of delivery, if I may so speak. His playing gives the same charm to a Sonata of Beethoven, or a Concerto of Bach, that what painters call glazing gives to a picture. All is harmonized and blended together in the legato passages, by his wonderfully flexible fingers, or brought out in bold and strong effect in the staccato and forte passages.

II.

DUSSELDORF, May 15, 1853.

Since writing the above, I have been spending a month in Paris, and am now to spend three days here, in order to attend the Nieder-Rheinisches Musik Fest, before returning once more to Leipzig. During my stay in Paris I attended but two concerts—one, of the Academy of St. Cecilia, at which we had a Symphony of Haydn's, the Fantaisie for piano, with chorus, of Beethoven's, very tamely performed by Mr. St. Saëns, and two choruses from Gounod's "Ulysse," in which I find great beauty of thought and clearness. Gounod, who is the hope of the young French school, is unquestionably a man of great talent, a thorough musician, and blest with the faculty of making the best use of the ideas which flow from his pen. I know no modern composer whose music has given me so much satisfaction, as I have derived from Gounod's opera of "Sappho," his choruses and solos to Mr. Ponsard's "Ulysse," and an exquisite "Sanctus" which I heard twice in Paris last year.

The other concert was a private one given by Mr. Erard at his Piano-forte rooms for the purpose of giving artists and lovers of music the opportunity of hearing Mr. Alkan play upon his new Pedal Piano-forte. The Piano itself is a magnificent instrument; the pedal bass serves to double the lower key octave, an octave below—without any attempt to imitate the tone of an organ—and would be a fine thing to own, in order to study a great deal of organ music which is written with pedal bass, and which can therefore only be performed upon an organ. Ferdinand Hiller, Alkan, Alard and Franchomme were the artists who assisted to render this musical soirée most interesting and delightful.

At the Opera Comique the novelties were La Tonelli, by Thomas, La Lettre au Bon Dieu, by Duprez, and best of all, a charming thing by Reber, called Le Pere Gaillard, probably the best Opera Comique which has been brought out in Paris for many a year—quite in the quick, easy-flowing and melodious style of the good old French school of Boieldieu and Gretry.

At the Grand Opera, La Fronde, a five act opera by Niedermeyer, has not met with any great success, though the music is often not without power and beauty, and the story possessed of a great deal of dramatic interest, though too much spun out.

And now to return to Germany and the Dusseldorf Festival, of which I shall write you an account as it proceeds. A temporary building of planks, capable of containing about 1700 people, has been erected in a garden near the Park, and the interior is adorned with the arms of many German towns and cities, the name of each being inscribed on a shield or banner. The orchestra, consisting of 160 musicians, gathered from all parts of Germany, a chorus of 490 singers, and the three directors, Dr. Schumann, F. Hiller and Tausch, make up the number of 653 persons assembled to lend their aid towards the worthy execution of many "chef d'œuvres" of the old masters. To these must be added the solo singers—Mme. Clara Novello, Fraulein Eschborn, Hartmann and Schloss—Herrn Osten, and Koch, as tenors—and Salomon as bass. The Festival opened yesterday evening with a Symphony of Dr. Schumann, in D minor, written some fourteen years ago, but never before performed, I believe. It consisted of Introduction, Allegro, Romanza, Scherzo and Finale, played through without stopping between each of the movements, they being written to lead into one another, and thus form an uninterrupted whole. The Symphony was conducted by the composer, and is certainly clearer, more pleasing, and more melodious, than any other of his larger compositions. It left a desire to hear it again, which is a good sign, and not always the case with Dr. Schumann's music.

The second part of the concert consisted of the mightiest of Oratorios, Handel's "Messiah." A finer performance of this great master-piece can scarcely be imagined; especially were the choruses sung as I never heard choruses sung before. No confusion, no blurred entering of the different bodies of singers—each subordinate or leading in turn, and as the composer meant they should be. If spots must be always found in the sun, the altos might be rather more numerous with benefit to the just balancing of the different parts; the basses were magnificent, and the sopranos admirable. The Hallelujah Chorus, and the "Lift up your heads," were given with stupendous effect. Madame Novello sustained the soprano part, assisted by Fraulein Eschborn. With the exception of certain alterings, and meretricious ornaments, which Mme. Novello chose to put in the "I know that my Redeemer liveth," she gave me great pleasure. I never heard any one sing that song as it should be sung, excepting Jenny Lind, for whom it was a triumph: and Mme. N. would do well to remember the faithful sticking to the text, and the grand simplicity of style which distinguished that great artist's delivery. Generally speaking, the tempos were taken rather faster than we are accustomed to hear them in America, and this is an improvement, and must entirely remove the sense of weariness, of which many persons complain, after, and during the performance of so long a work. If choruses of such weight are allowed to drag in time, they lose their effect of power, and their majesty even is impaired. Certainly, Handel was the mightiest of the mighty musicians, and the "Messiah" is his master-piece.

Monday morning, the 16th, was devoted to the rehearsal for the evening's concert. The programme for this, the second day, was indeed a rich one. Overture to Euryanthe; Tenor aria from "St. Paul," sung by Herr Koch; the overture and first act of Gluck's immortal opera of Alceste; and then the "Choral Symphony" of Beethoven, HILLER being conductor. The overture was played with the utmost fire and precision. Mme. Novello sang the part of Alceste admirably well, better far than Mme. Koster, whom I heard twice in this rôle during the winter at Berlin. I know no music so dramatic as Gluck's, so elevated in its melody, and so impassioned in its recitatives. The three first movements in the Ninth Symphony were played to perfection: the last failed somewhat in the bass solo and quartet, in the evening, though at the rehearsal it was all that could be desired. As for epithets of admiration, I believe they have been pretty well exhausted in my letter already; so I will say no more about this mighty work, and the admirable rendering of it by the Dusseldorf orchestra.

Tuesday, the last day, was occupied by the rehearsal for, and performance in the evening, of the Artists' concert, of which the marvel was JOACHIM'S wonderful performance of Beethoven's Violin Concerto. He introduced the three cadences which he has composed for it and lately published; the one in the first movement was truly superb—masterly; the second is merely to unite the Adagio and Finale, very short; and the third is nearly as long and as fine as the first. I never saw an audience more enthusiastic, and they had reason to be, for Joachim is perhaps the first violinist now living, and the effect of his genius is heightened by the perfect calmness and simplicity of his manner; he seems to ride over the most tremendous difficulties, as if to him they were mere child's play. And the applause hardly touched him more than if it were addressed to his neighbor. All this quiet self-possession, and yet the greatest power and passion held in with bit and bridle, controlled, or let loose at will.

The rest of this closing concert was made up of a Concert Overture by Tausch; Schumann's Concerto, beautifully played by his wife, CLARA WIECK, who you are aware is considered the best lady pianist in the world. I should also mention that Mme. Schumann accompanied Joachim when he was encored, and called upon by the audience to play Bach's "Chaconne." Herr OSTEN sang "Adelaide" with great feeling, and Mme. Novello also sang several Scotch melodies. The whole concluded with a solo, quartet and chorus on the German national song, "Am Rhein, am Rhein," with orchestra, composed by Dr. Schumann for the occasion.

I see that the last number of the Gazette Musicale contains a letter from a correspondent, who, after praising without limits the perfection of this great Festival, confesses that the French have no chance in their own country of hearing such music, so perfectly performed; and advises them to come, and learn in the true country of music, what music is. I myself saw a distinguished musician, who has led an orchestra for many years in Paris, without coming out of France at all during that time, and who told me that he was quite overwhelmed and annoyed by what he heard, and well he might be; for in Germany alone can such enjoyment be found—in Germany alone does music form an essential part of the people's existence; and therefore only in Germany will the demand create the perfect performance of the chef d'œuvres of the great masters.

C. C. P.

[For Dwight's Journal of Music.]

Letter from Italy.

FLORENCE, May 18, 1853.

DEAR SIR:—By the courtesy of your Parisian correspondent I received the last numbers of your valuable Journal, which I distributed amongst American artists here, and I assure you that they were a great treat to us all. There are two of Verdi's operas reigning at present: "Il Trovatore" and "La Traviata." I hear from good sources that they are the best productions of all his works. Both of these operas are to be brought out in Florence at the Pergola. We have had an opera buffa, written by the son of Romani, called "Il Mantello." It was quite original, full of pathetic melodies and wit—was played with great success, and is deserving of much credit. He is quite young and this is his second attempt. The first is called "Tutti Amanti" and was played all over Italy. At the small theatres "poor Uncle Tom" has made a fiasco both in French and Italian.

According to an invitation given by Princess P—I accompanied Miss Giulia Hill to a musical soirée, where the great Rossini played accompaniment, perhaps for the last time, to "Una voce poco fa" for one of Romani's scholars. Oh! how well worth a voyage across the Atlantic to be there, to hear his yet firm voice, to see his noble countenance light up at the words "il tutor ricuserò" and "io l'ingegno aguzzerò." His brow seemed again to beam with all the fire and spirit of youth, and all present were lost as it were in gazing upon this great and wonderful man. One word about him and his habits—it is not true as was stated in the United States that he "amused himself by fishing and sold his fish at the public market." Rossini lives very retired from the musical public and very seldom accepts any invitation except to a dinner party. He avoids all conversation about music—many artists beg him to hear them, or to see their compositions, which he never does unless compelled; and then he finishes by saying that all is very good, all is sung well, all is written well, and in short praises everything. He is exceedingly neat in his personal appearance—always dresses in black, and may be seen, at almost any time in the day, walking the street carrying a green umbrella. It is believed that he has said that after he is dead the world will once more hear his productions.

The church music in Italy is not so inspiring as one might imagine, generally consisting of a fine orchestra with the mingled voices of men and boys, which are not always so pleasing to the ear as one would wish; the music is selected from some of the most modern operas, and the public very often make a loud demonstration of their ecstasy by Bravo! Bravissimo!! Tenors in Italy are very scarce, and I have heard better tenor voices in America, taken as a whole, than I have yet heard here. We have here a Catholic priest who sings in all the concerts and in church, who is a fine singer and has the most splendid voice (baritone) that I have heard for a long time. He has desired to make the stage his profession, but by the influence of the Archbishop he cannot even get permission to leave town.

Our townsman, Mr. Millard, has left Florence en route to Naples, in order to obtain una scrittura, and I feel quite sure that he will succeed. There are also several artists, painters and sculptors who are worthy of our remembrance. Mr. Powers has just finished the model of a statue of Washington, for one of the southern cities, and also a few busts. Mr. I. T. Hart, of Kentucky, is about modelling his statue of Henry Clay. He has invented a very ingenious instrument for sculptural purposes, which greatly facilitates both the perfection and the rapidity of the work.

Mr. T. Galt, of Virginia, has just left for the United States, taking his productions of four years' study. Among the painters, Edwin White of New York, already an artist of great merit and talent, has just finished his picture of Columbus, representing him as taking his last sacrament, previous to his departure for the discovery of America. It is a very beautiful subject, full of originality and feeling. Here also are Mr. Kellogg and Mr. Dana of Boston—the latter is about leaving for Paris.

J. K. SALOMONSKI.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

FLORAL CONCERT, "FESTIVAL OF BEAUTY."—One of the above named unique entertainments will be given by about 200 young ladies, under the superintendence of D. S. PENNELL & J. B. PACKARD, in City Hall, Charlestown, on Wednesday evening, the 22d. The occasion is to bear the name of "The Festival of Beauty" and we have no doubt it will be every way worthy of its title. We would call the attention of all who can make it convenient to attend this exhibition, to its peculiar attractions and its claims on their patronage. Families can find no better amusement than this.

PORTLAND, ME. An "occasional correspondent" writes us:—"The Sacred Music Society of this City have been giving a series of Sunday evening concerts with immense success. The second of the series was given last evening in Lancaster Hall to a very full house. The Society which has lately been under the direction of Mr. Arthurson, have made great progress. The programme was a good one, embracing selections from Handel's Oratorios of the 'Messiah' and 'Saul.' Mr. Arthurson sang several airs and recitatives finely. The Choruses, 'O, fatal day!' and 'Mouru, Israel,' were given with good effect.

The "Germanians" have had great success in the lake cities, Milwaukee, Chicago, &c. They are announced for July at Newport, at the Ocean House.

Miss Catherine Hayes is reported to have been successful in California. She has accumulated the snug sum of forty-five thousand dollars, which is the nett proceeds of her concerts for six months. It is said that the two last complimentary concerts given her in San Francisco by the citizens and firemen, yielded her ten thousand dollars.—Transcript.

England.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—At the fourth concert of the season, a symphony written for this Society, by Cherubini, when in London, was performed; and also a new concerto for violoncello, by Herr Molique, was played by Piatti. Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, the Overture to Weber's Euryantle, the March in Athalie by Mendelssohn, and Beethoven's Concerto in E flat, played by M. Hallé, contributed altogether, with the efforts of Herr Staudigl and Mrs. Endersohn, to make this concert most remarkable.—The concert on the 16th was a very distinguished performance. Sir Henry Bishop conducted his own Cantata, "The Departure from Paradise." The welcome accorded to Sir Henry was sincere as it was hearty. Miss Louisa Pyne's singing was equally appreciated. The other pieces in the programme were Mendelssohn's Symphony in A, Beethoven's Symphony in F, Spohr's Overture to Jessonda, Handel's Overture to Esther, the Overture to Mozart's Figaro, and a Viola Concerto by Vieuxtemps.

NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The third concert of this Society was by many considered "the best ever given by the Society." The following is the programme. Part I: Overture, Il Flauto Magico, Mozart; Aria by Herr Staudigl, Iphigenia in Aulide, Gluck; The music to Paradise Lost, Wyld; Concerto in C minor, Piano-forte, Miss Arabella Goddard, Sterndale Bennett. Part II: Symphony in A major, Mendelssohn; Aria, by Herr Reichart, Il Seraglio, Mozart; Overture, Oberon, Weber; Lied, "Treuer Tod," by Herr Staudigl, Lindpaintner; Overture, La Gazza Lutra, Rossini. Conductors, Herr Lindpaintner and Dr. Wyld. The music to Paradise Lost was decidedly successful; and the composer, who conducted his own music, was overwhelmed with honorable plaudits. Miss Goddard played the Concerto from memory.

The Musical Union held their third meeting on the 17th, at Willis's Rooms. Onslow's Quintet, No. 5, in D; Mendelssohn's Posthumous Piece in B flat (Op. 67), were in the programme. Beethoven's Sonata in B flat was played superbly by Mdlle. Clauss and M. Vieuxtemps. Tortini's Sonata was performed by Piatti and Bottesini. A child of eight years, who made some sensation in Paris last winter, a Portuguese named Napoleon, performed a Fantasia of Thalberg's, to the surprise and admiration of all who heard.

Herr Molique's annual series of concerts began on the 18th, at Willis's Rooms, with the assistance of Herr Paher, Mr. Mellon, and Mr. Hill. These meetings afford hardly equalled opportunities of hearing the best of classical chamber compositions faultlessly interpreted.

OXFORD.—On the 3d of May, Mendelssohn's Choruses to Antigone were performed, under the direction of Dr. Corfe, in the hall of Magdalen College, Mr. Bartholomew's version of the text being read by a member of the University. The greater number of the singers were amateurs: but the band comprised all the efficient members of the Choral Society, strengthened by several wind instruments and a harpist from London, and led by Mr. Blagrove. The result was, on the whole, very satisfactory. In truth, the chief difficulty of the composition is presented by the melodramatic music, especially in those portions where the reader is accompanied by the flutes, &c. * * Throughout the work is manifest the genius of the master, who could identify himself with any age and country.

On Tuesday, May 24, the birth-day of the Queen Victoria, her Majesty gave an evening German concert. The following was the programme:—

Trio, "Trenne nicht das Band der Liebe," Mdlle. Agnes Bury, Signor Gardoni, and Herr Formes (Das Nachtlager in Granada,).....C. Kreutzer. Ballade, "Rolandseck," Herr Formes.....Reissiger. Frühlingslied, Mdlle. Agnes Bury.....Mendelssohn. Romance, "Les Regrets," Signor Gardoni, F. Schubert. Andante and Finale, Pianoforte, Mdlle. Clauss. (Sonata, Op. 53,).....Beethoven. Duette, "Belia Ninfia," Mdlle. Agnes Bury and Signor Gardoni, (Jessonda,).....Spohr. Lied, "Frühlingsliebe," Herr Formes....F. Schubert. Lied, "Das Schifflein," Mdlle. Agnes Bury....Gräff. Canzone di Primavera, Signor Gardoni..Mendelssohn. Komisches Trio, "Das Bandel," Mdlle. Agnes Bury, Signor Gardoni, and Herr Formes....Mozart. At the pianoforte, Mrs. Anderson.

After the canzone of Mendelssohn, Mdlle. Clauss, at the desire of Her Majesty, performed a sonata by Scarlatti. The concert lasted just one hour and a quarter, and was greatly enjoyed by the illustrious audience. The Royal infants were present.

At a recent meeting of the Musical Institute of London, Professor Donaldson, of Edinburgh, lectured on "Musical Vibrations," and exhibited a simple process, by means of which the number of vibrations corresponding to the natural scale or gamut, with the fundamental harmonies, may be seen, heard, and accurately counted. The illustrations were exceedingly interesting and satisfactory from the variety and accuracy of the instruments exhibited, and the clear manner the various processes were explained by the learned professor.

Advertisements.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,
A Paper of Art and Literature,
PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,
AT 21 SCHOOL STREET, BOSTON,
$2 per annum, in advance.

ITS CONTENTS relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time,—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music published at home and abroad. 3. A Summary of the significant Musical News from all parts; gathered from English, German, French, as well as American papers. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, Architecture, Poetry, Aesthetic Books, the Drama, &c.—8. Original and Selected Poems, short Tales, Anecdotes, &c. Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished. Address, (post paid,) J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School Street, Boston.

A. W. FRENZEL,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC, and late Leader of the "SAXONIA ORCHESTRA," having made Boston his residence, is prepared to give Lessons on the Piano-Forte and to Singing, both in the English and German languages; also to accompany with the violin more advanced pupils in the Sonata-duos of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c. During the summer season, Mr. F. offers his services to classes out of town. Or he will receive scholars, from the city or the country, at his Music Rooms, No. 4 Pine Street, Boston, where he may always be found before 10 A. M., and between the hours of 1 and 3 P. M.

Pianos and Melodeons to Let.

OLIVER DITSON,

Music Dealer, 115 Washington St., Boston.

HAS a good variety of Piano Fortes, Melodeons, Scrapphines, and Reed Organs, to let, for city or country, on low terms. If, within one year from the time of hiring, the party should conclude to purchase the instrument, no charge will be made for rent of it, except the interest on its value. 25 tf

JUST PUBLISHED,

THE STABAT MATER, by Rossini, at the low price of 75 cents. Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

BEETHOVEN'S CELEBRATED MASS in C, IN VOCAL SCORE:

With an Accompaniment for the Organ or Piano-Forte, by Vincent Novello. With Latin and English text. Just published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

THE SYMPHONIES OF BEETHOVEN:—ARRANGED FOR THE PIANO-FORTE BY J. N. HUMMEL. The above excellent compositions are now in course of publication by the subscriber.

Symphony No. 7, in A, op. 92, is now ready.

Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

Sold by all Music Dealers.

Edward L. Balch,

NEW EDITION OF CARCASSI'S GUITAR BOOK. New and Improved Method for the Guitar, by M. Carcassi. Price $2.50.

This new edition of Carcassi's celebrated method embraces much valuable matter not contained in those previously issued. These additions are those which have been made by the distinguished author after an experience which enabled him to determine what was actually needed by the pupil for a thorough understanding of the art. The whole has been carefully translated by a well known Professor of the Guitar, and is thereby rendered as free as possible from those slight but perplexing inaccuracies which sometimes become a part of translations and reprints. A number of popular songs in each of the different keys have been appended, which together with the masterly instructions of Carcassi, and his plain yet comprehensive course of Exercises, furnish all that is desirable to both teacher and scholar.

OLIVER DITSON, Publisher,
115 Washington St.

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE,
No. 86 TREMONT STREET, BOSTON.

WHITE BROTHERS,
DEALERS IN MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS,
Best Italian, German, French and English Strings,

AGENTS OF

J. André, Offenbach; and G. André, Philadelphia,
FOR THE SALE OF FOREIGN CLASSIC MUSIC,
CHOIR MUSIC, &c.

Instruments Made, Repaired, Tuned, Bought, Sold, or Exchanged, on the most favorable terms.

IRA J. WHITE. A. WARREN WHITE.
21 2 3m

THEODORE T. BARKER,
MUSIC STORE,
No. 381 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

Chickering's Pianos to let.

All Foreign and American Musical Publications received as soon as published. 1123 3m

N. D. COTTON,
IMPORTER AND DEALER IN
English, French, and American Stationery,
DRAWING & PAINTING MATERIALS,
No. 13 Tremont Row, Boston.

Wedding and Visiting Cards Engraved and Printed. 16 tf

BEETHOVEN'S ORATORIO OF ENGEDI, or DAVID IN THE WILDERNESS, known as the MOUNT OF OLIVES, is this day published in a neat, convenient form for the singer or concert-goer by

Geo. P. Reed & Co., Publishers,
Jan. 8. 17 Tremont Row, Boston.

J. W. TAVERNER,
PROFESSOR OF ELOCUTION,

AT HIS RESIDENCE,

No. 30 CHARLES STREET, BOSTON.

J. C. WOODMAN,
ORGANIST AND CONDUCTOR OF MUSIC AT CENTRAL CHURCH,
Teacher of Singing, Piano Forte, &c.,
No. 94 Chestnut Street, Boston.

1112 3m.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.

FOREIGN MUSIC DEPOT,
GIRARD HOUSE BUILDINGS,
NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,
PHILADELPHIA.

N. B. The complete works, for Piano, (Quartets, Trios, Duets for Piano and Violin, Duets for four hands and Piano solo pieces,) of BEETHOVEN and MOZART, as also the Piano solo Works of CLEMENTI and HAYDN, as published by J. André, Offenbach, in sets, at very low prices. We have appointed

Messrs. WHITE BROTHERS,
TREMONT TEMPLE, BOSTON,

our Agents for the sale of the above Standard Editions of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, &c. &c.

1112 2 tf

MRS. ROSA GARCIA DE RIBAS,
TEACHER OF THE
PIANOFORTE, SINGING & GUITAR,
2 Seneca St., corner Harrison Avenue.

MR. De RIBAS will give instruction on the Oboe and Flute. Also MUSIC ARRANGED, TRANSPPOSED, &c. Boston, April 23. 3m

Letter-Press, Music and Job Printing-Office,

JONAS CHICKERING,

RESPECTFULLY gives notice to his friends and the public that, having recovered from the late disastrous effects produced by the destruction of his factory, he is now ready to receive orders for PIANOS, which he promises to execute with as much faithfulness and promptitude as heretofore.

379 Washington Street, Boston.

Mar. 5.

tf

HEWS' PATENT

AMERICAN ACTION PIANOFORTE.

THE MANUFACTURER is in possession of numerous testimonials from distinguished Musical Professors, who have used the greatly improved ACTION PIANO, commending it in high terms. The attention of purchasers and amateurs of Music to an examination of its superiority, is solicited.

GEO. HEWS, 365 Washington St., Boston.

Apr. 10.

tf

D. B. NEWHALL,
MANUFACTURER AND DEALER IN
PIANO FORTES,
No. 344 Washington Street, Boston.
PIANO FORTES REPAIRED, TUNED, & TO LET.
Apr. 10.

tf

SIGNOR G. C. GUIDI respectfully informs his former pupils and the public, that he has resumed his instructions in SINGING, after the Italian school, with the intention to settle permanently in Boston. In order to accommodate those who may not wish to take private instruction, he will open classes for ladies and gentlemen, on moderate terms. None but good voices will be admitted. Terms liberal for persons intending to study for professional purposes.

Sig. G. can be consulted free upon any musical subject, daily, from 12 to 2, at Mr. Hews's Piano Manufactory, No. 365 Washington street, where terms and time for classes may be known.

Orders or notes for Sig. G. may be addressed to him at G. P. Reed & Co.'s Music Store, 17 Tremont Row, and at Oliver Ditson's, 115 Washington street.

Feb. 5.

A CARD.

THE SUBSCRIBER respectfully offers his services to the public as Teacher of the Piano-Forte, the Violin, and of Singing, after a clear and easy method. He will also accompany pupils, both in seminars and in private houses, in the practice of Duets, Trios, &c.

Address for the present at 168 Tremont Street.

March 26. 3m.

CARL GÄRTNER.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
265 Washington Street, Boston.
Oct. 16. 2m

T. BRICHER,
Organist and Conductor of Music
At the Bowdoin Square Church.

OFFICE UNDER THE CHURCH... ENTRANCE ON CHARDON ST.

Jan. 22. 3m.

H. S. CUTLER,
Organist at the Church of the Advent, also of
the Boston Harmonic Society.

ADDRESS—(Care of ROLAND CUTLER, No. 4 Market Square, Boston.) 22 tf

F. F. MÜLLER,

DIRECTOR OF MUSIC AND ORGANIST at the Old South Church; ORGANIST of the Handel and Haydn Society; ORGANIST of the Musical Education Society, &c. &c. &c. Inquire of Messrs. REED & Co., No. 17 Tremont Row, Boston. 117 tf

NATHAN RICHARDSON,
PROFESSOR OF MUSIC.

Now in Europe; will return 1st of June. Letters may be addressed at 19 Hanover St. 25 tf

GEORGE F. WILLEY,
TEACHER OF MUSIC.

Private Tuition in the principles of Music and the Cultivation of the Voice.

MUSIC ROOM, the LECTURE ROOM of KIRK STREET CHURCH, RESIDENCE, 34 FRANKLIN SQUARE, SUFFOLK STREET, Feb. 5. LOWELL, MASS.

Germania Serenade Band.

THE SERVICES OF THIS ASSOCIATION can be secured by applying to

G. SCHNAPP, Leader,
364 Tremont Street.

RATES FOR ADVERTISING.

For half a square, (8 lines,) or less, first insertion, . . . $0.50
each additional inser.25
For a square, (16 lines,) first insertion, 1 00
each additional insertion,50
On advertisements standing three months or longer, a discount of twenty per cent. on the above rates is allowed.
(A column counts as seven squares.)
Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 School St.

DWIGHT'S Journal of Music.

A Paper of Art and Literature.

VOL. III.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 25, 1853.

NO. 12.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

TERMS....TWO DOLLARS PER ANNUM, (IN ADVANCE.)

CITY Subscribers can be served at their houses by the further payment of fifty cents per annum.

☞ For Rates of Advertising, see last page.

POSTAGE, if paid in advance, for any distance within the State, thirteen cents a year; if not in advance, twenty-six cents. To all places beyond the State, double these rates.

J. S. DWIGHT,.....EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

☞ OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St.

By REDDING & CO., 8 State St.

" GEO. P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row.

" A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.

" DEXTER & BROTHERS, 43 Ann Street, N. Y.

" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 722 Broadway, N. Y.

" MASON BROTHERS, 23 Park Row, New York.

" GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.

" G. ANDRE, 229 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

" MILLER & BEACHAM, 151 Baltimore St., Balt.

" COLBURN & FIELD, Cincinnati, O.

" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Persons willing to become Agents for procuring subscribers, especially Music-Dealers and Teachers, are invited to correspond with the Editor, as above. Satisfactory references required, and liberal commissions allowed.

☞ Back numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Also bound copies of Vols. I. and II. at prices varying from $2.50 to $3.50.

Meyerbeer's "Huguenots."

[From Heath's "Beauties of the Opera and Ballet."

It was on the 29th of February, 1836, that the opera of "The Huguenots," written by Scribe, and the music by Meyerbeer, was produced at the Académie Royale de Musique, in Paris. It was a bold and even hazardous attempt to bring such a subject as the religious disputes between the Catholics and Huguenots, and the horrors attached to the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, within the range of the lyrical drama. But M. Scribe, with the aid of the "Chronicles of the Time of Charles the Ninth," by Prosper Mérimée, has most successfully combated all the apparent difficulties; and Meyerbeer, being of the Jewish religion, has maintained a strict impartiality, and accorded an equal portion of the music to Papists and Lutherans. Adolphe Nourrit (whose premature death, when at the zenith of his professional career, we have to deplore) was, under the name of "Raoul de Nangis," the symbol of Protestantism; whilst the beautiful Cornélie Falcon, in the character of "Valentine," was the representative of Catholicism. A strange fatality seems to have attached to the two distinguished artists we have just named: the one was consigned to an early grave at Naples, and the other, from the effects of a severe illness, has been deprived of one of the finest voices that ever emanated from a human being—a loss the more to be deplored, since, notwithstanding several fair débütantes have successively attempted the character, none have attained the éclat of the lovely original. The opera, however, has continued to maintain its high and merited position in public estimation, and is attended with the most triumphant success whenever it is performed.

The first scene represents an elegant saloon in the Castle of the Comte de Nevers in Touraine, where are assembled the chief members of the Catholic aristocracy—Tavannes, de Cossé, de Retz, Thoré, Méru, &c., who sing a joyous chorus in commemoration of youth availing itself of the time present, and leaving the future to itself. The fête is not, however, complete,—another guest is expected, in the person of Raoul de Nangis, the Huguenot, but especially patronized by the king, who had just been reconciled to the brave Admiral Coligny, and who was desirous to establish a reconciliation with all parties. This was, alas! to be but of short duration. Raoul is received with marked distinction, and in the midst of their festivity he is requested to tell them some love adventure. He instantly complies by singing a charming air, detailing his having met, near the old tower of the Castle of Amboise, a lovely maiden, riding in a litter (the mode in use at that period), who was grossly insulted by some students, evidently inebriated. To rescue her and put to flight her aggressors was the work of a moment; but since then he had never beheld her; all which he eloquently expresses in the delicious romance since become so extremely popular, which thus commences:—

"Oh, fairer than the driven snow, Purer than spring time's early glow!"

His new acquaintances, all unblushing libertines, cannot comprehend the purity of his Huguenot passion for the fair unknown, but drink to her health, wishing him success. Whilst they are all enjoying themselves, Marcel, the servant of Raoul, and a rigid Protestant, with sour aspect and formal demeanor, appears at the door. This faithful follower is astonished to find his master feasting, as he conceives, in the camp of the Philistines, and vents his indignation by chanting in a corner of the room the Hymn of Luther. This solemn and impressive music, forming such a contrast to the gay and joyous Bacchanalian airs of the Catholic noblemen, strikes at once upon the imagination of Raoul, who begins to reflect on his strange position, and sets down his brimming glass unostentatiously.

"What is that wild and funereal air?" asks the Comte de Nevers.

"It is the canticle composed by Luther, as our protection in the hour of peril," replied Raoul.

"If I don't mistake," says de Cossé, addressing Marcel, "you are the soldier who at the siege of La Rochelle gave me this severe wound; but it was the fortune of war, and I do not bear malice. Come, let us drink together."

"I do not drink," replies the fierce Puritan.

"Well, if you will not drink, sing," they all exclaim; and Marcel thunders forth the famous air of the Huguenots—

"Down with the convents accursed!
May the monks all prostrate be!
Be their gaudy altars reversed!
To the flames with their Breviary!"

When this opera was brought out in London in 1841, by the German company then at Drury Lane Theatre, the character of "Marcel" was assigned to Herr Staudigl, who is allowed to have the finest bass voice in Europe. He sung the music, and especially this Hymn, with marvellous effect. The deep notes of his mellow and matured voice resounded in splendid harmony throughout the opera, whilst his acting made the character of the Puritan follower of a Huguenot lord the most prominent in it.

Whilst he is singing the second verse, a servant enters, and tells the Comte de Nevers that a lady wishes to speak with him.

"Another despairing victim!" he cries. "Since my intended marriage has been announced I have not had a moment's peace. If it is Madame d'Entrague, or the young Comtesse, or Madame de Raincy, I will not go."

"This lady I have never seen before," says the valet.

The Comte, asking pardon of his guests for leaving them at such a moment, retires to receive this mysterious visitor.

Tavannes, more curious than the others, raises the curtain, exclaiming,—

"She is a very charming, delicious creature!"

Raoul also looks, when, to his grief and astonishment, he discovers his fair unknown, and accuses her of perfidy in giving a preference to the dissipated Nevers over his own pure and loyal attachment. In vain do his gay companions endeavor to rally him, singing—

"When bright eyes
Our love despise,
Let us be wise—
There are brighter elsewhere!"

Raoul will not listen to their boisterous mirth, and his anger is aroused, as well as his indignation, on again perceiving the unknown at the end of the garden, reconducted by his supposed happy rival.

"I will speak to her," he cries, "if only to tell her of my disdain."

But they prevail upon him to refrain, as it would be a breach of hospitality.

The Comte de Nevers enters immediately after, wrapped in thought, and much abstracted. The visit he has just received was not of that pleasing and flattering nature which his libertine companions had supposed—it being from his fair bride, one of the ladies of honor to the Queen, Marguerite de Valois, by whose advice and desire the maiden had come to solicit of the Comte that he would release her from her troth. As a gallant chevalier, he feels he is bound not to refuse her request, but in secret he is devoured by rage. He tries, notwithstanding, to conceal his inward vexation, and receives courteously the felicitations of his friends on this new conquest. These fulsome compliments augment the anger of Raoul, who is on the point of demanding satisfaction for what he rashly conceives to be meant as a personal insult, when a page appears, saying he is charged to deliver a missive to one of the gentlemen present.

"It is a letter," he says, "from a noble lady whom I must not name, but beautiful and virtuous enough to excite the envy of kings."

"Give me the letter," says the Comte de Nevers, carelessly.

"Are you Sir Raoul de Nangis?" asks the page; "for it is to him this billet is addressed."

All appear astonished, and none more than Raoul himself, who, however, opens the note, and reads these words:—

"In a moment you will be sought for; if you are brave, allow yourself to be blindfolded, and conducted to me in silence."

"It may cost me dear, yet will I go," replied Raoul. "Look, gentlemen!"

"Good heavens!" they exclaim, it is the handwriting of Marguerite de Valois! Her seal—her device! The Queen commands his presence—he is secretly beloved!"

Raoul is at once overwhelmed with offers of service, protestations of friendship, and devoted attachment; but he, not having heard their previous exclamations, cannot comprehend this sudden and obsequious respect. He is still lost in conjecture, when several masked men appear, and make signs for him to follow them. All the company, Raoul inclusive, appear greatly excited, and a very skillfully arranged chorus exhibits and expresses their various feelings. Raoul and the masked messengers disappear, and the curtain falls.

The SECOND ACT takes place in the park of Chenonceaux, some leagues from Amboise. The château, whose base is washed by the waters of the Cher, is seen in perspective at the back of the stage, with its lofty roofs and spiral turrets almost in the clouds. The river, after dashing rapidly under the arches of the bridge, winds deviously in all directions, and is lost amid the shades of the tall and umbrageous trees. A large flight of steps, seen on one side, leading to the gardens of the château, heightens the effect of the scene, which is one of the most complete and magnificent ever produced.

It is mid-day. Marguerite de Valois, surrounded by her maids of honor, is completing her toilet beneath the shade of the lofty trees. Urbain, her page, is holding a looking-glass before her. In a strain of delicious melody the young and lovely betrothed of the king of Navarre sings of the spring-time and love,—of all that is fresh and beautiful. What to her are Papists or Huguenots, with their feuds and bloodshed?—she thinks only of enjoying perpetual fêtes, and one round of varying pleasures. The sun is scorching—the atmosphere in a glow. The waters of the Cher in this sequestered part of the park are limpid and inviting. Marguerite desires her women to prepare every thing for the bath; but scarcely have they quitted the princess than she sees approaching, breathless with anxiety, a lovely girl: it is the youngest and fairest of her maids of honor, Valentine de Saint Bris, the mysterious beauty seen at the Comte de Nevers'. Marguerite de Valois, who has conceived for her the strongest affection, eagerly inquires the result of her interview with the Comte.

"He has promised me," says Valentine, "to refuse my hand."

"Then you will soon marry the man your heart has chosen."

"Alas! Heaven forbids this alliance;—our faiths are opposed."

"What does that matter? Am not I the betrothed of the king of Navarre, one of the Protestant leaders? I would wish your marriage to take place at the same time with my own."

"And my father?"

"I have his word that he will consent."

"But Raoul?"

"He will soon be here, and you shall be united."

It was, in fact, for the purpose of offering to him the hand of Valentine, who could not live without loving him, and whom he accuses of ingratitude, that the Queen had sent secretly for Raoul.

"Oh! madam, I can never speak to him," says the artless girl.

"Oh! leave that to me," gaily replies Marguerite, who had, in her desire to effect the union of these lovers, forgotten to follow her women, who are already prepared to enjoy their bath. Several of them, attired only in dressing-gowns of light gauze, are on the river's brink, and, before they plunge into the sparkling waters, sport, dance, chase each other, and form various groups, which the Queen contemplates with a smile, whilst she seats herself listlessly on a bank of turf. A party of the young maidens disappear behind the thick foliage, and are seen soon after disporting in the cool river. These graceful diversions are interrupted by the hasty arrival of Urbain, who appears suddenly amongst them, like Actæon surprising the nymphs of Diana. The mischievous young page announces to Marguerite (not without many sly and impertinent glances around him) that Raoul has reached the château, and will appear before the Queen directly. These words renew the alarm of the modest bathers, who throng about their mistress, uttering cries like the timid hinds affrighted by the hunters: but seeing Raoul approach with his eyes bandaged, they take courage; so much so, indeed, that the Queen is compelled to make signs to them to withdraw.

Alone with the young Protestant, Marguerite allows him to remove the covering from his eyes.

"Oh, heavens! where am I!"

Is this an illusion of my dazzled sight?"

Raoul exclaims, who does not know the Princess, and is struck by the aspect of her regal beauty. Then, thinking that he is en bonne fortune, and desiring to avenge himself, by this conquest, of Valentine's disdain, he offers, in a charming duet, his love, his arm, his life, to the Queen of Navarre, who is greatly amused at the mistake of the gallant cavalier, and asks if he is ready to obey her in all things?

"In every thing—I swear it at your feet!"

"Tis well—I accept your oath."

The malicious page again makes his unwelcome appearance.

"The lords of the country, summoned by your orders," he says to Marguerite, "claim the honor of being admitted to your Majesty's presence."

These words are a thunderbolt to Raoul, who withdraws with awe and respect.

"Well, Sir Raoul," says the Queen, smiling, "does the title of Majesty affright you? Will that destroy your sworn fealty?"

"Oh, never!"

"Well, I would marry you. I follow out the designs of my mother and the King by uniting you to the daughter of the Comte de Saint Bris, your ancient enemy, who sacrifices his hatred for the good of the state."

"Wed the daughter of a Catholic gentleman?"

"You have sworn to obey me in everything."

"Madam, I will obey you."

The Comte de Saint Bris then arrives, together with the Comte de Nevers and several Protestant noblemen, to whom Marguerite presents Raoul; they all receive him with apparent cordiality. After this ceremony, the Queen announces to the Comtes de Nevers and de Saint Bris, handing to them a written order, that her brother Charles IX., who knows their devotion, desires their attendance at Paris to assist him in a secret enterprise.

"We will obey the desire of the King," they reply.

"Yes, but first obey mine," responds Marguerite. "Before the celebration of the marriage at which you are to be present be concluded, promise, as Raoul has done, to abjure your mutual hatred."

The three gentlemen solemnly swear eternal friendship, and Marguerite, pointing to Valentine, who comes on covered with a long veil, says to Raoul,—

"Behold your bride!"

Then the Comte de Saint Bris takes his daughter by the hand, and conducts her towards her betrothed; but hardly has Raoul recognized her than he exclaims,— "Gracious Heaven! I marry her?—Never!"

Universal surprise prevails; Saint Bris and de Nevers tremble with passion; Marguerite urges Raoul to declare the motives of his refusal; he expresses his determination to observe the strictest silence. In vain does the Queen persist in persuading him;—he is resolute in his denial of any explanation. Exasperated at this conduct, de Nevers and Saint Bris are unable to repress their rage, and, notwithstanding the presence of the Queen, seek to provoke Raoul, and demand satisfaction for the insult. The young chevalier draws his sword from the scabbard, and prepares to follow them; but he is disarmed by the order of Marguerite, who at the same time desires Saint Bris and de Nevers to obey at once the summons of the King. These two gentlemen go out, leading Valentine with them, and still defying Raoul, whom the men-at-arms can scarcely restrain.

This dramatic and effective situation terminates the Second Act in an animated manner, wholly in contrast with the gentle character, style, and pleasing tableaux with which it commenced.

[To be continued.]

IS IT RAPTURE—IS IT WOE?

Heart, my heart, why throb'st thou so?

Is it rapture—is it woe?—

'T is at once, both woe and bliss;

Ah! so sad a joy is this,—

Ah! so exquisite a woe,

Not for worlds would I forego!

Beat, oh beat, my throbbing breast!

Sweet, oh sweet is love's unrest!

Heart, my heart, why throb'st thou so?

Is it rapture—is it woe?—

Every pleasure earth contains

Is conjoined to bitter pains.

Lover's bliss is bitterness—

Lover's woe is blessedness.

Beat, oh beat, my throbbing breast!

Sweet, oh sweet, is love's unrest!

Heart, my heart, why throb'st thou so?

Is it rapture—is it woe?—

Bliss of love hath me bereft;

Pang of love alone is left;

Yet, in woe, the heart loves on;

Sweet the joy of pleasure gone!

Beat, oh beat, my throbbing breast!

Sweet, oh sweet is love's unrest!

Brooks's German Lyrics.

Music to "Paradise Lost."

[One of the novelties of the musical season in London has been the performance, at a concert of the New Philharmonic Society, of a formidable piece of music, (whether cantata, or oratorio, or what its form, we are not told,) set by a native composer, Dr. Wylde, to Milton's Epic. As Punch says, "Marriage in High Life—Music to Immortal Verse." The Times gives the following account of the ceremony:]

The new music of Dr. Wylde met with decided success, and, what is more, deserved it. It is hardly enough to say that it is the most complete and musicianlike work that has proceeded from his pen, since it not merely betokens progress, but betrays an invention and a command of resources for which, judging from antecedents, we should have declined to give him credit. The choice of such a subject as Paradise Lost betokened a confidence in his ability to grapple with its difficulties which the result showed was not altogether misplaced. The portion of Milton's poem from which Dr. Wylde has selected his materials ranges from the loss of Paradise, through man's disobedience, to the point where Satan undertakes to set out in search of a verification of that heavenly tradition which prophesied another world, and a new creature, whose attributes were to be all but angelic. The personages are confined to Satan and the chiefs of the fallen angels; and this may serve as an excuse for the dramatic tone which Dr. Wylde has given to his music, in contradistinction to the more solemn and elevated style of the sacred oratorio. The composition begins with an overture, in D minor, which, from its restless and agitated character, may be presumed to depict the rage and despair of the degraded spirits who have been driven out of heaven. A bass recitative then commences the invocation to the muse ("Of man's first disobedience"); and a chorus in D major renders the fine passage, "Sing, heavenly muse," with great propriety and dignity. A soprano solo, "Say first, for heav'n hides nothing from thy view," followed by a chorus in A minor, "Th' infernal serpent, he it was," concludes the invocation, and conveys the description of the means by which Satan and Beelzebub met their fate,—

"Hurl'd headlong flaming from th' ethereal sky."

The chorus is marked by a wildness of character thoroughly in keeping with the subject. Satan and Beelzebub are now introduced, and in a duet, "If thou be'st he" (in F), their mutual recognition is followed by reflections on their actual condition, and by the resolution of Satan to oppose the Almighty will to disseminate good. There is some excellent writing in this duet; but on the whole Dr. Wylde, evidently trammelled by the quantity of words, has made it too long for musical interest. A soprano recitative, "Thus, Satan, talking to his nearest mate," leads to a chorus, "Farewell, happy fields" (in B flat minor), with the intervention of a recitative, in which Satan bewails the difference between the lost heaven and the dark dreary plain—"the seat of desolation"—where he and his companions are now assembled. The chorus in question, accompanied throughout by the violins and violoncellos, divided and muted, is plaintive and beautiful, and would alone establish the claims of Dr. Wylde to be regarded as a composer of feeling and refinement. Satan's address to Beelzebub, "Here at least we shall be free," Beelzebub's reply, and a soprano recitative that follows, merely serve to lead up effectively to the Arch Enemy's invocation to the assembly of fallen angels—"Princes, potentates, warriors!"—which Dr. Wylde has set to a striking and vigorous aria, in the almost unprecedented key of A flat minor. A similarity in the second measure of this air to a part of the theme of the first chorus about the serpent, whether premeditated or otherwise, has a good effect. Its length, however, the repetition of the opening, and the extreme difficulty of some of the orchestral passages (especially for the basses, where the enharmonic modulation changes the signature from flats to sharps), militate, in some degree, against its general effect. Another well-written chorus, "They heard and were abash'd" (in D minor), further develops the character of the music by means of which the composer has endeavoured to paint the feelings of the banished angels. What immediately follows—the council among the chiefs of the fallen angels who hold debate—is preceded by a series of lengthy recitatives and solos, which do little more than suspend the interest, and which—a charming soprano solo, cleverly accompanied, "For spirits when they pleased," excepted—not being absolutely essential, might be omitted, or at least considerably abridged with advantage. Among these occurs an air in E minor, "O myriads of immortal spirits," Satan's address to the powers, and his recommendation of war—which, from its peculiar style of melody and accompaniments, would be better suited to the atmosphere of the Italian Opera. In no other part of the work do we observe such an evident miscalculation. On the other hand, the care with which the recitatives are written, and the pains bestowed on the orchestral coloring plainly declare that Dr. Wylde was struggling conscientiously against an almost insurmountable obstacle, and barely escaped, like others before him, from being crushed under a heavy weight of words. The consultation is described in a quartet in B minor, for Satan, Moloch, Belial, and Mammon—"Powers and dominions"—which merges into a quintet, with the addition of Beelzebub, and constitutes one piece of concerted music, written throughout with great ability, and showing both facility in vocal part writing and skill in orchestral combinations. The concluding chorus, "O shame to men," is exceedingly spirited, and contains points of imitation which show Dr. Wylde to be well-studied in the fugal style. The music to Paradise Lost was admirably performed—orchestra, chorus, and solo singers (Miss Louisa Pyne, Mr. Lockey, Herrn Standigl, Reichart, and Hoelzel) taking equal pains to do justice to the parts allotted them. It was, moreover, received with distinguished favor. The chorus, "Farewell, happy fields!" was immensely applauded; and the soprano air, "For spirits, when they please" (exquisitely sung by Miss L. Pyne, and accompanied to perfection by the band) was unanimously redemanded. Dr. Wylde, who conducted his own music, was cordially welcomed; and at the end, the favorable verdict of the audience was loudly and generally expressed.

TWO LOVERS.

A skiff swam down the Danube's tide,
Therein a bridegroom sate, and bride,
He one side, she the other.

Tell me, my dearest heart, said she,
What present shall I make to thee?

And hack her little sleeve she stripped,
And deeply down her arm she dipped.

And so did he, the other side,
And laughed and jested with his bride.

Fair lady Danube, give me here
Some pretty gift to please my dear.

She drew a sparkling sword aloft,
Just as the boy had longed for, oft.

The boy, what holds he in his hand?
Of milk-white pearls a costly band.

He binds it round her jet-black hair,
She looks a princess, sitting there.

Fair lady Danube, give me here
Some pretty gift to please my dear!

Once more she'll try what she can feel;
She grasps a helmet of light steel.

On his part, terrified with joy,
Flung up a golden comb, the boy.

A third time clutching in the tide,
Woe! she falls headlong o'er the side.

The boy leaps after, clasps her tight,
Dame Danube snatches both from sight.

Dame Danube grudged the gifts she gave,
They must atone for 't in the wave.

An empty skiff glides down the stream,
The mountains hide the sunset gleam.

And when the moon in heaven did stand,
The lovers floated dead to land,
He one side, she the other.

Brooks's German Lyrics.

Muzio Clementi.

This celebrated pianist and composer, was born at Rome, in the year 1752. His father was a worker in silver of great merit, and principally engaged in the execution of embossed vases and figures employed in the Catholic worship. At a very early period of his youth, he evinced a strong disposition for music, and as this was an art which greatly delighted his father, he anxiously bestowed the best instructions in his power on his son. But on, who was his relation, and who afterwards obtained the honorable station of principal composer of St. Peter's, was his first master. At six years of age he began solfaing, and at seven he was placed under an organist of the name of Cordicelli for instruction in thorough bass; at the age of nine he passed his examination, and was admitted an organist in Rome. This examination consists in giving a figured bass from the works of Corelli, and making the scholar execute an accompaniment, after which he is obliged to transpose the same into various keys. This Clementi effected with such facility, that he received the highest applause from his examiners. He next went under the celebrated Santarelli, the great master of singing.

Between his eleventh and twelfth years he studied under Carpini, the deepest contrapuntist of his day in Rome. A few months after he was placed under this master, he was induced by some of his friends, and without consulting his preceptor, to write a mass for four voices, for which he received so much commendation, that Carpini expressed a desire to hear it. It was accordingly repeated in church in the presence of his master, who, being little accustomed to bestow praise on any one, said to his pupil, after his dry manner, "Why did not you tell me you were about to write a mass? This is very well, to be sure; but if you had consulted me, it might have been much better." Under Carpini he was practised in writing fugues and canons in the canto fermo, and his master was frequently heard to say, that had Clementi remained under his instruction a year longer, he might have passed his examination in counterpoint. During these studies he never neglected his harpsichord, on which he had made so great a proficiency between thirteen and fourteen, that Mr. Peter Beckford, nephew of the alderman of that name, who was then on his travels in Italy, was extremely desirous of taking him over to England. The declining riches of the Romish church, at this period, not giving much encouragement to the trade of his father, he agreed to confide the rising talents of his son to the care of Mr. Beckford, and soon after this Clementi set off for England. The country seat of Mr. Beckford was in Dorsetshire, and here, by the aid of a good library and the conversation of the family, Clementi quickly obtained a competent knowledge of the English and several other languages.

With regard to his own art, his early studies were principally employed on the works of Corelli, Alessandro Scarlatti, Handel's harpsichord and organ music, and on the sonatas of Paradis. His efforts to acquire preeminence on the harpsichord were in the mean time as indefatigable as they were successful; and at the age of eighteen he had not only surpassed all his contemporaries in the powers of execution and expression, but had written his Op. 2, which gave a new era to that species of composition. Three years afterwards this celebrated work was submitted to the public. The simplicity, brilliancy, and originality which it displayed captivated the whole circle of professors and amateurs. It is superfluous to add, what all the great musicians of the age have uniformly allowed, that this admirable work is the basis on which the whole fabric of modern sonatas for the piano-forte has been erected. The celebrated John Christian Bach spoke of it in the highest terms; but, although one of the most able players of his time, he would not attempt its performance; and when Schroeter arrived in England, and was asked if he could play the works of Clementi, he replied, that "they could only be performed by the author himself, or the devil." Yet, such is the progress which executive ability has made, that what was once an obstacle to the most accomplished talent is now within the power of thousands. A well-known popular air with variations, his Ops. 3 and 4, and a duet for two performers on one instrument, were the next productions of his youthful pen.

Soon after he had quitted Dorsetshire to reside in London, he was engaged to preside at the harpsichord, in the orchestra of the Opera House, and had an opportunity, which he never neglected, of improving his taste by the performances of the first singers of that age. The advantage which he derived from this species of study was quickly shown by the rapid progress he made, beyond his contemporaries, in the dignity of his style of execution, and in his powers of expression. This, also, he carried into his compositions; and Dussek, Steibelt, Woelfl, Beethoven, and other eminent performers on the continent, who had had no opportunity of receiving personal instructions from Clementi, declared that they had formed themselves entirely on his works. His ability in extemporaneous playing had, perhaps, no parallel. The richness of harmonic combination, the brilliancy of fancy, the power of effect, and the noble style of execution, which he displayed, made him stand alone in an age which produced such a host of executive talent. His reputation, without the protection of any patron, rose with such rapidity, that, in a very short time, he received the same remuneration for his instructions as J. C. Bach; and the fame of his works and of his executive talents having spread over the continent, he determined, in the year 1780, and at the instigation of the celebrated Pacchierotti, to visit Paris.

In that city he was received with enthusiasm, and had the honor to play before the queen, who bestowed on him the most unqualified applause. The warmth of French praise, contrasted with the gentle and cool approbation given by the English, quite astonished the young musician, who used jokingly to remark, that "he could scarcely believe himself to be the same man." Whilst he remained in that capital, he composed his Ops. 5 and 6, and published a new edition of his Op. 1, with an additional fugue. Having enjoyed the unabated applause of the Parisians until the summer of 1781, he determined on paying a visit to Vienna. In his way there he stopped at Strasburg, where he was introduced to the then Prince de Deux Ponts, since King of Bavaria, who treated him with the greatest distinction; and also at Munich, where he was received with equal honor by the elector. At Vienna he became acquainted with Haydn, Mozart, and all the celebrated musicians resident in that capital. The Emperor Joseph II., who was a great lover of music, invited him to his palace; where, to the latter end of the year 1781, he had the honor of playing alternately with Mozart before the emperor, and the Grand Duke Paul of Russia and his duchess. At Vienna, he composed three sonatas, (Op. 7.) published by Artaria; three sonatas, (Op. 8.) published at Lyons; and six sonatas, (Ops. 9 and 10.) also published by Artaria.

On his return to England, he deemed it necessary to publish his celebrated "Toccata," with a sonata, (Op. 11.)—a surreptitious copy, full of errors, having been printed without his knowledge in France. In the autumn of 1783, John Baptist Cramer, then about fourteen or fifteen years of age, became his pupil. He had previously received some lessons from Schroeter, and was studying counterpoint under Abel. Clementi, at this time, resided in Titchfield Street, and Cramer used to attend him almost every morning, until the following year, when Clementi returned to France. Previous to his undertaking this second journey, he was engaged at the nobility's concerts, and had published his Op. 12: upon one of the sonatas of which work both Dr. Crotch and Samuel Wesley afterwards gave public lectures in London. In the year 1784, he again went back to England, and soon afterwards published his Ops. 13, 14, and 15. From this period to the year 1802, he remained in England, pursuing his professional labors with increasing reputation; and wishing to secure himself sufficient time for the prosecution of his studies, he raised his terms for teaching to one guinea per hour. His fame, however, was so great, that this augmentation of price rather increased than diminished the candidates for his instruction. The great number of excellent pupils, of both sexes, whom he formed during this period, proved his superior skill in the art of tuition; the invariable success which attended his public performances attested his preeminent talents as a player; and his compositions, from Op. 15 to Op. 40, are a lasting proof of his application and genius. Before the publication of this last work, he had produced one, the advantages of which have been and are still felt and acknowledged by almost all professors; we mean his excellent and luminous "Introduction to the Art of Playing on the Piano-forte."

About the year 1800, having lost a large sum of money by the failure of the well-known firm of Longman and Broderip, 26 Cheapside, he was induced, by the persuasions of some eminent mercantile gentlemen, to embark in that concern. A new firm was accordingly formed, and from that period he declined taking any more pupils. The hours which he did not thence forward employ in his professional studies he dedicated to the mechanical and philosophical improvement of piano-fortes; and the originality and justness of his conceptions were crowned with complete success.

The extraordinary and admirable talents of John Field are still fresh in the memory of most lovers of classical music. These talents Clementi had cultivated with unceasing delight. With this favorable pupil, in the autumn of 1802, he paid his third visit to Paris, where he was received with unabated esteem and admiration. This pupil delighted every one who heard him; and what is still more worthy of remark, he played some of the great fugues of Sebastian Bach with such precision and inimitable taste as to call forth from a Parisian audience the most enthusiastic applause. From Paris he proceeded to Vienna, where he intended to place Field under the instruction of Albrechtsberger, to which his pupil seemed to assent with pleasure; but when the time arrived for Clementi to set off for Russia, poor Field, with tears trembling in his eyes, expressed so much regret at parting from his master, and so strong a desire to accompany him, that Clementi could not resist his inclinations; they therefore proceeded directly to St. Petersburg. In this city Clementi was received with the greatest distinction; he played extemporaneously in the society of the principal professors with his accustomed excellence, and to the admiration of his audience; and having introduced Field to his friends, soon afterwards left Russia, in company with a young professor of the name of Zeuner. Zeuner was the principal piano-forte player and teacher in Petersburg; and having received some instructions from Clementi during his residence there, he became so attached to his master, that he left all his scholars for the sake of accompanying him to Berlin. In the latter city Clementi played, both extemporaneously and from his works, before all the most eminent musicians, with his wonted vigor and effect; and, after remaining there two months, took Zeuner with him to Dresden, the place of his birth, where he left him well prepared to acquire the reputation which he afterwards obtained. In Dresden, an unassuming, but very able and excellent young musician, of the name of Klengel, introduced himself to the acquaintance of Clementi, and, after obtaining some instructions, became exceedingly desirous of accompanying his master in his travels. Clementi was so much pleased with his character and talents, which have since become well known to the public, that he consented; and after a few weeks' residence at Dresden, he took him on to Vienna, where, during some months, his pupil worked very hard under his instruction.

It was at this time that he became acquainted with and cherished, by counsel and the frequent exhibition of his own powers on the piano-forte, the rising talents of Kalkbrenner, who has since raised himself to such distinguished eminence. During the summer following, Clementi took his pupil Klengel on a tour through Switzerland, and returned immediately afterwards to Berlin, where he married his first wife. In the autumn he took his bride through Italy, as far as Rome and Naples; and on his return to Berlin, having had the misfortune to lose her in childhood, he immediately left the scene of his sorrows, and once more visited Petersburg. In this journey he took with him another promising young pupil, of the name of Berger, who had previously received his instructions; and who is now the principal professor of the piano-forte at Berlin. At Petersburg he found Field in the full enjoyment of the highest reputation—in short, the musical idol of the Russian nation. Here he remained but a short time; and finding relief from the contemplation of his severe loss in the bustle of travelling, he again went back to Vienna.

The following summer, having heard of the death of his brother, he proceeded once more to Rome, to settle the affairs of his family. He then made short residences at Milan and various other places on the continent, where he was detained, in spite of his inclinations, by the disastrous continuation of the war; and seizing a hazardous opportunity of conveyance, in the summer of 1810, he once more arrived in England, and the year following married. Although, during this period of nearly eight years, he published only a single sonata, (Op. 41.) his mind and his pen were still occupied in the composition of symphonies, and in preparing materials for his "Gradus ad Parnassum." His first publication, after his return, was the appendix to his "Introduction to the Art of Playing on the Piano-forte,"—a work which has been of infinite use both to the profession and to the public. He next adapted the twelve grand symphonies of Haydn for the piano-forte, with accompaniments for the flute, violin, and violoncello. This work was a great desideratum, since that which had already been published by Salomon was awkwardly and imperfectly done. Before he went abroad, he had adapted Haydn's "Creation" for the piano-forte and voices; and he now published the oratorio of the "Seasons," which he had done in the same manner. He afterwards adapted Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni," besides various selections from the vocal compositions of the same author. The Philharmonic Society having been now established, he gave two grand symphonies, which were received there, and at various other concerts, with enthusiastic applause. He produced several other symphonies at the Philharmonic Concerts, in March, 1824.

Clementi enjoyed the highest consideration in England. Having become rich, in the last years of his life he abandoned the direction of his mercantile house to his associate, M. Collard, and retiring to a pretty country seat, lived in repose, and seldom visited London. Once when he did come, Cramer, Moscheles, and others gave a banquet to the patriarch of the piano, at the close of which he improvised to the astonishment and delight of all present. This was his "swan song." He died on the 10th of March, 1832, at the age of eighty years.

Fine Arts.

Page's Portrait of Miss Cushman.

The True Democrat (Cleveland, O.) has an excellent correspondent at Rome, from one of whose recent letters we take the following account of a portrait of Miss Cushman, just painted by our countryman, PAGE:

"Mr. Page has just completed a portrait of Miss Cushman, which I should like to describe, but scarcely know how to do so without seeming to exaggerate. It is perfect, and to any one who has seen it any other statement would sound superfluous. Envy and all petty jealousies, for the present, have been laid aside, and every artist has been eager to bear his testimony in its praise. The critical and accurate draughtsmen, of the German and French school, wonder at the drawing, in which respect they consider American artists usually deficient. Sculptors are amazed at its solidity, if I may use such a term, finding that, though upon canvass, it has almost as much body and positive form, as if cut in marble. With regard to the coloring, there can be but one opinion; not artists and critics only, but all who have eyes, see and feel how beautiful it is. Even when examined closely no trace of slow, laborious painting can be observed; it seems to have been created by one sweep of a magic brush. Every vein, every line in the original may be found in the picture, though subordinate to the grand whole, and only to be seen when sought for; and over all rests, if not the down which softens the human face, a downy softness, like the "flower dust," blown over the petals of a flower, apparently resting so lightly upon them that a breath might blow it away. But now let us step back and view it from the proper distance. The head is half turned; the eyes looking from you—"away, away, is that look far lighting;" they are full of thought—the eyes of one pondering some great question, but not troubled. The artist has chosen the expression of that moment when thought is passing into conviction; when the earnestness of the one and the repose of the other are for an instant blended. A faint blush is "staying" on the cheek; there is a halfquiver on the eye-lids; in gazing upon them one almost believes they move; while over the face is a calmness which, like the calmness of nature, brings repose and joy to whoever looks upon it. Mr Page has that marvellous power which none but the true artist possesses, the power of looking into the soul and stamping its most secret and individual life upon the canvass. The picture of which I have spoken is not less wonderful as a likeness than as a work of art, nor is it necessary that the original should be seen to know that this is so. Its intrinsic individuality and harmony prove, in this respect also, its merit. A stranger to Miss Cushman, in looking upon it, would say at once, how striking a likeness this must be. One who had merely seen her, would be startled by the resemblance; but the better she is known and appreciated, the more will it be felt to be no picture, but herself, her soul looking forever from the canvass. Modern art, it is an acknowledged and lamentable fact, has in some degree fallen from the high estate which it once occupied. Its soul has gone from it, or has slept; while in every other respect man has rushed onward in eager pursuit of an ideal in the future, here alone has he been content to stand motionless; or rather, looking backward upon a lost excellence, has fallen more irremediably from the hope of a new or greater. The art of coloring, known to Titian, and in a degree to some of the other old masters, Mr. Page has rediscovered. It was a secret to be won from nature only by long and unwearied labor, by suffering, by hope and faith; and thus has he made it his own. During his life he has followed his art with passionate devotion; studied it with the severity and patience of a subtle and profound intellect, and to such a life there can be but one result. He stands upon the pinnacle to which his thought has ever turned, and will become, doubtless, the founder of a new school, through his example and through his words; for we believe he is even now engaged in a work in which the result of his labor and his discovery will be made known—a result which will immortalize him, and save those who are to follow many a weary step, giving them a higher stand from which to begin their efforts, and elevating the art to which their lives are to be devoted. It is a proud thought, that from America may arise the regenerator of art; nor should this seem strange. In America there is no ancient art, and in this is the advantage it possesses over other countries, and particularly over Italy. No ancient art, where false, to pervert with its falseness, and even where true, to be turned to ill, though a blind and servile imitation. American Artists have been driven back, face to face with nature, and compelled to gaze upon her truth and beauty; they have been forced to that original fountain from which all who have been truly great, have drawn their inspiration, and having drunk at the eternal spring of God's truth; is it strange that one should at last arise filled with its inspiration—the master and the artist?"

MONUMENT TO SCHILLER AND GOETHE.—A monument of bronze is about to be erected at Weimar, in honor of the two great poets of Germany, and an appeal is circulating in that country which calls upon all Germans to contribute to the fund for the purpose, sufficient means not having as yet been provided. The monument will be in the form of a group of statuary, the statues of the poets being of colossal proportions.

Illustrated Serials.

We have received from the publisher, Herrmann J. Meyer, New York, the first part of The United States Illustrated, in Views of City and Country; with descriptive and historical articles, edited by CHARLES A. DANA. Each part is to contain four steel engravings, from original drawings by eminent artists, representing the landscape scenery, and notable public buildings of our country; together with about sixteen elegant quarto pages of descriptive matter, from accomplished writers, for the excellence of which the name of the editor would seem to be sufficient guaranty. The price of each Part is fifty cents. Two volumes, of ten parts each, are promised within the present year. One of these volumes is devoted to Eastern and the other to Western subjects, and the two series are to be issued simultaneously, though they may be had separately. To subscribers for both series, or purchasers of both volumes when completed, a premium is offered in the shape of a large and "magnificent steel engraving of Trumbull's Battle of Bunker Hill."

The present number opens the series of Eastern subjects, which are to be drawn from all the sea-board States, from Maine to the Gulf of Mexico. It contains views of the President's house, on the Potomac; Niagara Falls, seen from the Clifton House; Barhydt's Lake, near Saratoga; and the Bunker Hill monument. These were evidently drawn by an artist and engraved with corresponding care and delicacy. We have seldom seen anything better of the kind, than the representations of the Falls, and of the little lake with its vista of tall pines opening boldly in the foreground and retreating into shadowy distance. The accompanying descriptions are well worth reading.

Meyer's Universum. Also edited by C. A. DANA. The first semi-monthly part of a second volume of this beautiful and instructive series of engraved views and descriptions of famous places in all parts of the globe, has made its appearance. The success of the first volume was, we are glad to hear, beyond expectation. The present volume will consist of 12 parts, each containing four plates, as before, making 48 in the volume. Among other attractive subjects will be several from Central America, Australia and China, countries rising into new importance in the world's regard. And the plan of the work has been so far changed, that it is henceforth to be devoted more exclusively to the illustration of foreign lands, leaving that of our own land to the new work above noticed. Each part costs only twenty-five cents, and subscribers to the volume are entitled to an engraving called "The Maid of Saragossa," as a premium. A work so cheap, so beautiful and full of information, ought to be in every family.

The subjects of the plates in the present number are: Columbia Bridge, on the Susquehanna, with article by R. H. Stoddard; the San Juan river (Central America); the castle of Luxemburg, near Vienna and the Valley of Goecksa, near Constantinople. One's ideas grow very cosmopolitan in perusing these successive issues of the Universum, with its nice engravings and spirited articles,—the latter, by the way, all written in a generous, humane and progressive tone.

(Both of the above works may be had of Redding & Co., and the other periodical dealers in Boston.)

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Strictures upon the Stage,

AS IT EXISTS IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

"O reform it altogether!"

For a number of years we have been accustomed to hear much said about the "decline of the Drama." The English Press from time to time has teemed with articles, pointing out remedies for this "general declension," but not any of them have as yet met with the shadow of success. Theatrical dinners have been held from year to year, at which—in London—Mr. Harley or Mr. Bartlett, or Mr. Meadows, records the subscriptions and good wishes of a host of the Nobility and Literature of England. Sir E. L. Bulwer, or Mr. Dickens, or both, make a speech to the effect—that the Drama has been undeservedly neglected. Somebody—the public, the aristocracy, (any but the professors,) is deemed always to blame—and even the upholding of Italian opera, as well as the neglect of the intellectual Drama, has on these occasions been considered cause for censure. Mr. Macready, or some one else engaged in theatrical management, is complimented for certain efforts made during the past season, for the advancement of the stage. And the speech ends with confident anticipations of future elevation, without any plan for its development, or reasons for its expectation. Similar proceedings mark the fulfilment of dramatic eras in New York.

And thus are the affairs of the stage wound up from year to year; but still it remains the same disjointed thing—to me a miracle of falsehood, obstinate and corrupt—its artists scarcely dreaming of its disease, and without a warning voice being heard against its hastening dissolution.

But to draw inferences from the state of dramatic representations in that city where Shakspeare's plays were first put upon the stage, it surpasses my understanding that such men, of exalted genius and taste, by whom it is there surrounded, accustomed to the study of art, accustomed to judge and criticise a statue, a painting, or a poem, by the most ingenious analyses, as well as the highest known canons, should (however intent on their admiration of this actor—intent in admiring that beauty of elocution—intent in praising the adaptation of that little trifle of costume, or scenic effect, or artistic manœuvre,) should so blindly overlook the real truth, that THE STAGE IS THE AUTHOR OF ITS OWN DEGRADATION!

I grant it is a vehicle often for the exhibition of transcendent genius, but as an art, and compared with the arts, it is a piece of miserable patchwork. I do not hesitate to say that the Stage was a botch at the commencement, it was a botch in Shakspeare's time, and still remains the same; never having made any really artistic advancement. It has stood still, only multiplying its errors and vices; and now, all the arts, and the intellect of the time are in advance of it and its professors.

All who read and study Shakspeare in the closet know how very inadequately represented on the stage these great dramas have hitherto been.

It is true that we have seen the stage crowded to its utmost capacity, and exhibiting splendid costumes and gorgeous scenery at the representation of a Shakspearian play. But however admirable this may be, it will not plead in palliation of the neglect to purify the whole fabric from its gross incongruities. Fancy has often weaved an external garment and fashioned a holiday dress; but Imagination, which dives into the heart of the mystery, capable of eliciting the untold portion of a picture, has done nothing as yet, to my thinking, for the filling up of this important part of even one of these plays.

But I am getting in advance of my subject, which requires me to show in the first place that the stage has never combined its elements in an artistic way. For the stage is a branch of the Fine Arts, and should be a reflex of the condition of the Fine Arts, as it is of Dramatic Poetry and Elocution. Let us then ask of the sculptor who visits the theatre, what he thinks of the grouping and all the detail that comes within the sphere of the plastic Art? Let us ask of the painter and the whole brotherhood of artists what they think of the display of science in blending colors harmoniously?—what of the chiaroscuro? What of the tact and genius displayed in the preservation of perspective in the scenery, unviolated by the action.

We may ask these questions and many more of a like nature, to be told only that they refer to subjects altogether unthought of upon the stage. Yet we hear of the combination of all Arts in dramatic representations. Are we not told, that painting, sculpture, music, poetry, and oratory are all combined to produce one grand effect? But alas, false and cold is the general effect of this union, which should otherwise make a dramatic representation glow with truth and beauty; and elevate it in sublimity and majesty above every other attempt of Art, affecting the human breast with sensations so powerful and so positive, as to crush and crumble to dust all littleness of spirit, whilst the mighty and the virtuous would be elevated beyond all grasp of thought. These certainly are the elements of all great dramatic representations; but, as I trust to show to the satisfaction at least of all artists, they have run riot in every form and shape of error, and thus have kept up a continued discord around the shrine, that they were intended to exalt and charm by a presentation of heavenly unity, one continued strain of harmony divine! *

[To be continued.]

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JUNE 25, 1853.

Music for the People.

We were not informed in time to chronicle last week the tardy action of our city fathers ordaining music on the common, twice a week for the remaining summer evenings. Crossing the common on our way home at sunset, Wednesday evening, our ears were unexpectedly greeted with the first sounds of the ordinance already carried into execution. There had been no public announcement, and the people, judging from the sparse attendance, could not have been generally aware that the new and longed for dispensation had begun. From a staging on the hill, a small military band, of sixteen instruments, all brass, except the drums and cymbals, were discoursing just such marches, opera choruses arranged as marches, and so forth, as are daily ringing through the streets of all our cities in the frequent military parades. It was a good band enough for its size, and for its kind, which happens just now unfortunately to be the only kind,—cornets and saxtubas being the reigning fashion, with quite as tyrannizing an exclusiveness, as prevails ever in the fashion of our hats and coats.

This musical providence on the part of the municipal powers is, it is well known, far from a bountiful and overflowing one. The measure was a bare triumph of the pressure of popular opinion, (well represented on the part of the majority of the fathers) against the tenacious, higgling resistance of the Philistines. Of course therefore, the idea, which was originally generous and ideal, came through the fight only alive, and plucked and curtailed of a great part of its beauty and its fair proportions. It was a very cautious, stinted, half-way sort of provision that was at last reluctantly adopted. A band too small, at hours too ridiculously and Puritanically early to partake of the charm and stillness of the evening, or even to admit of the attendance of the laboring classes, for whom the benefit was principally intended! Thus saith the law: One evening in each week there shall be music on the Common from seven until nine; and again on Saturday evening, from six till eight o'clock! There is an ingenious irony in this, considering that long days (to the million) simply and practically mean long days of work. It is as much as to say to them: Work while day-light lasts; go to bed when the sun sets, or to prayer in preparation for the Sabbath; and be refreshed with all the music you can get between whiles. That it is morally dangerous and profane to be out under the trees of a midsummer night, after eight o'clock, listening to carnal music, we are not distinctly taught in the aforesaid ordinance; but this would seem the natural inference. We apprehend, however, it would be coming nearer to the mark, to credit these fidgety and Puritan-looking limitations to the spirit of resistance to the measure as a whole, which, finding itself overruled, resolved to "face the music" only at the oblique angle at which it could be said to be just visible at all.

This, to be sure, is a local matter, and it perhaps requires apology for discoursing to our readers of an affair so purely and intensely Boston. But we apprehend the case is a fair type of the position, with regard to public outlays for the artistic culture and amusement of the people, of nearly every municipality in our republic. Democracy is not yet wise in these important considerations of its true self-culture,—we might almost say self-preservation. Art has flourished chiefly among princes, and has been lavished on the amusements of the people as a sort of paternal favor by the arbitrary powers, to offset somewhat their oppressions. But Democracy, more than all social systems, needs the harmonizing, humanizing, liberalizing and refining influences of Art. There is nothing which it can so well afford to pay for, if it took a far-seeing view of its own interest.

Art, whether in Music or in other forms, is, to be sure, a costly and a princely possession. Sovereigns, in Church or State, have been its patrons and supporters. But can a sovereign people ever be truly sovereign without incorporating Art along with the other humanities, into its institutions? Art is the highest type of the true sovereignty of man; his sovereignty over his accidents, over the outward limitations of poverty and a world rough and repulsive to the senses, and contradictory and unresponsive to the ideals of the soul. Art, and above all music, is a type and language of true Freedom, of freedom perfect through divine harmony and order. Democracy has yet to learn to value and to enter into this its rightful and most beautiful possession, without which liberty is only negative, and wealth a means without an end. So far Democracy has evinced a niggardly, utilitarian economy with regard to all propositions for making the externals of its life beautiful and inspiring; it has seemed constitutionally afraid of public luxury and refinement; while by a natural reaction it has squandered and wasted without stint upon coarse and idle modes of celebration in the name of patriotism. Our patriotic rejoicings, our occasions for the overflow of national and public feeling, have all been in the most noisy, rowdy, pop-gun and cracker-firing style of free expenditure. More money is burnt out in guns and fire-works in a single hour, than it would cost to keep a permanent supply of excellent music throughout all the summer nights. It would seem as if our patriotic rejoicing was the joy only of the lower and more animal faculties that enter into the composition of a man. The sounds we hear upon those proud occasions are all borrowed from the enginery of destructiveness; they all smack of war and of the demons of the nether world let loose. Call you this economy, O legislators and city fathers? Is money puffed away in gunpowder a better cement of society, than public gardens filled with statues, and public music filling the air and making the very senses willing captives to lessons of rhythm and refinement, and spontaneously inclined to all things gentle and harmonious? We pay much for "Union" and for "Union-saving;" consider whether the sentiment of Art, inspired throughout the people, might not become a quite important guaranty of union, harmonizing the very nerves and fibres of each sensitive member of the whole social body, like so many strings of a vast instrument,—to speak figuratively.

We wish, with what humble powers we have, to add some impulse to the artistic culture of this great, fearfully large, heterogeneous, democratic people; and in music especially, because it is more our individual mission, and because music, more readily than other fine arts, takes hold of the masses. Instead, therefore, of murmuring at the stinted provision of music on our common, we rather hail it as a beginning and a sign of better things to come. A precedent is set, if not on the most liberal scale; and there were good omens in the music of Wednesday evening, and in its reception by the lingering promenaders within hearing of it. So far as the quality of the performance and the selection of pieces went, it was on the whole a pretty good beginning. Returning to the common at a later hour, we heard strains of Mendelssohn,—an arrangement of that beautiful two-part song of his, so popular in the last season's concerts. The next piece, too, was Mendelssohn's; the "Wedding March." Then followed a melange of quicksteps, sentimental airs of Ethiopian popularity, scenes from Italian operas, such as the Edgardo finale in Lucia; &c., &c. Of course, the quicksteps and the Ethiopians elicited most clappings, because addressed most to the clapping classes, who must not always be taken as the thermometer of the whole musical audience.

But,—how refreshing to note the infallible magic of genius! and how can we cultivate a truer people's friend, than Mozart, type of an eternal youth!—presently the band struck up the Minuet from Don Giovanni, and where we thought it ended, came the little passage modulating into the maskers' trio; and then finally the sparkling allegro of the banquet scene:—quite a nice little abridgment of that glorious finale; and there was no mistaking the general gusto with which this was received. Verily there can be no better music than that of Mozart, for the summer nights, to go straight to the hearts of the people and make them realize the charm of genuine and vital Art!—It was a sign of a progressive taste, that so many allusions to the classical found place in this out-of-doors programme. Miscellaneous of course the selection ought to be; and no one can reasonably complain of the light and humdrum pieces, so long as there is a fair sprinkling of what is good.

The Puritanical limitation of the hours proved naturally a dead letter; for the music, once waked, would sound on till people were in the mood of moving homeward.

We will be thankful, as we said, for this beginning. But we could not listen without thinking how much more might, and we trust will another year, be made of it. In the first place, such bands are much too small, to be entirely efficacious; the music should be clearly audible to those who are promenading freely in the pleasant paths and avenues in all parts of the common; the harmony should come in full, rich, copious strains, with nothing thin and meagre in its rendering. Music for the million, in the open air, should be on a large scale.

In the next place it was entirely a brass band, and as such incapable of giving due expression to the finer kinds of music. Like all the street bands, it is conformed wholly to the military standard. We apprehend that something more than military music is desirable on these occasions;—something quite different and remote from that, in fact. Martial music is as familiar to the public ear, as the rattle of carriage wheels, day after day, the summer long. On that score we have opportunities enough. But opportunity for something better was the thing demanded. Brass bands are not only coarse and noisy; but the component instruments, being all of one family, mere cousins to each other, produce a monotonous aggregation of tones, instead of a rich blending of tones of well contrasted qualities. Our correspondent, "Sackbut," was entirely right about this; and we cannot do better than repeat his suggestion that there should be a Municipal or City Band, raised and maintained by the City, employed in all public civic celebrations, and not military, but civic in its composition and its style of music. It should be very much larger than the bands now common, and should include the long banished reed instruments, to give more delicacy, piquancy and contrast to the tone-masses. We submit that it would be good public economy for each civil community to support, at public cost, a band of this sort, up to the highest standard, for the express end of gracing public festivals and furnishing refined enjoyments to the people.

We want to raise the taste, as well as minister to the amusement, of the people; and although any kind of music is better than nothing, as a recreation to the weary sons and daughters of continual toil; yet it would be much better, and by no means impracticable, to have music that is artistically good and elevating, and have such well loved and appreciated. We see not why even the most perfect of all instrumental combinations, the orchestra, with strings as well as wind instruments, may not be available for out-of-door refreshment in the still and pleasant summer nights. Then should we hear not aggravating arrangements, but bonâ fide productions of fine compositions in their original and only worthy shape. Fancy the hearing of Mendelssohn's dream overture, under the trees, some fine midsummer night! We do not anticipate this speedily; but the hint may be worth considering for the future.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

We had the pleasure, a few days since, of welcoming home one of our musical students from abroad, namely our townsman, Mr. S. PARKMAN TUCKERMAN. Mr. T. has passed the last four years in Europe, principally in England, with the endeavor to become thoroughly acquainted with the school of English Cathedral music. And he has turned his opportunities to excellent account. In 1851 he received the degree of Doctor in Music from the Archbishop of Canterbury; and in the following year, during a residence in Rome, he was created a Master of Sacred Music in the Academy of St. Cecilia.

Several anthems of Dr. Tuckerman's composition have been published in England, and some of them are now in use in the Cathedrals. He brings with him a large and valuable library of music collected during his residence abroad, together with the knowledge and the zeal for raising up a higher standard of church music than has hitherto prevailed among us. We cordially wish him all success, and trust it will not be long before we may hear some specimens, under his auspices, of the grand old music of the church of England.

THE MUSIC ON THE COMMON. We learn from the Transcript that it was the Brigade Band that officiated so creditably on Wednesday evening. The same paper further states that:

On Saturday evening the Germanians (we suppose the Germania Serenade Band) are expected to play on the Common from 6 to 8 o'clock. The music will be continued, by the Boston Brass and Bond's Band, on Wednesdays between 7 and 9, and on Saturdays between 6 and 8 o'clock. The four bands above named will play in rotation. Should the weather be unpleasant on any evening assigned for the music, the performance will be postponed till the first pleasant evening.

A grand Military Benefit Concert will be given in the Music Hall this evening, to Mr. EDWARD KENDALL, who has contributed for many years so largely to the excellence of our band music. All the brass bands, the Campbell Minstrels, &c., are to lend their aid.

Our Charlestown neighbors are determined to have music from the foot of the Bunker Hill monument these summer evenings.

NEW YORK. JULLIEN the great, with his monster orchestra, the incomparable contra-bassist BOTTESINI, and the singer Mlle. ANNA ZERK, is to open his American career at Castle Garden on the 24th of August.—Haydn's "Creation" was successfully performed this week by the Sacred Harmonic Society, under the direction of Mr. Bristow.

CINCINNATI. Steffanone has given a concert here, assisted by Paul Jullien, Strakosch and others.

London.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—At the sixth concert M. HECTOR BERLIOZ conducted the first part, which consisted entirely of his own compositions. The first was his symphony, "Harold in Italy," a work which so excited the admiration of Paganini, when he heard it in Paris, that he forwarded a draft for 20,000*fr.* to the composer, with a most flattering letter. The theme is Byron's Childe. The Mus. World, reporting the performance, says:

In the first part,—representing "Harold in the Mountain"—the immense variety of light and shade, through the medium of which M. Berlioz has attempted to paint the various impressions produced on the mind of the pilgrim-poet by the scenes and incidents he encounters in his wanderings, were realized with wonderful accuracy. The principal part for the viola was performed by M. Sainton, with a tone, execution, and sentiment that gave full effect to the composer's bold and essentially dramatic notion of representing the hero of his descriptive symphony by a sole instrument, always distinct from the orchestra, and preserving a kind of individuality throughout. The "March of Pilgrims singing the Evening Hymn"—one of the quaintest and freshest movements in modern music—was played with extreme delicacy; the still more quaint and not less charmingly instrumented, "Serenade of the Mountaineer of Abruzzi," was given with equal effect; and the fourth and last movement, which, after some recapitulation of the previous incidents, ends with the hoisterous revels of the brigands, brought out the power of the orchestra with a force and resonance almost overwhelming.

Of the other two pieces the same writer adds:

The air from the Flight into Egypt, an oratorio, both words and music of which have been written by M. Berlioz, was admirably sung by Signor Gardoni, and unanimously encored. It is a pastoral—not at all "in the ancient style" (as the programme states), but peculiarly modern, in the flow of its melody, the variety of its expression, and the style of its orchestral accompaniments. On the other hand, it is decidedly one of the most effective vocal compositions of M. Berlioz, with which we are acquainted. The brilliant overture, Le Carnaval Romain (an interlude between the first and second acts of the opera of Benvenuto Cellini), already made familiar to the public by its frequent performance at the concerts of M. Jullien, was executed with a combined fire and delicacy that left nothing to be desired, and brought this novel and attractive performance to a close amid the greatest applause.

Thus M. Berlioz has gone through the ordeal of the old as well as the New Philharmonic, and judging from all accounts his music, as well as his talent as a conductor, are most rapidly rising into favor in England. The second part of the concert was conducted by COSMA and included Beethoven's C minor symphony; an air from Spohr's Faust, by Herr Pischek; a concertino for the double-bass, by Bottesini; Donizetti's Ange si pur, by Sig. Gardoni, and Weber's overture, "Ruler of the Spirits."

NEW PHILHARMONIC.—The fourth concert drew a vast crowd to Exeter Hall. In the first part were performed, (1) "The Widow of Nain," by the Conductor, LINDPAINTEUR, described as a cantata, or short sacred oratorio, founded on a passage in the Gospel of St. Luke; the music simple and unaffected, well suited to both solo and chorus voices, and instrumented by a master's hand. Several airs are mentioned as likely to become popular; and there are two fine quartets, while "the choruses though brief and unpretending, contain points of imitation that show Herr L. to be thoroughly familiar with the fugal style." (2) Macfarren's overture to Schiller's Don Carlos, written in 1842, better known in Germany than in England, and pronounced "one of his most thoughtful and original productions." (3) A "most fascinating piano-forte morceau," "La Chasse," composed and played by Emile Prudent. (4) Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, played, they say, more admirably than ever before in England.

The second part consisted of Mendelssohn's Waldpurgis Night, conducted by Dr. Wilde; Lindpaintner's popular little song "The Standard Bearer," sung by Pischek, and the overture to Freyschütz. Herr Lindpaintner, who was to return the next day to his king of Wurtemberg, at Baden-Baden, was greeted with such a leave-taking as left no doubt of the estimation in which he was held by the immense audience assembled. At the next concert they were to have the "Choral Symphony," with Dr. Spohr for conductor.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. For the 25th ult. Ernani was announced with a splendid caste: namely, BOSIO as Elvira, TAMERLIK as Ernani, BELLETTI as Silva, and RONCONI as Don Carlos. But Bosio was taken ill, and her place poorly supplied by Mlle. ALBINI, which threw a damper over the performance. All the critics praise the three men, but one suggests that Belletti and Ronconi might advantageously have changed places.

On the 31st Lucrezia Borgia and the second act of Il Barbiere completely filled the house. The World laments that the latter opera was shorn of its incomparable proportions, but adds that, "with Sig. LUCCHESI as Count Almaviva, the more the Barbiere is shorn the better for the Barbiere."

The Huguenots has had a run of several nights, in the presence of the Royal Family and an immense course. The Times says:

BELLETTI, with his earnest manner and artistic singing, could not fail to render St. Bris important. All he had to do was done well; all he had to sing was sung admirably. NANTIER DUINA made a very graceful and attractive page in Urbano. MARIO was grander than ever, and in as fine voice as we have heard him for years. We need not specify his great points. In the septuor, act third, and the grand duet, act fourth, he was transcendent, and created a furor. There was no husbanding of the voice, as of late years, for particular points; no saving certain notes to give others particular emphasis; no superabundant display of the falsetto to render the chest notes more strong and telling. Mario was in full possession of all his powers, and used them with magnificent effect. Purer, more powerful, or grander singing than that of Mario in the Huguenots, it would be impossible to hear, GRISS, also, was in high force, and signalized herself, as of old, in all her favorite bits. She sang splendidly throughout the evening, and acted with prodigious fire and numense feeling in the grand duet. But GRISS's Valentine is too well known to require iteration of its praises. It is decidedly one of her most exquisite performances, and has only one drawback—namely, that the music is sometimes too low for her voice. FORMES's Marcel is beyond all comparison the most finished and satisfactory we have seen, and was never more highly finished, or more thoroughly satisfying. With a strong word for TAGLIAFICO in Nevers and STIGELLI for his singing, as the Huguenot officer, in the Ratanaplan chorus, we must conclude our individual notice. The band was as splendid as ever, and the chorus generally better than we have heard them for years. CASTELLAN, the most charming and fascinating of Queens, Marguerite, sang most brilliantly her music, which exactly more from the singer almost than any soprano part written by Meyerbeer.

Among the improvements of the age we note the construction of telegraphic wires from the House of Parliament, to Covent Garden, whereby musical M. P.'s may be summoned from the opera when important questions are to be taken.

GRISS AND MARIO.—The London Musical World (June 4th) says: "We are furthermore informed that the engagement of the renowned twain for America is not definitely settled, but is likely to be so. In addition, we may state, that Formes was offered a large sum to accompany Mario and Grisi, but declined, as we are told, in consequence of prior engagements."

Advertisements.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,
A Paper of Art and Literature,
PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,
AT 21 SCHOOL STREET, BOSTON,
$2 per annum, in advance.

ITS CONTENTS relate mainly, to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time,—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music published at home and abroad. 3. A Summary of the significant Musical News from all parts; gathered from English, German, French, as well as American papers. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, Architecture, Poetry, Æsthetic Books, the Drama, &c.—8. Original and Selected Poems, short Tales, Anecdotes, &c. [Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished. Address, (post paid.) J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School Street, Boston.

A. W. FRENZEL,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC, and late Leader of the "Saxonia Orchestra," having made Boston his residence, is prepared to give Lessons on the Piano-Forte and in Singing, both in the English and German languages; also to accompany with the violin more advanced pupils in the Sonata-duos of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c. During the summer season, Mr F. offers his services to classes out of town. Or he will receive scholars, from the city or the country, at his Music Rooms, No. 4 Pine Street, Boston, where he may always be found before 10 A. M., and between the hours of 1 and 3 P. M. iii 6

Pianos and Melodeons to Let.

OLIVER DITSON,

Music Dealer, 115 Washington St., Boston,

HAS a good variety of Piano Fortes, Melodeons, Seraphines, and Reed Organs, to let, for city or country, on low terms. If, within one year from the time of hiring, the party should conclude to purchase the instrument, no charge will be made for rent of it, except the interest on its value. 25 tf

JUST PUBLISHED,

THE STABAT MATER, by Rossini, at the low price of 75 cents. Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St. iii 9

BEETHOVEN'S CELEBRATED MASS in C, IN VOCAL SCORE: With an Accompaniment for the Organ or Piano-Forte, by Vincent Novello. With Latin and English text. Just published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St. iii 4

THE SYMPHONIES OF BEETHOVEN—ARRANGED FOR THE PIANO-FORTE BY J. N. HUMMEL. The above excellent compositions are now in course of publication by the subscriber. Symphony No. 7, in A, op. 92, is now ready. Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St. iii 4

[Sold by all Music Dealers.]

—Edward L. Balch,

NEW EDITION OF CARCASSI'S GUITAR BOOK.

New and Improved Method for the Guitar, by M. Carcassi. Price $2.50. This new edition of Carcassi's celebrated method embraces much valuable matter not contained in those previously issued. These additions are those which have been made by the distinguished author after an experience which enabled him to determine what was actually needed by the pupil for a thorough understanding of the art. The whole has been carefully translated by a well known Professor of the Guitar, and is thereby rendered as free as possible from those slight but perplexing inaccuracies which sometimes become a part of translations and reprints. A number of popular songs in each of the different keys have been appended, which together with the masterly instructions of Carcassi, and his plain yet comprehensive course of Exercises, furnish all that is desirable to both teacher and scholar.

feb 26

OLIVER DITSON, Publisher,
115 Washington St.

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE,
No. 86 TREMONT STREET, BOSTON.

WHITE BROTHERS,
DEALERS IN MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS,

Best Italian, German, French and English Strings,

AGENTS OF

J. André, Offenbach; and G. André, Philadelphia,

FOR THE SALE OF FOREIGN CLASSIC MUSIC,
CHOIR MUSIC, &c.

Instruments Made, Repaired, Tuned, Bought, Sold, or Exchanged, on the most favorable terms.

IRA J. WHITE. A. WARREN WHITE.
iii 2 3m

THEODORE T. BARKER,
MUSIC STORE,
No. 381 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

Chickering's Pianos to let.

All Foreign and American Musical Publications received as soon as published. iii 23 3m

N. D. COTTON,

English, French, and American Stationery,
DRAWING & PAINTING MATERIALS,
No. 13 Tremont Row, Boston.

 Wedding and Visiting Cards Engraved and Printed. 16 tf

BEETHOVEN'S ORATORIO OF ENGEDI, or DAVID IN THE WILDERNESS, known as the MOUNT OF OLIVES, is this day published in a neat, convenient form for the singer or concert-goer by

Geo. P. Reed & Co., Publishers,
Jan. 8. 17 TREMONT ROW, BOSTON.

J. W. TAVERNER,
EXPERIENCED MUSICIAN,

AT HIS RESIDENCE,

No. 30 CHARLES STREET, BOSTON.

J. C. WOODMAN,
ORGANIST AND CONDUCTOR OF MUSIC AT CENTRAL CHURCH,
Teacher of Singing, Piano Forte, &c.,
No. 94 Chestnut Street, Boston.
iii 2 3m.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.

FOREIGN MUSIC DEPOT,
GIRARD HOUSE BUILDINGS,

NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,

PHILADELPHIA.

N. B. The complete works, for Piano, (Quartets, Trios, Duets for Piano and Violin, Duets for four hands and Piano solo pieces,) of BEETHOVEN and MOZART, as also the Piano solo Works of CLEMENTI and HAYDN, as published by J. André, Offenbach, in sets, at very low prices. [We have appointed

Messrs. WHITE BROTHERS,
TREMONT TEMPLE, BOSTON,

our Agents for the sale of the above Standard Editions of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, &c. &c. iii 2 tf

MRS. ROSA GARCIA DE RIBAS,
TEACHER OF THE
PIANOFORTE, SINGING & GUITAR,
2 Seneca St., corner Harrison Avenue.

MR. DE RIBAS will give instruction on the Oboe and Flute. Also MUSIC ARRANGED, TRANSPOSED, &c. Boston, April 23. 3m

Letter-Press, Music and Job Printing-Office,

JONAS CHICKERING,

RESPECTFULLY gives notice to his friends and the public that, having recovered from the late disastrous effects produced by the destruction of his factory, he is now ready to receive orders for PIANOS, which he promises to execute with as much faithfulness and promptitude as heretofore.

379 Washington Street, Boston.

Mar. 5.

tf

HEWS' PATENT

AMERICAN ACTION PIANO-FORTE.

THE MANUFACTURER is in possession of numerous testimonials from distinguished Musical Professors, who have used the greatly improved ACTION PIANO, commending it in high terms. The attention of purchasers and amateurs of Music to an examination of its superiority, is solicited.

GEO. HEWS, 365 Washington St., Boston.

Apr. 10.

tf

D. B. NEWHALL,
MANUFACTURER AND DEALER IN
PIANO FORTES,
No. 344 Washington Street, Boston.
PIANO FORTES REPAIRED, TUNED, & TO LET.
Apr. 10. tf

SIGNOR G. C. GUIDI respectfully informs his former pupils and the public, that he has resumed his instructions in SINGING, after the Italian school, with the intention to settle permanently in Boston. In order to accommodate those who may not wish to take private instruction, he will open classes for ladies and gentlemen, on moderate terms. None but good voices will be admitted. Terms liberal for persons intending to study for professional purposes.

Sig. G. can be consulted free upon any musical subject, daily, from 12 to 2, at Mr. Hew's Piano Manufactory, No. 365 Washington street, where terms and time for classes may be known.

Orders or notes for Sig. G. may be addressed to him at G. P. Reed & Co.'s Music Store, 17 Tremont Row, and at Oliver Ditson's, 115 Washington street. Feb. 5.

A CARD.

THE SUBSCRIBER respectfully offers his services to the public as Teacher of the Piano-Forte, the Violin, and of Singing, after a clear and easy method. He will also accompany pupils, both in seminaries and in private houses, in the practice of Duets, Trios, &c.

Address for the present at 168 Tremont Street.

March 26. 3m.

CARL GÄRTNER.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
265 Washington Street, Boston.
Oct. 16. 3m

T. BRICHER,
Organist and Conductor of Music
At the Bowdoin Square Church.

OFFICE UNDER THE CHURCH. . . ENTRANCE ON CHARDON ST.

Jan. 22. 3m.

H. S. CUTLER,
Organist at the Church of the Advent, also of
the Boston Harmonic Society.

ADDRESS—(Care of ROLAND CUTLER, No. 4 Market Square, Boston.) 22 tf

F. F. MÜLLER,

DIRECTOR OF MUSIC AND ORGANIST at the Old South Church; ORGANIST of the Handel and Haydn Society; ORGANIST of the Musical Education Society, &c. &c. &c. Inquire of Messrs. REED & CO., No. 17 Tremont Row, Boston. iii 7

NATHAN RICHARDSON,
PROFESSOR OF MUSIC.

[Letters may be addressed at the Revere House, Boston. 25 tf

GEORGE F. WILLEY,
TEACHER OF MUSIC.

[Private Tuition in the principles of Music and the Cultivation of the Voice.

MUSIC ROOM, the LECTURE ROOM of KIRK STREET CHURCH, RESIDENCE, 34 FRANKLIN SQUARE, SUFFOLK STREET, feb. 5. LOWELL, MASS.

Germania Serenade Band.

THE SERVICES OF THIS ASSOCIATION can be secured by applying to

iii 14 tf

G. SCHNAPP, Leader,
364 Tremont Street.

RATES FOR ADVERTISING.

For half a square, (8 lines,) or less, first insertion, . . . $0.50

For a square, (16 lines,) first insertion, . . . 1.00

On advertisements standing three months or longer, a discount of twenty per cent. on the above rates is allowed.

(A column counts as sixteen squares.) Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 School St.

DWIGHT'S Journal of Music.

A Paper of Art and Literature.

VOL. III.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 2, 1853.

NO. 13.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

TERMS...TWO DOLLARS PER ANNUM, (IN ADVANCE.)

CITY Subscribers can be served at their houses by the further payment of fifty cents per annum.

For Rates of Advertising, see last page.

POSTAGE, if paid in advance, for any distance within the State, thirteen cents a year; if not in advance, twenty-six cents. To all places beyond the State, double these rates.

J. S. DWIGHT,.....EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St.

By REDDING & CO., 8 State St.

" GEO. P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row.

" A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.

" DEXTER & BROTHERS, 43 Ann Street, N. Y.

" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 722 Broadway, N. Y.

" MASON BROTHERS, 23 Park Row, New York.

" GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.

" G. ANDRE, 229 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St., Balt.

" COLBURN & FIELD, Cincinnati, O.

" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Persons willing to become Agents for procuring subscribers, especially Music-Dealers and Teachers, are invited to correspond with the Editor, as above. Satisfactory references required, and liberal commissions allowed.

Back numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Also bound copies of Vols. I. and II. at prices varying from $2.50 to $3.50.

Meyerbeer's "Huguenots."

[From Heath's "Beauties of the Opera and Ballet."]

[Concluded.]

We must now turn to Paris, where the action of the piece is concentrated.—Behold the Pré-aux-Clercs, the Seine, and, down lower, the old Louvre, beneath the gloomy vaults of which sanguinary projects are brewing. On the left of the meadow, beneath the shadow of an aged chesnut, there is a chapel sacred to Catholic worship; in front and on one side are two small taverns—other chapels, dedicated to Bacchus.

It is the hour of the promenade, towards the end of a sultry day in the month of August. The citizens are breathing the fresh air on the banks of the stream; workmen and persons of the humbler classes are assembled, and in groups here and there before the shops of the itinerant vendors of wares, the puppet-shows, and the bands of music playing in the open air. Seated at the table of one of the taverns is a party of young fellows and girls, who are chatting, laughing, and flirting, whilst their mirth is intermingled with the harsh tones of some Huguenot soldiers, who are drinking and singing at a table on the opposite side of the stage:—

"March! soldier of old Calvin's breed;
To you the Papist maid's decreed,
Yours the bright gold and silver fine,
And good wine!"

But room there—make way! There is a marriage procession advancing towards the chapel. In the midst of a brilliant assemblage of court lords and ladies a young bride approaches. Heavens! it is Valentine! de Nevers is at her side! The Comte de Saint Bris has given her to him to avenge himself for Raoul's disdain, for whom, he adds, he has yet in store a chastisement still more terrible. The cortège enter the chapel, whilst the female spectators go on their knees and pray. This pious demonstration irritates the Calvinist soldiery, and they resume their chorus, which arouses the young men and work-people, and they retort in threatening words and gestures. A struggle is evidently at hand, when the arrival of a troop of gipsies fortunately attracts the attention of all in another direction. These gitanos restore the gaiety of the populace; they tell the young girls' fortunes, and then dance a merry round to a joyous air. The divertissement ended, Saint Bris and de Nevers come out from the chapel, where they have left Valentine, who wishes to remain there, engaged in prayer, until the evening. After the curfew, the relatives and husband of the young bride are to return to conduct her in state to the Hôtel de Nevers. All the wedding attendants depart: the Comte de Saint Bris remains, with only one gentleman, a brother Catholic, named Maurevert. Marcel, the formal servant of Raoul, soon presents himself before them, and hands to the Comte a note from his master, who has that very day reached Paris in the suite of Marguerite de Valois. Saint Bris opens the letter, which contains a challenge.

"As I expected," he says: and then, turning to Marcel, "This evening I shall expect Sir Raoul de Nangis on this spot."

"A duel with him?" inquires Maurevert, in a low voice; "you must not incur that risk;—

"Another course there lies
To strike an impious wretch which Heaven sanctifies."

"What mean you?"

"Come with me, and in the presence of the Almighty I will unfold to you the projects which are meditated."

They then both retire into the chapel.

Night draws on, and the sound of the curfew-bell is heard, and the sergeants of the watch come in and disperse the tardy walkers in the Pré-aux-Clercs. The students and Huguenot soldiers, whose day has not yet concluded, merely leave the outside for the inside of the taverns, that they may continue their libations and play privately. When the meadow is entirely deserted, Maurevert and Saint Bris are seen on the threshold of the chapel, and, after exchanging some words in a low tone, separate with an air of mystery. Thoughtless men!—they have forgotten Valentine!

Valentine, who, hidden behind a pillar, has, without designing it, overheard their horrid intentions, and who, for the sake of her father's reputation, desires to prevent their accomplishment. Marcel, appears punctually, impelled thither by his fearful forebodings. The faithful fellow determines to be present at the duel, and, if needs be, he will die with his master. Valentine recognizes him.

"Hear me," she exclaims. "Is not Raoul to be here immediately?"

"He is."

"And to fight?"

"True."

"Let him come well attended."

"Gracious God! does danger menace him?"

"I dare not tell thee."

"Who, then, are you?"

"I? I am—the woman he loves,—who seek to save him even by an act of treachery,—and whom he must forget for ever!"

Marcel seeks to know more, but she leaves him with a rapid step, and betakes herself to the chapel.

There is no time to warn Raoul, for he arrives at that instant with his seconds, and Saint Bris with his two "friends." Marcel tries, however, by some words uttered hastily and in a low tone, to make his master comprehend that he has fallen into a snare; but Raoul treats him as a madman, and hurls at his antagonist his defiance in words so energetic, and always so loudly applauded:—

"In my own good right is my trust," &c., &c.

They then decide on the conditions of the combat, measure the distance and the weapons, and the two adversaries and the four seconds betake themselves to their swords. At the moment when they begin to exchange thrusts, Marcel, who is on the watch, exclaims aloud that he hears footsteps, and sees the shadows of a band of men approaching. He has scarcely said so, when Maurevert, followed by two Acolytes, rushes on the stage, calling for aid against the Huguenots, who, he says, are making a cowardly attack on the Catholics. At his shouts a dozen or more suspicious-looking persons come from an obscure corner, where they were in ambush, and attack Raoul and his companions, whom they surround. The brave Calvinists, turning back to back, show a valiant front to the enemy, who assail them on all sides; but in this unfair strife their small and condensed bastation is each moment more closely pressed, and they are nearly defeated by such vast odds, when suddenly they hear in one of the taverns this Huguenot chorus:—

"Plan, rataplan, war we'll have!

Drink, drink we,
To the good and brave,
To Coligny!"

"Defenders of the faith! to the rescue!" cries Marcel.

The door of the tavern opens, and the appearance of the Protestant soldiers makes Maurevert and his band retreat; but at this moment the young students arrive, attracted by the noise, and range themselves on the side of the Catholics.

"To the stake with the Pagans!" "To the devil with the bigots!" are shouted on either side, and a struggle ensues. The two rival forces rush with fury against each other; Saint Bris and Raoul cross weapons,—another instant, and blood must flow.

"Rash men, desist!" cries a well-known voice, and every sword is returned to its scabbard. "Dare you, in Paris, and in the front of the Louvre itself, to engage in such hostilities?"

It is Marguerite de Valois, who returns on horseback to her palace, followed by her guards and pages bearing flambeaux. Saint Bris and his party declare that they have been treacherously attacked.

"It is they," says Marcel, "who have basely attempted to assassinate my master."

"How know'st thou that? Who has informed thee?"

"An unknown female, whom I saw here but now."

"Thou liest!" exclaims Saint Bris. "Where is this woman?"

"Behold her!" replies the stout sectarian, pointing to Valentine, who at this instant appears at the entrance of the chapel. At the sight of his daughter the Count is thunderstruck.

"What!" cries Raoul, "to save me she has not hesitated to betray her sire—and yet she loves me not!"

"She loves none but you," replies Marguerite, in spite of the entreaties of Valentine to be silent.

"But that mysterious visit to de Nevers?"

"She went to urge him to renounce all claims to her hand."

"Oh! Heaven, is it possible?—and I could believe that—Pardon! pardon! give her to me—to me who adore her!"

"You do love her!" exclaims Saint Bris, with savage joy; "then I am avenged; for this very day she espoused another!"

How can we depict the despair of Raoul, who bursts into an agony of tears. Whilst the Queen endeavors to calm his mind, a bark, splendidly ornamented, with silken sails and gilded sides, sparkling with lights, and enlivened by delicious music, descends the river, and anchors beside the meadow. De Nevers, attended by his bridesmen and all the guests of his wedding ceremony, arrives to seek Valentine, and escort her to the château of her husband. It is hardly possible to describe the varied feelings of the parties, whose emotions of love, revenge, pity, sorrow, exultation and despair, are given in most complicated yet expressive harmony. Wretched Raoul! he is compelled to witness the triumph of his rival, to see him depart, with an air of pride and joy, and take with him all his hope, happiness, nay, life itself! Marguerite conducts the unhappy lover from the Pré-aux-Clères, while the Huguenots and Catholics are still assailing each other in terms of foul reproach; and thus terminates the Third Act.

At the opening of the FOURTH ACT we follow the wretched Valentine to the Hôtel de Nevers.

She is alone—sorrow-stricken and agitated. The remembrance of Raoul pursues her, and in a moment of pious resignation she prays that every sentiment of a love, which must henceforth be criminal, may be at once eradicated from her heart, and that in its stead she may be inspired with the courage which virtue alone can give. In vain does she pray and weep, and weep and pray; her supplication is ineffectual;—the name of him she seeks to forget returns, in spite of herself, to her heart, her thoughts, her very lips. At that instant—is it a dream—a delusion?—Raoul himself appears before her aching sight! He enters, pale as a spectre, haggard as Remorse. He approaches her—he speaks. Oh, Heaven! 'tis himself.

"I would see you once again, and for the last time," he says, in accents of deep despair.

"Fly!" shrieks Valentine, affrighted; "if my husband or my father should find us together, they would slay us both."

"Wherefore should I avoid them? Since I have lost you forever, death is my only solace, my sole refuge."

"No, no, Raoul, live, and learn to acknowledge the true God, and then we shall one day be united in Heaven."

She then urges him again to leave her, but it is now too late; footsteps are heard in the vestibule. Valentine looks out, and exclaims:—

"Gracious Heaven! we are lost! It is my father—my husband!"

"Here, then, I await them!"

"What, Raoul, when that will compromise my honor? You must avoid them for my sake."

She then conceals him behind the tapestry.

In his capacity as Governor of the Louvre, the Comte de Saint Bris has been employed to bring together the principal Catholic noblemen, and to disclose to them the plot projected by Catherine de Medicis. They have all answered to the summons: de Nevers, Tavannes, Méru, de Retz, de Cossé, de Besme, &c., &c. Without being at all disturbed at the presence of his daughter, Saint Bris announces to the gentlemen who surround him, that, to put a stop at once to religious discords, to end at a blow an impious contest, Heaven wills, and Charles IX. ordains, that all the Protestants be massacred that very night!

"Who will strike them?" demands the husband of Valentine.

"We will!" exclaims Saint Bris. "Such is the order of the King. Will you swear to obey it?"

"We swear!"

Only one of the band has kept silence, and that is de Nevers. The others demand an explanation of his silence, and he boldly says that his honor will not allow him to immolate defenceless foes.

"When the King commands?"

"He commands me in vain when he bids me stain the pure name of my ancestors!" and pointing to their portraits hanging from the walls, he adds, "They are all soldiers—there is not one assassin amongst them!"

"Traitor! would you betray us?"

"No! but sooner than thus sully the brightness of my sword, I would break it! God be the judge between us!"

On hearing such noble language, Valentine throws herself into her husband's arms.

"Oh, now I am yours forever!" she exclaims.

But Saint Bris, pointing out de Nevers to the leaders of the citizens and the people, who appear at this moment, bids them not to lose sight of him until morning. They take him off a prisoner, and at a signal from her father Valentine retires.

There now remain about the Comte none but the gloomy fanatics sworn to the horrible assassination. The fierce interpreter of the behests of the Medici gives them their final instructions, and to each and all he assigns their posts and their victims.

"Go thou, de Besme, to Coligny, and let him be the first sacrifice! you, Tavannes, Cossé, Méru, to the Hôtel de Sens, where the heretics are feasting with the King of Navarre; you to the houses and the streets—our foes are everywhere. Seek out all, spare none. When ye hear the bell of St. Germain l'Auxerrois sound, then strike without pity or remorse. The Almighty absolves you already, before you begin your pious work."

Then, to confirm this blasphemy, he points to the doors in the back of the stage, where appear three monks, who come down to the centre of the scene, chanting a solemn anthem. All present, by a spontaneous movement, draw their swords or poniards, raise their arms towards Heaven, and the austere friars burst forth into bitter anathemas against the Calvinists, and bless the avenging weapons which are devoted to the deadly work of extermination. On these consecrated swords each repeats his homicidal oath, and then, led by their respective chiefs, the throngs of conspirators disperse quickly and in silence.

When they have all departed, Raoul, pale and alarmed, comes forth from beneath the curtain which has concealed him, and rushes towards the door, which he finds closed from without.

"Whither go you?" says Valentine, who appears from her apartment.

"To warn my friends and comrades to arm themselves against assassins!"

"Against my father? Oh! pray refrain—consider!"

"To hesitate were to forfeit my honor, my friendship. Let me go without delay."

"You shall not go, unless you would pass over my body!"

"Then follows a fearful struggle between the poor girl and her lover. She clings to him, clasps his knees, and entreats him, with tears streaming from her eyes, to remain with her until the dawn of day; but seeing him unmoved by her tears and agony, she cries,—

"Oh! I would not have thee die, Raoul!—Raoul, I love thee!"

This utterance from the heart—this impassioned avowal, makes the young cavalier hesitate. He forgets all his religion, his duty, his menaced comrades, and he falls at the feet of Valentine overwhelmed with love and joy. The toll of a distant bell recalls him to his senses.

"Ah, that is the signal for the massacre!" he exclaims, "and my friends are already sacrificed. Farewell!"

"I hasten to defend them,
Or share their threatened fate!"

Their struggle, which had been momentarily interrupted, is renewed. Valentine encircles him in her arms again, clinging to him with all the strength of despair, seeking to retain him by all the reiterated protestations of the most passionate love; but it is too late. There is no longer an echo in the breast of Raoul, to whose heart every note of the tocsin sounds a knell. Again the sound of the bell is heard, and the noise of arms, and the shout of combatants.

"Dost thou hear?" says the distracted Raoul, "my friends' fate—they cry for me! Heaven watch over thee, my beloved one—I must avenge them, or die!" And, disengaging himself violently from the clasp of his adored, he leaps into the street by the window. Valentine shrieks violently, and falls fainting on the ground.

As a theatrical situation this scene, with only two actors, is indubitably the finest in the whole opera. It produced on the first representation the most remarkable effect, and was followed throughout by the utmost anxiety, fear and anguish, excited by the perpetual change of interest which the progress of the act exhibited. As a man who is thoroughly versed in his business, M. Scribe chose it as the termination of his Fourth Act, well knowing that in all plays, lyric or otherwise, success depends in a great measure on the force, progress, and working out of this act. From that moment the result of the poem was decided. We must add, too, that the struggle of the two lovers was most powerfully depicted by Nourrit and Mademoiselle Falcon, and also by their successors, Madame Stoltz and Duprez.

The FIFTH ACT consists of a series of tableaux, which should be seen, as it is difficult to describe them. During its progress, the action of the drama is marked by scenic effects.

The curtain at its rising discloses the interior of the Hôtel de Sens, all the apartments of which are illuminated as if for a ball, and filled by a numerous assembly. All the Protestant chiefs are there. Ladies of the court, in their gala dresses, laugh, and talk, and dance with the young nobles. A variety of dances and amusements succeed rapidly, and all appear light of step and joyous of heart, when Marguerite de Valois and Henri de Navarre appear in the midst of the ball. Groups of ladies and cavaliers precede the royal pair, and pay their respects and the honors of a fête given expressly on occasion of the marriage. The King and Princess cross the saloon, then disappear, and the dances recommence. At a moment, far above the crash of the orchestra, is heard the tolling of a distant bell. The dancers pause and listen, but this sound does not instil any ideas of terror or dismay, and the ball is resumed with increased gaiety and animation. All at once another noise is heard, which begins at a distance, comes nearer, and then all eyes are turned with anxiety towards the bottom of the stage, and Raoul is seen entering with a hurried step, pale, with his hair dishevelled, and his garments stained with blood.

"To arms! to arms!" he cries, in a voice of thunder. "Our friends are murdered—the assassins draw nigh, with hasty and deadly steps!"

They cannot believe him; and he then relates the fearful scenes he has witnessed:—

"By the glare of their torches' funeral light,
I saw the blood-stained soldiers as they strode;
Their voices yelling in the fearful night—
'Strike, strike the wretches who're condemned by God!'

He has seen Coligny fall beneath the steel of the murderers, who spare neither the old, women, nor children. As he was hastening to the Louvre, to entreat justice of the King, he had seen Charles IX. from the balcony of the palace setting the example and exciting the carnage. At this declaration all present utter a cry of horror and of vengeance. The women, palsied with fear, rush out hastily, followed by their pages and attendants, by all the doors of the apartments, and the men, drawing their swords, hasten after Raoul, with whom they repeat,—

"Sword to sword let's now oppose,
Avenge our brethren on our foes!
Down with the vile assassins—down!"

The scene changes to a cloister, at the back of which is a Protestant church, of which the windows appear lighted up. The Calvinist women, carrying their children in their arms, enter in haste and terror by a side door, seeking a refuge from the sanguinary persecutors. Marcel, who arrives at the same time, wounded and faint, shows them a small wicket-gate, which leads to the interior of the church, and then he goes on his knees and prays in silence. Raoul enters.

"Is it thou, Marcel?" he inquires.

"Yes; I was praying for you, and I bless Heaven that I see you once more!"

"Thou art wounded!" exclaims his master, on looking earnestly at him; "but I will revenge thee!"

"Alas! it is impossible; we are surrounded, hemmed in on all sides. This temple is our last refuge; enter there—there, at least," we shall die on holy ground!"

"Whither do ye hasten?" asks a voice eagerly. It is the voice of Valentine.

"To glory!" replies Raoul.

"To martyrdom!" exultingly cries Marcel.

"No, you shall live—for I come to save you," says the young maiden to her lover; and she gives him a white scarf, by the protection of which he can reach the Louvre in safety, and, when there, Marguerite de Valois will obtain for him his life, if he will promise to embrace the Catholic faith.

Raoul rejects the proposal with scorn;—he will die, as he has lived, in the faith of his forefathers.

"Even did I become an apostate," he says, passionately, to Valentine, "you would not be mine! All conspires to keep us separate!"

"Oh, no! I may love you now without a crime."

"Yes," says Marcel, "de Nevers died the victim of his generosity, whilst attempting to rescue me from the hands of the assassins."

"What! is he dead?" cries Raoul: "is he dead? And a violent struggle between love and duty arises in his mind."

"Marcel," he exclaims,

"Dost thou not see the bliss that is before me?"

"And see'st not thou God's threatening finger o'er thee?"

replies the old Puritan, in a tone of severe reproach.

Raoul hesitates but one instant longer; then, seizing the hand of his faithful adherent, he says,—

"Adieu, Valentine! I await my death near thee."

"Then you refuse the certainty of life and safety which I bring thee? When I would live for thee alone, ungrateful man! thou wouldst die without me! But learn the depth—the sincerity—of a woman's love: that I may not leave thee, but cling to thee in life and death, I here abjure the Catholic faith. I am now and henceforth a Protestant. In hell or heaven, wheresoever be thy lot, there shall be mine also!"

"None but God's will be done,
Whatever he may decree;
So we on earth be one,
And in eternity!"

At these words, spoken with enthusiasm, Raoul throws himself into the arms of Valentine, whose countenance is radiant with resolution and beauty, and turning towards Marcel (who is deeply moved at this scene) he says,—

"No minister of Heaven is at hand to sanctify this union; but do thou, old and faithful friend, by the rights of virtue and age, consecrate our marriage in the presence of the Almighty God."

Marcel is wondrously affected, and a mental struggle appears for an instant—it is but for an instant—to agitate the war-bronzed features of the soldier, to shake his stalwart frame. It passes—(we should mention, in justice to the superb artist whom we have previously named, that this moment of agony is most exquisitely given by Staudigl)—and he is humiliated that his love for one, his admiration of the other, of the beings before him, had even suggested a thought that they might be saved from martyrdom by a few false words.

It is over, the fire of enthusiasm rekindles the veteran's eye, and its glow rushes to his darkened cheek. The gentlest, the loveliest of Christian rites, shall be celebrated even at that moment of fatal presentiment, of pending destruction.

The lovers kneel, and Marcel, with outstretched hands, and tones of the deepest pathos, bids them swear eternal love and union even in death. They vow, and he confirms the oath, in a noble trio, during which is heard, at intervals, a chorus from the church where Luther's Hymn is sung by the female and youthful voices. Raoul and Valentine are wedded—what more has Marcel to do on earth?

"For his creed, for his Master, his race he has run,
And he welcomes the death—for his mission is done."

Suddenly the pious strain is interrupted by a vast noise of arms clashing and loud shoutings. At the back of the scene, through the gratings, are seen the flames of torches and the glitter of halberds;—the murderers have assailed the last asylum of the Calvinists! The Protestants, far from showing dismay, sing their holy canticle with redoubled fervor, and for an instant a great tumult and discord reign; then all is suddenly hushed—the lights are extinguished, and all becomes silence and darkness.

"They sing no longer!" exclaim Valentine and Raoul at the same time.

"They are with their God!" adds Marcel, solemnly.

Again the three, full of religious fervor, and animated by pious inspirations, encourage each other to await with resignation the death which so speedily awaits them.

At that moment armed men appear, and having broken the door of the cloister rush on to the stage. Raoul, Marcel, and Valentine, hand in hand, advance, and present their bosoms to the deadly weapons of the assassins.

They retreat, as if astonished; then return, surround them, and, pointing to the cross of Lorraine and the white scarf, exclaim,—

"Abjure or die!"

"We will die!" exclaim the three martyrs, with one voice.

Their murderers, exasperated, rush at them, separate them, and take them in different directions; and at the instant they disappear several reports of fire-arms are heard in the street.

The scene then changes for the last time.

The theatre represents the view of a quarter of Paris in the year 1572.

The massacre is here seen in the full display of its horrible extent. Bands of furious soldiery overrun the city, spreading terror and death in all directions. Raoul and Marcel have fallen in the highroad, mortally wounded: Valentine is there, attending and consoling them. A body of musketeers appear on one side of the stage, with Saint Bris at their head.

"Who goes there?" he asks in hoarse tones.

Raoul attempts to reply; Valentine places her hand over his mouth: but, making a desperate effort, he half raises himself, and cries,—

"A Huguenot!" and then falls lifeless.

"We, too, are Huguenots!" exclaim Valentine and Marcel.

"Fire!" says the Comte to his troop.

The soldiers obey, and Valentine, pierced to the heart by a bullet, falls, uttering a dreadful shriek.

Saint Bris recognizes her voice, and shrieks out, "My child!"

"Yes," says Marcel, "God hath already avenged us: a moment, and I go into His presence to accuse you!"

"And I to pray for thee," murmured Valentine, with her dying breath.

During this scene of death and desolation Marguerite de Valois arrives, who, having just quitted the ball, is hastening to the Louvre. At the sight of the two lovers extended lifeless on the earth she utters a cry of intense grief, and with her hand waves to the Catholic soldiery to cease their work of vengeance and bloodshed.

This is a sketch of the "The Huguenots." It required, as we have already remarked, all the skill of the practised pen and apt judgment of M. Scribe to avoid the many difficulties, and even dangers, of the subject he had selected. In despite of the great space occupied by religious feuds, Love, the omnipotent groundwork of dramatic representation, still maintains ample prominence. The progress of the action is lively, interesting, and varied: in fact, it is one of the best of the libretti on the French or any other operatic stage, and the scenic department is first-rate for display and effect. We will candidly avow our opinion, that Meyerbeer must have had a difficult task to wed the prosaic verse of Scribe with his glorious music; which is, indeed, a chef-d'œuvre of harmony and musical science, whose beauties and perfections can never be obliterated from the memories of those who have had the good fortune to hear it well played and sung, and the good taste to appreciate its sterling merits.

The last two acts are, perhaps, the best in the opera, but the first three soon gained ground in popular favor, and have justly retained it. In the first act we have the chorus of the revellers, the romance of Raoul; the hymn sung by Marcel, which is the German air of "Eine feste Burg ist unser Gott—The Lord is unto us a strong tower," the words and the music being the composition of Luther himself, but which the skilful composer has heightened by a splendid accompaniment. Then we have the Huguenot air, "Down with the Convents accursed!" during which we have the pif-paf of the balls and the noise of the cannonade, the lively cavatina of Urbain, and the delightful septette which follows,—all conspiring to make the first act a splendid introduction, glowing with life, spirit, and joyousness.

The second act begins with three morceaux, which form the principal situations: first, the glorious air which Marguerite de Valois sings—a sparkling and skilful combination of notes, sustained in the allegro by a quintette of female voices which harmonize in chromatic variations as novel in idea as masterly in effect; then the duet of the Princess and Raoul, a flowing and original melody, full of delightful turns; and then concluding with a chorus so powerful and effective!

At the opening of the third act it would seem as though the musician wished to laugh at difficulties: he has brought together four or five different choruses which cross each other, interfere, mingle, without for one instant injuring the harmony or diminishing the effect. There is the chorus of the Huguenot soldiers, "On, brave lads!" which begins in four time, and towards the end, by an unprecedented tour de force, glides insensibly into a valse movement. With this chorus, so varied in rhythm and arrangements, we have the round of the gipsies and the monotonous chime of the curfew. Then we have the duo in which Valentine informs Marcel of his master's danger—a splendid "bit;" and the septette of the duet so magnificently led off by Raoul, "In my own right I have full faith,"—a glowing strain, and enough of itself to give celebrity to the act.

We now come to the fourth act, in which terror and passion swell the scene on all sides; and throughout the scene, from the entrance of the monks, the music is characterized by the utmost magnificence and sublimity of style.—Nothing can exceed the effect produced by the fearful trio; "Glory to God the Avenger," which precedes the benediction of the unsheathed daggers; and so the excitement proceeds, without constraint or any artificial means, by the aid of the more simple of musical resources. The psalmody, which bursts on us at first with the wrath of the tempest, and ends in deep notes like the distant growling of the thunder, is cut from the first by an accompaniment in discord, which descends until the voices again resume the upper part. After the adjuration of the monks we have a full chorus glowing with energy, fierceness, rage, and religious fury, whose general effect, skilfully managed, gives to the savageness of fanaticism a tone which is effective, majestic, solemn. Then the delightful duet in which Valentine and Raoul struggle with each other, in alternations of despair and love, grief and ecstasy! We are led away by the scene, the situation, the music, and the singers; and when the curtain falls we ask, What more can be expected of musical composition and of stage effect?

There is yet another scene, most striking and powerful: it is that in which Raoul and Valentine are united by Marcel when he is dying, and when the three willing martyrs, in a splendid trio, which seems altogether to be strained from terrestrial pollution, offer their lives as a willing sacrifice to the God of Luther.

The genius of Meyerbeer is essentially devotional. His choral effects have almost invariably an elevation which can only be produced by long study of the association of religious ideas. The situations in which he most delights are derived less from incidents of human life and human passion than from the profounder conflicts of supernatural agencies. In the opera we have now analyzed, the religious sentiment of the composition approximates more nearly to devotion as understood and recognized in England than was to be expected from a theatrical poet. The character of Marcel, as developed in "The Huguenots," might easily be taken for one of the enthusiastic and high-minded Puritans who fought in the cause of religious liberty, before the "cause" itself had become a mere stepping-stone for advancing the selfish interests of the Parliamentary leaders. The stern devotion displayed by Marcel to his chief was also the eminent characteristic of many of the earnest and zealous men who swelled the ranks of the insurgents of the seventeenth century; and the whole of his language is tinged with the same sombre, yet not uncheering hue, which marked their style, and which tradition has preserved, amid the distortion of malice and the caricature of levity. To M. Scribe, of course, much of the merit of the original design is due; but the soul of the composition is evidently the master-work of Meyerbeer, who has thrown himself with extraordinary ardor into the task of elaborating and completing the conception. That the mind of a composer, who had been from early life initiated into the inspired romance of Judaism, should almost involuntarily connect itself with religious aspirations, is not so singular as that it should be so eminently successful in portraying the sectarian Christian, not as a bigot, but as a believer, whose devotion, fierce though it be, is to be honored, and whose person it is impossible not to revere.

It is said that, in the original libretto, a fact had been selected from history to add a daring effect to the horrible scene of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew. Amid all the terrors of the slaughter, while the hideous bell is roaring out the cry to murder, and the shrieks of frantic women are rising above the oaths of the charging soldiery, over all the clash and clang of the scene, a lofty window of yonder frowning edifice is raised, and, by the light of a lamp within, a dark face, distorted with fanatic madness, is seen to glare out upon the groups below. The apparition snatches an arquebuse from the wall, and, with a ferocious gesture, levels it at the flying crowd. He fires—but what is that single additional death-cry in such an hour of blood? Claspings his hands with fiendish glee, the stranger shrieks out to the soldiery, "Tuez! tuez! Parisians, behold your king!"

Censorships and lord-chamberlains have somewhat dull eyes for theatrical effects, but an exceedingly sensitive vision for any thing calculated to connect an unfavorable idea with the persons of the powers that be, whether historical or actual. The scene lacks this startling addition.

We have nothing more to add. The opera of "The Huguenots" will, perhaps, preserve to future ages the memory of a scene which their advanced humanity may have taught them to forget.

The Germans in San Francisco.

[The examples of Milwaukee, Chicago, &c., have shown us that the large admixture of the German element in our rapidly growing Western States, may be regarded as a pledge of musical and artistic culture in those busy populations. We hail with pleasure therefore, the facts thus recorded in a recent number of the Alla California.]

There are about 5,000 Germans in San Francisco. They are of all classes, and from all parts of Germany: from the mountains of the Tyrol to the delta of the Weser, from the hills of Alsace to the sands of the Vistula. Many of them have long been away from their native land; some in the United States and others in Spanish America and in the isles of the South Pacific. A great many of the foreign merchants of Mexico, Chili, Peru, and in the provinces on the eastern coast of South America, are Germans. Germany has no foreign colonies, and yet there is not room for all her citizens at home. The Spaniards have a partiality for the Germans; in former times Spain and Germany were united under one emperor, the most powerful monarch of Europe, and the associations connected with the history of the Empire are agreeable. But probably the main cause of the preference of the Spanish for the Germans is that the latter possess no political power out of the continent of Europe, while the English, French and Americans are dangerous on account of their maritime power as well as of their grasping disposition.

Spanish America has been a kind of a paradise for adventurous young German merchants, that wished to sow their wild oats away from home. Many of them, scattered from Chili to Chihuahua, were attracted by the gold of California, and some of them are now among our wealthiest citizens. This residence in Spanish America accounts for the fluency and correctness with which many of them speak Spanish. The great majority of the Germans in California intend to make their permanent residence here. They are almost universally republicans: nearly all become citizens; they learn English readily, and they adopt American manners and customs more readily than any other Europeans from the continent. The Germans here are very different as a class from those in the Atlantic States: there nearly all are mechanics and laborers, and but few well educated, while here they are nearly all intelligent men. They have several associations to keep up the memory of the "Vaterland." Among these the Turn Verein, or Gymnastic Union, is the first. Ever since its formation it has been in high favor with the German people. It was started at a time when all popular gatherings were forbidden by those who feared the interchange of ideas among the people. Gymnastic exercises are part of the education of youth in Germany and are even held so high that an Academy is there called a Gymnasium. When all other assemblages were forbidden, those for gymnastic exercises were considered harmless and were permitted, but they soon became the schools of democratic principles which they have since so effectively propagated. The San Francisco Turn Verein is in a very flourishing condition. The Sänger-Bund, Singers' band, is another popular German association. The wealthier Germans, who desire to be exclusive, have a club. The Deutsches Club possesses a valuable though not an extensive library and has its rooms very finely furnished. The Germans of California have one newspaper, the Staats Zeitung or State Gazette for their organ. It is published every week day, is edited with spirit and has considerable circulation. It is democratic in politics. * * *

San Francisco has a German theatre, but it is yet only in its infancy. There is one German school in the city. The German population is very orderly and industrious. There is probably no class among the people which has fewer representatives, in proportion, as offenders before the courts than the Germans, and they have very few or no gamblers among their number. There are some occupations, which they nearly monopolize; thus the most of the dealers in cigars, musicians, and brewers in the city are Germans. The Union Band is composed entirely of Germans.

The Hippodrome.

[A New York correspondent of the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin, gives his impression of this so-called "re-vival of the Grecian games," as follows:]

If New York has a small Crystal Palace, she has a very large Circus—an illustration of the compensation principle which goes far to satisfy her people, whose taste for horse-flesh is far finer than that for Art and Industry. The Hippodrome is a vast affair, situated at the intersection of Fifth Avenue and 23d street. Outside it presents only the appearance of a low brick walled building, of great area, with a canvass roof. Inside, this area, which is about a quarter of a mile in circumference, and of oval shape, is surrounded with ranges of seats rising gradually from the ground, within which is the arena for the performances.

The only evening I was present the Hippodrome was uncomfortably empty. There could not have been more than fifteen hundred persons present, making two patches of people on each of the long sides of the oval, while the rest was entirely vacant or, at best, only dotted over with dollar paying visitors and dead-heads. Of course such an audience cannot pay, but the profits of the first few weeks were so large that a few losing houses can be endured until a new excitement can be got up to attract the multitude. The performances of the Hippodrome are rather elegant than amusing—they are too much so, indeed, to be permanently popular with a New York public. The tournament displays are quite showy, but there is no great exhibition of skill or strength, and the show of fine dressing, banners, chariots and horses soon grows wearisome. The acrobatic and other exploits in the centre of the arena are good, but it is like looking at feats of agility a half a square off, and has nothing of that satisfying impression derived from a performance close to you as in an ordinary Circus.

The great feature, and the only one that keeps up any spirit in the affair, is the racing, and the Hippodrome may be regarded as simply a respectably got-up race-course, for the accommodation of those whose consciences will not permit them to visit the regular bona fide affair at Union Park.—There are races of female equestrians, races of chariots, races of monkeys on ponies, and, last and most ridiculous of all, races of ostriches. As each set of racers rides slowly around the arena on first entering, nearly everybody selects his favorite, and before the starting point is reached, hundreds have made their bets. It is rather exciting to see the racing and hear the shouts of the spectators urging on their favorite riders, but unless one has a very decided penchant for the turf, the affair soon grows wearisome.

I imagine that this racing is the only thing that keeps up the Hippodrome. Certainly the other performances are tame and spiritless compared to the scenes of the old-fashioned circus. The distances are so great as to make a powerful glass necessary for most of the exploits, and it is the pursuit of pleasure under difficulties to have to look through a lorgnette for it during an hour or two. Then there is no clown, and we miss the merry cry of Mr. Merryman—"Here we are, Sir!" as well as his shockingly worn-out jokes at his master's expense during the evening. An old-fashioned "ring," with good riders and tumblers and a good clown, and all right under your eye, is a far more satisfactory place of amusement than the New York Hippodrome.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Strictures upon the Stage,

AS IT EXISTS IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

II. SCENE PAINTING.

Scene painting has been lately admitted in England to be one of the Fine Arts, and no less an artist than Stansfield has directed his attention to it. Moving dioramas for the theatres, and scenery (so called) executed by him, were (as specimens of scene painting, exhibited at the back of the stage,) splendid works of the kind. But the true dignity of the painter's art, as connected with dramatic representations, appears to me not to be understood in England or in America. If it were understood he would exert a very different influence; he would not consider that to produce scenery was his only office; but the great dramas would come under his study as if he had to illustrate them in a pictorial work; their grand and important scenes would for the chief part be the realization of his conception (I mean as to the distribution and arrangement of the stage). He would be seen in front of the proscenium an important member of the stage managerial corps, and with his correct eye, and his picturesque imagination, correcting all harsh lines, harmonizing colors, heightening effects of contrast, and giving to the foreground the same light and shadow, the same chiaroscuro, that with a weaker motive and a lesser inspiration he imparts to the tame and speechless back-ground. But to obtain this light and shade, this chiaroscuro (a thing of the utmost importance and for the most part entirely novel to the stage, and which I will explain more particularly hereafter) the unnatural dispersed light, under the present mode of lighting the stage, would require to be altered.

Here is an addition to the office of stage manager! Here's work, my masters! Here's consternation among the actors! That crown wont do—that gold is too glittering. To the right and the left he sends red stockings and yellow stockings. Here he is suppressing color and bringing all into tone; here he adds a white feather, or a little red feather; here he throws a piece of armor upon the ground; here he calls up a piece of drapery. Here a daïs, there a column. And thus things of apparently such little importance, as to be now subject to the caprice of a common carpenter or property maker, might receive the attention and surveillance of the greatest of living painters.

What we should gain by this arrangement the master genius of the painter alone could inform us, from whom we have all to hope and to expect; but it will convey to us some idea to contemplate, with the assistance of the author of "Modern Painters," some dramatic effects which have been the singular production of the Painter's genius. The following refers to the treatment of the Masacre of the Innocents by Tintoret:—

"The artist here does not depend on details of murder or ghastliness of death; there is no blood, no stabbing or cutting, but there is an awful substitute for these in the Chiaroscuro. The scene is the outer vestibule of a palace; the slippery marble floor is fearfully barred across by sanguine shadows, so that our eyes seem to become bloodshot and stained with strange horror and deadly vision: a lake of life before them, like the burning sun of the doomed Moabite on the water that came by the way of Edom; a huge flight of stairs, without parapet, descends on the left; down this rush a crowd of women mixed with the murderers; the child in the arms of one has been seized by the limbs, she hurls herself over the edge, and falls head downmost, dragging the child out of the grasp by her weight;—she will be dashed dead in a second: two others are farther in flight, they reach the edge of a deep river,—the water is beat into a hollow by the force of their plunge; close to us is the great struggle, a heap of mothers entangled in one mortal writhing with each other and the swords, one of the murderers dashed down and crushed beneath them, the sword of another caught by the blade and dragged at by a woman's paked hand; the youngest and fairest of the women, the child just torn away from a death grasp, and clasped to her breast with the grip of a steel vice, falls backward helplessly over the heap, right on the sword points: all knit together and hurled down in one hopeless, frenzied, furious abandonment of body and soul in the effort to save. Their shrieks ring in our ears till the marble seems rending around us; but far back at the bottom of the stairs, there is something in the shadow like a heap of clothes. It is a woman sitting quiet—quite quiet—still as any stone, she looks down steadfastly on her dead child, laid along on the floor before her, and her hand is pressed softly upon her brow."

The same writer says:—

"I should exhaust the patience of the reader, if I were to dwell at length on the various stupendous developments of the imagination of Tintoret in the Scuola di san Rocco alone. I would fain join in that solemn pause of the journey into Egypt, when the silver boughs of the shadowy trees lace with their tremulous lines the alternate folds of fair clouds flushed by faint crimson light, and lie across the streams of blue between those rosy islands, like the white wakes of wandering ships; or watch beside the sleep of the disciples among those massy leaves, that lie so heavily on the dead of the night, beneath the descent of the angel of the agony, and toss fearfully above the motion of the torches as the troop of the betrayer emerges out of the hollow of the olives; or wait through the hour of accusing beside the judgment seat of Pilate, when all is unseen, unfelt, except the one figure that stands with its head bowed down, pale like a pillar of moonlight, half bathed in the glory of the Godhead, half wrapt in the whiteness of the shroud."

When, upon the stage, do we get any such attempts at ideality as this?

Let any one remember the 'Belshazzar's Feast,' the attitude of Belshazzar,—the architecture, the grouping, the chiaroscuro—and suppose only a faint realization of such in the banquet scene in Macbeth.

But how much, we feel, has yet to be learned in this department of the stage, when we contemplate the radical mistake which has been made from the first in scene painting. And that mistake is, the constituting the farthest wings the frame of the painting; thus placing the frame of the picture at the back of the stage. Now if we look at these things correctly, the proscenium is the frame of the picture and the front of the stage the foreground. We cannot travel to the back of the stage for the foreground of the scene, when the action of the scene is going on in front. Is not this child's play! Surely the principle I have here laid down displays the only correct method of building stage scenery. I see many improvements that could be made in the machinery of the stage for the accommodation of the painter in working out his perspective; and if it were necessary I could show that it would be perfectly practicable to make the stage represent a mountain summit.

But I will not take up the time of my readers with any further remarks at present on scene painting, but—with these hints—I leave it in the hands of those who understand this subject better than I do, that they may tell us what might and ought to be done.

It is evident that it has hitherto been trifled with, and no attempt made at conveying the idea of truth. And truly it is enough to make us blush to think of a few of the absurdities we have seen in this way. What pretty "foot-pieces" we have seen running across the stage as a partition to divide off the river from the "boards." The one, for instance, behind which the boat is pushed on in the "Miller and his Men," or that with Albert and Willibald in "The Bottle Imp." The same absurdities occur in Shakspearian representations also. Still more money is expended upon a scene of fountains and terraces, in one of their trumpery ballets at the Queen's Italian Opera House, than would give truth at least to twenty Shakspearian scenes. But let us once get scenes of truth and connected with actions of thought, and such senseless exhibitions will soon appear "stale, flat and unprofitable." The public will miss the idea and crave for it; and will not be content with the impossible and the improbable, however gorgeously it may be colored or however prettily it may be tricked off, for as soon as taste becomes cultivated into a knowledge and perception of Nature and Truth, it will never receive — "these tenders for true pay,

Which are not sterling." *

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 2, 1853.

Fourth Jubilee of the German Singing Clubs.

Decidedly the musical event of our midsummer season is the annual gathering, from all the Eastern States, of the numerous circles of male part-singers, which are kept up so enthusiastically among the Germans, as a beautiful reminiscence of the Fatherland. Last year the four days' festival was held in New York. This year it came off with more than usual spirit and preparation in Philadelphia. We hope the time is not far distant when our Northeastern metropolis may in its turn become the focus of all this fine popular enthusiasm for Art and Freedom. If we are north of the centre of the young Germany of the Atlantic States, yet railroads bring us within hailing distance; and a New England atmosphere would but transpose the music into a new and interesting key for the time being. The worst is, Boston is a small state in the musico-German confederacy as yet, having, we believe, but one solitary Liederkrantz, while Philadelphia, and New York, and its smaller neighbors, each are represented by a dozen clubs. We trust the spirit of these annual gatherings will find sympathetic nerves in the German population (small only by comparison) of Boston and vicinity, and start into life a goodly crop of Männerchöre.

But to us Americans this spectacle is interesting in another aspect. At first we look on simply as upon a charming national custom which our German neighbors have brought over with them. It is characteristic and imposing, and we enjoy it as an importation of that genial, happy, social and artistic life, which has seemed so ideal as we read about it, and which it is so pleasant to have brought under our own immediate observation. Its nationality gives it a pleasant piquancy, viewed as a spectacle outside of us, and cannot be in the least objectionable, since its animating spirit is essentially in harmony with the free spirit of our own institutions. It even benefits us by the example of popular mass-gatherings so brimming with the sentiment of liberty, and yet kept so orderly, harmonious and peaceful by a certain practically religious worship of Art with Liberty, which it is refreshing and encouraging to witness.

But the interesting question about it is: Why may not we, who are not Germans, borrow this excellent practice and incorporate it into our American life. If the music-loving Germans must seek out a republic for the free continuance of their musical existence, so on the other hand must a widespread, imperial democracy like this seek pledges of good order, concord and refinement in an all-pervading and inspiring influence of Art. The needed element comes providentially, with the tide of immigration, in the persons of these hearty, generous, art-loving Teutonic cousins of our Anglo-Saxon blood. As they assimilate to us politically, let us assimilate to them in the warm, rhythmic social culture, of which as a people they are the most quickening example. Glee-singing, which is only technically distinct from the German "part-singing," is a growing passion with our young men. A large proportion of our so-called "Glees" are adaptations from the German part-songs; and German music takes every day a deeper hold upon American sympathies and tastes than any other music. We would not have the charm of separate nationality in these German festivals dissolved; but we should be pleased to see Americans and Germans, (in this great land of blended nationalities, where all peoples are combined to make one good liberal and universal people), mingling together and making common cause in this great work of developing a popular musical sentiment. Why may not singing clubs be organized, American, with Germans in them, (for they are our teachers and examples in this sphere of Art) and be affiliated over the country, and hold annual festivals at midsummer at different points in turn? We cannot but think it in the very tendency of things that this shall naturally and gradually come about. We read that in the Philadelphia festival, this week, a club of native Philadelphians took their turn in singing with the German Club, and did not sniffer in the comparison.

We had hoped to receive ere this an express report of the Philadelphia festival; in the want of which, we must glean what account we can from the local papers. It commenced on the 25th and lasted till the 29th. The Philadelphia Germans had made the most extensive preparations, and societies were present from all the cities from Richmond to Boston, numbering some 800 voices. That is, we understand, besides the local clubs. The guests arrived on Saturday evening and by torch-light were escorted to the front of the Custom House, where the Welcome Song was sung; thence by an extended route to the Chinese Museum, where addresses were interchanged, succeeded by a collation. For Sunday there was no programme, but it was left to the tastes of the different societies or individuals.

On Monday the Jubilee proper commenced with rehearsals for the grand concert; after which a grand procession to old Independence Hall, where the Mayor welcomed the guests to the city. In the evening the grand concert took place in the upper saloon of the Chinese Museum, before an audience of several thousand persons. We let the Bulletin describe the scene.

The hall was tastefully decorated with flags of different nations, wreaths and festoons of evergreens, and all around the galleries the names of the great composers of Germany, with a few of France and Italy, were displayed in bold letters. The stage occupied the entire Eastern end of the hall, sloping up from the floor to a line above the galleries. In front of it were placed the orchestra. Vast as was the stage, it was not large enough to accommodate all the singers at once; but there appeared to be generally about five hundred on it at a time.

The programme seems to have been rather second-rate for one so purely German, and yet for the most part new (to us) and far from uninteresting. It opened with Reissiger's pretty Overture to Felsenmühle, well played by an orchestra of fifty. Then followed Mendelssohn's "Ode to Artists," founded, we believe, on Schiller's noble poem, An die Künstler, written for the Belgian festival in 1846, where Mendelssohn conducted; we believe, too, that it does not rank among his finest works. This was sung by the whole chorus, with wind instruments.

To this succeeded a buffo song of Kücken's, "Blue Monday," sung cleverly by the Williamsburgh Männerchor; "The Woodland," very well given by the Eintracht Glee Club of Newark, and a Rhenish Drinking Song by Kücken, graceful and joyous, and so well sung by the Wilmington "Sänger-bund," that it received an enthusiastic encore.

The first part of the programme concluded with a grand chorus by Zöllner, in religious style, full of beauty and sung with great effect by the vast chorus, which, in this piece, seemed to be quite at home and at ease.

The second part opened with a descriptive song by Fischer, representing a Calm at Sea and a Prosperous Voyage. It was the best song of all the full choruses, and to those who were in a position—hard to find in this hall—where the music could be well heard, the effect of such a body of voices, all harmonizing well and observing the lights and shades of sound required by the composition, was truly magnificent. This was encored also. After it came a jolly chorus by Zöllner, representing a contest between wine and water drinkers—sung with much spirit and entire correctness by the Baltimore singers, and also redemanded. The Philadelphia Glee Association, consisting of about twenty young men of this city, all Americans, then sang a Turkish Drinking Song, with English words, and the music by Mendelssohn. They have good voices and are well balanced in the several parts. Their performance was capital—quite equal to the best of the Germans, and the latter partook largely of the enthusiasm excited by the unexpected excellence of a company of native singers. The piece they sung was one more readily appreciated than most of Mendelssohn's, but abounding in nice harmonies, requiring great readiness and quickness of ear. We hope for other opportunities of hearing this excellent society. The New York singers, numbering a couple of hundred, next sang Schmalholz's Prayer before Battle. The whole grand chorus then sang a piece by Abt, one of the most tender and graceful of German modern composers, and the concert closed with Greger's Hymn to Gladness.

The evening was one to be remembered, not only for the novelty of hearing so large a body of singers together, but for the genuine beauty of the performance.

We have seen no account of Tuesday's performances, but the day was to be spent im Freien, in the open air, at a pleasant spot outside of Philadelphia, called Lemon Hill; and the plan of the campaign was in this wise: at 8 o'clock in the morning, a procession, with flags and insignia, and several military bands, out to the hill aforesaid; then a repetition, in full chorus, of the Mendelssohn-Schiller Ode aforesaid; then an oration, followed by an out-door concert by the societies from abroad; then dinner, military music, and amusements of all kinds; a procession back to head-quarters in the city, a deliberation by delegates on the place and manner of the Fifth General Music Jubilee, sleep, and a scattering for home next morning. Again we venture to express the hope that Boston will ere long have a large Sänger-Bund enough to bear its turn of hospitality to all the others.

Cologne Union of Men Voices.

The season of the annual congress of the German Song Unions in our own country lends interest to the following account, from a London paper, of the first appearance in England of a model society of this kind from the Fatherland. We omit what is said of the origin of these societies, having given substantially the same account in a number of this journal a year since.

A very crowded audience filled the Hanover-square Rooms on Tuesday morning, at the first of a series of six concerts, to be given by the Kölner Männer Gesang-Verein, one of the most renowned of the choral societies of Germany. The result was a musical treat of the highest order. No performance of the kind of equal merit has ever before been heard in London—that of the Berlin choir not excepted. * * * *

The Cologne Union of male vocalists was instituted in 1842, under the superintendence of Herr Franz Weber, who has been appointed director for life. Its members are all amateurs; and the sole object of the society is the promotion of a taste for German song, which, it is believed, must also exercise a beneficial influence on the moral elevation of the people. The proceeds of their public performances are devoted to "useful, patriotic, and charitable purposes;" and the motto they have adopted, "Durch das Schöne stets das Gute" ("Let the good be always attained by the beautiful"), suggests the policy upon which they act. In the great contests at the vocal festivals in Belgium the Cologne Union has carried off all the prizes. The German-Flemish Vocal Festival, the largest ever held on the continent, was instituted by its members, and its first celebration (in 1846) was rendered memorable by the presence of Mendelssohn, who, besides being the principal conductor, composed a new work expressly for the occasion. The society numbers, in all, 172 members, of whom 80 of the principals comprised the force which on Tuesday filled the orchestra of the Hanover-square rooms. The performance of these gentlemen may, without the slightest hesitation, be characterised as perfect. For truth of intonation, decision of accent, harmony of ensemble, ready command of all the gradations of force—from the strongest forte to the most delicate piano, rather breathed than sung—we have heard nothing to equal them in any body of choristers. But these desirable mechanical requisites are made the more valuable from the excellent use to which they are put. The experience and ability of Herr Franz Weber, the conductor, are incontestable. He has an authority over his vocal orchestra that admits of no denial. The slightest motion of his baton changes a fortissimo into a pianissimo, as if by magic; and his beat is so clear and prompt that not a note is ever sustained by any single voice a second longer than he intends. Execution, so sure and satisfactory, so unerringly correct, and so scrupulous in the observance of details, has alone an indefinable charm; but when to this are added all the varieties of expression, applied with unflinching ease and propriety, as in the present instance, the charm is doubled. The "Gruss an England," a cantata, with appropriate words by M. Klingemann, set to music for the occasion by the Chevalier Neukomm, at once made the audience aware of the great excellences of the choir. These, however, were more variously and happily developed in the pieces from their repertoire. In the Abendlied (Evening Song) of Otto, and in subsequent morceaux (which, it must be observed, derived their chief interest from the execution), the exquisite pianissimo, and the singular and unprecedented management of the crescendos, quite enraptured the audience. A chorus, with quartet of single voices, outside the room—Doppelständchen (double serenade), by A. Zöllner, though of slight value as music, produced an effect so entirely original, that it was unanimously re-demanded. A similar compliment was paid to Kücken's "Normann's Song," a stirring and animated chorus, which brought out the power and volume of the whole body of voices, in fortissimo passages, with astounding effect. There are some very striking points in this chorus, especially one on the words, "Freiheit oder Tod" ("Freedom or Death"), which is frequently repeated, and always with increasing force and majesty. A good example, in another style, was the "Tralerliedchen" of Ferdinand Ries—a spring-song of irresistible vivacity. Best of all, however, was the "Wasserfahrt" (Water Journey) of Heine, set to music by Mendelssohn, a chorus of peculiar loveliness, melancholy in tone, but, as a musical composition, worth all the rest of the programme put together. This was sung in an irreproachable manner, and left a deep impression. The national anthem, "God Save the Queen," was extremely well executed, although transposed a third above the original key.

Mademoiselle Claus's highly-finished and poetical reading of three of Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte (the Adagio in F, the Volkslied, and the Presto in C), and her brilliant execution of Weber's Invitation à la Valse, formed a grateful relief to the choral performances, and were warmly applauded.

To the above we add the opinion of the distinguished critic of the Athenæum, of June 11. No man is better qualified to judge of the German part-singers, than the author of "Music and Manners in Germany," of which we are happy to hear that an enlarged edition is in press.

The musical event of the week has been, the appearance of Der Kölner Männer Gesang Verein, which is represented by eighty gentlemen belonging to the famous singing society of the city of the Three Kings. * * Herr Franz Weber is a consummate director. If we mistake not, it is under his presidency that the best orchestral Mass in Europe—the one, we mean, in the Cathedral of Cologne—is performed. The vigor, clearness, and consent of these Rhineland singers—the grand and piercing body of sound which they give forth—their perfect command over every gradation of tone—produce a specific and strong effect on the nerves analogous to that called out by the music of wind instruments, which is among the strongest of sensual excitements. When the shock is recovered from (to a shock it amounts) the listener becomes aware of some interesting peculiarities. Supposing him conversant with the voices of other countries, he will remark, on comparison, a certain throaty and hard quality among the German tenors:—singing as they do in a high chest-register, which distinguishes the leading voices of their male quartets from the nasal ful-setto of France—the more fluent tone of Donzelli's Rubini's and Mario's countrymen—or the lower-pitched diapason of our English tenors. Generally speaking, the quality just noted seems incompatible with that melting or blending of voices which forms the greatest charm of part-singing:—but no crude insulation of the upper notes is to be complained of in this Cologne vocal quartet,—which, on the contrary, for a body of sound so forcible and ready, is singularly ripe and mellow. Farther, an elasticity and a sonority, no less precious, are to be commended in its piano and mezzo-forte passages.

Beethoven's Adagios—The "Moon-Light" Sonata—Liszt.

[We translate the following from the Voyage Musical en Allemagne et en Italie of HECTOR BERLIOZ, Paris, 1844.]

Beethoven's astonishing faculty of being always new without departing from the true and beautiful, is conceivable to a certain point in pieces of a lively movement. There the thought, aided by the powers of rhythm, can in its capricious bounds leap from the beaten paths more easily. But where we cease to comprehend it, is in the Adagios, in those extra-human meditations into which the pantheistic genius of Beethoven is so fond of plunging. Here we have no more passions; no more terrestrial pictures; no more hymns to joy, to love, to glory; no more strains of childhood, sweet conversations, biting or humorous sallies; no more of those terrible bursts of fury, of those accents of hatred which the spasms of a secret suffering so often wrench from him; he has even no more contempt in his heart; he is no longer of our race; he has forgotten it, he has departed from our atmosphere. Calm and solitary, he swims in the clear Ether; like those eagles of the Andes sailing at altitudes below which other creatures only meet asphyxia and death, his eyes plunge into space, he flies from sun to sun, chanting the infinity of Nature. Can one believe that the genius of this man could take such a flight, however much he wished it!

Of this one may convince himself, by numerous proofs which he has left us, less even in his symphonies than in his piano-forte compositions. There, and only there, having no longer in view a numerous audience,—no crowd, no public,—he seems to have written for himself, with that majestic abandon which the crowd comprehends not, and which must inevitably be spoiled by the necessity of promptly arriving at what we call effect. There too the task of the executant becomes a crushing one, if not by the mechanical difficulties, at least by the profound sentiment, by the large intelligence which such works exact of him; it is absolutely essential that the virtuoso should make himself invisible before the composer, just as the orchestra must in the symphonies; there must be a complete absorption of the one in the other. But it is precisely in this identifying of himself with the thought which he transmits to us, that the interpreter grows to the full height of his model.

There is a work of Beethoven, known by the name of the Sonata in C sharp minor, the Adagio of which is one of those poesies which human language knows not how to designate. Its means of action are very simple; the left hand softly lays out large chords of a sad and solemn character, and of such length as to allow the vibrations of the piano gradually to die away upon each one; above this, the lower fingers of the right hand keep up an obstinate arpeggio accompaniment, of which the form never varies from the first measure to the last; while the other fingers render audible a sort of lamentation, the melodic efflorescence of this sombre harmony.

One day, some seven or eight years ago, Liszt, in executing this Adagio before a little circle of which I made one, took it into his head to alter and denaturalize it, after the manner usually adopted then to win the applause of the fashionable public: instead of holding out those long notes in the bass, instead of the severe uniformity of rhythm and of movement just alluded to, he introduced trills and tremolos, he hurried and retarded the measure, disturbing thus by passionate accents the calmness of this sadness, and making thunders groan in this cloudless sky, which should be only sombered by the sun's departure. . . . I must confess, I suffered cruelly, more even than I ever suffered hearing our unfortunate cantatrici embroider the grand monologue in Freyschütz; for, to this torture was added the chagrin of seeing such an artist indulge in a trick that ordinarily belongs only to mediocrity. But what was to be done about it? Liszt was then like a child who, without complaining, picks himself up from a fall which we pretend not to perceive, and who would cry were you to offer him your hand. He has risen up proudly: for several years past especially it is no longer he who pursues success, but success which is out of breath in following him; the rôles are exchanged. Let us return to our Sonata.

Recently one of those men of heart and soul, whom artists are so happy to encounter, had assembled a few friends; I was of the number. Liszt arrived in the evening, and,—finding a discussion going on about the value of a piece of Weber's, to which the public, whether because it was poorly executed, or from some other reason, had in a recent concert given but a cold reception,—seated himself at the piano to answer in his manner to the antagonists of Weber. The argument appeared unanswerable, and all were obliged to confess that a work of genius had been misappreciated. Just as he had finished, the lamp which lighted the apartment appeared on the point of going out: one of the company went to revive it.

—Do no such thing, said I; if he will play the Adagio of Beethoven in C sharp minor, this twilight will not be amiss.

—With all my heart, said Liszt; but extinguish the light entirely, cover up the fire, let the darkness be complete.

Then, in the midst of those deep shades, after a moment for collecting our thoughts, the noble elegy, the same which he had formerly so strangely disfigured, rose in its sublime simplicity; not a note, not an accent were added to the notes and accents of the author. It was the shade of Beethoven, evoked by the virtuoso, whose grand voice we were hearing. Each of us shuddered in silence, and after the last chord we were silent still we wept.

A very considerable portion of the French public are yet ignorant of the existence of these marvellous works. Surely the entire Trio in B flat, the Adagio of that in D, and the Sonata in A with violin, should be enough to prove, to those who know them, that the illustrious composer was far from having expended all the treasures of his genius upon the orchestra. But his last word is not there; it is in the sonatas for the piano alone that we must seek it. The time perhaps will soon come when these works, which leave behind them all that there is most advanced in Art, will be comprehended, if not by the crowd, at least by a select public. It is an experiment to be tried; if it do not succeed, it must be tried hereafter. The grand sonatas of Beethoven will serve for a metrical scale to measure the development of our musical intelligence.

MUSIC ON THE COMMON. The early hours have been wisely changed, so that now we have music, both on Wednesday and Saturday evenings, from 7 until 10 o'clock. The experiment has been quite successful, so far as the large and cheerful gathering and good order of the people are concerned. But on a windy night, like last Saturday, the band being perched upon a hill, the sounds are blown away above the heads of the crowd. It would be better always, and certainly when there is wind, that the band be stationed in a hollow, and the audience occupy the surrounding slopes. The "Germania Serenade Band" have not yet taken their turn; when they do, we may hope for a mitigation of the eternal din-asty of brass. We are glad to see the Traveler copying and endorsing our correspondent's appeal on this subject.

IN THE SUBURBS. The love for out-door music has become contagious all about Boston,—a very wholesome influence for the city to send back to the green hills of Roxbury and Brookline in exchange for airs freighted with rose and honeysuckle odors. Nor will we return them altogether brass airs. Our Brookline friends have engaged the Serenade Band to play for them, as newly organized for such purposes, with fourteen instruments, half reeds, half brass. This is a good beginning of reform.

It is pleasant to meet the familiar faces of the "Germanians" again in Boston, ere they take up their dog-day quarters at Newport. Mr. Bergmann, we are sorry to hear, is obliged to recruit his exhausted strength at a Water Cure, that he may be sound and bright for our autumn season of concerts. They can get along without him in the Newport polkas.

Mr. Otto Dresel has gone to Newport for the rest of the summer. We fancy choice feasts of Mendelssohn and Chopin there sometimes, in spite of the Polkas.

New York.

"In musical matters," says a letter writer to a Philadelphia paper, "there is an absolute calm, nobody is either playing or singing, and New York is full of 'artists' out of employment, and many of them out at elbows. They may be seen and heard, chattering Italian or French, at the bar-rooms, the cheap restaurants, and

DWIGHT'S Journal of Music.

A Paper of Art and Literature.

VOL. III.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 9, 1853.

NO. 14.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

TERMS....TWO DOLLARS PER ANNUM, (IN ADVANCE.)

CITY Subscribers can be served at their houses by the further payment of fifty cents per annum.

☞ For Rates of Advertising, see last page.

POSTAGE, if paid in advance, for any distance within the State, thirteen cents a year; if not in advance, twenty-six cents. To all places beyond the State, double these rates.

J. S. DWIGHT,.....EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

☞ OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St.

By REDDING & CO., 8 State St.

" GEO. P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row.

" A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.

" DEXTER & BROTHERS, 43 Ann Street, N. Y.

" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 722 Broadway, N. Y.

" MASON BROTHERS, 23 Park Row, New York.

" GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.

" G. ANDRE, 229 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

" MILLER & BEACHAM, 151 Baltimore St., Balt.

" COLBURN & FIELD, Cincinnati, O.

" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Persons willing to become Agents for procuring subscribers, especially Music-Dealers and Teachers, are invited to correspond with the Editor, as above. Satisfactory references required, and liberal commissions allowed.

☞ Back numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Also bound copies of Vols. I. and II. at prices varying from $2.50 to $3.50.

Translated for this Journal.

Of the Different Effect of Music on the Cultivated and the Uncultivated.

From the German of F. ROCHLITZ.

Before inquiring why it is that Music acts so powerfully upon one and so feebly upon another (comparatively speaking); or why our artistic Music scarcely affects the uncultivated classes at all, while theirs affects us disagreeably, it were well to settle these questions, namely:

Is it really Music, which so operates upon the uncultivated?

And, where it is so, does it operate on the uncultivated as Music?

On one point we are all agreed: At the foundation of what we call the Fine Arts lies the universal element in human nature, which we call the poetic sense, the poetic feeling, or in short Poesy, in the broadest sense of the word. On this too we are agreed, I think: All these Arts, as they exist among more or less cultivated peoples, who possess a history, have grown to be these Arts by a process of composition out of certain primitive Arts, which probably were not distinct from actual life, or whose origin was prior to all history. Thus Poetry (in the strictest sense) we know only as a compound of the art of fable or invention and the art of speech; and so too Music, as the compound of the art of rhythm and the tone art properly so called. The latter again resolves itself into the arts of Melody and Harmony: but it takes both these, united with the first, and presupposing that universal poetic sentiment aforesaid, to make up Music. Now savage tribes, and wholly uncultivated men among us, have properly no tone art and no sense therefor, but only a sense of rhythm. What sounds before their ears, is not perceived by them as tones; it only rings and makes a noise; to them it only exists as a condition of the perception of the rhythmical. Such secondary questions, then, as: Why our music does not affect them at all, and why theirs affects us disagreeably? have ceased to be questions any longer. They have no music and no sense for it. What operates on them is something wholly different, if not in itself, at least to them; although it may be something included among the elements of Music.

These questions put aside, another forces itself upon us: Why does mere Rhythm work so powerfully upon rude nations, or uncultivated persons? I answer: For precisely the same reason that it works upon animals, nay, or upon us cultivated mortals,—for, if it affects us less, it certainly affects us not a little. We can remark it every day: not only elephants and camels, but even we ourselves step more lively and buoyantly, when we step to regular measure; and this is easier for us, when this measure is uniformly and distinctly given us from without. Motion interests all that move; and only by the measure or definite limitation of motion does it become perceptible to us at all,—just as only by figure, limiting space, can we appreciate space; and perhaps we have no need to be reminded of that spirit of order and uniformity, which pervades all Nature, and which expresses itself here likewise. We obey the dictate involuntarily, mechanically. "Yes," you say, "but not so violently; we are not so furiously borne away by it!"—I admit it. And why not?

The reasons of that very violent effect of rhythms, which we see in rude people, lie, as it seems to me, neither in the rhythms, nor in the nature of man, but in accidental, outward circumstances. The North American savage burns and shouts, when his drum rattles in strongly marked rhythms, or his pipe twitters with a measured sound: both to him are sounds of war. The ease of the Scotch mountainer is still more interesting. He has two ways of bringing out the drone of his favorite bagpipe: now strong, over-blown, snarling, in march-like, sharply marked rhythms: whereupon he, the brave man, proud of his nationality, living in continual remembrance of his fathers' deeds, is kindled to his most peculiar and glorious self-consciousness. Therefore, and surely not by reason of the rhythm of the snarling bagpipe in itself, he burns and shouts; and the songs commonly connected with it bring those objects of his love still more distinctly before his imagination. But now the dear pipes sound softer, though still in sharply marked and uniform, only not so heavy rhythm: and now is he, the man of heart, the constant one, reminded of the joys of his cottage and the objects of his tenderness; he yearns, he complains; and again not because of the rhythmic droning, but because of the recollections into which it transports him, and which the national songs connected with these melodies excite all the more distinctly and vividly.

Would you note the fact more closely, then observe the construction and effect of certain dances on the people, in the least musically cultivated provinces of Germany: for instance, the genuine Swabian, Tyrolese, or Steyermark dances; or the construction and effect of very ordinary marches: and you will see substantially the same thing. Real music works upon the people by no means so powerfully; even here (in Germany) one is often forced to say, the people have no music, and, what is more, no sense for what little melody and harmony they have; (indeed they find it far more splendid and effective, if, for instance, the man with the bass viol only turns it over and, instead of drawing his bow over the strings in a given rhythm, drums to the same rhythm on the belly of the instrument.) It is only the rhythm that operates upon them; and where the effect is accompanied with peculiarly violent demonstrations, it is owing to other suggestions, not at all pertaining to the music, which are commonly associated with swift dances or with warlike marches.

But now to the main point. * * * Why does our music, in which to rhythm is added, instead of these accessories, the collective art of Tones (viz. Melody and Harmony), associated also for the most part with the peculiar art of the Poet (in vocal music):—why does it work upon us with so much less energy and violence, than that empty rhythm does upon the uncultivated?

This question I will answer by another. Ought we, when the question is of any Art, in the nobler sense of the word, where sense, mind and heart are supposed to be all and equally engaged, and where the Beautiful is to be represented;—ought we, I say, to expect or to desire intense and violent effects, or to seek to produce such, even were it possible to do it? Is it not rather the mission and the praise of Art, to mitigate all that is violent in and about man, to subdue the passionate, to put away the rude? And are not possibly those longings and appeals and complaints, which we often hear from learned philologists or historians (mourning over the alleged wonderful effects of ancient music, to which we have no counterpart in our experience),—are they not uttered and repeated without a precise understanding of what it is that they would have?

A something less violent, less furiously transporting, resides in the very essence of Art, and is one of its chiefest excellencies. It resides too in the very essence of human culture, and is one of man's chiefest excellencies. The cultivated man ought not to be entirely carried away; nor will he be, if he is truly cultivated: and this, were it only for physical and self-evident reasons; but far more so for reasons that are spiritual and moral.

What, after all, is Culture? Surely it extends not merely to social relations and customs; not merely to knowledge and opinion. What is it and what is it worth, if it do not decidedly affect our will and moral powers, and thus control somewhat our internal and external effort and performance? We all know and confess, that moderation in all things is both the first fruit and first sign of true culture. Moderation it is impossible to maintain, where only the sensual nature is excited: but it becomes not only possible, but the easiest of all things, where all parts of our nature are alike appealed to, alike stimulated and employed, to keep them all in balance. I need not repeat where this happens. And if it happens now, if at least the disposition for it is actually realized at this present time—if by repeated exercise the faculty therefor is increased and its efficacy facilitated, shall we complain that it happens and find fault with the means by which it happens? Shall we deery as weakness what we regard elsewhere as the crowning flower of strength?

But how easily one gets to expatiating on what is self-evident, when a subject which one has at heart is started! Let me only say: The fact that we are affected so much less violently by our music, than the uncultivated are by simple rhythm, is a fact which pertains in the first instance to ourselves, but as one of our distinctions; and in the next place to the music, as Art, and also as one of its distinctions. But while we confess that our music does not act upon us so violently, so passionately, we by no means admit that it cannot and does not operate powerfully, grandly and to a grand result. (Of course, the right music, in the right time and place!) I will not again lose myself in generalities; but look, my friend, at King Frederic the Second of Prussia, for example—such a man as he was—after the Peace of Hubertsburg, shut up in his garrison-church, sitting all alone, listening to Graun's Te Deum laudamus, at the words: Salvum fac populum, completely dropping his bent head and folding his hands. . . . Is this perhaps, in such a character, only a fleeting touch of tenderness, and not of lasting consequence to thousands? Look at George the First of England, immediately after hearing Handel's Te Deum laudamus at the celebration of the Peace of Utrecht; see him go trembling into his cabinet and sign (what the evening before he had hesitated to do) the general amnesty in behalf of the many who were compromised in the concluded strife. . . . See George the Third, in Westminster Abbey, when the "Messiah" was performed at the commemoration of Handel: during the "Hallelujah," at the words: "And He shall reign forever and ever, king of kings, and lord of lords," he falls upon his knees, and all the thousands of the congregation with him, and all bend in reverence before their God, until the last tone of that imperishable song of praise has died away. . . . Look at these things and tell me: Are not these effects, mighty and grand, and to a grand end? Of a different kind, to be sure, from those effects wherein our music is reproached with being weak; but God be praised, that they are different!

I am far from denying that many, otherwise important, works of our present music are far less efficacious than they should be; because they have not adhered firmly to the central point of every Fine Art, where it appeals to and employs alike all the faculties of the inner man. On the contrary their appeal is paramount now to the understanding, through their intricate artificiality of structure; now to the senses, through their tumultuous noise or their unnerving tenderness; and now to the imagination, through their bold adventurousness and strange surprises. But what then? These are merely specialties and soon pass over; and indeed what they leave behind them, must, like every one-sidedness, so it be only clever and have life in it, even though it have a disturbing tendency for the time being, contribute far more to the advantage than to the injury of the whole.

Life of Farinelli.

This renowned singer, whose voice and abilities surpassed the limits of all anterior vocal excellence, was born at Naples in 1705. He was instructed in the rudiments of music by his father, and in singing by Porpora. In 1722, at the age of seventeen, he went from Naples to Rome, with his master, then engaged to compose for the Alberti theatre, where Farinelli contended with a famous performer on the trumpet. Every night, during the run of an opera, this struggle was repeated, which, at first seemed amicable and sportive, until the audience began to interest themselves in the contest. After severally swelling out a note, in which each manifested the power of his lungs, and tried to rival the other in brilliancy and force, they had both a swell and a shake together, by thirds, which was continued so long, while the audience eagerly waited the event, that both seemed to be exhausted; and, in fact, the trumpeter, wholly spent, gave it up, supposing, however, his antagonist as much tired as himself, and that it would be a drawn battle; when Farinelli, with a smile on his countenance, showing he had only been sporting with him all this time, broke out, all at once, in the same breath, with fresh vigor, and not only swelled and shook upon the note, but ran the most rapid and difficult divisions, and was at last silenced only by the acclamations of the enraptured audience.

From this period of his life may be dated that superiority which he ever maintained over all his contemporaries. In the early part of his life, he was distinguished by the name of "Il Ragazzo," (the boy), as Homer was called "the Poet," and Swift "the Dean."

From Rome, Farinelli went to Bologna, where he had the advantage of hearing Bernacchi, a scholar of the famous Pistocchi, of that city, who was then the most scientific singer in Italy. Thence he went to Venice, and from Venice to Vienna; in both which cities his powers were considered as miraculous. Farinelli himself told Dr. Burney, that, at Vienna, where he received great honors from the emperor Charles VI., (and admonition from the prince was of more service to him than all the precepts of his masters, or the examples of his competitors) his imperial majesty condescended one day to tell him, with great mildness and affability, that in his singing he neither moved nor stood still like any other mortal; all was supernatural. "Those gigantic strides," said he, "those never-ending notes and passages, (ces notes qui ne finissent jamais) only surprise, and it is now time for you to please. You are too lavish of the gifts with which nature has endowed you: if you wish to reach the heart, you must take a more plain and simple road."

These judicious remarks effected an entire change in his manner of singing: from this time he united pathos to spirit, simplicity was the sublime, and by these means delighted, as well as astonished, every hearer.

In the year 1734, he went to England, where the effects which his surprising talents had upon the audience were ecstasy! enchantment! In the famous air, "Son qual nave," which was composed for him by his brother, the first note he sang was taken with such delicacy, swelled by minute degrees to such an amazing volume, and afterwards diminished in the same manner to a mere point, that it was applauded for full five minutes. After this, he set off with such brilliancy and rapidity of execution, that it was difficult for the violins of those days to keep pace with him.

But it was not in speed only that he excelled; for he united the perfections of every celebrated singer. His voice was equally eminent for strength, sweetness, and compass; and his style equally excellent in the expression of tenderness, grace, and rapidity. In a word, he possessed such powers, as were never before or since united in any one singer, powers that were irresistible, and which subduced every hearer, the learned and the ignorant, the friend and the foe.

With these talents, he went to Spain, in the year 1737, intending to return to England, having entered into articles with the nobility, who had, at that time, the management of the opera, to perform during the ensuing season. In his way thither, he sang to the king of France, at Paris; where, according to Riccoboni, he enchanted even the French themselves, who universally abhorred Italian music.

The very first day he performed before the queen of Spain, it was determined he should be taken into the service of the court, to which he was ever after wholly appropriated, not being once permitted to sing in public. A pension was then settled upon him for life, amounting to upwards of two thousand pounds sterling.

He told Dr. Burney, that, for the first ten years of his residence at the court of Spain during the reign of Philip V., he sang to that monarch, every night, the same four airs, two of which were "Pallido il sole," and "Per questo dolce Amplesso," both composed by Hasse. He was honored also by his first royal master, Philip V., with the order of St. Jago, and by his successor, Ferdinand VI., under whom also he continued in favor, with that of Calatrava, in 1750. His duty now became less constant and fatiguing, as he persuaded this prince to patronise operas; which were a great relief to Farinelli, who was appointed sole director of these performances, and engaged the best Italian singers and composers, as also Metastasio as poet.

The goodness of Farinelli's heart, and the natural sweetness of his disposition, were not exceeded even by the unrivalled excellence of his vocal powers, as some of the following anecdotes will testify.

It has been often related, and generally believed, that Philip V., king of Spain, being seized with a total dejection of spirits, absolutely refused to be shaved, and was, in other respects, incapable of transacting the affairs of the state. The queen, who had in vain tried every common expedient that was likely to contribute to his recovery, determined that an experiment should be made of the effects of music upon the king, her husband, who was extremely sensible of its charms. Upon the arrival of Farinelli, of whose extraordinary performance an account had been transmitted to Madrid, her majesty contrived that there should be a concert in the room adjoining the king's apartment, in which this singer executed one of his most captivating songs. Philip at first appeared surprised, then affected, and, at the conclusion of the second air, commanded the attendance of Farinelli. On his entering the royal apartment, the enraptured monarch overwhelmed him with compliments and caresses, demanding how he could sufficiently reward such talents, and declaring that he could refuse him nothing. Farinelli, previously instructed, only entreated that his majesty would permit his attendants to shave and dress him, and that he would endeavor to appear in council as usual. From this moment the king's disease submitted to medicine, and the singer had the whole honor of the cure. By singing to his majesty every evening, his favor increased to such a degree, that he was regarded as a prime minister; but what was still more extraordinary, and most highly indicative of a superior mind, Farinelli, never forgetting that he was only a musician, behaved to the Spanish nobles attendant upon the court, with such unaffected humility and propriety, that instead of envying his good fortune, they honored him with their esteem and confidence.

The true nobility of this extraordinary person's soul appears still more forcibly in the following rare instance of magnanimity. Going one day to the king's closet, to which he had at all times access, he heard an officer of the guard curse him, and say to another, "Honors can be heaped on such scoundrels as these, while a poor soldier, like myself, after thirty years' service, is unnoticed." Farinelli, without seeming to hear this reproach, complained to the king that he had neglected an old servant, and actually procured a regiment for the person who had spoken so harshly of him in the antechamber; and on quitting his majesty, he gave the commission to the officer, telling him he had heard him complain of having served thirty years, but added, "You did wrong to accuse the king of neglecting to reward your services." The following story, of a more ludicrous cast, was frequently told and believed at Madrid, during the first year of Farinelli's residence in Spain. This singer, having ordered a superb suit of clothes for a gala at court, when the tailor brought them home, he asked for his bill. "I have made no bill, sir," said the tailor, "nor ever shall make one. Instead of money, I have a favor to beg. I know that what I want is inestimable, and only fit for monarchs; but since I have the honor to work for a person of whom every one speaks with rapture, all the payment I shall ever require, will be a song." Farinelli tried in vain to persuade the tailor to take his money. At length, after a long debate, giving way to the earnest entreaties of the humble tradesman, and perhaps more highly gratified by the singularity of the adventure, than by all the applause which he had hitherto received, he took him into his music room, and sang to him some of his most brilliant airs, delighted with the astonishment of his ravished hearer; and the more he seemed surprised and affected, the more Farinelli exerted himself in every species of excellence. When he had concluded, the tailor, overcome with ecstasy, thanked him in the most rapturous and grateful manner, and prepared to retire. "No," said Farinelli, "I am a little proud, and it is perhaps from that circumstance, that I have acquired some little degree of superiority over other singers. I have given way to your weakness; it is but fair that, in your turn, you should give way to mine." Then taking out his purse, he insisted on his receiving a sum, amounting to nearly double the worth of the suit of clothes.

Farinelli, during two reigns, resided upwards of twenty years at the Spanish court, with a continual increase of royal favor, and the esteem of the principal nobility of the kingdom.

During his greatest favor at the court of Madrid, he is said to have been no more elated, than with the acclamations which his extraordinary talents commanded whenever he sang in public. In the year 1759, Farinelli returned to Italy. After visiting Naples, the place of his nativity, he settled at Bologna, in 1761: in the environs of which city, he built himself a splendid mansion, which in Italy is called a palazzo. Here he resided for the remainder of his life, in the true enjoyment of affluent leisure. He was remarkably civil and attentive to the English nobility and gentry who visited him in his retreat, and appeared to remember the protection and favor of individuals, more than the neglect of the public, during the last year of his residence in London. When the marquis of Caermarthen honored him with a visit at Bologna, upon being told that he was the son of his patron and friend, the duke of Leeds, he threw his arms round his neck, and shed tears of joy in embracing him. This extraordinary musician, and blameless man, died in 1782, in the seventy-eight year of his age.

[From Chambers' Journal.]

SITTING ON THE SHORE.

The tide has ebbed away;
No more wild surgings 'gainst the adamant rocks,
No swayings of the sea-weed false that mocks
The hues of gardens gay;
No laugh of little wavelets at their play;
No lucid pools reflecting heaven's brow—
Both storm and calm alike are ended now.

The bare grey rocks sit lone:
The shifting sand lies so smooth and dry
That not a wave might ever have swept by
To vex it with loud moan;
Only some weedy fragment blackening thrown
To rot beneath the sky, tell what has been,
But desolation's self has grown serene.

Afar the mountains rise,
And the broad estuary widens out,
All sunshine: wheeling round and round about
Seaward, a white bird flies;
A bird? Nay, seems it rather in these eyes
An angel; o'er Eternity's dim sea,
Beck'ning—"Come thou where all we glad souls be."

O life! O silent shore,
Where we sit patient! O great sea beyond,
To which we look with solemn hope and fond,
But sorrowful no more!—
Would we were disembodied souls to soar,
And like white sea-birds wing the Infinite Deep!—
Till then, Thou Just One, wilt our spirits keep.

Mendelssohn's Precocity.

[The following remarks are from an analytical programme, by G. A. Macfarren, to Mendelssohn's Quartet No. 3, in B minor, for piano, violin, and violoncello, which was recently performed at the Quartet Association in London, with Miss Arabella Goddard as pianist.]

The extraordinary precocity of this production is truly marvellous, and wholly without parallel in the annals of all art, musical, verbal, and plastic; the author having been still a child (I believe only in his twelfth year) when it was published, which was some considerable time after its composition. The fluency of invention, the power of continuity, and the capacity of development that are herein evinced, are such as the knowledge of the career of other artists teaches us to associate only with the idea of so long a course of well-directed study, and of such experience in the practice of composition, as the labor of many years and the production of many works can alone afford; but here, contrary to whatever principles of nature can be collected from precedent, we have the performance of an accomplished musician, who must have been yet an inmate of the nursery, and scarcely let loose from his leading-strings. What is still more remarkable, is, that in this work we have such powerful indications of the style of Mendelssohn as cannot be mistaken; such as, in the case of Beethoven, are not to be so distinctly traced until he had entered upon what critics call the middle period of his mental development. This would prove that with the greatest genius there needs many years to establish this regular manifestation of individuality; but, except we can suppose that our composer's musical culture was the continuance of some ante-natal course of development, every proof of the kind is by this example refuted. Mozart, it is true, made music while yet an infant, while yet too young to hold a pen for the purpose of conveying his ideas to paper; and there are instances, in the other arts, of remarkable, if not so remarkable, precocity; but if such facts be marvellous, Mendelssohn's production, at a not much more advanced age, of a long, well sustained, and highly elaborated work, which more than anticipates the manner of thought that will always distinguish him among his compeers, and so attest his greatness, can be nothing short of a miracle. The present Quartet is, in this last respect—namely, of announcing the future style of the composer—an immense advance upon the two works that preceded it, both compositions of the same class for the same instruments; and it is otherwise a much more interesting production than either of these, which, however, have both of them merit that is wholly incompatible with the period when they were written. For all this, it would be absurd, it would be to depreciate the greater merit of all that followed, to pretend that the work was without unquestionable tokens of immaturity; such as the somewhat irrelative consecution of keys in the succession of the movements, and still more important, the want of conciseness, the deficiency of the grand power of concentration, that is to be felt in the construction of the several movements. That the work presents these imperfections, makes it, if so much the less admirable, surely as much the more interesting, since it presents to us an insight into the history of the author's mind which is far above value.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Frank Darley's "Belshazzar."

On Thursday Evening, April 28th, the Grand Saloon of the Assembly Buildings, Philadelphia, was crowded to its utmost capacity by the leading musicians and principal amateurs of the city, assembled, notwithstanding the heat of the weather, to attend the first performance of a new Sacred Cantata, entitled "Belshazzar," composed expressly for the Harmonia Sacred Music Society, by Frank Darley, a young man still considerably under age, but pretty generally known among the musical circles as a writer of some promise. The announcement of the Harmonia Society that they would give an extra concert after the close of the regular subscription series, for the purpose of presenting this work, had been made some six or eight weeks before, and been received with very general favor. The musical public were quite on the qui vive to attend its performance, and, as we have already said, they assembled in full force.

Before proceeding, we will state that the success of the Cantata was so very flattering, that on May 12th, it was repeated with still greater applause at the Musical Fund Hall, before a large audience, despite the raging of a violent rain storm that prevailed throughout the afternoon and evening.

The Cantata is in one part; the story chosen is the somewhat hackneyed one of Belshazzar's Feast, and the words are so inferior, not to say bad, that we can scarcely conceive how Mr. Darley could write music to them. The subject is treated more in the dramatic style than in that of the oratorio, and the distribution of characters is as follows:

Belshazzar, King of Babylon,.....Baritone.
 Daniel, the Prophet,.....Basso.
 Aspha, a General in Babylon,.....Tenor.
 Queen of Babylon,.....Soprano.
 Eractha, her sister,.....Contralto.
 The guests, priests, and astrologers, by a chorus of 80.

Dramatic interest is infused, by the Queen and her sister being represented as Jewish converts desirous of leading Belshazzar in a more righteous course, while Aspha stoutly supports the career of his sovereign.

The Cantata consists of the following pieces of music:—

1. Opening Chorus of Priests, with Aria for Belshazzar.
2. Recitative, Belshazzar, and a concerted chorus.
3. Trio, for Belshazzar, Queen and Eractha.
4. Recitative, Belshazzar and Daniel.
5. Quintet, for all the principals, with chorus.
6. Preghiera and Bravura, for Queen.
7. Quintet, concerted piece and chorus.
8. Cavatina, Eractha.
9. Grand Chorus—Finale.

The Cantata, strictly speaking, ends with No. 7; the two ensuing pieces being a sort of moral on the story and a chorus of praise to the Deity, which is a somewhat sudden transition from the bustling action of the dramatic part, to a strictly descriptive style of writing—the fault of the librettist, whoever he or she may be, the name not being given.

And now, at length, we come to our promised criticism on the composition, our preceding remarks having been a necessary evil in the shape of a preface.

The Cantata opens in C minor with a short but impressive symphony, that after some thirty or forty bars modulates into E♭ major, and the vocal portion commences in a chorus of priests addressing the Chaldean gods, and pouring libations on the altars. The air of this chorus is very striking and contains many passages of exceeding originality and beauty—some well managed imitations are interspersed, which show that young Darley is a fugue student, although not of the strictly ecclesiastical school. There is some little abruptness in the close of this chorus, the modulation from Tonic to Dominant being a little awkward, from the means taken to render it out of the common way,—an affectation of which we do not approve. The aria for Belshazzar, which enters at this point, is in B♭, and reminds us somewhat of the celebrated coronation march in Meyerbeer's Prophète, while the second movement is slightly in Bellini's style. In the midst of this solo the chorus enters with a new and highly original subject, which blends with the aria in perfect accord, although of an entirely distinct character,—it is a beautiful piece of writing and reflects great credit not only upon the composer himself, but also upon his instructor, Leopold Meignen, the conductor of the Musical Fund Society's orchestra.

This is succeeded by a morcel of recitative that is not so good as it should be, the notes being in a somewhat tortured progression, and difficult to intone well. It leads into a fine concerted chorus, representing the horror felt at the appearance of the fiery hand which traces the mystic characters upon the wall of the banquetting-room; and is followed by a reprise of the second movement of the opening chorus, a telling passage in C minor, closing what may be considered the first division of the Cantata, as a short pause was made at this point by the performers on both occasions, (for we attended both—indeed it is impossible to judge of an original composition at the first hearing, and we would not venture to express an opinion upon so slight an acquaintance.)

No. 3 is considered the gem of the Cantata by most people; it is a trio for soprano, contralto and baritone, and certainly contains the most beautiful melody in the entire work. This pleasing subject is treated in the French style, to which, on the whole, we think the composer has a decided tendency, some of his modulations being modelled on Auber. The coda, or more properly speaking, the ensemble of this trio is written with great taste and judgment, consisting of delicious harmony and very graceful florid passages for the soprano. It is the pet encore.

The recitative for Belshazzar and Daniel was so indifferently sung, that it was almost impossible to arrive at what the composer wished to effect at this point. However, it modulates very well into No. 5, a quintet, "O'ercome now with fear," which is, although graceful and well written, not precisely the kind of composition which, it appears to us, should be introduced at this point. There is a want of harmony between the meaning of the words and the music, which interferes with its proper effect, though the latter possesses much merit as part-writing. It is, at the end, mingled with a full chorus that is truly grand: it is in this description of construction that Frank Darley is particularly happy, and it never fails in producing an impression upon the audience.

This quintet is succeeded by the preghiera and bravura for soprano, in which the Queen urges Belshazzar to turn from the false gods and endeavor to avert the anger of the offended Deity by worshipping him alone. We consider this the most uninteresting piece in the Cantata. The adagio with which it opens contains excellent harmony, but there is a decided want of melody, and from its extreme length it becomes dragging and fatiguing. The bravura is better, in point of air, but is too florid, too hashed up with running passages, beautifully sung, by the way, by a lady vocalist of great talent, who has a perfect delivery of rapid passages, and a voice of considerable compass; the bravura requires within a note of two octaves.

No. 7 follows; it may be considered as the finale of the Cantata, as we have already said, and it represents the despairing Chaldeans calling upon their gods to defend them from the approaching enemy, together with the reproaches heaped upon Belshazzar by his Queen for his effeminacy and irresolution. It opens in G minor very effectively, an andante for the chorus, followed by an elaborate allegro for the quintet and chorus in B♭, concluding with a different treatment of the first subject in presto, which has a novel and startling effect, representing, to the life, the terror and dismay of the people at finding their prayers disregarded and their doom sealed. It is probably a finer piece of writing than any other portion of the Cantata, and is intensely dramatic; although occasionally the hearer is reminded of its being a sacred story by the prolonged solid harmony or the elaborate imitations.

Nos. 8 and 9 are taken together. The first is a dirge-like air for contralto, replete with expression, and with a very rich accompaniment in A minor, and modulates boldly into C for the final chorus of "Praise to God," which is written in the true church style, and has the fault,—a common one with this composer,—of being too short, so that at the end of forty-five minutes, the hearer finds himself wishing for more,—this may have been done intentionally for the sake of policy.

Having thus given a full account of "Belshazzar," we feel that we cannot finish this protracted article better than by advising some of the Boston societies to produce this new Cantata during the next season.

The Philadelphia Evening Bulletin, in the course of its critique, says:—"We heard no dissent among the audience from the opinion that the Cantata would be creditable to any one, and that, as the work of one so young, it was quite extraordinary."

The "Inquirer" goes further:—"In no one instance does it flag in fire or energy; nowhere are displayed the redundancy or puerilities of the novice. On the contrary, it is all exceedingly clever, and some points in it may be regarded as great." With this high praise we feel fully able to agree. W.

Sayings of Coleridge.

An ear for music is a very different thing from a taste for music. I have no ear whatever; I could not sing an air to save my life: but I have the intensest delight in music, and can detect good from bad. Naldi, a good fellow, remarked to me once at a concert, that I did not seem much interested with a piece of Rossini's which had just been performed. I said, it sounded to me like nonsense verses. But I could scarcely contain myself when a thing of Beethoven's followed.

The darkest despotisms on the Continent have done more for the growth and elevation of the fine arts than the English government. A great musical composer in Germany and Italy is a great man in society, and a real dignity and rank are universally conceded to him. So it is with a sculptor, or painter, or architect. Without this sort of encouragement and patronage such arts as music and painting will never come into great eminence. In this country there is no general reverence for the fine arts; and the sordid spirit of a money-amassing philosophy would meet any proposition for the fostering of Art, in a genial and extended sense, with the commercial maxim—Laissez faire. Paganini, indeed, will make a fortune, because he can actually sell the tones of his fiddle at so much a scrape; but Mozart himself might have languished in a garret for any thing that would have been done for him here.

The fondness for dancing in English women is the reaction of their reserved manners. It is the only way in which they can throw themselves forth in natural liberty. We have no adequate conception of the perfection of the ancient tragic dance. The pleasure which the Greeks received from it had for its basis Difference; and the more unfit the vehicle, the more lively was the curiosity and intense the delight at seeing the difficulty overcome.

The ancients certainly seem to have understood some principles in acoustics which we have lost, or at least, they applied them better. They contrived to convey the voice distinctly in their huge theatres by means of pipes, which created no echo or confusion. Our theatres—Drury Lane and Covent Garden—are fit for nothing: they are too large for acting, and too small for a bull-fight.

All harmony is founded on a relation to rest—on relative rest. Take a metallic plate, and strew sand on it; sound a harmonic chord over the sand, and the grains will whirl about in circles, and other geometrical figures, all, as it were, depending on some point of sand relatively at rest. Sound a discord, and every grain will whisk about without any order at all, in no figures, and with no points of rest.

The clergy of a nation, that is, its learned men, whether poets, or philosophers, or scholars, are these points of relative rest. There could be no order, no harmony of the whole, without them.

It is very remarkable that in no part of his writings, does Milton take any notice of the great painters of Italy, nor, indeed, of painting as an art; while every other page breathes his love and taste for music. Yet it is curious that, in one passage in the Paradise Lost, Milton has certainly copied the fresco of the Creation in the Sistine Chapel at Rome. I mean those lines,—

"now half appear'd
The tawny lion, pawing to get free
His hinder parts, then springs as broke from bonds,
And rampant shakes his braided mane;" &c., an image which the necessities of the painter justified, but which was wholly unworthy, in my judgment, of the enlarged powers of the poet. Adam bending over the sleeping Eve, in the Paradise Lost, and Dalilah approaching Samson, in the Agonistes, are the only two proper pictures I remember in Milton.

It is a poor compliment to pay a painter to tell him that his figure stands out of the canvass, or that you start at the likeness of the portrait. Take almost any daub, cut it out of the canvass, and place the figure looking into or out of a window, and any one may take it for life. Or, take one of Mrs. Salmon's wax queens or generals, and you will very sensibly feel the difference between a copy, as they are, and an imitation, of the human form, as a good portrait ought to be. Look at that flower-vase of Van Huysum, and at these wax or stone peaches and apricots! The last are likeliest to their original, but what pleasure do they give? None, except to children.

Some music is above me; most music is beneath me. I like Beethoven and Mozart—or else some of the aerial compositions of the elder Italians, as Palestrina and Carissimi. And I love Purcell.

The best sort of music is what it should be—sacred; the next best, the military, has fallen to the lot of the devil.

Good music never tires me, nor sends me to sleep. I feel physically refreshed and strengthened by it, as Milton says he did.

I could write as good verses now as ever I did, if I were perfectly free from vexations, and were in the ad libitum hearing of fine music, which has a sensible effect in harmonizing my thoughts, and in animating, and, as it were, lubricating my inventive faculty. The reason of my not finishing Christabel is not that I don't know how to do it—for I have, as I always had, the whole plan entire from beginning to end in my mind; but I fear I could not carry on with equal success the execution of the idea, an extremely subtle and difficult one. Besides, after this continuation of Faust, which they tell me is very poor, who can have courage to attempt a reversal of the judgment of all criticism against continuations? Let us except Don Quixote, however, although the second part of that transcendent work is not exactly uno flatu with the original conception.

Strictures upon the Stage,

AS IT EXISTS IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

III. MORE PARTICULAR VIEWS UPON THE INTRODUCTION OF CHIAROSCURO ON THE STAGE.

As there are certain beautiful effects in the natural landscape, which depend altogether on shadow for their production—as there are certain beauties in sculpture discernible under different lights, though perhaps more particularly under one light, which again is the consequence of shadow; it follows that the 'Dramatic Art Represented,' whose figures are like those of the sculptor, but invested with life, and having colored draperies, resemble those of the painter, but endowed with motion—must be feeble, and deprived of vitality and truth, by the absence of shadow;—cold, disagreeable and uninteresting, like those shadowless portraits of Queen Elizabeth. This is the state of the Stage as regards light. The condition of painting among the Chinese is precisely similar. And thus may we trace a resemblance between a tableau upon the stage, and a group of figures upon a Chinese tea-pot.

The Stage has, however, by accident, supplied occasional instances of chiaroscuro; but it has never been thought of as a general principle. I will relate one of these instances, that came under my own observation in London. It was in the performance of the play "Mary Stuart," in which Macready played Ruthven, Mrs. Warner the Queen of Scots, and the late Mr. Elton, Rizzio. It was in the scene in which Ruthven enters the queen's apartment to demand the life of Rizzio. It was managed in this way: Macready, as Ruthven, entered at the side, one step, by throwing back the tapestry with one hand, and with the other hand holding a two-handed sword, and dressed from head to foot in steel armor. And a strong light was thrown upon the armor, casting a shadow from Ruthven; whilst Rizzio, by the crouching attitude assumed behind the ample drapery worn by the queen, to whom he lies for protection, was also partially in shade. Here was in this the principle of light and the principle of shadow. The effect was at once artistic. What dignity, interest, and reality was imparted to the scene! I was then impressed with the importance of the adoption of chiaroscuro as a general principle.

Those unacquainted with Art, may deem this of little importance; but let them reflect on the universality of light and shadow. And if you will allow me, once more, to use the language of the important work on Art to which I have before referred—take the following lines, where the author speaks of the effect of shadows upon the light. For, understand that without shadow we lose the effect of light—but what is here described is as the effect of shadow.

"There is not a stoe, not a leaf, not a cloud, over which light is not felt to be actually passing and palpitating before our eyes. There is the motion, the actual wave and radiation of the darted beam—not the dull, universal daylight, which falls on the landscape without life, or direction, or speculation, equal on all things and dead on all things; but the breathing, animated, exulting light, which feels and receives, and rejoices, and acts—which chooses one thing and rejects another,—which seeks and finds, and loses again—leaping from rock to rock, from leaf to leaf, from wave to wave—glowing or flashing, or scintillating, according to what it strikes, or in its moods, absorbing and enfolding all things in the deep fulness of its repose, and thus again losing itself in its bewilderment, and doubt, and dimness; or perishing or passing away, entangled in drifting mist or melted into melancholy air, but still—kindling or declining, sparkling or still, it is the living light which breathes in its deepest, most entranced rest, which sleeps but never dies."

Shall we then endure the universal light which falls on every dramatic scene, "equal on all things, and dead on all things"? and to see a Shaksperian canvass of large size, and filled with life and interest, speechless and dumb? Lacking shadow, form is obscured; the eye has neither light nor shadow to rest upon; all is glaring, and yet all is cold; and before a performance is half over, the eyes of the audience are tired out, by the force of the unnaturally scattered light, and feel it a relief to leave the theatre.

I will now in a hasty manner glance at some Shaksperian scenes, and suppose that we are prepared to carry out this effect of shadow.

The last Scene in Othello.

The scene opens on the bed-chamber; in the usual method, the stage is darkened, and there is a sober light. (This effect is good.) But then Othello enters with a light, and the floats, or foot-lights, are then turned, and all is scattered light. (This effect is bad, and not in keeping with the scene, as can be perceived at a glance.)

Suppose it to be managed thus: The stage is darkened, the bed is in deep shadow, and the figure of Desdemona is barely visible. A lamp burns in the apartment, beneath a yellow shade; so that on any particular part of the scene, a mellow secondary light may be cast, according to the taste and judgment of the presiding artist. Othello enters, and bears a lamp; a strong light should be now thrown upon the countenance and figure of Othello, and the greater portion of the apartment is in chiaroscuro. When he takes the lamp to the bed, a thrilling effect is produced, as the hitherto obscure figure of Desdemona comes into the strong light, in company with that of his, all around being in dark contrast. When he wails, or calls on the devils to snatch him from the possession of this heavenly sight, he retires into the shadow—we lose the expression of his countenance; but that is all the better; his words will reach our hearts as the echoes of distant thunder—as the fall of an avalanche—as the awful warning of an earthquake—better, much better, than if his spangles were glittering there in the light.

The Platform Scene in Hamlet.

The moonlight would afford a broad, deep shadow of the fortress across the stage. The Ghost stands in the moonlight; Hamlet and his friends are grouped in the shade.

The Cauldron Scene in Macbeth.

What a caricature this has hitherto been! Doubtless there has been a difficulty at all times to find actors of taste and judgment to play the Witches. And at some remote period, some clever fellow, not being able to make the scene sublime, undertook to make it "funny;" and manager and audience have consented that that would do equally well. But the audiences of the present day begin to exclaim against this caricature of the Witches. Sometimes it has been thought that the scene and characters were intrinsically ridiculous. But what has been done to elevate it, to give it dignity, awe, sublimity, or even a supernatural interest? All supernatural scenes—the Witches in Macbeth, the Spirits in the Tempest, the Fairies in the Midsummer Night's Dream, required that which the imagination of the reader always supplies, to be wrought out for them upon the stage; and thus surrounding them with all the accessories (that are natural or in keeping) that genius and fancy can invent,—such scenes can be raised into sublimity and grandeur.

In the scene before us, take notice, Shakspeare in the direction of the scene says, 'Thunder.' In the first scene of the first act, the direction is, 'thunder and lightning,' but here, only 'thunder.' It is a dark cave, under ground, (the Pit of Acheron,) the day-light does not penetrate it, and the lightning does not penetrate it; therefore the flashes of lightning (as constantly given in this scene) destroy the idea of location. We also read in the direction, 'a cauldron boiling.' Now, I suspect there is not one of us who ever witnessed this; not one who ever saw 'a boiling cauldron' in this scene in Macbeth. But what have we had instead? why, 'fire' inside the cauldron! They have found it inconvenient to place fire outside the cauldron, and considering that no cauldron, not even a witch's, could boil without fire, some one starts up and says, "O, put the fire inside the cauldron, it will do just the same." But alas! this will never do. And with such imbecile, contemptible attempts to understand and illustrate Shakspeare, the English stage might well be made the mock of all the world.

We will suppose the cave to have a roof, (and not to be open at the top,) a roof of apparently the rough natural rock. This cave has no limits, far away and away into the gloom and the distance (aided by chiaroscuro) winding away into unexplored recesses. In the centre of the cave, rising up almost perpendicularly to a considerable altitude, stands a portion of the natural rock, thrown up from its dark bed beneath, rising in smooth surface to a jagged peak, (and skillfully managed might look as grand as a precipice,) this elevation the witches have constituted their altar of rites. Upon the summit of this, then, is the 'cauldron boiling,'—not such as we usually see, with three legs, cast at Mr. Thompson's iron-foundry in the nineteenth century,—but a huge, uncouth thing, harmonising in color and the rest with the rocks around. A column of steam ascends from it, breaks against, and then rolls along the roof of the cave. The ear detects the regular but deadened beat of the boiling substance, and listening as it readily would to this, becomes mightily affected by the first distant roll of the thunder without, pealing and echoing through the cavern. Poised up upon this rock, we see a figure leaning over the cauldron. It is, or it is not, one of the witches. The light, as proceeding from beneath the cauldron, falls upon the figure. The fire itself is much obscured, and allowed scarcely to be seen, but its reflection is full upon the figure of the witch, and upon some projecting points of rock. This is the first effect. After a long pause, we hear a low, distant, but continuous roll of thunder; the figure remains motionless. Another pause ensues, (the dull beat from the cauldron still going on,) and then a heavy crash and breaking up, as of a loud hurst of reverberating thunder, followed by a distant echo of it, rolling away and dying off in the distance. Now we expect something, and lo! the first witch comes looming out of the darkness, with a message that

"Thrice the brindled cat hath mew'd."

She is about returning to her place of destination, when the second and third witches, one dragging the other by the hand, advance with rapid strides, and one announces that

"Thrice and once the hedge-pig whined."

The three witches now listen for the cry of harpies. The third witch lying with her ear down to the earth—

"Harper cries: 'tis time, 'tis time!'"

They now ascend their platform of rock, and prepare their incantations, sitting on the edges of rock around the cauldron:

"Double, double, toil and trouble"— are words of especial meaning, and I think that they should be chanted; indeed I doubt if the whole of this incantation was not originally intended to be sung.

One word more with reference to stage grouping and effect. When the grouping on the stage is in large masses, and thrown back as far as the rear of the first wing of the stage: such as the banquet scene in Macbeth during the appearance of the ghost of Banquo—the whole of the Witches' scene in Macbeth, certainly—the trial scene in the Merchant of Venice, with the exception perhaps of one or two outstanding groups in the foreground—the senate scene in Othello, &c.,—it may, I think, be always within the aid of chiaroscuro, and as such under the superintendence of the painter. But when the figures of the foreground come in advance of the first wing, some conformity with the arts of painting and sculpture is required. Not, certainly, so as to embarrass or control the action of the actors; but to give to the grouping additional beauty and consistency, and to prevent characters when slain on the stage falling in parallel lines; and in other respects attaining to situations nothing removed from the most ridiculous. *

[To be continued.]

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 9, 1853.

Music for the Blind.

We have been enjoying the perusal—for some years past an annual pleasure—of the "Twenty-First Annual Report of the Perkins Institution and Massachusetts Asylum for the Blind." There is a cheerful, wholesome and invigorating tone in these yearly reports of progress from the indefatigable director of this noble enterprise, which is as refreshing as cool early morning breezes to the reader. There is no feeble sentimentality, no hacknied moral cant about his genuine philanthropy. There is a brave candor and sound common sense, not easily self-deceived, about it. We need not say that the Report shows that all still goes on well in this attempt to educate and fit for self-support and usefulness those who unfortunately lack the sense of sight. But with more means, which we trust, in such a liberal community, will speedily be forthcoming, more might be done. It is our province to note especially one phase of the experiment.

These institutions for the Blind, and especially this at South Boston, have done and are doing a great deal to develop the importance of a right, harmonious education of the Senses in all—the normally endowed, as well as in those who are deprived of one or more of those avenues to knowledge. As from sickness and morbid anatomy we learn the laws and beautiful organism of the sound human frame; so, it would seem, the attempts to remedy defects of sight or hearing have been destined to initiate us into a fuller appreciation of the heavenly ministry and proper culture of the Senses. What is technically called, in the modern philosophies of Art, Aesthetic Culture, in allusion to the dependence of all our ideas of the Beautiful upon the perceptions of the senses, owes not a little to these philanthropic institutions for the training of the blind, the deaf and the dumb, &c. It is here that one sees most clearly demonstrated how indispensable is the right possession and culture of the senses, especially sight and hearing, to the refinement of the whole nature, mental, moral, spiritual. No one who has been familiar with a blind asylum, is likely to be sceptical about the humanizing, spiritualizing, refining office of the well educated senses. Scenes of beauty and sounds of melody and harmony are as essential to the harmony and beauty of the inner man, as wholesome air is to the lungs. Beauty and harmony are the native environment, the outward correspondence, the only proper outward home and sustenance and mirror of pure souls. If the eyes are sealed against the visible beauty of God's universe, then cultivate the ear; for Beauty, in some shape, is the birth-right of the human soul, and an essential mediator between the spiritual and the material elements of which we partake.

The blind naturally evince an aptitude for music; their minds concentrate upon this source of ideas of the Beautiful. Hence the study and practice of music are wisely made to occupy a large part in the education of the Blind. At South Boston excellent instruction is given by the accomplished musician and devoted teacher, Mr. ANTHON WERNER, who has a true German's feeling of the sacredness of his art. It has been a pleasure also to notice at the concerts and rehearsals of the orchestras and oratorio societies in Boston, frequent delegations from the blind pupils. When society recognizes its parental obligations, in respect of such opportunities of aesthetic culture, to the blind and unfortunate, it will ere long, perhaps, learn to feel the same obligation towards all its members, and to see to it, as a matter of mutual charity and justice, that the masses at large shall have a chance to see statues, and hear music, and share the sweet conservative influences of Art, amid the sharpening and hardening tendencies of our ultra-political and competitive existence.

There is another, special point of view, in which the experience of music-teaching at the blind asylum is quite valuable. In preparing the pupils to earn their livelihood by music-teaching, &c., they have learned a lesson, which it would be well for all to heed, namely, that the patronage of Art must and will be in the long run according to artistic merit, whatever individual charity or friendship may have to say about it. The best charity, therefore, is the best education, leaving employment afterwards to the inevitable laws that regulate the great market. We copy from the Report Dr. Howe's account of their experience on this point.

When institutions for the blind were first established, great expectations were entertained, and great hopes were held out, that all who were capable of becoming organists, tuners of pianos, or teachers of vocal or instrumental music, would surely find employment and earn a livelihood. The public was interested; and a demand was created, which soon exceeded the supply. A great number of blind persons turned their attention to music; and some who were well qualified, presented themselves in the market. Concerts and lessons by the blind were the order of the day. The market was overstocked, and for the most part with inferior goods; consequently the demand fell,—blind musicians and music were soon at a discount,—and much disappointment, and some suffering, followed. Such was the state of the matter during the years immediately succeeding the establishment of institutions for the blind in the principal States. These things, however, regulate themselves. A few years ago, say from five to ten, there was a general feeling of disappointment; institutions for the blind had not done what was promised; a great many blind persons had attempted to get a livelihood by music, but the majority had failed to do so. It was not considered how suddenly they had been brought forward, and how very inferior was the article they offered in the market.

But another change has taken place, or is going on. Many of those who without natural ability and without laborious study had taken advantage of the newly awakened interest of the public, and expected that people would continue to listen to and pay for poor music, because made by them, found their mistake. They found that the public tired of poor concerts, and would not take lessons of incompetent teachers; in fine, they found that music could not be made to pay, except by those really masters of it; and they took themselves out of the way. Meantime, others of more ability or more industry kept on resolutely in the study of music, and established themselves in different places, with the determination to be content with small beginning, and to persevere to the end. The good effects are beginning to be seen. Several have already gained the confidence of the community, and are beginning to earn a comfortable livelihood by teaching music, tuning pianos, or playing the organ in churches. The result shows, that, though the most sanguine hopes entertained at the outset have not been realized, yet very much has been accomplished. It is now established, beyond a doubt, that if blind persons who have a decided taste and talent for music, and a natural aptness for teaching, will labor perseveringly to qualify themselves, they may have reasonable assurance of success. It is with regard to music precisely as it is with regard to mattresses, or any thing else offered in the market by the blind,—at first the public purchases without much attention to quality, out of sympathy with the vendors; but it soon returns to the settled principles of trade, and refuses poor articles at any price.

The Western Tour of "The Germania."

The summer concert-tour, from which our friends of the Germania Musical Society have just returned, has derived peculiar interest from the fact that they have been everywhere welcomed, as it were, to a portion of their ancient home, by Germans. To the hearts of their emigrant countrymen, settled down in Cincinnati, in St. Louis, in Milwaukee, in Chicago, &c., their music has been truly a revival of the old "Sounds from Home." There are thousands of Germans in the West, who for some five or eight years have been out of hearing of the music of the grand old masters of the Fatherland, on which the highest enthusiasm of their youth was nurtured. Music and the love of liberty and country are eternally associated with their souls. We may judge then of the excitement and intense delight with which, after so long a fast, these emigrant communities drunk in the glorious harmonies of Beethoven and Mendelssohn and Weber from the Germania orchestra. It is pleasant to remark the cordial fervor with which the German newspapers in the above-named cities speak of those concerts as a real God-send; and for this reason—not that we need go abroad for confirmation of the praise of artists whom it has been the privilege of Boston music-lovers to know so well, we translate for our readers a warm notice, which we find in the Anzeiger des Westens, published at St. Louis. It is from the pen of the editor, Mr. Henri Börnstein:

"THE GERMANIA. Third Concert.—Day before yesterday, for the first time this long while, we tore ourselves away from the writing desk, and went to the concert of the Germania. * * * We have often been reproached with our little or no attendance at theatres, concerts, and other public entertainments. Among other supposed reasons, the simplest seem to have been overlooked. The first and weightiest was, that we preside over a business which claims all our time and activity;—and the second is simply a matter of taste. We have spent the largest and fairest portion of our life in the spheres of artists; we have exhausted the richest enjoyments; we have stood in intimate relations to Meyerbeer, Donizetti, Kreutzer, Lachner and other tone-poets; we were for years one of the few habitués of the Italian Opera at Paris, who had free access to the stage; we learned to know Liszt, Ernst, Strakosch, and so many other artists, more nearly than in the concert-room; and that period of our life has left behind it a treasure of artistic reminiscences, whose after-enjoyment we should not like to damage.

"Deem us not arrogant, therefore, ye brave musicians and dilettanti, who are here working in an ungrateful land; believe not that we esteem your work of small account;—ye do your utmost, ye strew abroad artistic germs for the Future, ye awake the taste for what is better, ye are here the pioneers of Music. The reason why you cannot do more is, that in this land of business, Art can and must be but a secondary matter; and a much worse reason is, the proverbial want of unity among the Germans, which chokes and deranges everything.

"And for this very reason was the Germania Society a note-worthy and refreshing phenomenon to us. Three and twenty Germans, who for five years now in this "free" land have kept together faithful and united,—that is indeed a rarity, deserving to be held up as an example to be imitated,—a phenomenon which shows us in a refreshing manner what Germans could accomplish here in every respect, if they would only remain faithful and united. Thus disposed, we went to the concert and again heard music, European music,—which awakened all the sweet remembrances of fairer times in us and made us revel once more in the lost Paradise of Art.

"Yes, that is Music,—those are Artists, who are in earnest, who consider Art a sacred thing,—to whom a concert is a solemn transaction,—to whom a score of Beethoven or Mozart is an evangelium of God in man. We will write here no critique; we have enjoyed, and in enjoyment the sharp-sighted judgment ceases. But for those of our friends, who have not yet heard the Germania, we only add the assurance, that choice of pieces, precision, delivery, expression and unity of performance reminded us, in proportion to the numbers of the band, of the best European orchestra, that of the Conservatoire in Paris. From director Bergmann, with his energetic bâton, to the beater of the drums, each man is in his place and be completely fills it.

"ALFRED JAEHL, who accompanies the Society, played the grand concerto of Mendelssohn-Bartoldy (opus 24) with full orchestra. We have known Jaell for a long time;—when we conducted the splendid Teatro Grande in Trieste, in 1840, the old Jaell brought to us the little Alfred, then about nine years old;—we heard him play and shared in our astonishment the father's great expectations.

"Thirteen years have fled since then,—we are in America and have exchanged the beautiful Art life for the unfruitful arena of politics,—and the little Alfred has become a great artist, and has kept the promise of the boy. What most surprises us in Jaell is not his extraordinary facility of overcoming difficulties, which he shares with Liszt; and not alone his delivery, so full of soul and rich in feeling, which he has in common with Thalberg,—but it is especially the manner in which he treats such a universally known and every-day affair as the piano. Under Jaell's hands it becomes certainly a different instrument, with tones, with an effect, not known to us before. In the Mendelssohn concerto it now complained languishingly like a flute, now sounded clear as a silver bell in the midst of the storm of brass instruments, and now trembled in expiring chords, like a harp. Yes, Jaell is an artist in the finest sense of the word,—an artist, whose performance leaves behind a lasting memory.

"Worthily by his side stands the little maiden, CAMILLA ÜRSÖ; not her double and triple stopping,—not her sharply seized highest chords, not her leaps and chromatic runs alone deserve admiration;—more than all this we were enchanted by the soul, the depth of feeling that lay in the delivery of this earnest child. The melting, elegiac Adagio of the dying scene in Lucia she rendered with an expression that reminded us of Rubini and Salvi in their prime. And then that quiet, that absence of the usual little coquetry of the so-called wonder-children;—serious, almost sad are her features, the eye rests deeply glowing under the thick brows, and is first animated, when she places on the bow and woos from the violin the first complaining tones. Once only did the serious child's face light up, when after the splendid delivery of the Adagio several bouquets fell down at her feet;—then her face was transfigured, she smiled and bent down to the flowers which she carefully picked up, almost forgetting that she had only sixteen bars' rest and must soon fall in again.—Good child! How beautiful a youth-tune! Flowers and Tones! Nature and Art, are thy enjoyments, thy life.

"And so it was with thee, too, Theresa Milanollo, never-to-be-forgotten maiden;—thou too didst live in flowers and music, and didst die ere the years of passion came and the prose of marriage and of household drudgery followed. Thine was a short, but beautiful existence, and thou didst lose nothing in that thou didst live no longer.

"But to thee, still, serious Camilla, with the soul of deep feeling in thy bosom and thy bow, we wish a long, long childhood, an eternal youth of Art;—and to you all, our friends and countrymen of the GERMANIA! the fullest success of artists wherever you may go, and long continuance of your dearest treasure,—pure, untroubled HARMONY in Art as in life! Continue Germans in heart and mind; continue German artists in music,—and we will ever think with pride and joy of you, as worthy representatives of German Art in America." H. B.

Floral Entertainment—The Festival of Beauty.

[We were not present on the occasion here described, but we take our correspondent's word for it that it must have been as beautiful as it appeared to him. Certainly, the idea in itself is a fine one, and might be worked up to excellent results.]

"One of the most interesting musical gatherings of the season occurred on the 22d ult., at the City Hall, Charlestown. We refer to the 'Festival of Beauty,' produced under the superintendence of Messrs. D. S. Pennell and J. B. Packard. The evening was a pleasant one, and at an early hour throngs of fairy-dressed young ladies, attired in white, and decorated with a profusion of every variety of roses, made the hall echo with their joyous tones, and filled it with the busy hum of preparation. There was not one sad face among them all. Not one brow bore the impress of care; but like 'Charming Cherubs,' bearers of glad news to earth, they met upon the platform, and by their presence caused many a weary heart to thrill with a new delight and a brighter hope. Would that there were more of such training for our children! then, perchance, Age would not tread so closely on the footsteps of Youth, and Care would administer less of her bitter drug.

The exercises consisted of Songs, Recitatives and May Dances; and all who took a part, from the gentlemanly managers down to the wee bit of a bairn who personated a Dew Drop, infused a grace, vigor and life into their respective performances.

The subject was portrayed by the Seasons, each of which came in with its distinct, characteristic features. Spring, with its early bride and flowers; Summer, with its fragrant crown of roses; Autumn, with its harvest sheaves and golden fruit; Winter, with icy beard and snowy mantle. At length the Queen was arrayed for her coronation, and the Goddess, who had sat all the evening the fairest gem amid the beauties of nature with which she was surrounded, performed the ceremony with exceeding grace and appropriateness.

The Recitatives were well adapted to the occasion, both in sentiment and the manner in which they were delivered.

On the 22d the hall was well crowded; there was not a spare seat, and scarcely a spare standing-spot; and as a great desire was expressed to have the entertainment repeated, it was brought forward on the following evening, to a full and appreciative audience. At this point it would seem that the 'Festival' had been sufficiently participated in by all, but a request was again made to have it repeated in a larger building. This could not be granted owing to arrangements made for its repetition in other cities and towns.

This entertainment we consider highly interesting and instructive, and heartily commend it and the gentlemen who have originated it, to the good will of all whom they meet, in whatever place they may visit for the purpose of producing the 'FESTIVAL OF BEAUTY.' A.

Foreign.

BELGIUM.—A statue has lately been erected to the famous old composer, ORLANDO LASSO, at Mons, his birth-place. He was chapel-master (in the middle of the 16th century) in the Lateran at Rome; the French king, Charles IX., who was a passionate lover of music, received him very graciously on his arrival in Paris, and wished to retain him in his chapel. But Orlando preferred to go to Munich, where for many years he led the chapel music of Albrecht the Magnanimous, duke of Bavaria, and finally died there. Judging from the accounts, the ceremonies on the occasion were not very imposing. At 11 o'clock, Lasso's Mass: Or—ly à coup, which he had set, after the manner of his time, to a well-known theme, was performed,—not in the Cathedral, nor in the Church of St. Nicholas, where Lasso used to sing as choir-boy—but in a little ob-cure church of the society which has assumed the name of Reland de Lettre; and performed too with many modern embellishments, and with an organ accompaniment. After the mass, there was a procession to the public garden, where the statue was consecrated, and the various musical bodies of the place were put in requisition. The statue was uncovered amid the thunder of artillery, several speeches were made, &c. &c. In the expression of the statue there is something very noble. With one hand Lasso touches the keys of a portable organ; the other is raised to heaven, as if he had just discovered a new chord. The house where Orlando was born is no longer identified.

FRANKFURT ON THE MAINE.—Mlle. Johanna Wagner is engaged at the opera, to appear in the characters of Romeo, Fides, Alice, Valentine, Leonora (in La Favorita) and Fidelio.

HAMBURG.—Jacob Schmitt, the once celebrated pianist, is dead.

BERLIN.—The performances at the Royal Opera on June 6th, were Auber's Les Diamans de la Couronne; on the 12th, Harold's Zampa; at "Kroll's Establishment," Boildieu's Dame Blanche, Der Freischütz, and Zampa. The composer of La Gage d'Amour, Adolph Henselt, has arrived here from St. Petersburg, and without delay proceeded to his newly-acquired domain at Gersdorf.

WEIMAR.—Flotow's new opera, Indra, produced on the occasion of the marriage of the Princess of Saxe-Weimar and the Prince of the Netherlands, made a complete fiasco.

BASEL.—At the Subscription Concerts an excellent orchestra executed an overture, by Charles Oberthür, to Shakespeare's Macbeth, which gave general satisfaction. The orchestration was much admired.

Advertisements.

The best Book on Piano Instruction existing!

IN PRE-S:—JULIUS KNORR'S GUIDE FOR TEACHERS ON THE PIANO. A full system of instruction, from the very outset, to artistic perfection, with full advice to teachers and pupils. Its progressive order, completeness, and the value of the pieces recommended, (about 200,) make it indispensable to teachers, and invaluable to all players. It is

THE BEST SELF-INSTRUCTOR EXTANT.

It is also THE ONLY KEY to the proper use of Julius Knorr's "Materials," and his "Large Method." Price 75 cents.

G. A. SCHMITT, Petersburg, Va.

iii 14 3m

L. O. EMERSON,

Teacher of the Piano-Forte and Singing.

APPLY AT HIS RESIDENCE,

No. 12 INDIANA PLACE, BOSTON.

iii 18 3m.

A. W. FRENZEL,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC, and late Leader of the "SAXONIA ORCHESTRA," having made Boston his residence, is prepared to give Lessons on the Piano-Forte and in Singing, both in the English and German languages; also to accompany with the violin more advanced pupils in the Sonata-duos of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c. During the summer season, Mr. F. offers his services to classes out of town. Or he will receive scholars, from the city or the country, at his Music Rooms, No. 4 Pine Street, Boston, where he may always be found before 10 A. M., and between the hours of 1 and 3 P. M.

iii 6

JONAS CHICKERING,

RESPECTFULLY gives notice to his friends and the public that, having recovered from the late disastrous effects produced by the destruction of his factory, he is now ready to receive orders for PIANOS, which he promises to execute with as much faithfulness and promptitude as heretofore.

379 Washington Street, Boston.

Mar. 5.

tf

HEWES' PATENT

AMERICAN ACTION PIANO-FORTE.

THE MANUFACTURER is in possession of numerous testimonials from distinguished Musical Professors, who have used the greatly improved ACTION PIANO, commending it in high terms. The attention of purchasers and amateurs of Music to an examination of its superiority, is solicited.

GEO. HEWES, 385 Washington St., Boston.

Apr. 10.

tf

BEETHOVEN'S CELEBRATED MASS in C,

IN VOCAL SCORE:

With an Accompaniment for the Organ or Piano-Forte, by Vincent Novello. With Latin and English text. Just published by

Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

Sold by all Music Dealers.

iii 4

THE SYMPHONIES OF BEETHOVEN:—

ARRANGED FOR THE PIANO-FORTE BY J. N. HUMMEL. The above excellent compositions are now in course of publication by the subscriber

Symphony No. 7, in A, op. 92, is now ready.

Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

Sold by all Music Dealers.

iii 4

—Edward L. Balth,

BERTINI'S PIANO METHOD—ABRIDGED.

The popularity of Bertini's Celebrated Method for the Piano is sufficient evidence of its great merits. The only objection ever made to the Method has been that the elaborateness with which the subject is treated, renders the task of commencing and completing it, somewhat arduous, and to a young pupil a formidable undertaking.

Teachers as well as scholars have, therefore, seen the want of an Abridged Edition, in which all that was actually necessary might be included—an edition containing the choicest and most important lessons; one that might be commenced and finished by those composing the majority of piano pupils.

To meet a want so long apparent, the publisher has issued this edition, which, as a superior work, is recommended to the musical public of the United States.

Published by

OLIVER DITSON,

115 Washington St.

Sold by all Music Dealers in the United States and Canada.

iii 12

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE,

No. 88 TREMONT STREET, BOSTON.

WHITE BROTHERS, DEALERS IN MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS,

Best Italian, German, French and English Strings,

AGENTS OF

J. André, Offenbach; and G. André, Philadelphia,

FOR THE SALE OF FOREIGN CLASSIC MUSIC,

CHOIR MUSIC, &c.

☞ Instruments Made, Repaired, Tuned, Bought, Sold, or Exchanged, on the most favorable terms.

IRA J. WHITE.

iii 2 3m

A. WARREN WHITE.

THEODORE T. BARKER,

MUSIC STORE,

No. 381 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

Chickering's Pianos to let.

All Foreign and American Musical Publications received as soon as published.

iii 23 3m

N. D. COTTON,

IMPORTER AND DEALER IN

English, French, and American Stationery,

DRAWING & PAINTING MATERIALS,

No. 13 Tremont Row, Boston.

* * * Wedding and Visiting Cards Engraved and Printed.

16 tf

BEETHOVEN'S ORATORIO OF ENGEDI, or DAVID IN THE WILDERNESS, known as the MOUNT OF OLIVES, is this day published in a neat, convenient form for the singer or concert-goer by

Geo. P. Reed & Co., Publishers,
17 Tremont Row, Boston.

Jan. 8.

D. B. NEWHALL, MANUFACTURER AND DEALER IN PIANO FORTES,

No. 314 Washington Street, Boston.

PIANO FORTES REPAIRED, TUNED, & TO LET.

Apr. 10.

tf

J. C. WOODMAN,

ORGANIST AND CONDUCTOR OF MUSIC AT CENTRAL CHURCH,

Teacher of Singing, Piano Forte, &c.,

No. 94 Chestnut Street, Boston.

iii 2 3m.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.

FOREIGN MUSIC DEPOT,

GIRARD HOUSE BUILDINGS,

NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,

PHILADELPHIA.

N. B. The complete works, for Piano, (Quartets, Trios, Duets for Piano and Violin, Duets for four hands and Piano solo pieces,) of BEETHOVEN and MOZART, as also the Piano solo Works of CLEMENTI and HAYDN, as published by J. André, Offenbach, in sets, at very low prices ☞ We have appointed

Messrs. WHITE BROTHERS,

TREMONT TEMPLE, BOSTON,

our Agents for the sale of the above Standard Editions of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, &c. &c.

iii 2 tf

MRS. ROSA GARCIA DE RIBAS,

TEACHER OF THE

PIANOFORTE, SINGING & GUITAR,

2 Seneca St., corner Harrison Avenue.

MR. De RIBAS will give instruction on the Oboe and Flute. ALSO MUSIC ARRANGED, TRANSPOSED, &c.
Boston, April 28.

3m

Letter-Press, Music and Job Printing—Office,

SIGNOR G. C. GUIDI respectfully informs his former pupils and the public, that he has resumed his instructions in SINGING, after the Italian school, with the intention to settle permanently in Boston. In order to accommodate those who may not wish to take private instruction, he will open classes for ladies and gentlemen, on moderate terms. None but good voices will be admitted. Terms liberal for persons intending to study for professional purposes.

Sign. G. can be consulted free upon any musical subject, daily, from 12 to 2, at Mr. Hewes's Piano Manufactory, No. 385 Washington street, where terms and time for classes may be known.

Orders or notes for Sign. G. may be addressed to him at G. P. Reed & Co.'s Music Store, 17 Tremont Row, and at Oliver Ditson's, 115 Washington street.

Feb. 5.

A CARD.

THE SUBSCRIBER respectfully offers his services to the public as Teacher of the Piano-Forte, the Violin and the Guitar, also of Harmony and Singing, after a clear and easy method. He will also accompany pupils, both in seminaries and in private houses, in the practice of Duets, Trios, &c. Address for the present at 163 Tremont Street.

March 26. 3m.

CARL GÄRTNER.

L. H. SOUTHARD, TEACHER OF MUSIC,

265 Washington Street, Boston.

Oct. 16.

3m

T. BRICHER,

Organist and Conductor of Music
At the Bowdoin Square Church.

OFFICE UNDER THE CHURCH... ENTRANCE ON CHADRON ST

Jan. 22. 3m.

H. S. CUTLER,

Organist at the Church of the Advent, also of the Boston Harmonic Society.

ADDRESS—(Care of ROLAND CUTLER, No. 4 Market Square, Boston.)

22 tf

F. F. MÜLLER,

DIRECTOR OF MUSIC AND ORGANIST at the Old South Church; ORGANIST of the Handel and Haydn Society; ORGANIST of the Musical Education Society, &c. &c. &c. Inquire of Messrs. REED & Co., No. 17 Tremont Row, Boston.

ii 7 tf

NATHAN RICHARDSON,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC.

☞ Letters may be addressed at the Revere House, Boston.

25 tf

GEORGE F. WILLEY,

TEACHER OF MUSIC.

☞ Private Tuition in the principles of Music and the Cultivation of the Voice.

MUSIC ROOM, THE LECTURE ROOM OF KIRK STREET CHURCH,

RESIDENCE, 34 FRANKLIN SQUARE, SUFFOLK STREET,

Feb. 5.

LOWELL, MASS.

Germania Serenade Band.

THE SERVICES OF THIS ASSOCIATION can be secured by applying to

ii 14 tf

G. SCHNAPP, Leader,

364 Tremont Street.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

AT 21 SCHOOL STREET, BOSTON.

$2 per annum, in advance.

ITS CONTENTS relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time,—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music published at home and abroad. 3. A Summary of the significant Musical News from all parts; gathered from English, German, French, as well as American papers. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, Architecture, Poetry, Aesthetic Books, the Drama, &c.—8. Original and Selected Poems, short Tales, Anecdotes, &c. ☞ Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished. Address, (post paid,) J. S. DWIGHT,

21 School Street, Boston.

RATES FOR ADVERTISING.

For half a square, (8 lines,) or less, first insertion, . . . $0.50

each additional inser. 25

For a square, (16 lines,) first insertion, 1.00

each additional insertion, 50

On advertisements standing three months or longer, a discount of twenty per cent. on the above rates is allowed.

(A column counts as seven squares.) Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 School St.

DWIGHT'S Journal of Music.

A Paper of Art and Literature.

VOL. III.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 16, 1853.

NO. 15.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

TERMS....TWO DOLLARS PER ANNUM, (IN ADVANCE.)

CITY Subscribers can be served at their houses by the further payment of fifty cents per annum.☞ *For Rates of Advertising, see last page.*POSTAGE, if paid in advance, for any distance within the State, thirteen cents a year; if not in advance, twenty-six cents. To all places beyond the State, double these rates.

J. S. DWIGHT,.....EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

☞ OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St.

By REDDING & CO., 8 State St.

" GEO. P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row.

" A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.

" DEXTER & BROTHERS, 43 Ann Street, N. Y.

" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 722 Broadway, N. Y.

" MASON BROTHERS, 23 Park Row, New York.

" GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.

" G. ANDRE, 229 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St., Balt.

" COLBURN & FIELD, Cincinnati, O.

" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Persons willing to become Agents for procuring subscribers, especially Music-Dealers and Teachers, are invited to correspond with the Editor, as above. Satisfactory references required, and liberal commissions allowed.

☞ Back numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Also bound copies of Vols. I. and II. at prices varying from $2.50 to $3.50.

Translated for this Journal.

A Sketch of Madame Mara.

By F. ROCHLITZ.

GERTRUDE ELIZABETH SCHMALING, afterwards Madame MARA, was born at Cassel, in the year 1749. Her early childhood was exceedingly confined and wretched. Her mother had died soon after her birth. Brothers or sisters she had none. The father, a poor town musician, could not pay a nurse, and had to spend the chief part of the day away from home in giving lessons. Then he would set the weakly child upon a little arm-chair, with a cramp in front to hold it up; and so left it alone, with closed doors, to itself and its own irksomeness. The child grew rickety: but there was nothing to be done for it.

In this way Gertrude got to be four years old. The father procured a little extra occupation in the repairing of musical instruments. One day, being called away to give a lesson, he had left lying there a violin, upon which he had been at work. The little girl, tortured with ennui, tried to reach it. She succeeded; Gertrude brought out tones; she had found a pastime. The father caught her at it; she was punished; but the enjoyment had proved too sweet, and the fiddle was taken up repeatedly. In a little while the father again surprised her; and then with astonishment he heard that she produced the tones of the scale, all purely intonated and correct. Now he gave her a little instruction, and it soon went so far that she played little duets with him. The wonder spread abroad. Many persons wished to convince themselves of its reality; so the father carried the child, who, owing to that sickness, could not walk, into the houses of the music-lovers and played the duets with her. There was no mistaking the extraordinary talent: some benevolent persons took compassion on the child and offered their support; one, whose business called him to the Fair at Frankfort on the Main, took father and daughter with him. Here they let themselves be heard in little circles; they excited astonishment and found reward; and some kind families subscribed enough to support the father and procure better instruction for the daughter. She made most rapid progress; her health, too, was improved, so that the father, after a residence of nearly two years, resolved to travel further.

Gertrude had come to Frankfort in her sixth year; in her ninth she gave a public concert in Vienna. Here the English minister advised the father to go with her to London; and upon the ready compliance of the latter, who had heard somewhat of English guineas, he furnished him with recommendations. Gertrude was in her tenth year, when they came to London. She played in the houses to which she had been commended, exciting great attention, so that there was even talk of her at court and she was presented to the queen. She played in the royal Chamber Concerts; her virtuosity, which, if not brilliant in itself, was striking for a child so young, attracted: but the violent exercise of her body, small even for her age, in managing her instrument, excited partly laughter, and partly pity or aversion. An artist surely she is bound to be, they said to the father; but not to remain a violin player. What then? "Does she not sing?" That she had long done, and with a pleasing voice, but without any teaching, and even without any pieces for the voice; she had sung her violin solos, as far and as well as that was practicable. But now good songs were given her; she went through with them and delivered them not only with distinguished voice, but also not without some understanding and feeling of what she was singing.

Several persons of rank assisted the father, under the condition that he would let her receive thorough instruction in singing. The father took her to a celebrated Italian singing-master, PARADISI; who benefitted her decidedly by systematic development of her tones, solfeggio practice, &c. After a while certain bad habits manifested themselves in the teacher, which induced the father to take the little girl away from him; and so she was again left to herself and her own industry. Finally the queen desired once more to hear her. But where the child had produced excitement, where its helplessness and its droll ways had made people laugh, the performances of one just entering into maidenhood simply pleased, but were received quite calmly; and so her appearance at court, as in other distinguished circles, had no great influence upon her future.

So much, not more, and scarcely that, could Gertrude recall afterwards of this chapter of her life, down to her sixteenth year. And very naturally! Travelling, fiddling, and after that, singing,—was about all of life that really interested her: how could she have cared enough about anything else, to have it remain in her memory? And now that she excited no more curiosity in London, now that the guineas ceased to flow in, the father returned with her to Germany, and at once to her native city. He hoped to see her presented at court. But the landgrave would only hear Italians. The public met her with attention and with sympathy: but that could not ensure her a subsistence, especially as the seven years' war, just then concluded, had exhausted the resources of the place.

The father now turned to HILLER, at Leipsic, who had established a series of winter concerts, over which he presided as director. Gertrude's father begged him, if she went there, to help to make her known and to procure her the opportunity of being heard in public. Hiller, always reasonable and obliging, allowed both father and daughter to come, and at the Easter fair in 1766 they met. Hiller heard, examined, heard again: the remarkable talent was gladly recognized by him, nor was he slow to perceive the unpropitious situation of the daughter dependent on a father, honorable indeed, but narrow-minded and morose. He took counsel for both. First he introduced the singer before the friends of his house and of music, and then before the public at large: she met with unanimous applause. He now offered her the place of singer at the concerts, with respectable advantages; took her, when she joyfully embraced the proposition, into his house, and made a suitable arrangement with the father, whereby Gertrude secured to him a portion of her income through his lifetime.

To this provision for the outward, father Hiller added a much more careful provision for her inward wants. In the first place he taught her to understand herself. "You are a singer," he began, "of excellent voice and of much capability; moreover there is manifested in your delivery, though you may scarcely know it or intend it, something of soul and character. Cling to that: by so doing you are always sure of some sort of success, so long as you are young. But what then? See here: it is in you, you have the power, to become a great singer, a true artist, if you have the will and the persistency, and will enter the right path. Once become that, and the whole world will be open to you, and furthermore the coffers of the wealthy and the high-born; and that not merely for the few years of youth. To be sure, the place where the great singer chiefly shines, the theatre, is—perhaps not wholly closed against you; but you will hardly ever find there your peculiar place. You are not pretty; and you have neither command nor knowledge of all the other means of producing effect upon the stage; even your figure and bearing are not in the least properly developed. Now certainly we will gladly help in all that as far as may be; but in a maiden, who is already almost seventeen, it is too late to expect anything remarkable in that line. You must become a concert and chamber singer, and, so far as depends upon yourself, you must remain such; that is to say, a singer upon whom are made, and justly made, the greatest claims, and who must execute whatever she undertakes to deliver—seeing that her audience have no other source of diversion, but observe the least minutiae—in the most perfect manner. Now an astonishing deal is required for that and it is a long way: but you can achieve it, and I will lead you into the way. You can do it, for you show firmness and persistency; your father says you are a stubborn creature. Be so; but turn the peculiarity to good account."—Gertrude comprehended, resolved, promised and kept the promise.

Hiller's instruction, which she enjoyed from this time forward, was not only the most simple and most natural, but also the most suited to its purpose. So far as actual singing was concerned, it was as follows: Every day without exception, early in the morning, she had to sing scales, from the full chest, through the whole compass of her tones, with perfectly pure intonation and with all the modifications from fortissimo to pianissimo, and the reverse. By this means not only her organs, but her tones themselves were enlarged and strengthened, so that each one, from the lowest to the highest, became fully equal to every other, and each so pure, that a wavering, or unequal, or impurely intonated tone seemed an impossibility with her. Then he taught her to enunciate distinctly and euphoniously; first mere vowels and then words. In the doctrine of harmony he carried her so far, that she felt every irregularity at once, so that afterwards she could yield herself to the suggestions of the moment without fear of mistakes. By the aid of a young musician he had her carried so far in piano-playing that she could accompany herself. If Hiller studied with her any larger vocal pieces, with a view to public performance, he first explained to her the sense of the text and the music; next he insisted that she should render it all note for note, strictly as it was written; but after that, in all that concerned expression or embellishment he left her to herself, and only gave advice when he was asked. Yet after the piece had been performed in public, he did not neglect, at the little oft-times frugal supper, to point out and explain both what had succeeded excellently well, and what had not gone wholly to his mind.

All this, with Gertrude's spirit, talent and truly astonishing industry, produced the finest results. As to her industry, she sang, unurged, for five or six hours every day; and frequently in these exercises it was only a single phrase or passage, which was not left until it would go perfectly. But as for all the other branches which Hiller and his friends endeavored to teach Gertrude,—whether scientific or practical, whether for general culture or for the world,—including some indispensable knowledge of some of the modern languages,—there was little progress. "Do not plague me," she would say; "I want to become a singer, and nothing more. What else do I need? And should I have use for it, it will easily be found."

Thus Gertrude's residence in Leipsic, in the house of Hiller, (from 1766 to 1771), was decisive of her destiny. She had opportunity enough to hear and study many of the most excellent and most various works of art, especially in church and concert music, under her master's conductorship, and even to shine in such herself. This raised, enriched, and formed her mind, expanded and ennobled her taste. Nor did she lack opportunities to become acquainted with foreign virtuosos, and, of those of her own country, especially with an amiable and extremely graceful rival, CORONA SCHRÖTER;—nor of gratifying an odd enough caprice of her own, of entering into competition with excellent instrumental players: this stimulated to new efforts and increased her skill. It was especially the works of Hasse, Graun, Benda, Jomelli and Pergolese, with which she here made herself acquainted, and in which she appeared; but Durante, too, and Sacchini, Porpora, Caldara and others were no strangers to her. For Pergolese, on account of his tendency to sentimentality, for which the capacity was not yet developed in her, or perhaps did not exist in her, she had no partiality; like Hiller himself, she was most fond of Hasse. And this perhaps because Hasse,—not to mention his well-known excellencies as an artist,—sketched his arias, duets, &c., with a noble breadth, yet very simply, and with a still simpler accompaniment, so that to a clever singer there was a broad, free field left open to her own mode of treatment. This was favorable to Gertrude, since the spirit of original invention had begun to develop itself most strikingly in her, under her master's guidance. Thus she has been heard to sing some of Hasse's principal arias, over and over, six or eight times publicly, and hence,—since these arias, after the custom of the time, consisted of two main divisions, of which the first was always repeated,—she sang these first divisions twelve or sixteen times: and yet never did she deviate in her embellishments from the expression and style of the piece;—and no wonder, with Hiller for a master! for such a liberty would have made the old man almost jump out of his skin.

In this way Gertrude, and in this way all great singers, formed their lofty school; and so they left the school to share the respect and attention of the world. If we dwell awhile in this contemplation of the past and compare the present with it, we can hardly help remarking, that singing then was really an Art, but now (with scarcely a few exceptions) a means of astonishing; then the public sought an inward satisfaction in it, now it seeks only to be stimulated and amused.

In the manner just now indicated Gertrude rendered lofty and animated pieces; those of a gentler and more inward feeling at that time she sang less willingly and less well. These were the domain of the deep-souled, graceful Corona. To do that, she required, besides the qualities already mentioned, also the most transcendent organ and the greatest flexibility of voice. The first she had; the second she made her own. Organs like hers are among the rarest gifts of fate, and in our days we have only known the like thereof, although in a far smaller compass of tones, in Madame CATALANI. Without being sharp or screaming in the least degree, Gertrude's voice was so powerful and full-toned, that one could distinguish it in the midst of the strongest chorus, with drums and trumpets accompanying. From this degree of strength she could diminish through all gradations to a tone so soft and yet so clear, that in passages for instance with an obligato instrument, the player scarcely knew whence to procure a tone that should be distinguishable, and yet not drown hers. And this control she exercised over the wide region of tones, (to use the technical language of musicians) from G unmarked to the thrice-marked E.

To acquire that flexibility and fluency, she set to work now with her characteristic "stubbornness." Whatever difficulties she could conceive of, she practiced all alone incessantly, till breast and throat could give the sounds out with the greatest certainty and ease, as if it were mere recreation; and what she could not herself conceive of, she would remark in the concert and other solos of the best instrumentists, whom Leipsic then possessed; especially the flutist, Tromlitz, and the violinists, Göpfert and Berger. Thus have these three worthy men, by their prompt, neat and elegant play, without their knowing or intending it, had a great influence in the developing of the singer into the virtuoso; for whatever cantabile passage came out finely on their instruments, Gertrude would imitate it in her singing, till she succeeded to the finest point.

[To be continued.]

Dragonetti.

Domenico Dragonetti, the celebrated performer on the double bass, was born in Venice, in 1771. His father, Pietro Dragonetti, was also a performer on that instrument, but by ear only; he excelled in accompanying a band at balls, and was likewise a professor of a sort of guitar with steel strings—an instrument which was at that time commonly in use for the purpose of teaching the chords in music. At nine years of age, Domenico, feeling an irresistible impulse towards music, applied himself to study, unknown to his parents, on the guitar of his father, and in a short time made incredible progress; so much so, indeed, that a certain Doretto, an excellent violinist and composer of ball music, having requested Peter to accompany him on the guitar in some of his compositions, and the son, Domenico, perceiving that his father did not perfectly well succeed, asked for the guitar, to accompany himself the composer. Peter, unconscious of the ability of his son, refused to satisfy him; Doretto, however, observing the boy's assurance, persuaded the father to cede the instrument to him. How great was the surprise which Domenico occasioned to both parties, when, taking the guitar in hand, he began to accompany the notes of Doretto with chords so exact and so masterly as to resemble much more those of an expert professor than a mere lad! Domenico having at that time an acquaintance named Giacomo Sciaradori, a shoemaker by trade, but who was a passable violinist, and knew a little of music, begged this man to be his instructor in the rudiments of violin playing. He very willingly undertook the office, and with this frail assistance alone, aided by his natural genius and perseverance, Domenico soon picked up, unknown to his father, a knowledge of the use and management of his double bass. Soon after this, another musical performance took place between his father and Doretto, when Peter played the double bass. The son then again proposed (as he had done before with the guitar) himself to accompany Doretto with the double bass; when, on his request being granted, his extraordinary advancement on the instrument was so highly appreciated by Doretto, that he earnestly begged the father to allow his son to play in public with him at some of the most brilliant musical parties of Venice.

He was at this time about twelve years of age, and, on the father's consenting to his public performance, his fame soon spread through that city as a most extraordinary instance of precocity of musical talent. He was now placed under the tuition of Berini, the best master for the double bass in Venice, and received from him eleven lessons, that number being found sufficient, as Berini could teach him nothing further. Young Dragonetti, now abandoning himself entirely to his genius, determined to carry the culture of his instrument to the highest possible point of perfection, and with this object in view, associated himself with his friend Mestrino, who, being likewise endowed with extraordinary talents for the violin, was engrossed by a similar desire of fame. The two students commenced, therefore, at the house of Dragonetti, the most scientific and accurate exercises on the violin and double bass, employing many hours of the day in various practical experiments on music not adapted to their instruments. To these exercises of execution they added the composition of capricci and other short pieces, which pursuits lasted for several years, whilst the two friends were engaged, almost every evening, at the most brilliant musical circles in Venice, and on their return from these assemblies, would frequently amuse crowds in the streets by serenading with the violin and guitar.

When Dragonetti was only thirteen years of age, he held, with great applause, the situation of first double bass at the Opera Buffa, at Venice; and when in his fourteenth year, he obtained the same rank in the orchestra of the Grand Opera Seria, at the theatre of St. Benetto, where he remained always employed during his stay in Italy. When about eighteen, being at Treviso, he was invited by the distinguished family of the Signori Tommasini to join in their quartets. At this mansion he met a nobleman named Morosini, procurator of St. Marco, who, astonished at the performance of Dragonetti, complimented him by observing, that he was only sure of his not being a performer at the chapel of St. Marco, because they had no double bass there equal to him. On his return to Venice, the office of principal double bass at the above chapel was offered to him and accepted. This was thought a peculiar honor, since the post was certainly already well filled by Berini, and it had been a previous rule in the chapel that the first places should be given by seniority. Dragonetti, however, did not willingly accept of this office, being hurt at the idea of superseding his old master Berini, whom he much loved and respected; so much so, that he was just on the point of refusing the proffered honor when Berini appeared in his chamber, and, embracing him, entreated that he would accept the situation, as he (Berini) had been complimented with increased salary, and was perfectly consented to resign in favor of so eminent a successor.

About a year after this time, Dragonetti was offered a very lucrative appointment in the service of the Emperor of Russia, on which occasion he applied to the procurators of St. Marco for permission to resign; so far, however, were they from acceding to his request, that they augmented his salary, and relieved him from the embarrassment of refusal, by taking that duty on themselves. He was now invited to perform at the magnificent musical meetings which were given in Venice on the occasion of the grand festival for the new doge. He was likewise employed, with the pay of a concerto performer, to take the solo and other violoncello parts in quartets with his double bass. At one of these meetings, which was most numerous attended, he was unexpectedly called upon for a concerto d' solo on his instrument, from which he tried to excuse himself, having with him no music of that description. This apology was, however, not accepted, and he was at length obliged to play a very difficult concerto, written for the bassoon. After this time, he set himself to work to compose concertos, sonatas, and solos for the double bass, in which he introduced passages to prove the superiority of his power over the instrument, and many of which were attended with difficulties which he alone was competent to overcome. Nor was the execution of these compositions long delayed; for shortly after this time, the republic of Venice received fourteen sovereign princes within their city, when they elected Dragonetti one of the directors of their great musical festivals on that occasion, at which meeting he formed the delight of his distinguished audience by the performance of his own music for the double bass. He was sometimes called on to perform seven or eight pieces on the same evening, and almost always those of his own composition. One of his concertos so delighted the Queen of Naples, that he was commanded to repeat it in all the evening performances, which were fourteen in number. He afterwards presented a copy of the concerto to the queen, which was most graciously received.

Dragonetti next went to Vicenza, where he played at the grand opera. It was at this town that he was so fortunate as to get possession of the celebrated double bass, manufactured by Gasparo di Salò, master of the famous Amati. This instrument had formerly belonged to the convent of St. Pietro. Delighted with so precious an acquisition, Dragonetti hastened to get the instrument repaired with the utmost skill, on the completion of which he made a trial of it in the hall of his residence at Vicenza. How great was his surprise, when, after a few sounds, he observed the servants running from a distant kitchen in alarm, many of the brass vessels on the shelves having vibrated so powerfully to the tones of the double bass as to ring and shake as if they were all ready to fall.

On quitting Vicenza, Dragonetti proceeded to Padua to pay his accustomed friendly visit to the inmates of the celebrated Convent of St. Giustina. He took his newly-acquired instrument with him, and, in describing its excellences to Signor Turvini Bertoni, the celebrated chapel-master and organist of the convent, ventured to express an opinion that the lower strings of it might be made to produce a more powerful effect than could be derived from the bass of the magnificent organ of the convent. Turvini treated this proposition with ridicule, which so piqued Dragonetti, that he resolved to have his little revenge, and accordingly furnished himself in private with some immensely thick bass strings, which at night he attached to his instrument. The weather was perfectly calm, and, when sleep reigned through the whole convent, he quietly carried his double bass into one of the spacious corridors, and there produced, from the thick strings, sounds so strange and characteristic, as precisely to counterfeited the rising of a horrid tempest. The imitation was so complete, that nothing was talked of the next morning in the convent but the storm of the preceding night. Great indeed was the surprise of the fraternity, when they discovered, from the neighbors, the weather had been unusually serene. On the following night, Dragonetti, having remained unsuspected, was desirous again to conjure up the spirits of the air; but, unluckily, he so alarmed one of the monks, that, rushing precipitately from his cell, he tumbled over the double bass, and the necromancer was thus discovered. After this anecdote, it may be well supposed that the organist allowed the double bass to be more powerful than his own instrument.

Dragonetti had now attained the age of twenty-four, and his fame as a performer being decidedly unrivalled in his own country, he was applied to by the celebrated singer Banti to make an engagement for London. In this request she was seconded by Bertoni, chapel-master of St. Marco, and Paechierotti the singer, both at that time in England, and who on their return to Italy, prevailed on Dragonetti to accept the proposals made to him. He accordingly took leave of the directors of the chapel of St. Marco, who kindly granted him a year's leave of absence, with a continuation of his salary for that period. Dragonetti remained in London the rest of his life, occupying without a rival the place of first double bass in the Royal Theatre and the concerts of the Philharmonic Society. He died in 1846.

* From the New York Musical Review and Advocate.

Music at the Museum;

OR MR. BANGUM'S BALCONY BRASS BAND.

Mr. Bangum was sitting in his office in the Museum the other day, when he heard a knock at the door.

"Come in," said he.

The door opened, and a trombone entered. Mr. Bangum stared. The trombone was followed by an arm, and the arm by a body, the body belonging to no less a personage than Mr. Eli Fant.

"Mr. Bangum?" said Mr. Fant inquiringly.

"That's my name," said that gentleman.

"Good morning," said Mr. Fant.

"Good morning," said Mr. Bangum.

"I see that you have a band on your balcony," began Mr. Fant.

"Yes," said Mr. Bangum.

"And I came to see if I could get a situation there as trombone."

"I presume you can," said Mr. Bangum, "if we can agree upon terms."

"During what hours should I play?" asked Mr. Fant.

"They usually play," said Mr. Bangum, "from two to three in the afternoon, and from six to eight in the evening."

"What is the place worth?" said Mr. Fant.

"Five dollars a week?" said Mr. Bangum inquiringly.

"Very well," said Mr. Fant, "with great satisfaction. He had not expected more than three or four."

"You can begin to-day if you like," said Mr. Bangum. "The payments are weekly."

"Very well," said Mr. Fant.

In accordance with this agreement, Mr. Fant's trombone did duty for a week on Bangum's balcony, and very hard, too, did Mr. Fant bone away on his trombone. At the end of the week, he called on Mr. Bangum for his week's salary.

"I will make out a bill if you like," said Mr. Bangum.

"If you please," said Mr. Fant.

After a little turning over of leaves and comparing of books, Mr. Bangum handed him the bill. He read it over once, twice, three times, looking every time more and more mystified. At last he said:

"Mr. Bangum, you have made a little mistake here, I believe."

"Eh?" said Mr. Bangum; "not that I am aware of."

"Yes," said Mr. Fant, smiling. He couldn't help smiling to think how Mr. Bangum would laugh when he learned what the mistake was.

"It's rather a funny mistake. I don't see how you came to make it. The bill reads:

"Mr. Eli Fant to P. T. Bangum, Dr.

"To privilege of playing a trombone in his museum for the week ending May 14, 1853,$5."

"Well," said Mr. Bangum, "I believe it was five dollars; wasn't it?"

"Y-es," said Mr. Fant, perplexed; "I believe it was. But I didn't look at it in that light."

"In what light did you look at it?" said Mr. Bangum.

"W-h-y," said Mr. Fant, still more perplexed, "I thought you paid me five dollars, not I you."

"Oho! no," said Mr. Bangum. "This is the state of the case. There are quite a number of persons in this city who wish to practise such instruments, but cannot do it at home, on account of disturbing the neighbors, so I let them a standing up place on the balcony; and each gentleman comes here, brings what instrument he likes, and practises whatever he wants to, without disturbing any body; that is, any body we care any thing about."

The office-door opened, and the trombone went out, followed by Mr. Fant; while Mr. Bangum proceeded to make out his bills against the other instruments. Mr. Fant has since given up the trombone. L. A.

Art in China.

The drama in China is at a very low ebb. It is still in the strolling state: such as it might have been when Thespis and his company declaimed from a wagon, or rather, such as it was in the middle ages, when mysteries were performed in the open streets and squares for popular edification.

A wealthy citizen, or, sometimes, the parish or municipality, hire a company of strollers, who erect their stage across a thoroughfare, with little respect for the public right of way. The entertainer and his friends occupy seats in front of the stage, and the tag-rag and bobtail stand in the rear.

The actors are mere boys, who are dressed in robes of silk and satin, rich with embroidery, but much tarnished and rumpled.

The subject of the play is usually taken from the life of some hero of mythology or history of China, and the plot is constructed with an attention to the unities of the drama that would have charmed a critic of the French school.

The narrative begins with the earliest events of the hero's existence, carrying them on in uninterrupted dulness to his apotheosis. The play usually takes hours, and some of them, I have been informed, some days. The spouting and posturing are varied by recitative singing in a shrill contralto key; and every scene begins and ends with banging of gongs and squealing of pipes, occasionally varied by the explosion of crackers, when the interest becomes thrilling, and some great event is enveloped in the noise and smoke, being left, in other respects, to the imagination of the audience.

There are some dramas which treat of the loves of the heroes, in which little is left to the imagination, although the dialogue is carried on in a lofty rant which never descends to comedy, much less to farce. With such taste, it is not surprising that this species of amusement is not in much repute, and that its professors should be classed with the mountebanks and vagabonds, to whose ranks they properly belong.

There are no moral lessons to be learned from the Chinese drama: it inculcates no good principles, nor does it hold the mirror up to nature. Buffoonery, coarse ribaldry, and exaggerated passion, are its chief characteristics: one cannot wonder at the low esteem in which it is held.

Music is not more advanced. All the singing is in an unnatural falsetto key, pitched as high as possible, so that anything more hideous and ludicrous than the sounds produced can scarcely be imagined. A tom cat caterwauling on the pan-tiles is the nearest approach I know to the vocal music of this refined nation. They frequently accompany the voice with a kind of violin, the scraping of which is sufficient to put one's teeth on edge. A lute with wire strings and a very wiry tone is sometimes used for the same purpose. The instrument, however, that is to be heard on all occasions, is a sort of pipe, very much resembling the bagpipe in tone.

The songs I have heard were all of very similar character, and were sung in short cadences, alternating with the symphony, reminding me very much of the Spanish seguidilla, as it is heard screeched by the muleteers in the mountain paths of Andalusia; only that while the muleteer screeches, the Chinaman howls in a way that would excite the sympathy of a whole kennel of bounds, compelling them to join in an obligato chorus.

Chinese poetry is on a par with the music. It either delights in namby-pamby sentimentality, or puerile conceits. Graceful metaphor, subtle allegory, warmth of sentiment, a picturesque feeling for the beauties of nature, are all utterly unknown; while plays-upon-words, and a studied arrangement of phrases, delight the most fastidious critics, and satisfy their taste.—London Leader.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

THE THREE LIGHT-HOUSES.

To guard the ancient harbor
Three blazing beacons stand,
And warn the coming sailor
Of the dangers of the land.

One on the frowning headland,
Where the long waves dash and roar,
One on the stout breakwater,
And one on the reef by the shore.

Far out across the waters
They seem to stretch the hand
Of the mariners' wives and daughters,
Who're waiting on the land.

By day, their snow-white columns,
Above the surges' roar
Do shout a silent welcome
To the ships as they near the shore.

Soon as the west is glowing
With the sun's last setting rays,
You may see the shining beacons
Gleam faintly through the haze.

But, as the darkness deepens
And deepens into night,
Red grows the blaze of the beacons,
And stronger grows their light.

Though the moon shine bright in heaven,
Though stars are in the sky,
Though blackest clouds are driven,
Though storms and tempests fly;

Ever the sleepless beacons
Their watch and ward do keep,
With blood-red eyes still gazing
Far out upon the deep.

And ever pointing heavenward,
By day and night they stand,
Faith, Hope, and Love, proclaiming
The lights of the Better Land.

W.

How it is Sometimes Done.

We know too much of the genial, buoyant, mighty West.

"Drawing (as it does) huge shoals of people like the moon, Whose beauty draws the solemn-noised seas." (Alex. Smith,) to make it the scene of all the stupid jests that swarm the brain of addled waggery; but the following evidence of erudition, both "ancient" and "modern," on the part of a Cincinnati singing-master, furnished us by a professor of music, who himself resides in the "Queen City," is certainly too good to be lost.

Our informant says he was one day last winter walking along one of the streets of Cincinnati, when his attention was attracted by a flaming poster on the opposite side of the way, beaded "SINGING-SCHOOL!"

Crossing over to see what new development was to take place in musical science, he read the following:

"All those who wish to be taught music in CLASSES as it was taught in ancient times by Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and MENDELSSOHN; and as it is taught in modern times by Mason, Webb, Hastings, Bradbury, and ZINER, will meet this evening," etc.

The misspelling of Zeuner's name, and the anachronism of putting Mendelssohn among the "ancients," is only equalled by making Handel, Haydn, etc., teach music in classes!—Musical Review.

VERDI'S MUSIC.—"I cannot," says the independent Irishman, "share the common prejudice against Verdi. His music seems to me fully equal to that of many operas we accept de confiance. It has life, brio, melody, movement. It is noisy, commonplace, but not dull. There are charming vocal effects in it, and occasionally exquisite phrases. If the instrumentation is poor, if the choruses are written in unison to conceal poverty of harmonic invention, if the trombones clang uproariously, these are defects I find abundant elsewhere, and therefore, on the whole, by way of variety, I welcome Verdi, and especially Verdi's best opera, Ernani."

A Theatrical Manager.

A Paris correspondent of the London Literary Gazette, relates the following curious transaction:—

The musical circles of Paris have been a good deal amused by a strange adventure. A few days ago, a man, well known, it appears, in certain circles of Paris for his extreme vanity, went to the director of the Grand Opera, and said, "Sir, I offer you £32,000 to make over your privilege to me!" "Thirty-two thousand pounds!" cried the stupefied director. "Are you serious?" "Perfectly," was the reply; "and, to convince you that I am so, I refer you to my friends Messrs. So-and-So, who will tell you that the money is ready to be paid the moment you accept my offer." The director hastened to the gentlemen named, and they confirmed the statement. Knowing that £32,000 do not drop from the clouds every day, the director declared his willingness to accept them; and immediately, by a formal agreement, resigned his privilege to the stranger. "And now," said the latter, "let the company be called before me."—Singers and musicians, dancers, and employés of all kinds, from the principal tenor down to the meanest candle-snuffer, appeared, with all due humility, in his dread presence.—Some he received affably, others coldly; of some he renewed the engagements, and others, with a haughty wave of the hand, he discharged. This done, he examined the list of free admissions, and struck off names by wholesale, and introduced others as freely. Then he ordered the architect to attend him. "What place is this I am in?" "The manager's room." "You must furnish it in more sumptuous style, and make such and such changes. What is that large room there?" "The place for the chorus to practice in." "Let the chorus go somewhere else, and transform it into my salle de reception. What rooms are those?" "The private apartments of the manager."—"Turn them into stables for my horses. What is that place?" "The practising-rooms of the corps de ballet." "Make it my kitchen." Having decreed these changes behind the scenes, the worthy gentleman gave orders for equally extensive ones in the stage body of the house. Everybody was thunderstruck at such grandeur, and well he might be. But as the Grand Opera belongs to the Government, it became necessary to obtain its consent to the nomination of the new and reforming director. Alas! however, for the great man; the government would not hear talk of him or his £32,000. And he was accordingly, without much ceremony, ejected from the theatre, to, it must be said, the great delight of everybody connected with it. The moral of this adventure is, that the French have sometimes a very strange way indeed of doing strange things.

A Triumphant March to the Opera.

[A Spanish paper at Lima thus records the second appearance of Madame BISACCANTI, at the theatre:]

On the sixteenth of the present month, (May,) it was announced in the usual manner that Donna Eliza Bisaccianti would present herself in our new theatre, to favor us with the opera of Ernani. Since the preceding night, when we had seen her in La Sonnambula on the occasion of her inimitable first appearance, she had elicited, on all sides, indescribable praises; but yesterday, the day of the announcement to which we refer, hardly anything was talked of from an early hour but the theatrical success which awaited the prima donna, Biscaccianti, on the coming night; so that every one had taken care to provide in the morning a supply of natural flowers, garlands and wreaths, or doves dressed in ribbons, and adorned with various emblems appropriate to the purpose for which they were designed. The expected night arrived, and at three-quarters past six o'clock there stood, at the doorway of the Hotel de Morin, where the noble lady resides, a beautiful coach drawn by a superb span of horses, with two servants on the box, to convey her to the theatre: it was the coach of D. D. Buenaventura Seoane, President of the Tribunal de Cuentas, who on the said day had accompanied Madame B. to the baptism of an infant daughter of Senor Lorini, the manager of the theatre.

Around the coach were seen six servants, bearing torches to illuminate the triumphal march of the heroine and her distinguished companion, whose cortège marched in the following manner: An immense crowd of people opened the procession; the coach followed, surrounded by gentlemen of the country and many strangers, among whom we noticed the principals of various commercial houses, as well as some officers of state and several military gentlemen; behind the coach came the band of music of the battalion Pinchincha, playing elegant national airs, and followed by a multitude of people.

The great crowd passed thus through the streets of Mercaderes, Espaderos and Lescane, to the square of the principal theatre, shouting on all sides "Viva la Señora Biscaccianti! Viva the glory of the theatre of Lima! Viva the Queen of Songstresses!" and a thousand other vivas in honor of the lady. One of her admirers, carried away by his enthusiasm, shouted "Viva!" Biscaccianti is the soul of Bellini, of Donizetti, of Rossini, and the rest of the composers!" and all the people responded Viva!!!

In this manner, and in crowds, we entered the theatre, which was already filled at a very early hour with a numerous concourse, waiting to enjoy Ernani. The moment of beholding Biscaccianti upon the stage was that in which all sought to salute her. Her entrance was greeted with a shower of applause and the different acclamations, and as well in this act as in each of the succeeding scenes in which, now alone, now accompanied, Elvira has to sing, the friends of the illustrious artist, and the united audience, poured forth their delight anew, in wreaths, bouquets, and trinkets.

At the conclusion of the beautiful cavatina "Ernani involami," there darted upon the stage an immense floral branch, composed of natural and artificial flowers interwoven, and bound at the centre and the extremities with three precious and rich gold chains. The concussion which this giant of the Lirarian gardens made in falling, was like a death-blow to any lyrical reputation which shall venture to follow Biscaccianti upon the stage.

Both at the entrance and the exit of our unequalled Eliza, brilliant fireworks were displayed. Passing out from the theatre on her return homeward, she had on her right and left two bands of music, that of the corps of artillery and that of the battalion Pinchincha; her most intimate friends surrounded the coach, bearing the bouquets and wreaths which were the trophies cast at her feet upon the stage; within the coach she was accompanied by her enthusiastic and intimate friend, D. Juan Soba Potillo; the large floral branch was carried on the step, so that it appeared that our Eliza was marching over a pathway of flowers. The same cortège which had before attended her, with a still greater number of citizens and friends, accompanied her from the doorway of the theatre, all pronouncing new vivas, new acclamations. Thus this deified woman was escorted to her home.

Meyerbeer's own Opinion of the "Huguenots."

MR. EDITOR:—The following trifling anecdote might come in as an appendix to the article in your paper of July 2d, upon the "Huguenots."

During one of the performances of Robert le Diable, Rossini happened to be in the same box with Meyerbeer, and apparently was so much pleased that he said to Meyerbeer: "If you compose anything better than this, I will dance on my head." "In that case," said Meyerbeer, "I advise you to commence practising, as I am now writing the 'Huguenots,' which I think will be far superior to Robert." W. K.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

ON THE BEARD.

Tertullian, cloistered, old, with kindling eye,
Through reverend lips twice touch'd with grace
Cried out, "To shave the beard is blasphemous Against the human face!"

Thy thought, an urn of light, O prophet true!
Drops lustre on one English line:
Thence studious Milton oddly haply drew
His "human face divine."

Now golden visions, on the sea of dreams,
Uprise from many an Eastern clime,
And on my view a shadowy glory streams
From many a form sublime.

The beard marks each: O'er Moses' breast it flows,
And when the cloudy column wakes
In flame, its massive undulation glows,
In Sinai's tempest shakes.

A light on that grand head, those godlike lips—
The Greek's keen guess at the Divine—
It trembles, when Jove's words the spirit eclipse
Of his deep eyes benign.

Round Fletcher's mouth in curling gold it plays!
The fiery breath of genius flies
Through its divided and luxuriant maze,
Where England's worthies rise.

It shines, pure snow, on Titian's face, for whom Italian suns in glory set;
On Ariosto's chin an amber gloom
With bright red wine drops wet.

Its arc of beauty spanning one pure mouth,
Descending with majestic flow,
Graces the noblest son of all the south,
Chaste Michael Angelo!

Spirits of power dwell where thy chisel wrought
Prayer in the atmosphere of Rome,
Where, swell'd by breathings of thy pious thought,
Floats Peter's ponderous dome.

Bard, builder, sculptor, lover! Of these names,
The last the least dare I refuse
To him whose verse, tender, ethereal, shames
Smooth Petrarch's sensuous muse.

Ah, manly men and golden days of old,
Ye vanish from my longing eyes;
In your blest places things of feeble mould
And forms fantastic rise.

A beardless, pale, or fancy-whisker'd herd;
Among them some, not all unmann'd,
Have, from the imperial body of the beard,
Cut but the Caesar hand.

Yet Nature smiles on every loyal soul,
Though giggling women pass him by;
And Fortune writes his name on her bright scroll:
A loyal soul am I!

Whose full beard flows like modulations of Tide waves on some resounding beach;
Or bright brown waterfall, poised clear above
The thunder of his speech.

Our line bears one lov'd child, whose presence lights
A home where southern suns arise:
And tender dreams from starr'd, still, tropic nights,
Sleep deep in her dark eyes!

Niagara laughs hugely in the sun,
Through beard of snows with godlike glee;
And holds his solemn court when day is done,
In moonlit mystery.

A child's face, bright with laughter, wet with tears,
Is grander than all waterfalls:
Sooner its gentle voice the Almighty hears,
Than their sonorous calls.

She met me by that wonder one May morn;
Around my neck her arms she threw,
And from these lips young love had nigh forsworn,
Their nested kisses drew!

Still in the hallowed home of one pure breast,
One love abides for aye the same,
From the first cry unto the final rest—
Alike through praise and blame.

My mother's eyes are large, full-fringed and deep,
And gray and hopeful as the dawn;
Beneath a Juno brow they smile or weep,
In lines Olympian drawn.

They stream on me, whene'er we part or meet,
(My kiss of salutation shrined
From touch less pure,) with ample influence sweet,
The daylight of her mind.

My bearded mouth one crowning blessing bears,
Sacred from speech, without alloy—
Fruition of the hope of patient years;
Let Silence wait on Joy.

So Nature, kind, above man's wayward will,
And his deforming fancy's dream,
Holds her pure laws of use and beauty still Unerring and supreme. *

Strictures upon the Stage,

AS IT EXISTS IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

IV. TRUTH OF EARTH AND SKY NEGLECTED.

We have been 'striking wide at Greeks,' aiming at large things and overlooking small, rejoicing in finishing touches and neglecting rudimentary ones; but small things, of apparently minor interest, are of the utmost importance. And such now challenge our attention. To return—simple and smiling Nature is offended with us, (I speak for the Stage) she will not visit our Theatre, indeed she cannot: for there is neither Earth to tread upon, nor Sky to canopy her. No, the Stage possesses neither earth nor sky. Oh, what an arena for the due representation of such dramas as the world never saw before, and can never see surpassed! Can we imagine Bosworth Field, or the Field of Agincourt, by looking at this horn-piper's board before us, decorated with those miserable, childish, contemptible pieces of straight scenery, representing banks, called foot-pieces; and surmounted by those equally contemptible straight bars of blue canvass, called sky-pieces?

Modern landscape painters have not been content with such generalization in clouds, as was once considered sufficient; but every altitude, with its peculiar cloud formation, is represented upon their canvass. (As the hour of noon, or sunrise, or five minutes before sunset, is told by their shadows.) This being understood in the arts, shall we remain content with this vile pretence at representing sky?

Bars of blue, not only so carelessly painted that they do not gradually decrease in depth of color, but also so clumsily contrived and placed that we see between them, catching sight perhaps of a coach and horses, or a chandelier, or anything else, in fact, that you would never expect to find hanging on the "horns of the moon." But that is not half so bad, as the boards of the stage. This makes a mockery of every field of battle, and is enough to turn into ridicule the catastrophe of nearly every great play that terminates in warlike strife.

Do not imagine that I am now speaking of impossibilities; or that this cannot be materially amended; for these things have already been done in a particular effort to aid a new play, to attract and delight for the time, but never as a permanent improvement. As an instance:—When Madame Vestris had the management of Covent Garden Theatre, a few years since, was produced for the first time Sheridan Knowles's new play of 'Love.' In the scene in which the tree under which Huon, I think, is standing, is struck with lightning, the stage (the boards being every where concealed by a painted covering) had all the appearance of a park, with its slopes and banks, and irregular trees and shady avenues. All that could have been desired was achieved. It was an illusion such as I never saw before upon the stage, and particularly valuable, as showing us what can be done in this respect.

In the name of all that is natural, what advances can we be said to have made towards rendering a dramatic representation perfect, when we have never yet managed the bare ground for the characters to walk upon! What is the utility of all the rest? Their dressing in boots, cloaks, hats, feathers, &c., to come and walk before us on those smooth ball-room boards? It is all useless. Such a mass of imperfection is to be found nowhere else.

It is indispensable that these boards should be covered in every out-door scene. And once commenced there would be in good time a regular series of these "ground-pieces," (affixed, possibly, to the rollers at the back of the stage) representing different formations and varieties of ground structure; representing the rocky and uneven surface of highland districts, or meadow-field land, or the latter torn up and broken by the action of battle; and every variety of ground surface, natural or artificial, upon which the scene may be laid. By these adjuncts, much of the labor and skill in making paintings, that is now lavished on what is called "the scene," would be dispensed with; every stage would appear infinitely larger, for the scene and the stage would be one;—and the scenery would cost less money than it does at present, for all of it would be much more permanent. Good taste in the scenic art, would save much labor in vain, (indeed I might say much pains-taking to do mischief only, by bright lights and brilliant coloring which tend only to kill the costumes that are placed in the foreground); and adopt the more easy task of accomplishing a quiet tone to be a suitable background to the action.

[To be continued.]

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 16, 1853.

Harmony and Melody.

HARMONY is the heart, the mainspring and origin of music. Harmony is the elder sister, rather say the parent of Melody. Harmony is first, as Love is; Melody is derived from it, as Intelligence is derived from Love. Harmony is founded purely in nature, her immediate offspring. The vibrations of a tone generate first the tones which harmonize with it. Each sound naturally accompanies itself with the other notes of its accord. You have but to listen to the sound of a bell, or the string of an instrument tuned to any note, to become aware of its Third and Fifth in higher octaves, forming the perfect Common Chord. Above that, the Perfect Seventh, and so on.

In horns and trumpets these harmonic intervals yield themselves spontaneously as you blow harder. They are the natural scale of all such instruments. This natural or harmonic scale of notes, produced in this way, is very different from the melodic scale. It ascends by Thirds, the most pleasing consonant intervals. Melody results from dissonance, from the introduction or interpolation between these harmonic Thirds of the notes which do not accord with them, simply because they differ less in pitch. Melody deals with smaller intervals, and constructs its scale in a more finely graduated ascending progression, wherein each sound is succeeded by the one whose pitch is least above its own. Now the concord between two notes is (to a certain point) inversely as their distances; those which are immediately contiguous to each other will not harmonize.

Harmony, therefore, classes by agreement and affinity; Melody classes by differences and antipathies, which it arranges into beautiful and complete series. Harmony is the expansion of the ONE; Melody is the escape from unity, the tendency to individuality and variety. Harmony is fixed and constant; Melody is discursive. Harmony gives all in One; Melody gives one after another, and would straightway run off into utter forgetfulness of its first starting-point, did not the centripetal law of Harmony lurking behind, though unperceived, recall its steps and round its course into a graceful orbit. So all thought is prompted by a sentiment and must be true to that, or what consistency is there after all in all its logic?—Harmony, then, is the combining, unitary tendency in music; it constitutes the atmosphere of the picture, and determines its whole sphere of sentiment. It is the pervading spirit of the composition, whether song, or symphony or chorus. If it is not expressed in the way of an actual accompaniment, still the truly musical hearer feels it to be understood and implied, as the invisible ground-work of the air or tune.

MELODY, on the contrary, (which of course implies Rhythm) is the unfolding and spreading out of harmonies or chords into orderly sequence, connecting the wide consonant intervals by intermediate notes, which can only bear to be heard in succession, (excepting of course those cases in which discord is desirable as preparation for harmony.) It is the restless and progressive tendency, which wearies of the richest, grandest and the most complete effect of simultaneous concord, and stimulates each part or voice to detach itself and move along. It would be taking steps continually; it denies or qualifies what was last asserted and takes a new position, passes into a tone that bears no necessary affinity to the first, and through this to another equally discordant with the second, but agreeing with the first.

Her first work, therefore, is to construct a scale of tones through which she may range. Remember, Harmony is secretly at the bottom of this scale, though Melody seems to make it of herself. She (Melody) graduates the sounds into a regular series of Seven, corresponding to the seven colors of the rainbow; and through the whole range of audible sounds this peculiar series of Seven repeats itself, higher or lower, in such wise that the same degrees or steps in these series correspond and form an accord of perfect identity. Each of the seven notes derives its character from its relation to the Key-note or Tonic of the Scale or Series; and the Diatonic scale itself, so called, is but the unfolding in gradual sequence of what is implied in one tone. Presently it appears that each of these seven may become in turn a Key-note and may be unfolded into its Scale or Series of Seven in a similar manner. But the intervals between the seven notes are not of equal lengths; two of them are only half-steps: to form a new scale, therefore, based on a new tone, new notes must be introduced. Hence the origin of the Five Semi-tones, the Flats and Sharps, which are the transitional element, by whose mediation only can there be any modulation into new keys or scales. These, ranged in gradual progression amongst the original Seven, give us a new Series of Twelve, or what is termed the Chromatic Scale.

Harmony creates combinations, therefore, while Melody creates series. Harmony attracts, melts, blends into one; Melody distributes, bound, however, in her distributions by the nature of Harmony, which generates all her tones, and which says: Of the infinitely various shades of tone imaginable between any two given degrees of pitch, thou shalt use only these tones and no others, these which are of such fixed proportionate distances from each other, that their very differences may help to enrich my harmony."

Now mark the intimate connection between Melody and Discord. Discords (so long as no sounds enter which do not belong to the true scale) are not only tolerable in composition, but they even enrich and enliven the effects of Harmony. The discordant element always is thrust in by the movements of Melody. When what should be successive becomes simultaneous, there is temporary discord. Hold back a note that should move on, so that it finds itself in the midst of a new chord, and a certain jar of dissonance ensues. So if a note of a coming chord is anticipated, while the last chord continues to sound. In fact discord, (such as is legitimate in music, that is, such as does not borrow any sounds out of the prescribed scale or series,) is merely the confounding of tenses, Present, Past and Future. As the full ranks advance, a member of one falls back into the rank behind his own, or overtakes the one before. Have we not states of feeling much analogous to this? and is not the momentary dissonance of the co-presence of two states of consciousness, the meeting but not blending of a past state with the present, followed as it always soon is by a happy resolution, one of the richest experiences? Our passions have their laws of Concord, Discord, and Modulation, too, by which their music grows so rich and complex.

Music for the Piano-Forte.

Among the recent foreign publications, we notice two that are especially worthy of the attention of pianists.

The first is "Twenty-Four Preludes in all the Keys," by STEPHEN HELLER. Op. 81. Published by Ewer & Co., London. Heller is one of the most original, deeply poetic, and infallibly graceful of all the modern composers for the piano. There is always meaning, sentiment, and a certain delicate and subtle individuality in what he writes. Many of his choicest things too are far from difficult in respect of mere mechanical execution. After Chopin he is perhaps the finest of these modern poets of the piano, and he is very much more accessible to ordinary powers of execution, though he has written things that tax the wrists and fingers quite severely—witness his superb Caprice Symphonique, which plunges on like a roaring cataract, with unrelaxing speed and glorious abandon, through some thirty pages! His lighter pieces, like the Etudes, the Promenades d'un Solitaire, &c., are easy as well as fascinating, and must wherever they are known ensure a welcome to a new work of Heller. Of these Preludes the London Musical World says:

Whatever M. Stephen Heller undertakes, he undertakes con amore. In the preludes before us, combined with their evident utility, we find strongly manifested that poetic feeling which gives a charm so individual and so captivating to all the compositions of the author. They are most of them short, but there is not one that does not develop some entirely new thought, and some fine points of musicianship. We cannot imagine more delightful practice for the pianist who wishes to attain style while vanquishing mechanical defects. Each prelude has its special air, and each its particular character. From the first, in C—"Très modéré, avec sérénité"—to the 24th and last, in D minor—"D'une expression plaintive"—there is not one that is uninteresting. The forty-five pages, of which the publication consists, literally sparkle with beauties, like brilliants in a jewelled diadem.

We recommend them, without reserve, to all who profess the instrument, and like good music better than mere trifling. None can study without advantage, none without ample pleasure.

The other is one of the chivalric exploits of LISZT, being no less than an arrangement for two pianos of Beethoven's Ninth or "Choral" Symphony. With two Liszt's to play it, it might perhaps amount to something; but it must require more than a Liszt-ian energy to compress the colossal and sublime expansion of the last or choral movement into a piano-forte abridgment. The first movement or Allegro one can conceive it possible to reproduce in that way somewhat satisfactorily; the Adagio too might yield a reminiscence of the orchestra, but in mere outline, destitute of all the exquisite instrumental coloring. The Scherzo again must be but a feeble, lifeless shadow of the original. Liszt, however, always comprehends his author well, and performs these labors of love reverently. We have it on the authority of the Athenæum critic that he has arranged this symphony with genius, skill and good sense.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

MUSIC ON THE COMMON. The experiment succeeds beyond doubt or cavil. The music might be better, with larger and more especial organization, but under the circumstances it has been very good, and has been drunk in with every sign of attention and delight by a continually increasing crowd of listeners. There could not have been fewer than ten thousand persons, of all ages and classes, on the Common the two last times. And the scene was magical, with the purple sunset blending into moonlight, (just that witching and poetic light of Allston's Lorenzo and Jessica!) and the gas-lights softly gleaming under the massive foliage of the trees, or dancing on the glossy waters of our pretty fountain lake, (if so we may dignify the old "Frog-pond.") A favorite station this for hearing; for the sound comes larger and richer over the little intervening sheet of water.

So far there has not been an instance of positive insult or outrage in all that promiscuous crowd. Certain tunes, to be sure, of the hacknied, national, or negro kind, are apt to produce noise, by appealing to the peculiar sympathies of the noisy; and therefore the bands have done wisely to reserve their "Wood Ups," and their "Yankee Doodles," to the last hour.

Making our way the other evening through the denser crowd upon the hill, immediately around the stage, we were almost awed by the intense and palpable silence of the listeners. Verily, the brass bands have their earnest amateurs and dilettanti! But it is plain to common sense, that the music would be audible to a much larger circle, were it to proceed from the hollow, instead of from the breezy hill.

The Brigade, the Suffolk, and Bond's Cornet Bands have all done good service. The engagements of the Germania Serenade Band do not admit of their appearing until next Saturday evening (July 23d). The other evenings assigned them are Wednesday, August 10th, and Saturday, August 27th. They will discourse sweet sounds from melodious reeds, as well as horns.

BROOKLINE, DORCHESTER, & C.—It seems, we scarcely did justice to our suburban friends, in speaking of their summer evening music. Instead of taking the key-note from the city, they may be said rather to have set it. One writes us: "We had music in Brookline summer before last, having given the Germania Serenade Band their very first engagement, and were followed by Dorchester and Jamaica Plain; and long before the matter was decided in Boston this season, our subscription was collected and the reed band engaged." The Brookline concerts have attained even to the dignity of regular programmes.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—Since our last summary Grisi has appeared in Norma, and BOSIO as the princess, with CASTELLAN as Alice, in Roberto il Diavolo. Bosio produced a great impression, especially in her Robert, toi que j'aime, which still shines out among the purest reminiscences of our Boston concerts. This was followed by MARIO, FORMES, & C., in the never-failing Huguenots.

The next event has been the début of Madame MEDORI in Maria di Rohan. This lady has been pronounced by the connoisseurs of St. Petersburg to be the legitimate successor of Grisi. Her success, although the character of Maria was thought a poor one for her début, appears to have been very decided, and London dilettanti congratulate each other, now that Viardot Garcia has left the stage, and Grisi has restricted herself to a few parts, that a new goddess has descended. Mme. Medori's next personation, it is said, will be Mozart's Donna Anna; this will test her; but who, it is asked, will be the Don Juan? who the Elvira? The Musical World of June 25th says:

Madame Medori in person is somewhat large, but finely made. Her actions are natural, her motions free, and her attitudes striking and expressive. Perhaps there is too much freedom in her gait, which may detract from the dignity of her appearance. But it must be remembered that Maria is no queen-heroine, or classic dame. * * * The general opinion entertained, we believe, was, that she possessed an expressive and intelligent countenance rather than a beautiful one; and that her features were cast in the Gallic rather than in the Ansonian mould. * * * Of Madame Medori's voice we can speak with positive assurance. It is a magnificent soprano, large, thick, powerful, and brilliant. In quality it hardly possesses the roundness, richness, or voluptuous sympathy of the Italian soprano organ. It is a little in the throat, more especially in the middle register, and does not proceed pure and clear from the chest, like Alboni's, Grisi's, Viardot's, or most of the best Italians. Madame Medori's intonation is perfect. She invariably sings in tune, exquisitely in tune, and whatever note she attacks, she accomplishes it with the precision of a mechanical instrument. Her upper notes are deliciously pellucid and bell-like in quality, and, like Jenny Lind's, satisfy to the full the most sensitive ear. * * * As a bravura vocalist, we are inclined to think that Madame Medori will find her superiors at the Royal Italian Opera. She doubtless vocalises with much facility, but her execution is nothing out of the common way.

Verdi's Rigoletto "drew a host of fashionables" to a fourth performance, but "the pit was roomy, and the amphitheatre not crowded."—Lucrezia Borgia was given on an extra night, with a new ballet, called Fleur-de-lis. In the next cast of the Prophète, Tedesco is engaged for Fides in place of Grisi, who resigns all interest in the part, and Tambrlik for Jean, in place of Mario. For the 25th, Berlioz's Benvenuto Cellini was announced for the first time.

Mlle. CLAUS.—The concert of the young German pianist (June 15th) was a brilliant affair. Her own performances were Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor, with Molière and Piatti; one of Handel's Suites de Pièces; Beethoven's Sonata in C, op. 53; and finally a selection of morceaux, consisting of (1) a Presto Leggero from Suites de Pièces by W. Sterndale Bennett, (2) Andante in E flat, from 6th book of Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte, and (3) a Rondo Brilliant of Weber. In all she elicited the warmest praise. Of the second and third pieces the Musical World says:

The 8th suite of Handel, which we never heard played in public before, was quite a treat. The prelude was given with the proper gravity—the fugue with point and firmness—the ollemande, and courante with an indefinable grace, destitute of affectation—and the gigue with a vivacity that left nothing to be desired. The pale girl, with the luxuriant hair—a very type of the German ideal—by the magic of her fingers, and the magnetism of her soul, brought vividly before us the mighty old musician, with his copious wig; while the tinkling harpsichord was realised in the special sharpness of the Erardian tone. The illusion was perfect, and the pleasure of the hearers amply, heartily expressed.

COLOGNE CHORAL UNION.—The London Musical World says:

Their success has been almost without precedent. The ten concerts, especially the seven at the Hanover-square Rooms, were all crowded, and at the majority of them money was refused at the doors. Mr. Mitchell's speculation was a bold one, but it has entirely succeeded; and we understand that the members of the Union will carry over with them about £800 (their share of the profits), to be applied to the funds in aid of the completion of the great cathedral at Cologne. No such choral execution has been previously heard in England.

The repertoire of the Cologne Choral Union, as we have already hinted, might be improved. The character of the pieces is too generally effeminate and trivial. The manliness of the original Liedertafel has not been preserved, and what was once the rule has now become the exception. Some few pieces of Weber, Mendelssohn, and Ferdinand Hiller alone supported the musical reputation of the performances. The fault, however, does not rest exclusively with the Choral Union of Cologne, since the national song has deteriorated all over Germany; and there is not a single society whose efforts are directed to its restoration. The intercourse with France and Italy has corrupted, instead of refining, the music of the people; and the worst faults of two foreign schools have been engrafted on what was once vigorous and healthy.

MR. BENEDICT'S ANNUAL CONCERT took place on the 22d ult. This gentleman seems to be highly popular with all the artists; at least he has the faculty of marshalling them all about him, when he gives a concert once in a year in his own name. On this occasion his programme embraced more than thirty pieces (!) He had a full orchestra, namely the entire Orchestral Union, under Alfred Mellon, who performed Mendelssohn's Ruy Blas overture and Meyerbeer's march from the "Camp of Silesia." Then what a list of vocalists! To wit:

Mesdames Pauline Viardot Garcia, Clara Novello, Marchesi, F. Lablache, and Sims Reeves, Mademoiselle Agnes Bury, Misses Williams and Dolby, Signors Gurdoni, Ciabatta, Burdini, F. Lablache, Marchesi, and Gnglielmi, Herren Pischek and Reichart, Messrs. Weiss and Sims Reeves—a formidable host to make serviceable and tractable. Mr. Benedict, however, is an experienced hand in resolving such difficult problems, and all of these ladies and gentlemen had something effective to sing. Among the good things were a beautiful air from Mozart's Seraglio, well given by Herr Reichart, and a very interesting specimen from the Italian "Chamber duets," of Handel ("Che via pensando"), admirably scored for the orchestra by Ferdinand Hiller, and sung by Madame and Signor Marchesi; the "Deh vieni non tardar," from Figaro, sung by Madame Novello as no one else has sung it since Jenny Lind, at Her Majesty's Theatre; the unaccompanied trio, "Lift thine eyes," from Elijah, allotted to Mademoiselle Agnes Bury, Mesdames Marchesi, Lablache, &c.

There was also a selection from Benedict's own compositions: the overture to his Minnesinger; a very dramatic scena from his "Crusaders," composed originally for and now sung by Herr Pischek; several ballads; a choral part-song; a German lied; and finally a bravura duet for piano and violin, played by the composer and M. Vieuxtemps.

Bottesioi gave one of his marvellous displays of the double bass; M.M. Saindon and Vieuxtemps a duet of Spohr's for violin and alto; and Herr Reichert, from Brussels, an astonishing flute solo. So much for the solos. Then came the "classical" point of the programme, which was no less than that "triple Concerto" of Bach, which we heard last winter in our friend Dresel's concerts, and which was executed this time by three such famous pianists as Miss Arabella Goddard, M. Benedict, and Mr. Ferdinand Hiller; "each of them introduced a cadenza at the point d'orgue in the first movement, that of M. Hiller being a masterly improvisation in a style that few pianists of the present era could approach."—But we are not through yet.

One of Madame Viardot's quaint and humorous Spanish songs (accompanied by herself); the duet, "Da qual di," sung with great effect by Mr. and Mrs. Sims Reeves; Mozart's impressive aria, "Io ti lascio," given by Miss Dolby with Mozartean purity (and accompanied by Mr. Lindsay Sloper); Purcell's vigorous song and chorus, "Come if ye dare," sung by Mr. Sims Reeves as no one else can sing it now, and the sparkling bass air from Mendelssohn's operetta, Son and Stranger (Heimkehr), "I am a roamer," which Mr. Weiss has made his own, were noticeable points in the third part of the concert. Several quartets, quintets, &c., in which some of the principal singers joined, enriched the selection, one of the best and most varied ever provided by Mr. Benedict for his fashionable patrons.

The concert began at twelve and lasted till half-past six (!), and the room, it is said, was more than three parts full at the conclusion. Verily, they have musical appetites in England!

Miscellaneous.

Galli, one of the greatest hñffo singers of the Italian stage, has just died at Paris, aged 70. He was a native of Rome, and made his debut at Bologna in 1804. He sang for the first time at Paris, in 1825, where he was engaged at the Italian at a salary of 25,000 francs for six months. Rossini wrote for him "L'Inganno Felice," "L'Italiano in Algeri," "Il Turco in Italia," "Torvaldo," "La Cenerentola," "La Gozza Ladra," "Maometto," and "La Semiramide." Lablache was his legitimate successor in the principal parts written for him.

Signor Rossini, on being applied to by the Emperor of France to furnish a new score to the Grand Opera, the composer of "William Tell" is said to have declined, stating that his musical career was finished, but offering a Mass for the Coronation.

An attempt was recently made in Paris to perform a Spanish opera, "Maravilla," which most signally failed. About one half the singers were French, and the other half Italian.

M. Dababie, for many years belonging to the Grand Opera of Paris, died recently, aged 55. He was one of the singers in the original casts of Spontini's "La Vestale," and "Fernand Cortez," Rossini's "Count Ory," and "Moise," and Anber's "La Muette."

"L'Italiana," one of Rossini's operas, was recently revived at Milan. And what seemed not a little odd, the "Isabella" was an English lady who sings under the assumed name of Signora Giulia Amedei, and who is described as being "not without talent."

A new theatre has just been erected in the small town of Baden. It was inaugurated by Schiller's "Joan of Arc," proceeded by a prologue set to music by Strauss. It will amply accommodate an audience of 2,200 persons.

Advertisements.

The best Book on Piano Instruction existing!

IN PRE-S.—JULIUS KNORR'S GUIDE FOR TEACHERS ON THE PIANO. A full system of instruction, from the very outset, to artistic perfection, with full advice to teachers and pupils. Its progressive order, completeness, and the value of the pieces recommended, (about 200,) make it indispensable to teachers, and invaluable to all players. It is

THE BEST SELF-INSTRUCTOR EXTANT.

It is also THE ONLY KEY to the proper use of Julius Knorr's "Materials," and his "Large Method." Price 75 cents.

G. A. SCHMITT, Petersburg, Va.

iii 14 3m

L. O. EMERSON,

Teacher of the Piano-Forte and Singing.

APPLY AT HIS RESIDENCE,

No. 12 INDIANA PLACE, BOSTON.

iii 13 3m.

A. W. FRENZEL,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC, and late Leader of the "Saxonia Orchestra," having made Boston his residence, is prepared to give Lessons on the Piano-Forte and in Singing, both in the English and German languages; also to accompany with the violin more advanced pupils in the Sonata-duos of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c. During the summer season, Mr. F. offers his services to classes out of town. Or he will receive scholars, from the city or the country, at his Music Rooms, No. 4 Pine Street, Boston, where he may always be found before 10 A. M., and between the hours of 1 and 3 P. M.

iii 6

JONAS CHICKERING,

RESPECTFULLY gives notice to his friends and the public that, having recovered from the late disastrous effects produced by the destruction of his factory, he is now ready to receive orders for PIANOS, which he promises to execute with as much faithfulness and promptitude as heretofore.

379 Washington Street, Boston.

Mar. 5.

tf

HEWS' PATENT

AMERICAN ACTION PIANOFORTE.

THE MANUFACTURER is in possession of numerous testimonials from distinguished Musical Professors, who have used the greatly improved ACTION PIANO, commending it in high terms. The attention of purchasers and amateurs of Music to an examination of its superiority, is solicited.

GEO. HEWS, 365 Washington St., Boston.

Apr. 10.

tf

BEETHOVEN'S CELEBRATED MASS in C,

IN VOCAL SCORE:

With an Accompaniment for the Organ or Piano-Forte, by Vincent Novello. With Latin and English text. Just published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

Sold by all Music Dealers.

iii 4

THE SYMPHONIES OF BEETHOVEN:—ARRANGED FOR THE PIANO-FORTE by J. N. HUMMEL. The above excellent compositions are now in course of publication by the subscriber.

Symphony No. 7, in A, op. 92, is now ready.

Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

Sold by all Music Dealers.

iii 4

—Edward L. Balch,

BERTINI'S PIANO METHOD—ABRIDGED.

The popularity of Bertini's Celebrated Method for the Piano is sufficient evidence of its great merits. The only objection ever made to the Method has been that the elaborateness with which the subject is treated, renders the task of commencing and completing it, somewhat arduous, and to a young pupil a formidable undertaking.

Teachers as well as scholars have, therefore, seen the want of an Abridged Edition, in which all that was actually necessary might be included—an edition containing the choicest and most important lessons; one that might be commenced and finished by those composing the majority of piano pupils.

To meet a want so long apparent, the publisher has issued this edition, which, as a superior work, is recommended to the musical public of the United States.

Published by OLIVER DITSON,
115 Washington St.
Sold by all Music Dealers in the United States and Canada. iii 12

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE,

No. 86 TREMONT STREET, BOSTON.

WHITE BROTHERS,
DEALERS IN MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS,

Best Italian, German, French and English Strings,

AGENTS OF

J. André, Offenbach; and G. André, Philadelphia,

FOR THE SALE OF FOREIGN CLASSIC MUSIC,
CHOIR MUSIC, &c.

☞ Instruments Made, Repaired, Tuned, Bought, Sold, or Exchanged, on the most favorable terms.

IRA J. WHITE.

iii 2 3m

A. WARREN WHITE.

THEODORE T. BARKER,
MUSIC STORE,

No. 381 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

Chickering's Pianos to let.

All Foreign and American Musical Publications received as soon as published. iii 23 3m

N. D. COTTON,

IMPORTER AND DEALER IN

English, French, and American Stationery,
DRAWING & PAINTING MATERIALS,
No. 13 Tremont Row, Boston.

 Wedding and Visiting Cards Engraved and Printed. 16 tf

BEETHOVEN'S ORATORIO OF ENGEDI, or DAVID IN THE WILDERNESS, known as the MOUNT OF OLIVES, is this day published in a neat, convenient form for the singer or concert-goer by

Geo. P. Reed & Co., Publishers,
17 Tremont Row, Boston.

D. B. NEWHALL,
MANUFACTURER AND DEALER IN
PIANO FORTES,

No. 314 Washington Street, Boston.

PIANO FORTES REPAIRED, TUNED, & TO LET.
Apr. 10. tf

J. C. WOODMAN,

ORGANIST AND CONDUCTOR OF MUSIC AT CENTRAL CHURCH,

Teacher of Singing, Piano Forte, &c.,

No. 24 Chestnut Street, Boston.

iii 2 3m.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.

FOREIGN MUSIC DEPOT,

GIRARD HOUSE BUILDINGS,

NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,

PHILADELPHIA.

N. B. The complete works, for Piano, (Quartets, Trios, Duets for Piano and Violin, Duets for four hands and Piano solo pieces), of BEETHOVEN and MOZART, as also the Piano solo Works of CLEMENTI and HAYDN, as published by J. André, Offenbach, in sets, at very low prices. ☞ We have appointed

Messrs. WHITE BROTHERS,

TREMONT TEMPLE, BOSTON,

our Agents for the sale of the above Standard Editions of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, &c. &c.

iii 2 tf

MRS. ROSA GARCIA DE RIBAS,

TEACHER OF THE

PIANOFORTE, SINGING & GUITAR,

2 Seneca St., corner Harrison Avenue.

MR. De RIBAS will give instruction on the Oboe and Flute. ALSO MUSIC ARRANGED, TRANSPOSED, &c. Boston, April 23. 3m

Letter-Press, Music and Job Printing-Office,

SIGNOR G. C. GUIDI respectfully informs his former pupils and the public, that he has resumed his instructions in SINGING, after the Italian school, with the intention to settle permanently in Boston. In order to accommodate those who may not wish to take private instruction, he will open classes for ladies and gentlemen, on moderate terms. None but good voices will be admitted. Terms liberal for persons intending to study for professional purposes.

Sign. G. can be consulted free upon any musical subject, daily, from 12 to 2, at Mr. Hew's Piano Manufactory, No. 365 Washington street, where terms and time for classes may be known.

Orders or notes for Sign. G. may be addressed to him at G. P. Reed & Co.'s Music Store, 17 Tremont Row, and at Oliver Ditson's, 115 Washington street. Feb. 5.

A CARD.

THE SUBSCRIBER respectfully offers his services to the public as Teacher of the Piano-Forte, the Violin and the Guitar, also of Harmony and Singing, after a clear and easy method. He will also accompany pupils, both in seminaries and in private houses, in the practice of Duets, Trios, &c.

Address for the present at 168 Tremont Street.

March 26. 3m.

CARL GÄRTNER.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
265 Washington Street, Boston.

Oct. 16.

3m

T. BRICHER,

Organist and Conductor of Music

At the Bowdoin Square Church.

OFFICE UNDER THE CHURCH. ... ENTRANCE ON CHARDON ST.
Jan. 22. 3m.

H. S. CUTLER,

Organist at the Church of the Advent, also of the Boston Harmonic Society.

ADDRESS—(Care of) ROLAND CUTLER, No. 4 Market Square, Boston) 22 tf

F. F. MÜLLER,

DIRECTOR OF MUSIC AND ORGANIST at the Old South Church; ORGANIST of the Handel and Haydn Society; ORGANIST of the Musical Education Society, &c. &c. &c. Inquire of Messrs. REED & Co., No. 17 Tremont Row, Boston. ii 7 tf

NATHAN RICHARDSON,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC.

☞ Letters may be addressed at the Revere House, Boston. 25 tf

GEORGE F. WILLEY,

TEACHER OF MUSIC.

☞ Private Tuition in the principles of Music and the Cultivation of the Voice.

MUSIC ROOM, THE LECTURE ROOM OF KIRK STREET CHURCH, RESIDENCE, 34 FRANKLIN SQUARE, SUFFOLK STREET, feb. 5 LOWELL, MASS.

Germania Serenade Band.

THE SERVICES OF THIS ASSOCIATION can be secured by applying to

G. SCHNAPP, Leader,
364 Tremont Street.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

AT 21 SCHOOL STREET, BOSTON,

$2 per annum, in advance.

ITS CONTENTS relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time,—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music published at home and abroad. 3. A Summary of the significant Musical News from all parts; gathered from English, German, French, as well as American papers. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, Architecture, Poetry, Aesthetic Books, the Drama, &c.—8. Original and Selected Poems, short Tales, Anecdotes, &c. ☞ Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished. Address, (post paid,) J. S. DWIGHT,

21 School Street, Boston.

RATES FOR ADVERTISING.

For half a square, (8 lines,) or less, first insertion, . . . $0.50
" " " " each additional inser. 25
For a square, (16 lines,) first insertion, 1.00
" " " " each additional insertion, 50

On advertisements standing three months or longer, a discount of twenty per cent. on the above rates is allowed. (A column counts as seven squares.)

Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 School St.

DWIGHT'S Journal of Music.

A Paper of Art and Literature.

VOL. III.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 23, 1853.

NO. 16.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

TERMS....TWO DOLLARS PER ANNUM, (IN ADVANCE.)

CITY Subscribers can be served at their houses by the further payment of fifty cents per annum.

For Rates of Advertising, see last page.

POSTAGE, if paid in advance, for any distance within the State, thirteen cents a year; if not in advance, twenty-six cents. To all places beyond the State, double these rates.

J. S. DWIGHT,.....EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St.

By REDDING & CO., 8 State St.

" GEO. P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row.

" A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.

" DEXTER & BROTHERS, 43 Ann Street, N. Y.

" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 722 Broadway, N. Y.

" MASON BROTHERS, 23 Park Row, New York.

" GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.

" G. ANDRE, 229 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

" MILLET & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St., Balt.

" COLBURN & FIELD, Cincinnati, O.

" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

" JOHN H. MELLON, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Persons willing to become Agents for procuring subscribers, especially Music-Dealers and Teachers, are invited to correspond with the Editor, as above. Satisfactory references required, and liberal commissions allowed.

Back numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Also bound copies of Vols I. and II. at prices varying from $2.50 to $3.50.

Translated for this Journal.

A Sketch of Madame Mara.

From the German of F. ROCHLITZ.

[Continued.]

Such was Gertrude in her last years in Leipzig (1770 and 1771); and it is time that we return to the events of her life. A little episode, which occurred in the former of these two years, will serve us for a stepping-stone.

The elector of Saxony and his high house had not wholly abandoned their old custom of visiting Leipzig during the Fair. As concerts formed a part of the entertainments offered by the city to its noble guests, Gertrude became known to them and was noticed with the distinction she deserved. The system of extreme economy, which had become so indispensable, both to the electoral house and to the whole land, had greatly limited the Art institutions of the earlier and more brilliant Polish period, particularly the theatre, and most of all the costly Italian opera; even Hasse and his then world-renowned FAUSTINA had retired to Venice: it had grown very still at court, and those who had known it in its glittering and stirring days, now found it lonely. And perhaps no one more so than the widowed electress, Maria Antonia, who had not only been the focus of the old festivities, but who was a zealous patroness of the fine arts which lent them so much lustre. (She practised painting and music with considerable skill herself.)

This princess sought now to retain or win such artists of excellence, as were willing to adapt themselves to the existing circumstances. The Opera was just now destitute of a distinguished prima donna; Maria Antonia thought of Gertrude, and sent for her to come to Dresden to attempt the principal rôle in one of Hasse's operas. Gertrude was twenty-one years old, had never trod the stage, never cultivated in herself any of its requirements, and had altogether neglected the bearing and movement, and still more the art of embellishing and making the most of her person; so that, as Hiller expressed it, she could neither go nor stand. But that will all come right! said father Hiller. One must try every thing! thought Gertrude.—She started off, arrived, and was presented to the widowed Princess, who saw at a glance what there was wanting. She took compassion on her, had assistance given her, as far as it was possible in so short a time—which truly was not far—and arranged that she should rehearse the principal scenes and decisive situations in her own rooms before her eyes. Gertrude appeared and returned richly rewarded to Leipzig. With eager curiosity her friends received her: "Well, how did it go in Dresden?"

"Ah, how do I know!" answered Gertrude.

"You pleased them, surely?"

"So they say. They pulled and worked over me; then they dressed me up, like a milliner's stock; and finally they shoved me off. So I have been on the stage and have sung. What a lay-figure I must have looked like in the character of queen Semiramis!"

"But at least they had taught you what was most indispensable,—what to do and how to demean yourself?"

"Certainly! I knew every time I went on how it ought to be."

Gertrude's fame now began to spread abroad. They spoke of her to King Frederic the Second of Prussia. This monarch, since the seven years' war, and since he had left off playing the flute himself, had begun to grow indifferent to music and to his musicians. As he had formerly found his favorite recreation in this art, and as he had nothing now to fill the void, he was visited by more frequent returns of certain melancholy and to others often painful hours, than formerly. This they thought to remedy, could they only revive the old love of music in him. He would be tractable, they thought, to Gertrude's singing: so they told the king of her and tried to move him to take her into his service. King Frederic despised German singers, as well as German poets, although he had heard the former as little as he had read the latter; in fact, he compared the efforts of the former to the neighing of his horse. He rejected the proposal. But finally they persuaded him to hear Gertrude once. So she was summoned to Berlin. She arrived; and after a few days they carried her to Potsdam to sing in one of those famous chamber concerts of the king, in which he had been used to play the flute himself.

Gertrude was led into the concert room and placed at the little singer's desk by the piano. She saw the king sitting opposite the piano. Bending forward he fastened that piercing falcon eye of his upon her: she stood there calmly. Approach him she dared not; but as he kept his look still fixed on her, the concert master, Franz Benda, who knew his sovereign's ways, led her a little nearer to him. "She will sing me something?" said the king in his dry and hollow tone. "If your majesty commands it." "Aye, let her sing!" Gertrude, sure of her case, sang without any fear. By the advice of some interested persons she had selected one of the greatest arias of Graun, whom the king had valued, and indeed even loved. He knew the air and listened with attention. When she had finished he said in a friendly tone: "She did that well. Can she sing from notes, too?" He meant, at sight, a prima vista; and so Gertrude understood it. She answered with composure: Yes. Whereupon the king himself brought one of the most difficult bravura airs, also by Graun, which the singer could not have known. He opened the score, saying: "The aria is good. That there"—pointing to some long artificial roulades—"that is stupid stuff: but if it is well sung, it sounds quite prettily. There, sing it!"—He handed her the notes, the parts were placed around, and the ritornel commenced. Gertrude sung it, and, as she said afterwards, at least without mistakes. When she had done, the king said: "Yes, she can sing." Then he made a few inquiries into her circumstances, to which Gertrude gave simple and fearless answers, and then left her.

In the succeeding weeks Gertrude was frequently sent for to Potsdam and sang before the king. Then a proposal was made to her to enter his service, which she seized upon with joy, and a pension for life of three thousand thalers was settled upon her. She had proposed to herself a journey to Italy, to complete her cultivation; but king Frederic decided: "She must remain here; there she will learn nothing new."

So now her subsistence was secured to her; her position was honorable, not laborious, and, as things then were, very advantageous. She found continual joy and satisfaction in her art, besides employment and support; while she was obliged to appear beside Concialini and Porporino, and emulate their perfection in the adagio—until then not her forte. The great king continually applauded and distinguished her; the public received her with esteem and favor, and her income was before long doubled. And so she would have led an exceedingly desirable, worthy and contented life, had not her hour arrived, though somewhat late indeed, yet not the less decisively, for becoming a wife. Until then she had taken no interest, or only a passing one, in men; she could not even imagine herself in any nearer relation with them, laughed at love-matches, and took it ill when she was jestingly rallied by her older friends: that she possessed a heart, or the capacity of loving, she had been conscious only in her art. Here, in her brilliant, advantageous position, she became an object of speculation to many who would have made their fortune through her: short and indifferent, however, she repelled all advances, until Herr MARA, of the private chapel of Prince Henry of Prussia, approached her with a similar design: and now, as if all at once, she was enchanted and transported.

Mara was not older than Gertrude: a handsome man and a distinguished violoncellist; whatever else he was, was quite suspicious. Wild, arrogant, extravagant, a spendthrift, sinking in the indulgence of passion from one disorder to another—so he was esteemed by all who knew him well: and he has since confirmed this judgment before all the world so fully, that we need not scruple to repeat it here. Mara, too intimate with women, as Gertrude had not been at all with men, soon noticed the impression he had made upon her; he besieged her, now with impassioned wooing and now with lordly arrogance, and so seized and bound her once strong, steadfast soul entirely to himself. The relation did not remain unobserved, the purpose was not to be mistaken. Gertrude was warned: she did not heed it; they told her of Mara's previous life: she would not believe it; they brought her unanswerable proofs: "He will become better!" Even king Frederic, who knew Mara, and really wished her well, caused her to be warned: but all in vain; indeed opposition appeared rather to excite in her the spirit of contradiction and confirm her in her own will. So she went before the king (1773, in her four and twentieth year) with the petition that she might marry Mara. King Frederic received it with manifest displeasure. "Tell her," said he to Benda, "she may do what she pleases with the fellow, only she must not marry him." But marriage was precisely what Herr Mara wanted; the petition was repeated. The king, who almost always decided quickly, delayed this decision, from easily conceivable motives of his gracious good will: the request was made a third time and now granted; Gertrude became Mara's wife.

Now all went badly, as everybody had foreseen, except herself. Mara had money in abundance; he abandoned himself to his old habits. He kept himself up through the unbounded devotion and love of his wife towards him; and so he injured and insulted everybody that came near him, and drew his wife with him into his quarrels. Complaint after complaint came in; reconciliation was in vain attempted; one quarrel settled only begat several new ones.

Gertrude at last began to feel that things could not go on so. But what was to be done? As to converting or even bridling her husband, that she could not; quite as little could she leave him: and as she had brought the evil upon herself in spite of general warning, her pride demanded that she take her husband's part, publicly, everywhere, and contend for him by every means at the disposal of a fascinating singer. Even Mara himself seemed to perceive that things could not go on in that way: but it by no means occurred to him, as a serious matter, that he had only to change himself, to bring all right again; he was much more interested in the fact that the money-chests would stand open everywhere in the wide world to his wife. This consideration was confirmed by a private proposal from London, in which she was guaranteed three concerts with 16,000 dollars and 2,000 dollars travelling money. Accordingly he persuaded, he compelled the wife to ask leave of absence. She did it, as she did everything which he insisted on. The king rejected the petition in harsh terms, and that tempting offer had to be declined. Vexation and anxiety, ever renewed, burning passion for a faithless husband, and finally miscarriage, brought Gertrude upon a sick bed. She recovered only slowly; the physician advised the Bohemian baths. She asked permission, but the king declared that "Freyenwalde, too, is good!" He knew well enough that, once over the borders, she would not return. She recurred to her plan, when she first entered the king's service, of going to Italy: He decided: "The (Mme.) Mara may go; but he remains." It was easy to foresee that she would not go without him. Restored to health, she sang, and all the more movingly; the whole public sympathized in her unhappy situation; the king likewise, who conducted himself graciously; but his decision remained unaltered. Embittered, full of gnawing chagrin, she now set about it in another way.

The grand prince, afterwards emperor, Paul of Russia, came to the court; a grand opera was to make one of the brilliant entertainments given him by the king; Gertrude had the first part and was to shine before all the rest: on the morning of the day, for which the representation was announced, she sent word that she was sick. The king sent her warning; she was still sick; the programme would have to be given up, and there was no time to substitute another entertainment. Two hours before the beginning of the opera a carriage appeared before Gertrude's dwelling, surrounded by eight dragoons. A rough bearded captain stepped into her chamber: "Madam, I must deliver you alive or dead at the opera house." "But, you see, I am confined to my bed." "If necessary, I can take you, bed and all." No entreaty, no resistance was of the least avail. Gertrude had to rise and dress herself.

The officer politely offered her his arm, led her to the carriage, seated himself beside her, and produced her in the opera green-room. In burning tears she let them dress her up. Her first scene came; she went on, sang languidly and feebly, yet everything exactly as it was written in the score. So too with the succeeding scenes. But the foreign prince, thought she, must hear too what I can do; and so, in her last aria before the finale of the opera, indeed in its very last bars, at the principal fermata, she expended all her art and power upon an elaborate cadenza, the like of which no one had ever heard before. Gertrude closed this cadenza with a trill so prolonged, so raised from piano to fortissimo, from a slow to a most rapid alternation of the two tones, and again by the same degrees diminishing and finally expiring, that the hearer, in raptures as he was, felt also an anxiety lest she might rupture a blood-vessel. The grand prince himself stood up and applauded, leaning forward from the box; the crowded house joined in with thundering jubilation.

But thus, with bitter chagrin at heart, with discontent and passionate outbreaks at home, constrained to sing for others' pleasure,—and in open opposition to the king, who not long before had become master of two hundred thousand Austrians and was now used to being feared by all the world: her case grew unendurable. As they had no power to alter circumstances, and no will to submit, the only alternative seemed to be to withdraw themselves. By force that was not possible; so they hoped to accomplish it by cunning. A secret flight was resolved upon: a most adventurous plan in a state, where the prevention of desertion, at least on the part of the military, was systematically organized and most promptly executed. The pair attempted it; but, as might easily have been foreseen, they were soon captured and brought back.

King Frederic, not to punish the unfortunate woman too severely, did not inquire how far she had had part in the plan, and considered her as one led away. But he treated the husband as a deserter and in good soldier fashion: the Herr chapel virtuoso was promoted to the office of drummer to a fusilier regiment in a fortress. It is presumable that the king even by this means wished to assist Gertrude; she would get used to separation from her husband, and, free from his personal influence, might come back to her own right mind; his disgrace before her and the public might awaken her self-respect, so that she would of her own accord propose a separation.

These views of the king, if he had any such, remained unrealized in Gertrude; she had entwined herself about this man with all the nerves and tendrils of her affectionate nature. She was in despair; she came in with the most moving entreaties, the most humble supplication for the release of her husband; she promised to live at peace with him thenceforward, and to be entirely at the service of the king. She elicited no answer, and Mara remained a drummer. Finally, she agreed for that price to dispense with the double salary above mentioned, and to serve for what had been freely offered her in the beginning. This—the king accepted, and so Mara came back. This sacrifice for him, who was once more her husband, won the liveliest sympathy of the public for her as a woman. This was expressed to her in every form; they presented her with a copperplate engraving, representing the scene, from the then admired French operette, "The Galley-Slave," where the lady takes off the chains from her beloved, with the inscription:

Ame tendre et généreuse,
Tu brisas mes fers. . .

Upon Mara this experience made at least such an impression that he suppressed his arrogance and avoided open quarrels.

So passed several years: what mournful years for Gertrude! What a home must her's have been! What torture for her to be obliged to while away the king's time with her talents, when all her reverence and love for him had changed to fear and trembling! to appear before the multitude—"in beautiful garments," as Mignon has it in her song—for their delight, while her own heart was almost breaking with misery and torture! Her whole nature seemed transformed. She grew sickly, frequently quite ill; she shunned society, and nothing further gave her pleasure, not even her art; the light-hearted carelessness with which she had formerly passed her days, only concerned about her duties as an artist, had all vanished; a certain inward acerbity and bitterness was engendered in her, which repelled and gradually alienated others altogether. Gertrude now found everything intolerable, herself included: hence it is not to be wondered, that she consented, when Mara once more proposed flight.

This time they went to work more cautiously. Gertrude was to ride alone with one female attendant; Mara was to slip over the borders in a wholly different direction; they were to meet in Saxony. The stratagem succeeded. To be sure they were detained in Dresden by the Prussian ambassador, till he had written about them to the king and had received his orders: but he, weary perhaps of long resistance, and having now withdrawn almost entirely from the friend of his long life, Music, gave orders to send Gertrude her dismissal. He is reported to have said, of her relation to Mara: "A woman, who has entirely given herself up to a man, (the king's expression was even harsher,) is like a hound; the oftener you tread on him, the more devoted he becomes."

(To be continued.)

M. FÉTIS.

We abridge the following sketch from French and German sources:

FRANÇOIS JOSEPH FÉTIS, the learned musical theorist, critic and journalist, known also as an industrious composer, was born at Mons in Belgium, in 1784. He manifested a passion and talent for music at a very early age, and had his instruction from his father, who was organist at the Cathedral and conductor of the concerts in that city. He entered the Conservatory at Paris, in the year 1800, where he became the pupil of Rey in harmony. In 1804, he studied under Albrechtsberger in Vienna. He tried his fortunes in many branches of musical composition, not excepting symphonies and the larger forms of church music, but his true vocation more and more developed itself in the sphere of musical learning and criticism. He published first in 1823 his "Traité élémentaire d'harmonie et accompagnement," (Elementary treatise on harmony and accompaniment;) afterwards, in 1824, a valuable treatise on counterpoint and fugue ("Traité du contrepoint et de la fugue,") which was adopted as the basis of instruction at the Conservatory.

His next work was a memoir on the question: "What was the merit of the Flemish musicians in the 15th, 16th and 17th centuries," which received a prize from the Royal Institute of the Netherlands. In 1829, he published his "Traité de l'accompagnement de la partition," (Treatise on the accompaniment of a Score,) and in 1830 his popular little work, which has been translated into English and German; "La musique mise à la portée de tout le monde," (Music made plain to all the world.)

In 1827 Fétis commenced the publication of his very valuable musical journal, "La Revue Musicale," which he continued without interruption till November 1833, nearly nine years. Of the labors and responsibility of this task we may form some idea from his own description of it in his "Biographie Universelle": "With the exception of ten or twelve articles, Fétis edited the first five years alone, making an amount of matter equal to about 8000 octavo pages. During the first three years he gave every week twenty-four pages of small, close type, and in the fourth year thirty-two pages of a larger size. During this time he had to be present at all representations of new operas or revivals of old ones, at the débuts of singers, at all kinds of concerts; to visit the schools of music; inquire into new systems of teaching; visit the work-shops of musical instrument makers to render account of new inventions or improvements; analyze what appeared most important in the new music; read what was published, in France or foreign countries, upon the theory, didactics or history of music; take cognizance of the journals relating to this art, published in Germany, in Italy and in England; and even consult a great many scientific Reviews, for facts neglected in these journals; and finally keep up an active correspondence;—and all this without neglecting his duties as professor of composition in the Conservatory, or interrupting other serious labors." At the same time M. Fétis edited the musical "Feuilleton" in the newspaper "Le Temps," and he says that several times he has written three articles upon a new opera on the same day, amounting in all to about twenty-five octavo pages: namely one for his own Revue, one for the Temps, and one for the National; each article considered the opera under a different point of view, and all three appeared the day but one after the performance.

Fétis commenced the collection of materials for his great biographical dictionary of musicians as early as 1806. The first volume appeared in 1837 (Brussels; Meline, Cans & Co.) and the continuation in 1844 (Mayence; Schott & Sons). It is the most complete work of the kind in existence, filling eight large octavo volumes, under the title of, "Biographie Universelle des Musiciens, et bibliographie générale de la Musique," (Universal biography of musicians, and general bibliography of music.) It is a work valuable for reference, though the Germans complain, doubtless with some justice, of the partiality displayed in this and other writings of Fétis.

In the year 1833 Fétis was appointed director of the newly established Belgian Conservatoire at Brussels, which position he still holds. His musical journal has also been revived for some years past, under the title of Revue et Gazette Musicale, and principally edited by himself and his son. He has also continued to compose music, to write and publish books and treatises, theoretic, critical, philosophical and didactic, and to give historical concerts and lectures upon music. For a fuller catalogue of his works, see article Fétis, in his "Biog. Universelle."

CHURCH MUSIC.

Ah, dearly do I love the organ's pealing,
With psalm-tunes holy and with anthem grand,
The while I drum the measure with my hand,
And gaze devoutly at the frescoed ceiling,
Where modern Angelos have spent their skill,
And mimic niche and pillar make display,
And shadows fling themselves in every way,
In independence of the sun's high will.
I love to hear the voice and organ blending,
And pouring on the air a cloud of sound,
Until, as with a spell, my soul is bound,
And every faculty is heavenward tending.
Bang goes a cricket!—Squalls a child, sonorous,
And earth's harsh discord drowns the heavenly chorus.
Shillaber's Poems.

Anecdotes of Gluck.

J. J. Rousseau's admiration for the genius of Gluck, as soon as he became acquainted with his works, is well known. All Paris observed him frequenting the theatre at every representation of Gluck's "Orpheus," although for some time previously he had absented himself from such entertainments. To one person he said on this subject, that Gluck had come to France to give the lie to a proposition which he had formerly defended, namely, that good music could never be set to French words. At another time he observed, that all the world blamed Gluck's want of melody; for himself, he thought it issued from all his pores.

Gluck was one day playing on his piano the part in "Iphigenia in Tauris," where Orestes, left alone in prison, after having experienced his accustomed agitation throws himself on a bench, saying, "Le calme rentre dans mon cœur." Some persons present thought they observed a contradiction in the bass, which prolonged the preceding agitation, after Orestes had declared that his heart was calm: they mentioned this to Gluck adding, "but Orestes is calm, he says so."—"He lies," exclaimed Gluck, "he mistakes animal exhaustion for calmness of heart; the fury is always here: (striking his breast): has he not killed his mother?"

On the day appointed for the first representation of his "Iphigenia in Aulis" at Paris, Gluck was informed that the principal singer had been suddenly taken ill, but that another would perform his part that evening. Gluck, who suspected cabal, immediately replied, "No; the performance must be postponed." That was declared impossible, the piece having been already advertised and announced to the royal family, under which circumstances there was no precedent of a postponement. "I will sooner," replied Gluck, "throw the piece into the fire, than submit to its being murdered in the way proposed." All remonstrance was in vain, and the circumstance was obliged to be reported to the royal family, who kindly allowed the performances of the night to be altered.

COULDN'T! COS HE SUNG So!—Leaning idly over a fence a few days since, we noticed a little four-year old "lord of the creation" amusing himself in the grass, by watching the frolicsome flight of birds which were playing around him. At length a beautiful bobolink perched himself upon a drooping bough of an apple-tree, which extended to within a few yards of the place where the urchin sat, and maintained his position, apparently unconscious of the close proximity to one whom birds usually considered a dangerous neighbor.

The boy seemed astonished at his impudence, and after regarding him steadily for a minute or two, obeying the instinct of his baser part, he picked up a stone lying at his feet and was preparing to throw it, steadying himself carefully for a good aim. The little arm was reached backward without alarming the bird, and Bob was within an ace of damage, when lo! his throat swelled and forth came Nature's plea: 'A link—a link—a li-n-k, bob-o-link! a-no weet, a-no-weet! I know it! a link—a link—a link! don't throw it!—throw it, throw it,' &c., &c.; and he didn't. Slowly the little arm subsided to its natural position, and the despised stone dropped. The minstrel charmed the murderer! We heard the songster through, and watched his unbarred flight, as did the boy, with a sorrowful countenance. Anxious to hear an expression of the little fellow's feeling, we approached him, and inquired:—

'Why didn't you stone him, my boy? you might have killed him and carried him home.'

The poor little fellow looked up doubtfully, as though he suspected our meaning, and with an expression of half shame and half sorrow, he replied: 'Couldn't, cos he sung so!'

Who will say that our nature is wholly depraved, after that; or aver that music hath no charms to soothe the savage breast. Melody awakened humanity, and humanity—mercy! The angels who sang at the creation whispered to the child's heart. The bird was saved, and God was glorified by the deed. Dear little boys! don't stone the birds.—Clinton Courant.

"Benvenuto Cellini" in London.

The Musical World (London) thus relates and accounts for the failure of Berlioz's opera at the Royal Italian Theatre. The play upon the word cabaletta is amusing. The technical meaning of the term will perhaps be asked. It is used in most modern Italian operas to designate some little very singable and taking aria, which is commonly left to the mood and discretion of the singer as to time, and therefore marked ad libitum. Commonly, too, the aria is sung once simply and once with ornamental variations.

The opera of Benvenuto Cellini was composed for the Académie Royale (Nationale-Imperiale) de Musique et de Danse, no less than fifteen years ago. It was produced here in September, 1838, performed once, and put down by a cabal. The same fate attended it on Saturday night, June 25th, 1853, at the Royal Italian Opera. The opera was played, it is true, from beginning to end, but it was not listened to with sufficient attention to justify any verdict that may have followed the descent of the curtain. A strenuous opposition was maintained, by a well-organized and cleverly distributed party, from the first note of the overture to the last note of the finale. The party succeeded in damning the opera, but failed to show that the music was bad, since the majority of the audience were not allowed to hear it.

Under these circumstances we decline entering into any account of Benvenuto Cellini. Thus much we may say, however, as a matter of opinion:—the book is one of the silliest ever written, while the music, whatever its peculiarities (defects, if you please,) is interesting throughout—interesting for many reasons, and for none more than for its entire originality.

We wish we had been at Weimar when Benvenuto was brought out at the theatre, under the auspices of the intrepid Liszt, before the Court, and in presence of the composer. A correspondent of the Athenæum, who went to Weimar, to hear the opera, gave a full account of its success, and a long analysis of the music, which was read with avidity by the admirers of Berlioz, among whom we have the honor to rank.

Did the little capital of the little German Duchy read a lesson to the large capitals of Gaul and Britain? Time will prove.

Meanwhile, nous ne sommes pas si betes as to set down the demonstration of Saturday night as significant of anything that regards the merits and demerits of Benvenuto Cellini as a work of art.

1. The Royal Italian Opera is an Italian theatre.

2. The Italian repertoire of good old sterling operas is exhausted.

3. There is not an Italian composer of genius, or even of talent, now living and writing. (Rossini is living and fishing.)

4. Meyerbeer, Auber, Halévy, are gradually taking possession of the Italian stage in London.

5. Jullien has had an opera produced at Covent Garden.

6. None of Verdi's operas succeed in this country.

7. Her Majesty's Theatre is shut up.

8. The Italians begin to tremble for their supremacy. They have long reigned and long monopolised.

9. There are at least 500 Italian composers in and about London, with one, two, three or more operas in their portfolios. Say 2000 MS. operas at a round guess.

10. Mr. Gye cannot bring out 2000 Italian operas by obscure composers in one season, or even two. Moreover, in all likelihood, the very first he brought out, would empty his boxes, pit, stalls, amphitheatre, and gallery. Not a dog, a cat, a mouse, or a living creature of any known form would remain in the theatre. Even the spiders, who by this time must have acquired a certain taste for music, would run over the roof, and build their webs on the adjacent houses. Anything, indeed, in the "cabaletta" shape, from a new hand, would knock up Mr. Gye and knock down his establishment. The carpenters would go to sleep. The ballet girls would get varicose-veins; and the band would become stark to a member.

11. A new "cabaletta," then, is impossible. As well go back to Tubal Cain, with his hammer. Preserve us, Heaven, from the "cabaletta." We wonder we are not dead of the "cabaletta," this many a year gone. There are 100,000 "cabalettas" all alike. We would rather disinter the works of Blewett, and place them on the stage, with a libretto by Manfredo Maggioni, and Grisi and Mario in the cast. Any thing sooner than a "cabaletta." Tubal Cain and his hammer, the primitive music, would be far more welcome. The sparrow on the house-tops, with his music, or the cat in the area, with his music, or the old sailor without legs who carries a ship on his head and sings a gruff song, with his music, would be better for Mr. Gye than a new "cabaletta." The very thought of a "cabaletta" makes us sneeze.

12. There are no "cabalettas" in Benvenuto Cellini. Berlioz likes not the "cabaletta." He never disguised his aversion to the "cabaletta." For 20 years he has declared it in the Debats. Therefore the "cabaletta" likes not Berlioz (as Cherubini said of the fugue).

13. The derivation of cabaletta is evident. It comes from Cabal. It is a name of endearment for Cabal. The Italians, like the Germans, add something to names, in familiar conversation. The Germans would say Cabalchen. The Italians say Cabaletta.

14. BERLIOZ likes not CABALETTA, and CABALETTA likes not BERLIOZ.

15. There is a fable about a dog in a manger.

ELEUSINIA.

Lines suggested by the bas-reliefs on the Portland Vase; the figures of which are supposed to be illustrative of the Eleusinian Mysteries.

Blue darkness, as of deep midsummer nights,
Rolls round this Vase before me; and I see
The grand, pale phantoms of an older time
Fixed by consummate Art for evermore.

What naked man is this, that, fearfully,
Beneath a pillar'd portico moves on
Into the glimmering dusk? He, sick at heart
With the dull shows and wrangling of this life,
Would pass the magic Temple doors, and know
The faces of the glad Eternal Gods;
Would enter the majestic regions lying
Above the Olympic peaks, and gaze far down
The dazzling pits of Being, and the abyss
Where suns, and moons, and stars, without an end,
Boil upward like a storm of sparkling dust
Upon a ceaseless wind. And he would hear
The swift and glassy spheres, Heaven over Heaven,
Their nine-fold crystal thunders modulate
To perfect music and sublime consent,

In-orbing all things with round harmony;
Yet, pausing as in doubt and natural fear
Of what those haunted boundaries may enclose,
He stands upon the threshold of two worlds,
And hears the voices calling either way.

Oh, floating Love! white star within the dark!
Clear herald of the morning! lead him on
Through the long silence and the mystical night
To where the gods reveal themselves in flame,
And the great secret of the world lies bare.
Oh, beckoning Love! keep ever on thy path
With forward wings and backward looks, that he May pass unflinching the severe aspects
That gloom about the palace-doors of Jove;
And, entering, may behold, and yet still live,
The fountain of that elemental Life
Which is the essence of all forms and modes,
From the intensest star beyond the sun
To the dejected worm; that subtle spirit
Which from inert, cold matter, summons forth
The green enchantments of the Spring, and all
The richness of the harvest. Lead him on Past the old satyr visages, whose eyes,
For ever upward cast, seem ever waiting
Some revelation of the hidden sense
Of Heaven's marmoreal hieroglyph. And thou,
Fair shape of woman, whom the wise snake loves
To play with (like grey Knowledge twining round
The eternal youth of Beauty), hold him thus,
With thy kind hand upon his arm, until
His doubt and fear have flown, and he perceives
The inner throbbings of Elysian dawn
Pulse in the darkness, and the widening day
Silently open like a golden rose.

I turn the Vase, and see two watching shapes,
Female and male, who steadfastly regard,
With looks that breed a sense of quietness,
A languid woman sitting on a heap
Of rugged stones, beneath a large-leaved tree,
Close by a column; with one hand upthrown
Across the head; the other droopingly
Holding a drooping torch, whose flame, nigh spent,
Falters and faints upon the verge of dusk.
A waking sleep, with pageantries of dreams,
Holds her in trance; and all the tide of life
Is at an ebb. Oh, melancholy eyes!
Oh, empty eyes, from which the soul has gone
To see the far-off countries! still look thus
Over the wastes of Time, that we may read
Thy owner's history written large and fair.

She, by long fasting and much solitude,
And by strong aspiration, has attain'd
To inward vision of the outward world;
Till, down the burning vistas of new sense
Her spirit, like a taper-dazzled moth,
Embalms itself in brightness, and is blown
In gusts of splendor round that central flame
Which lights the gross mass of the Universe,
As clouds are lit with sunrise. She has seen
The awful sanctities of Birth and Death
And Resurrection, and the hearts of things.
"Oh, Light, and Love, and Majesty, and Power,
Whereto my soul has journeyed from afar!
The strength of thy perfections drinks me up,
As drops of feeble rain or feeble dew
Are caught into the sunbeams! I am drawn
Into the wind of thy swift orbit—swung
Round the vast circle of created forms:
A conscious atom in the conscious whole;
A portion of the never-resting scheme.

AGREEMENT AND DIFFERENCE.—Sentiments join man to man, opinions divide them. The former are elementary and concentrate, the latter are composite and scatter. The friendships of youth are founded on sentiment: the dissensions of age result from opinion. If we could know this at an early age, if, forming our own mode of thought, we could acquire a liberal view of that of others, and even of those that are opposed to ours; we should then be more tolerant, and endeavor to reunite by sentiment, what is divided and dispersed.—Goethe.

MUSICAL WALKING CANE. The British Whig, of Kingston, C. W., boasts the possession of a very ingenious specimen of flute and walking stick combined, which answers admirably for either purpose. "It is of Parisian Manufacture, and its tones are equal to those of any Flute. One of these 'Orphean Walking Canes,' in possession of the writer, on being taken up by a demon of the 'British Whig,' played 'Nelly Bly' of its own accord, and had commenced 'The Last Rose of Summer,' when its owner made his appearance, when it struck up 'Wha'll be King but Charlie?' winding up the concert with a famous solo, such as walking stick never chirped before.—Our musical friends need not want now for 'musical companions.'"

BEAUTY.—Beauty is inexplicable: it appears to us a dream, when we contemplate the works of great artists; it is a hovering, floating, and glittering shadow, whose outline eludes the grasp of definition. Mendelssohn, [the philosopher, grandfather of the composer] and others tried to catch Beauty as a butterfly, and pin it down for inspection. They have succeeded in the same way as they are likely to succeed with a butterfly. The poor animal trembles and struggles, and its brightest colors are gone; or, if you catch it without spoiling the colors, you have at best a stiff and awkward corpse. But a corpse is not an entire animal, it wants what is essential in all things, namely, life—spirit, which sheds beauty on everything.—Goethe.

The Mocking Bird of America.

The American mocking bird is the prince of all song-birds, being altogether unrivalled in the extent and variety of his vocal powers; and, besides the fulness and melody of his original notes, he has the faculty of imitating the notes of all other birds, from the humming-bird to the eagle. Pennant states that he heard a caged one imitate the mewing of a cat, and the creaking of a sign in high winds. Barrington says his pipes come nearest to the nightingale of any bird he ever heard. The description, however, given by Wilson, in his own inimitable manner, as far excels Pennant and Barrington as the bird excels his fellow-songsters. Wilson tells us that the ease, elegance, and rapidity of his movements, the animation of his eye, and the intelligence he displays in listening to and laying up lessons, mark the peculiarity of genius. His voice is full, strong, and musical, and capable of almost every modulation, from the clear and mellow tones of the wood-thrush to the savage scream of the bald eagle. In measure and accents he faithfully follows his originals, while in strength and sweetness of expression he greatly improves upon them. In his native woods upon a dewy morning, his song rises above every competitor; for the others appear merely as inferior accompaniments. His own notes are bold and full, and varied seemingly beyond all limits. They consist of short expressions of two, three, or at most five or six syllables, generally uttered with great emphasis and rapidity, and continued with undiminished ardor, for half an hour or for an hour at a time. While singing, he expands his tail, glistening with white, keeping time to his own music; and the buoyant gaiety of his action is no less fascinating than his song. He sweeps round with enthusiastic ecstasy; he mounts and descends, as his song swells or dies away; he bounds aloft with the celerity of an arrow, as if to recover or recall his very soul, expired in the last elevated strain. A bystander might suppose that the whole feathered tribe had assembled together on a trial of skill—each striving to produce the utmost effect—so perfect are his imitations. He often deceives the sportsman, and even birds themselves are sometimes imposed upon by this admirable mimic. In confinement, he loses little of the power or energy of his song. He whistles for the dog; Cæsar starts up, wags his tail, and runs to meet his master. He cries like a hurt chicken, and the hen hurries about with feathers on end, to protect her injured brood. He repeats the tune taught him, though it be of considerable length, with perfect accuracy. He runs over the notes of the canary and of the red bird with such superior execution and effect, that the mortified songsters confess his triumph by their immediate silence. His fondness for variety, some suppose injures his song. His imitation of the brown thrush is often interrupted by the crowing of cocks; and his exquisite warblings after the blue bird are mingled with the screaming of swallows or the cackling of hens. During moonlight both in the wild and tame state, he sings the whole night long. The hunters in their nocturnal excursions, know that the moon is rising, the instant they hear his delightful solo. After Shakspeare, Barrington attributes, in part, the exquisiteness of the nightingale's song to the silence of the night; but if so, what are we to think of the bird, which, in the open glare of day, overpowers and often silences all competition? The natural notes of the American mocking-bird are similar to those of the brown thrush.—Audubon.

LONGEVITY OF MUSICIANS.—The following list of musicians, with the age at which they died respectively, is well worthy of attention:

Dr. Aldridge, 91; Dr. Ayrton, 74; Barthelmon, 74; Bird, 80; Dr. Burney, 88; Dr. Child, 90; Clementi, 80; Cervitto, 96; D. Corri, 81; Crodill, 70; Geminiani, 96; Giardini, 80; Gluck, 75; Neil Gow, 80; Handel, 75; Haydn, 76; M. Kelly, 76; Madame Mara, 82; Dr. Miller, 76; Palestrina, 81; Pouchee, 109; John Parke, 84; J. P. Saloman, 77; J. Sale, 72; J. S. Smith, 86; W. Shield, 80; Sir J. Stevenson, 74; S. Webbe, 77; C. Wesley, 78; S. Wesley, 70; &c.

Cocks's Misc.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Strictures upon the Stage,

AS IT EXISTS IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

IV. TRUTH OF EARTH AND SKY NEGLECTED.—(Concluded.)

Again, let us look at the subject of Sky Expression. The highest effort of art here, would indicate a study of the expression of the sky and clouds as connected with the scene to be performed. Surely this is as important on the stage as in a 'battle painting' or an historical painting, and will make or mar equally the same. Yet on the stage one sky is made to serve all purposes and all scenes.

Some scenes in Shakspeare I would have confined to a mere low horizon and all the impression imparted to the sky. Of all objects affecting the mind through the medium of sight, the expression of the sky affects it perhaps more strongly than any. Without variety in this regard, how can we obtain poetical harmony? Would not a dark and portentous sky, with black clouds flying in collateral directions, as before a great wind, give power and elevation to a scene of strife? Shakspeare in such scenes strives at similar impressions throughout his poetry. The following lines occur on a field of battle:

"Th' battle fares like to the morning's war
When dying clouds contend with glowing light;
What time the shepherd, blowing of his nails,
Can neither call it perfect day or night.
Now sways it this way, like a mighty sea,
Forced by the tide to combat with the wind;
Now sways it that way, like the self-same sea,
Forced to retire by fury of the wind;
Sometime the flood prevails, and then the wind;
Now one the better; then another best;
And tugging to be victors breast to breast,
Yet neither conquerer nor conquered;
So is the poise of the fell war."

Now turn your eyes to that streak of speechless blue, hung there to represent sky; and how cold, how disconcerting, how disgusting is its dumb monotony! It should be labelled, as in olden times, with a placard to signify its intention. Surely it requires an interpreter, like the moonshine of Bottom the weaver:

"But there are two hard things;
That is to bring the moonlight into a chamber;
For you know, Pyramus and Thisbe meet
By moonlight."

* * * * *
"One must come in with a
Bush of thorns and a lathorn, and say he comes
To disfigure, or to represent the person of Moonshine."

Alack, how many 'Bottoms' we have had for managers! I shall quit the subject. Not for lack of matter; the subject is a grand one. Justice to Shakspeare in respect to sky expression alone would be a triumph. His works are full of sublime demands upon us to lift our eyes unto the sky, our hearts to the influences springing therefrom; the mysterious but unmistakable handwriting of God. O, where is the counterpart of this Book of Nature! And where the counterpart of such expositions of her every day work!

"See how the morn, with russet mantle clad,
Walks o'er the dew of yon high eastern hill."

"Look, love, what envious streaks
Do lace the severing clouds in yonder east;
Night's candles are burnt out, and jocund day
Stands tiptoe on the misty mountain tops."

By Jupiter! we want a changing sky.

"Last night, when yon same star
That's eastward of the pole, had made his course
To illume that part of heaven where now it burns,"—

Here the scene is dictated by Shakspeare, yet is never so represented in Hamlet. I remember seeing the starry firmament introduced in a representation of 'Coriolanus,' in London, in a scene in which Caius Martius stood on a balustraded terrace, and looked down on the city of Antium. The stage was the terrace, and the city had the appearance of being below the level of the stage.

But these remarkable exceptions prove only the possibility of that for which I am contending. And I believe science and art will furnish the means for the fulfilment of everything that Shaksperian representations require.

But in the face of such general neglect, such misbegotten, unpoetical substitutes for truth, we will live and hope. *

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 23, 1853.

Honor to Art and Industry.

Under this heading the New York Tribune makes some just and trenchant comments on the inauguration of the great festival of Art and Industry at the opening of the Crystal Palace. The platform, it appears, was covered with politicians, soldiers, clergymen, and all the usual occupants of posts of honor, while no such distinction was extended even to the architects, who planned the noble edifice; and neither they nor any of the priests and heroes of the Useful and the Beautiful, the Artists and Inventors, were toasted or in any way alluded to in the vulgar and common-place political speech-making at the banquet which succeeded. Let statesmen and clergymen, and perhaps too, for some time to come, military heroes and commanders, have all the honor that accrues to them in their own several spheres. They all have their occasions, where they are justly paramount. But this was the festival of Labor, the festival of Art and Industry and Genius, of the peaceful, patient, quiet heroism which subdues rough nature to the wants of man and moulds the onward world into harmonious correspondence with the purest and divinest instincts of the soul. Here we assembled to behold what Art and Industry have done for us; and the artists, the inspired mechanics, the chiefs of industry, the inventors and executors of invaluable models and appliances of Use and Beauty, were really the only persons who could wear a princely presence in this palace.

It is their Palace, as it is their hour, their demonstration altogether. For the first time the word Palace has a meaning and a fitness upon this side of the ocean. Palaces have implied kings and princes, false and envious distinctions. But this is the Palace of Industry, typifying the supremacy of the honest working millions, and glorifying those arts and occupations which are gradually emancipating, refining and elevating humanity, and lifting mankind at large up into the true and glorious estate of manhood. This is what gives Music, Sculpture, Painting, Architecture, as well as Poetry and Philosophy, all their worth. It is for the humanity that is in them, whereby they react inspiringly upon the humanity in each of us, that we respect and love and cherish all these arts. And the mission of the mechanic, of the intelligent laborer, is not, after all, so very distinct from that of the artist or the poet. For what is labor without intelligence, without a certain quickening ideal of perfection and completeness that nerves and guides with a religious certainty each blow. The crown of use is beauty. It is in the material as in the moral world; even a religious life fails to pass current until it attains to the "beauty of holiness." And so the mechanic arts all seek their perfection, not in superadding elegance to use, but in perfecting the rough prose of use into the poetry of beauty. More and more the civilized man demands an exquisite grace and finish in the commonest utensil, as in his house and furniture. We take this hint from nature, where every form, while most divinely fitted to its use, is thereby at the same time a revelation of beauty that enchants the poet and the artist. All progress in society is a tendency towards a life that shall be altogether artistic. The cultivation of Taste is indispensable to any true society; there cannot be liberty, there cannot be harmony, or happiness, or real holiness without it. Now if the fine arts create inspiring models, the mechanic arts translate their influence into every-day forms, multiplied all around us. If the sculptor sets up a noble form of beauty, which he moulded in the worship of beauty singly and directly for its own sake, so the mechanic and the artisan reflect this soul-inspiring lesson of beauty in the tasteful style and finish of their useful products, thus bringing the whole atmosphere and background of our daily life up to some correspondence with these best ideals of the artist. Art prophesies, what tasteful industry fulfils. It is a great day therefore in the history of our race, when men perceive this truth and when industry is inspired with a sublime self-respect, and erects its palaces, and holds great festivals that overlook the petty boundaries of nationality and call upon all mankind as members of one family to contemplate the general progress and look forward to the general destiny.

For this reason we say Amen! to the articles of the Tribune, and share its mortification at such a vulgar exhibition of barbarism as attended those inauguration ceremonies. But we have said more than we intended, which was simply to prepare the way by a few words for the following extracts:

We may as well confess the truth, but we do not live in a civilized country. The mere possession of edifices grand and diminutive, public and private, and the production of articles of food and raiment, do not constitute civilization. The Romans, who had white slave-artists, men of genius or talent, were also civilized in the same sense. They could build a matchless Coliseum—still standing—a wonder of strength and design—but they also could make it the arena of gladiatorial combat, designedly ferocious and tragic. In this country also we have yet to see Labor and Art rewarded. We have yet to see an intelligent Mechanic or Artist, as such, elevated to eminent office; though if his blows and strength had been devoted to battering down ensanguined walls and he had a chivalric title, he might have been selected, other things equal.

Our public festivals are countless. On all national jubilee-days they spring up by tens of hundreds over the land. They are made the occasion of national glorification, or in other words, things and persons are supposed to be dwelt upon in toasts and speeches, which are honorable to the country, and enable it to hold its head up among others of the earth. But we record as a dismal fact, which taken single would place America among barbarous nations, that never, never on these occasions has any man been signalized, individuated, honored, or elevated by notice in toasts or speeches, who was not connected with politics either civil or military. We challenge proof of any such official notice being taken of Rumsey, Fitch, Evans, Fulton, Whitney, Morse, McCormick, Ericsson, Allston, Sully, Inman, Hicks, Powell, Powers, Greenough, Bryant, Willis, Irving, Anthon, Dr. Thomas Jones, Sears Walker, Silliman, Hare, Wells, Haviland, Strickland, Renwick, William Norris, David Dale Owen, Franklin Bache, Ralph Waldo Emerson, H. C. Carey—or any other of the historical names of the country—names which will live when the work of political shams will be reduced to their least elements, when Army and Navy shall be abolished. * *

This fact of political function overriding and stifling worth, work and genius upon all occasions of a public or national character was simply carried out in full deformity at the opening of the Crystal Palace; and, in order that the barbarism of that occasion might not be contrasted with its opposite at the public banquet at Niblo's Saloon, on the day following, the same ignoring of all names and persons not political was repeated.

Let us consider the real condition and philosophy of the occasion:

In presence of twice ten thousand spectators, of Commissioners from Europe and America, of the Chief Public Servant of the Republic, of a corps of journal-reporters taking down notes to be reproduced within a few days in thousands of newspapers at home and hundreds abroad, the ceremonies of the inauguration took place. There soared above them the vast dome: there loomed around them the great structure, covering five acres, and seemingly light as a dream: in which the might of engineering and the splendor of architecture resonant of the triumphs of the nineteenth century are combined—an architecture no stale iteration of the ever-present and under-done rendering of Grecian orders in this country, but palpitating with the courageous and advancing heart of the age—of the age when iron wrenched from the stubborn earth is made to work with the genius of the nation—to cut its way in the aboriginal forest; to redeem from swamp and pestilence the richest land; to wreath the great staples into form and value; to cleave in the steamer the angriest seas; to support with the strength of fabled deity whatever incumbent massive structure: and, in the last capacity, threaded through fields of crystal, to solve a new problem in the builder's skill. This all was before them—not the names of politicians who did nothing toward it, not the prides of men paid out of the public purse, not the precedents and actors of Church and State—but Art and Labor so displaying its calculations and proportions, and so opening its doors to the world. But no Art or Labor was there represented in person, while the Roman ideas which confined greatness to the politician, warrior and priest—combined in the high patrician person—were absolutely carried out, and the world did not appear to have advanced for two thousand years. And the Banquet which followed was full in keeping with the Inauguration. Sir Charles Lyell being a foreign Commissioner, and Lord Ellesmere, a Norman nobleman, being absent owing to severe indisposition, was called upon to speak, but that was the only real tribute to science on the occasion. We wished on that occasion to have something except from politicians, in power or out of power, but with the above reservation we did not hear a word. We would like to have seen the company rise up en masse and cheer the architects who planned the building, and thus receive the homage which was so ungallantly withheld from them at the Inauguration—in the same way that Mr. Paxton was thanked and honored in public. But there they sat—countrymen of Thorwaldsen—unnoticed and unknown—no more named than they are in the official catalogue of the Crystal Palace.

We have no patience with such proceedings. Rhetoric is palsied in characterizing them as they deserve. Feejee islanders would honor a Robinson Crusoe who would give them a new string to their bow, but on the greatest occasion of Art and Industry this continent has ever known, we thrust both into the background—we wrench the claims from genius—we drive the laborers among the rafters of the dome to look down like blackguard boys on the official crowd beneath—we tell the makers of the treasures of the Exhibition to keep by their wares "during the ceremonies," as though they were not fit to sit alongside of cassocks and soldier-clothes—we follow out the uniform political fraud that prates of this or that speech in Congress saving the Republic, that omits on every public occasion to signalize Genius, that never mentions the Inventor, Painter, Composer, or Poet, that is circumfused in a sea of Roman and Norman lies!

THE INFLUENCE OF ART. The presence of one artist, or even of one person artistically and earnestly devoted to an art, though of no great attainments therein, is much in any circle. We say the mere presence of such a person and of his art, though he do not teach it, or seek systematically to impart it to his neighbors, is a great educational influence. If he be not himself a creative genius, if he be neither painter, sculptor, nor composer, yet he may be a constant expositor of the works of genius. His presence in a manner domesticates the arts among us, ensures to them a due respect and value, calls out by example whatever of latent taste or talent there may be for them in others, and fills the atmosphere with their grace and sanctity.

Music is especially available in this way. Music should be valued in society, if not as a study, yet as a pervading presence. He that makes music, from no other motive but mere love of it, does even a greater good than he that teaches it. There should be music floating about in the air, which should never suffer it to be a dull atmosphere. Snatches of melody should visit the workman in the field or shop, should impart a rhythm, if nothing more, to idle thoughts, should arrest the violent purpose, should soften and refine all hearts and manners. The presence of good music is the presence of a good spirit. The presence of deep and earnest music is the same thing as the presence of the deep and earnest minds who composed it,—a presence more surely felt than their speech or looks could be. Music is the outpouring of the lives, of the hopes and prayers and faith of men like Handel, Mozart, and Beethoven. It is good to have them with us. We know the moral influence of music has been questioned. It all depends upon the character of the music. Music is an expression of character, of the moods, the spirit, and the meaning of the man that makes it. His words can only tell the meaning of his thought; his music tells the meaning of him. A Beethoven surrounds you with a bracing Alpine element, he leads you into the solemn depths of nature, where everything excites earnest, unutterable spiritual longings; while a Rossini is like a gay city about you. Especially in earliest childhood is this influence felt. The very infant is affected by music. We care not that he should understand it, that he should even seem to heed or listen. An atmosphere of music is a peculiar atmosphere, as much as is the atmosphere of pine woods, or fresh fields. The sensibilities, the character, the tone of feeling, the aspirations, the habitual consciousness of the child will be affected by it, and his whole after-life will be redolent of it. Beethoven or Mozart may be made a presiding genius over his earliest education, before any teacher can begin to reach him or any thoughts shall have begun to shape themselves in his unconscious mind.

Berlioz's Opera Again.

The Critic of the Athenæum gives a different view of the failure of Benvenuto Cellini in London, from that copied on a preceding page. In spite of characteristic vinegar, there would seem to be some good sense in it. He asks:

When, then, should fancies so distinct, with the advantage of orchestral coloring so luminous, delicate and voluptuous, so utterly have failed to please? Because our opera public is narrow and partisan? Because a cabal was raised 'to damn' the work, and this not 'with faint praise'? Neither solution is the real one. Because—we reply—the composer has been self-willed, without being mighty enough to bear down and to fascinate his audience by a personality which is musically defective. Because no touching ingenuity of color can in music of effect (which all theatrical music must be) make amends with a general audience for the disdain of known rules and for the mystification of form. The catastrophe of this day week is ascribable to the errors of the system which M. Berlioz has substituted for ordinary construction,—of which we have never lost sight nor varied in our expressed judgment of their taste and tendency. His plan of action—though far less remorselessly followed out in the opera which has failed than in the symphonies which have succeeded here—reminds us of nothing so much as of the tactics of a late English manager, who was laughingly accused of always keeping several goods plays in his strong box which were too good to be brought forward just at that moment. Let M. Berlioz exhibit a glimpse of a bright and characteristic and beautiful thought—lo and behold! it is forthwith snatched away, and the listener, denied the expected sequel, is dragged into labyrinths where all is vague and crude under pretext of his being raised above common-place and meagre pedantries. Yet, what is so old as confusion,—what so poor as disorder? That is no real affluence of design in which the artist, heaping up fancies, blots and scrawls one above the other,—tantalizes the amateur with an impression that some child's random and feeble hand has been wantonly straggling over the master's sketch. It is of no avail to misapply terms,—to call that composition which is de-composition, to plead for new forms, when all form is perversely obliterated.

It is of no use for us to recollect that after a time zealous sympathy with an interesting heresiarch can work itself oblivious of grave defects for the sake of the great qualities that exist by their side. This no opera-goer has leisure to do: unless, like the Germans, he has long graduated in chaotic no-meaning—long tampered with no ideas for new ideas—ere he enters the opera-house. Nay, even among the Germans, it may be asserted, individual likes and dislikes have more to say on these occasions than revolutionary æsthetic convictions. Dr. Schumann's congregation—for instance—is cold to those who burn incense at Herr Wagner's altar, and vice versa. Both parties are recalcitrant against the inroad of the French iconoclast—though he be far more original in his doctrine than either Dr. Schumann or Herr Wagner. For, that M. Berlioz has indicated the true genius of a discoverer in his treatment of the orchestra, few open-minded persons will dispute. We are satisfied, also, that he has within him the materials of a great poetical musician. That he possesses command over these materials—that he has in any entire work brought them out—are assertions, to maintain which must involve the sacrifice of every known principle, practice and proportion in music. We are inclined to fancy, that could he recommence his career, with his present experience, we should have that which is incomplete in him completed—that which is crude mellowed—that which is inaccessible simplified.

Highly Important!

BOSTON, JULY 19, 1853.

To the Editor of the Journal of Music.

DEAR SIR:—As you seem to be so passionately fond of foreign performers and their music, I think it would be more congenial to your feelings, and also to many American musicians, if you removed yourself, office, and contents, to Germany.

Yours Respectfully,

NATIVE MUSICIAN.

REPLY.—The shortest way of getting us to Germany, will be to help us double our list of paying subscribers. Take hold, then, patriotic native American musicians, instead of wasting your efforts in jealous opposition of all advocacy or welcome of these interloping countrymen and scholars of Beethoven and Mendelssohn, and Pergolese and Rossini. If Mozart himself were to reappear on earth, and have the presumption to come over here and teach or give some concerts, you would perhaps flout him as an interloper, and cry out that the integrity and purity of the only genuine American school of musical art was endangered by his presence.

P. S. Our printer, reasonably enough, asks, "Why do you want the contents removed?"

"ELEUSINIA." Will some one inform us of the authorship of the beautiful poem on our fourth page? We found it in a Philadelphia paper, printed neither as original, nor with credit. Wedgewood copies of the "Portland Vase" are now so common, and its exquisite allegorical relief has puzzled so many curious admirers, that the poem will be read with interest.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

This evening the music on the Common will be by the GERMANIA SERENADE BAND, under the direction of Mr. SCHNAFF; and judging from the excellence of their performance at the Commencement festivals this week in Cambridge, we have reason to pray that the weather may not cheat us out of a rare feast. The ensemble of tone in their instruments, half brass, and half composed of clarinets, flute, bassoon, &c., was very fine; their intonation always pure and true (which is far from always the case with mere brass bands); and the tasteful regard to light and shade, and points of expression, for which this band have always been distinguished, as well as their choice and artistic selections, must raise our standard of good out-door music.

AN ORGAN CONCERT.—On Wednesday we had the pleasure to be present, with some sixty or seventy other invited guests, at a little musical feast of a choice and unique character. The motive of the assembling was to witness the effect in a new hall (the small hall, or chapel, of the Tremont Temple), of a fine new organ just erected there, at a cost of $1600, by Messrs. E. & G. G. Hook, of this city.

The organ is of course a small one, suited to the room, though the rich, large volume and clear, penetrating quality of most of its stops, would doubtless amply fill a much larger place. It has two rows of keys, with nine stops in the Great Organ, and seven in the Swell. It has twenty pedal keys (more than an octave and a half), connecting with Double Open Diapason sixteen-feet pipes. There are three couplings, and the number of registers is twenty-five. The whole number of pipes is about one thousand.

The instrument was played by Mr. WILCOX, one of our most promising, musician-like and well-schooled young organists, a pupil of Dr. Hodges, and now intimately connected with the organbuilding of the Messrs. Hook. He gave us an exceedingly varied and yet tastefully contrasted series of pieces, including some very clever and delicate improvisations in the free style. A fugue by Bach, the fugue piece from the Messiah: "For by his stripes," followed very naturally by the slow and solemn conclusion to "We like sheep," &c., were played with distinctness, and true feeling, and told very impressively in the little hall, which proves both richly resonant and free from all disturbing echo. In these pieces we could admire the powerful and mellow quality of the open diapason of the great organ, especially in the tenor register, where it is so often feeble and characterless. In another vein Mr. Wilcox played with rare delicacy of expression the prayer from Freyshütz, where that wild wind-harp accompaniment of the breeze sighing through the pine woods was beautifully conveyed by reed stops. Here, if we mistake not, we recognized the fine violoncello-like tones of a peculiar stop in this organ, called the Viol d'Amour.

With the aid of a good quartet choir, Mr. Wilcox also satisfactorily tested the virtues of his instrument in the accompaniment of chants, hymns, and other portions of the church service. Among the chants we recognized the solemn motive and harmony of Beethoven's In questa tomba oscura, which did impressive service in the chant form. Miss ANNA STONE sang, with all her brilliancy of tone and execution, and truth of intonation, the florid Gratias Agimus of Guglielmi, which she kindly repeated for the pleasure of the company. In this the clarinet obligato was effectively supplied by the organ.

Using the widest latitude of the organist's function, Mr. W. exhibited the variety of stops and the efficacy of the swell to great advantage in the overture to Fra Diavolo, which was quite a clever picture representation. Everybody left highly edified with the music and pleased with the chaste elegance, comfort and acoustic virtues of the "lesser temple." The lights, from gas burners suspended at intervals all over the ceiling, was sufficient, and grateful to the eyes, and gave a genial aspect to the place. The same may be said of the main hall or "greater temple," which had been courteously lighted for the inspection of the company as we passed out of the building. Further we have not room to say.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY seem to be happy and social from their success in the last winter's Concerts. Recently they presented their indefatigable secretary, Mr. J. L. Fairbanks, with a testimonial in the shape of a silver service,—and now on Tuesday they are to make a grand excursion down to Hingham.

NEW YORK.—The SONTAG-MARETZKE Opera, at Castle Garden, would seem to be the finest musico-dramatic combination that has yet been realized in America, and all reports proclaim it successful. Surely it ought to be, with such singers, and in such a place! Sontag, with Salvi and Badiali, in Lucia; Steffanone, with Salvi, in Norma, (in which Steffanone can be great, and they say, was so this time); Sontag again in the Elisir d'Amore, as we have seen her in Boston;—this is no poor account to render. But the event has been the two performances of Meyerbeer's Roberto il Diavolo, with Steffanone as Alice, Sontag as the Princess, besides Salvi, Badiali, Beneventano, &c. And last night there was announced Don Juan, with Steffanone for the Donna Anna!

At Niblo's, Mme. ANNA THILLON is again the "enchanted," in that and her three or four other well worn rôles.

GLANCE AT THE CONTINENT.

On the 24th of June, the Académie Impériale de Musique closed with a performance of Le Prophète. Chapius sang the part of Jean de Leyden, and Mme. Tedesco that of Fides. The "Cheval de Bronze," by Scribe and Auber, is in preparation for the re-opening, which will take place on August the 8th. Mademoiselle Lonisa Steller had made a second début in the Huguenots. The Jeûne Étranger, Moïse, and La Favorite, were amongst the latest performances. Mlle. Emmy La Grua is engaged for the Imperial Theatre of Vienna. The Opera Comique closed on the 19th of June.

The Committee of the Association of Dramatic Artists (Paris), announce a Ball, at the Jardin d'Hiver, for the 7th of July.

Ernst, the great violinist, has been received with great enthusiasm at Rochelle. He retains, it is remarked, that firm bowing and vigor, which placed him in the highest rank on his first appearance; but he has gained much in precision, and prestidigitation, to borrow a term, which seems to be consecrated to another instrument. His fantasia on Hungarian Airs called forth the loudest applause.

At Vienna, Teresa Milanollo, the lady violinist, has given a series of eighteen concerts, and cleared 22,000 florins, about £2000 sterling. Paganini scarcely excited so great a furore. The Court and the high aristocracy were present at all her concerts. The Opera was opened on the 11th of June, with the Prophète. Roger, the famous Parisian tenor, is engaged.

A new musical journal is publishing at Florence, called the "Gazzetta Musicale di Firenze."

Mme. de Begnis has just died in Italy, at the age of 53. Her first appearance in Paris was in 1819, where she made her debut in the character of Rossini, in Rossini's Barber.

It is not true, it seems, that Rossini was composing a mass for the sacre of the French Emperor.

Auber retains his position of Director of the Chapel, &c. to his Majesty, although the Chapel is (provisionally) dissolved.

Advertisements.

The best Book on Piano Instruction existing!

IN PRESS.—JULIUS KNORR'S GUIDE FOR TEACHERS ON THE PIANO. A full system of instruction, from the very outset, to artistic perfection, with full advice to teachers and pupils. Its progressive order, completeness, and the value of the pieces recommended, (about 200,) make it indispensable to teachers, and invaluable to all players. It is

THE BEST SELF-INSTRUCTOR EXTANT.

It is also the ONLY KEY to the proper use of Julius Knorr's "Materials," and his "Large Method." Price 75 cents.

G. A. SCHMITT, Petersburg, Va.

iii 14 3m

L. O. EMERSON,

Teacher of the Piano-Forte and Singing.

APPLY AT HIS RESIDENCE,

No. 12 INDIANA PLACE, BOSTON.

iii 13 3m.

A. W. FRENZEL,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC, and late Leader of the "SAXONIA ORCHESTRA," having made Boston his residence, is prepared to give Lessons on the Piano-Forte and in Singing, both in the English and German languages; also to accompany with the violin more advanced pupils in the Sonata-duos of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c. During the summer season, Mr. F. offers his services to classes out of town. Or he will receive scholars, from the city or the country, at his Music Rooms, No. 4 Pine Street, Boston, where he may always be found before 10 A. M., and between the hours of 1 and 3 P. M.

iii 6

JONAS CHICKERING,

RESPECTFULLY gives notice to his friends and the public that, having recovered from the late disastrous effects produced by the destruction of his factory, he is now ready to receive orders for PIANOS, which he promises to execute with as much faithfulness and promptitude as heretofore.

379 Washington Street, Boston.

Mar. 5.

tf

NEWS' PATENT

AMERICAN ACTION PIANOFORTE.

THE MANUFACTURER is in possession of numerous testimonials from distinguished Musical Professors, who have used the greatly improved ACTION PIANO, commending it in high terms. The attention of purchasers and amateurs of Music to an examination of its superiority, is solicited.

GEO. HEWS, 365 Washington St., Boston.

Apr. 10.

tf

BEETHOVEN'S CELEBRATED MASS in C, IN VOCAL SCORE:

With an Accompaniment for the Organ or Piano-Forte, by Vincent Novello. With Latin and English text. Just published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

Sold by all Music Dealers.

iii 4

—Edward L. Balch,

BERTINI'S PIANO METHOD—ABRIDGED.

The popularity of Bertini's Celebrated Method for the Piano is sufficient evidence of its great merits. The only objection ever made to the Method has been that the elaborateness with which the subject is treated, renders the task of commencing and completing it, somewhat arduous, and to a young pupil a formidable undertaking.

Teachers as well as scholars have, therefore, seen the want of an Abridged Edition, in which all that was actually necessary might be included—an edition containing the choicest and most important lessons; one that might be commenced and finished by those composing the majority of piano pupils.

To meet a want so long apparent, the publisher has issued this edition, which, as a superior work, is recommended to the musical public of the United States.

Published by

OLIVER DITSON,

115 Washington St.

Sold by all Music Dealers in the United States and Canada.

iii 12

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE,

No. 86 TREMONT STREET, BOSTON.

WHITE BROTHERS,
DEALERS IN MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS,

Best Italian, German, French and English Strings,

AGENTS OF

J. André, Offenbach; and G. André, Philadelphia,

FOR THE SALE OF FOREIGN CLASSIC MUSIC,

CHOIR MUSIC, &c.

Instruments Made, Repaired, Tuned, Bought, Sold, or Exchanged, on the most favorable terms.

IRA J. WHITE.

iii 2 3m

A. WARREN WHITE.

THEODORE T. BARKER,

MUSIC STORE,

No. 381 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

Clickering's Pianos to let.

All Foreign and American Musical Publications received as soon as published.

iii 23 3m

N. D. COTTON,

IMPORTER AND DEALER IN

English, French, and American Stationery,

DRAWING & PAINTING MATERIALS,

No. 13 Tremont Row, Boston.

 Wedding and Visiting Cards Engraved and Printed.

16 tf

BEETHOVEN'S ORATORIO OF ENGEDI, or DAVID IN THE WILDERNESS, known as the MOUNT OF OLIVES, is this day published in a neat, convenient form for the singer or concert-goer by

Geo. P. Reed & Co., Publishers,
17 Tremont Row, Boston.

Jan. 8.

D. B. NEWHALL,
MANUFACTURER AND DEALER IN
PIANO FORTES,

No. 344 Washington Street, Boston.

PIANO FORTES REPAIRED, TUNED, & TO LET.

Apr. 10.

tf

J. C. WOODMAN,

ORGANIST AND CONDUCTOR OF MUSIC AT CENTRAL CHURCH,

Teacher of Singing, Piano Forte, &c.,

No. 94 Chestnut Street, Boston.

iii 2 301.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.

FOREIGN MUSIC DEPOT,

GIRARD HOUSE BUILDINGS,

NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,

PHILADELPHIA.

N. B. The complete works, for Piano, (Quartets, Trios, Duets for Piano and Violin, Duets for four hands and Piano solo pieces,) of BEETHOVEN and MOZART, as also the Piano solo Works of CLEMENTI and HAYDN, as published by J. André, Offenbach, in sets, at very low prices. We have appointed

Messrs. WHITE BROTHERS,

TREMONT TEMPLE, BOSTON,

our Agents for the sale of the above Standard Editions of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, &c. &c.

iii 2 tf

MRS. ROSA GARCIA DE RIBAS,

TEACHER OF THE

PIANOFORTE, SINGING & GUITAR,

2 Seneca St., corner Harrison Avenue.

MR. De RIBAS will give instruction on the Oboe and Flute. Also MUSIC ARRANGED, TRANSPPOSED, &c. Boston, April 23.

3m

Letter-Press, Music and Job Printing-Office,

SIGNOR G. C. GUIDI respectfully informs his former pupils and the public, that he has resumed his instructions in SINGING, after the Italian school, with the intention to settle permanently in Boston. In order to accommodate those who may not wish to take private instruction, he will open classes for ladies and gentlemen, on moderate terms. None but good voices will be admitted. Terms liberal for persons intending to study for professional purposes.

Sig. G. can be consulted free upon any musical subject, daily, from 12 to 2, at Mr. Hew's Piano Manufactory, No. 365 Washington street, where terms and time for classes may be known.

Orders or notes for Sig. G. may be addressed to him at O. P. Reed & Co.'s Music Store, 17 Tremont Row, and at Oliver Ditson's, 115 Washington street.

Feb. 5.

A CARD.

THE SUBSCRIBER respectfully offers his services to the public as Teacher of the Piano-Forte, the Violin and the Guitar, also of Harmony and Singing, after a clear and easy method. He will also accompany pupils, both in seminaries and in private houses, in the practice of Duets, Trios, &c.

Address for the present at 168 Tremont Street.

March 26. 3m.

CARL GÄRTNER.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
265 Washington Street, Boston.

Oct. 16.

3m

T. BRICHER,

Organist and Conductor of Music

At the Bowdoin Square Church.

OFFICE UNDER THE CHURCH. . . ENTRANCE ON CHARDON ST.

Jan. 22. 3m.

H. S. CUTLER,

Organist at the Church of the Advent, also of the Boston Harmonic Society.

ADDRESS—(Care of ROLAND CUTLER, No. 4 Market Square, Boston.)

22 tf

F. F. MÜLLER,

DIRECTOR OF MUSIC AND ORGANIST at the Old South Church; ORGANIST of the Handel and Haydn Society; ORGANIST of the Musical Education Society, &c. &c. Inquire of Messrs. REED & Co., No. 17 Tremont Row, Boston.

iii 7 tf

NATHAN RICHARDSON,
PROFESSOR OF MUSIC.

Letters may be addressed at the Revere House, Boston.

25 tf

GEORGE F. WILLEY,
TEACHER OF MUSIC.

Private Tuition in the principles of Music and the Cultivation of the Voice.

MUSIC ROOM, the LECTURE ROOM OF KIRK STREET CHURCH, RESIDENCE, 34 FRANKLIN SQUARE, SUFFOLK STREET, feb. 5.

LOWELL, MASS.

Germania Serenade Band.

THE SERVICES OF THIS ASSOCIATION can be secured by applying to

G. SCHNAPP, Leader,

364 Tremont Street.

iii 14 tf

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

AT 21 SCHOOL STREET, BOSTON.

$2 per annum, in advance.

ITS CONTENTS relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time,—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music published at home and abroad. 3. A Summary of the significant Musical News from all parts; gathered from English, German, French, as well as American papers. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, Architecture, Poetry, Aesthetic Books, the Drama, &c.—8. Original and Selected Poems, short Tales, Anecdotes, &c. Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished. Address, (post paid,) J. S. DWIGHT,

21 School Street, Boston.

RATES FOR ADVERTISING.

For half a square, (8 lines,) or less, first insertion, . . . $0.50 each additional inser.25

For a square, (16 lines,) first insertion,1.00 each additional insertion,50

On advertisements standing three months or longer, a discount of twenty per cent. on the above rates is allowed.

(A column counts as seven squares.) Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 School St.

DWIGHT'S Journal of Music.

A Paper of Art and Literature.

VOL. III.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 30, 1853.

NO. 17.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

TERMS....TWO DOLLARS PER ANNUM, (IN ADVANCE.)

CITY Subscribers can be served at their houses by the further payment of fifty cents per annum.

For Rates of Advertising, see last page.

POSTAGE, if paid in advance, for any distance within the State, thirteen cents a year; if not in advance, twenty-six cents. To all places beyond the State, double these rates.

J. S. DWIGHT,.....EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE of PUBLICATION, 21 School St.

By REDDING & CO., 8 State St.

" GEO. P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row.

" A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.

" DEXTER & BROTHERS, 43 Ann Street, N. Y.

" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 722 Broadway, N. Y.

" MASON BROTHERS, 23 Park Row, New York.

" GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.

" G. ANDRE, 229 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St., Balt.

" COLBURN & FIELD, Cincinnati, O.

" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Persons willing to become Agents for procuring subscribers, especially Music-Dealers and Teachers, are invited to correspond with the Editor, as above. Satisfactory references required, and liberal commissions allowed.

Back numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Also bound copies of Vols. I. and II. at prices varying from $2.50 to $3.50.

Translated for this Journal.

A Sketch of Madame Mara.

From the German of F. ROCHLITZ.

[Continued.]

Gertrude, inspired with a new sense of freedom, soon grew cheerful, hopeful and well again. She travelled with her husband through most of the larger cities of Germany. Unbounded applause and rich gains flowed in upon all sides. She took the first, but Mara looked out for the second. She had few wants and needed little for herself: so she left the whole to her husband, and was content as long as he was. But he was seldom so; the more he had, the more he spent, and there was usually nothing in the box. Then he grew morose and harsh towards his lady, to the extent finally of maltreatment; and she bore all. Plethora of money plunged him back into his old bad habits; she bore this also.

In the year 1780 they went to Vienna, where they staid some time. The emperor Joseph occupied his leisure hours at that time with his darling hobby, the theatre of the Italian Comic Opera; and this toy (with Signora Storace at its head) was just then extremely fascinating. But Gertrude was in no way fitted for this opera; and accordingly she found small support with Joseph. But Maria Theresa, though advanced in years, and withdrawn from the world and nearly all things worldly, took a more gracious interest in her, and gave her, as she desired to visit France, a letter to her royal daughter there.

In 1782 Gertrude went to Paris. With such a letter she was at once presented to the queen; and Maria Antoinette, gracious and always attached to the German music, received her with the friendliest condescension, notwithstanding that she lacked everything, besides her art, that gave a lady currency at so highly cultivated a court. After she had sung before the queen at Versailles, and had been largely applauded and remunerated, she announced a public concert in Paris. The great fame that had shone before her, her gracious reception by the still deified queen, and the presence of TODI, put all on tip-toe with expectation. The Todi passed universally, at least in France, for the first singer of the age; and as she added to her (in certain departments really enchanting) art the charms of beauty, grace, and the finest social culture, which were all wanting in the German singer, she proved for her, especially in Paris, all the more dangerous a rival. Gertrude herself, after she had seen and heard the Todi, was, for perhaps the first time, full of apprehension. However, the day came, she collected herself, summoned up all her powers, sang, and all were in raptures. Gertrude became the topic of the town and of the journals; Paris was divided into two parties, the Todists and the Maratists. "Well," asked the queen at Versailles of two courtiers, who, as she knew, had been present at the concert; "which of the two is the greatest singer?" "Undoubtedly the Mara," answered the first. "C'est bientôt dit (c'est bien Todi)," said the second, wittily enough. Could parties but discriminate, they would easily have found that the two artists—like a thousand things, in the arts, as in life—were not to be placed above or below, but beside each other; and that then they would both prevail, without any mutual injury. In the sublimely simple, and in brilliant bravura, Gertrude surpassed the Todi, as greatly as she was surpassed by her in heartfelt, tender, love-inspiring songs.

Gertrude remained through this and the following year in Paris. But as the French were never great friends to concerts, and least of all to serious songs in them—nor are they so to-day;—and as Gertrude's proper place was not, as Hiller said, upon the theatre: she resolved to travel farther, and in fact to England. Here all was different; here the grand oratorio and great concert music—partly through the decided preference of the king and royal family—had stood in the highest esteem and been most richly supported since the time of Handel. Gertrude, judging herself and her talents now more calmly, found that for just this kind of music she was suited, as no other one besides herself.

But before we accompany her to England, it may be advisable to glance once more at her domestic and affectional relations, and then close this mournful chapter as briefly as possible, once for all, although we may have to anticipate the course of her life somewhat.

Mara had brought things to so bad a pass in Paris, and again in London, with his vicious habits, and even in his own house with his wife, that her attachment to him could not but grow cold at last. She separated from him, and, as she settled a not inconsiderable support on him for life, peaceably. He started off with his violoncello, and his bad tricks, and roved about through Germany, where finally, though somewhat late, he came to a melancholy end. Thus Gertrude had come to see that this man was good for nothing and entirely unworthy of the great sacrifice which she had made to him; she had learned wisdom; but only for this special case. Even when I met her personally, in 1802, consequently in her fifty-third year, she had a good-looking friend and companion of about four and twenty with her. He was named Signor Florio, and of his merits there was absolutely nothing visible to others, except that he played the flute indifferently well. We leave this connection, with all the curious stories, which the Berliners knew how to tell at that time; we leave earlier matters connected with it, letting them all rest, and merely single out two brief remarks, which appear necessary to complete the picture of this remarkable woman.

Gertrude, when she was once won by a man, gave him unconditionally and unreservedly her all,—her money-chest included. The consequence was, that when she came to look into it, in spite of the sums upon sums that had kept flowing in, she found it empty; that of the hundreds of thousands, which she had cleared in England alone, there was absolutely nothing left, when she again stepped upon the German soil; that even in places like Berlin, where her two concerts yielded her a clear gain of between three and four thousand thalers; at her departure she possessed less than nothing; and that now, in her old age, especially since an accident has befallen her, which we shall mention in due time, she possesses scarcely any thing. Intimacy with a certain class of men, with all that it involved; as well as the withdrawal of better persons of both sexes, who could not and might not sustain any relation with such men: to these two causes it was owing that Gertrude, in all that good society teaches or compels, in all that one unconsciously derives from it, was so utterly deficient, that those who had not been informed of it beforehand, must have found it altogether strange. Besides her art, there was nothing in her to interest, but a certain true-heartedness and good nature; unless indeed one should be interested in the very union in one and the same person of such extremely narrow culture with such deep sense and high conception of her art.

Let this close this whole chapter of her life; and we will now resume the thread of her history where we let it drop.

In 1784 she went to London. Her fame had long preceded her: she was received with the greatest honor. She possessed the advantage, nowhere more necessary than in England, of speaking the language of the country with considerable fluency; she had learned it while a child and still practised it industriously. The Prince of Wales, afterwards king, became her protector; and every one knows what such protection can do even in England. Since the king kept no private music of any consequence, but only supported the public oratorios, especially those which had been so dear to him through his whole life, Gertrude made her first appearance in the Pantheon, and gained, besides the most brilliant reception, in two weeks 15,000 thalers. There was now no success for any concert in which Gertrude did not sing; so too her singing had to lend lustre to the great social parties of the nobility; and as the Englishman generally covets nothing, as he does nothing, in vain, she had followed the counsel of her friends and fixed the price for every piece she sang, at three hundred thalers; this was paid, and often more than this. Far greater was the fame and popular sympathy which she acquired, however, by assisting in the colossal concerts, founded and for some time kept up annually by Salomon and Cramer (both Germans), in celebration of the memory of Handel, in the immense interior of Westminster Abbey. Here the religious oratorios exclusively of that great master, never and nowhere surpassed in that form of composition, were produced, under the patronage of the monarch and the entire royal family, by an assemblage of at first more than two hundred singers and three hundred and fifty instrumentalists[?]; afterwards increased to a thousand—with an effect of which no one can have an adequate conception if he was not there to feel it. Handel, though a German, was regarded as the national composer; and accordingly this whole enterprise was considered a national one; and, since the entire proceeds were destined for the widows and orphans of deceased musicians, it became an obligatory act of benevolence. Certainly most worthy, as well as genuine old English views! and they inspired a brilliant welcome and a universal esteem towards the members who bore prominent parts in the performance. Among these participants was by all means Gertrude—nay, at the head of the singers, and delivering the principal parts, which Handel usually gave to the first soprano, she was, next to the projectors, the most shining member of them all. For here first, here, as nowhere before or since, she found the place where she could exhibit her most peculiar excellence in all its power and fullness and effectiveness. In that vast space she could display her extraordinary organ; in the simplicity and grandeur of the composition, her simple and grandiose style of singing; in the expressive, the supremely true inventions of the master, how thoroughly she comprehended him, and had become imbued with his spirit, his intentions and his style. Here too she could try her capacity upon thousands of hearers; she could not only render the ever significant words intelligible to every mind, but she could convey each syllable, each accent with the most vital, penetrating power to every heart. Even to this day men, whose opinion is the best authority, remember with astonishment and joyful enthusiasm,—with what power, what grand expression of the firmest and most unqualified confidence she sang the oft-returning "I know that my Redeemer liveth," in that celebrated air of Handel's "Messiah," and singing spake, and speaking emphasized, attuning every hearer to the same feeling, and wafting all their souls aloft with her's. This, just this, was what no other singer but the Mara ever did or could do: and here was the culminating point of her art, as here too was its most brilliant triumph.

By these productions, as we have said, she kindled the enthusiasm even of the multitude toward her; and as this festival was annually repeated, and she stood at the head of the singers with the same ascendancy each time, she could rekindle the enthusiasm and keep it fresh. Hence it came, that scarcely any public concert met with favor, in which Gertrude did not appear; accordingly the managers had to solicit her assistance; and she, or rather her purse-bearer, used to grant it at the highest prices. Even the Italian theatre had to conform to the one wish of the public and the other of the singer.

Meanwhile she soon had occasion to taste, together with the richest rewards and greatest distinctions, certain old, well-known Anglicisms of a wholly different sort, and she had to put up with them for better or for worse. Every body knows the marvellously strict distinction made in England in the general opinion and treatment of things in the abstract and things in the concrete. The Court, or the persons who compose it, even the highest—what a difference it makes! The government, the administration, or the persons of whom it consists,—what a difference! So too, and far more so, in the case of less exalted objects; here, briefly speaking, in the opinion of the multitude everything is—merchandise; for all merchandise, money; for good merchandise, much money: the receiver, and the giver—they are nothing. Accordingly the singer, as a personified singing voice, deserves to be highly prized and richly paid: further than that, considered as a person, she is nought. We will cite a single example.

Gertrude's fame had spread from the metropolis into the other great cities of England; these also wished to hear her for a rich remuneration. This was the case with Oxford. She arrived there. In the concert, that had been prepared for her with all possible splendor, she appeared in one of her greatest, but at the same time most exhausting pieces: a long recitative; the aria, first Adagio, in long sustained notes, and then the grand Allegro, in the most difficult bravura style. The audience were enraptured, Gertrude had finished, and Da Capo! was the cry. That is too much for human strength: do no such thing! Gertrude comes forward to excuse herself: she is not heard! She bows, expresses by gestures a request that she may say a word: it is not suffered! You get money—a great deal of money: now you must do our pleasure. She does not do it: they hiss, they thump, they scream: then she turns round and goes. How? Does she show her back to the audience, a thing which the actor on the stage may never do, but make his exit backwards, in the best way he can? The tumult grows more fearful: she waits it through, the whiles an instrumental piece is played, which they let pass in quiet. But now she must come on with her second aria. The instant she appears the tumult breaks out anew and will not end. This time its costs her more exertion to control her sensibility: meanwhile she lets the orchestra play the ritornel to the aria. As soon as she commences, all is still: when she has ended, the storm breaks out anew. Now, from suppressed excitement and from exhaustion, she can no longer sustain herself upon her feet; to turn round and go off she dares not venture: a stool stands near; she seats herself. But that was a new offence: what serves must stand. So now she is solemnly hissed off. Nor was that enough; but the next day she gets from the Chancellor of the University, Dr. Chapman, a formal warning never again to brighten the University of Oxford with her singing; and the newspaper contains the following article: "There have already been repeated complaints of the unmannerliness of Madame Mara; but since the Oxford men have become her teachers, she is on the point of putting the finishing touch to her education." Gertrude had inserted by way of answer: (for the newspapers of course are free!) "An attack of pleurisy, under which I was already suffering in Berlin, forbids my singing or standing too long at a time. And as no positive order with regard to standing or sitting has ever fallen under my observation, I am sure that I have not deserved such unfeeling and unjust treatment as I have experienced here. The Herr Doctor Chapman has my sympathy."*

* Even JOSEPH HAYDN, although world-renowned and honored, and especially in England, had there to taste the same experience. It is well known that Salomon had invited him to London to his grand concerts, under the condition that he would write something new for every concert, and conduct the work himself. To this we owe twelve of his finest symphonies. When the great master made his first appearance in the orchestra, to commence his direction, all the members, without previous concert, rose from an instinctive feeling of respect and love. This was a thing that had been only wont to occur, when the king or some one of the royal family entered the boxes; how was it to be suffered here? The public hissed and thumped, and screamed out, "Fiddlers! Fiddlers!" till the men, terrified, had resumed their seats and Haydn had caused the first chord to be sounded.

One of the most exalted personages sent Salomon to Haydn with the request that he would give him lessons on the piano. Haydn stared at his friend: "I? I am no piano player. Give lessons!" "I entreat you," replied Salomon, who was perfectly familiar with the ways there, "do not refuse; else it will get out, and then it is all over with our whole enterprise, in fact with your entire existence here. Ask what compensation you please: put money in your pocket; go at the stated hours, and be quite sure there'll be nothing in it but the name of the thing." Haydn complied. The first time, he was introduced into the presence, graciously conversed with for a quarter of an hour and then dismissed. As for the other hours, he was allowed to pass them in the ante-chamber, where he found himself not ill at ease, since nearly every person present was emulous to entertain him. On his departure he received, besides the stipulated rich remuneration, a fine present for his faithful services as piano-forte master.

[Conclusion next time.]

Queen Elizabeth's Musical Skill.

Queen Elizabeth was, as well as the rest of Henry VIII's children, and, indeed, all the princes of Europe at that time, instructed in music early in life. Camden, in enumerating the studies of his royal mistress, says, "She understood well the Latin, French, and Italian tongues, and was indifferently well seen in the Greek. Neither did she neglect musick, so far forthe as might become a princesse, being able to sing, and play on the lute prettily and sweetly." There is reason to conclude that she continued to divert herself with music many years after she came to the throne. Sir James Melvil gives an account of a curious conversation which he had with this princess, to whom he was sent on an embassy by Mary, Queen of Scots, in 1564: "After her majesty had asked him how his queen dressed; what was the color of her hair; whether that, or hers, was best; which of the two was fairest; and which of them was highest in stature; then she asked, what kind of exercises she used. 'I answered,' says Melvil, 'that when I received my despatch, the queen was lately come from the Highland hunting; that when her more serious affairs permitted, she was taken up with reading of histories; that sometimes she recreated herself with playing on the lute and virginals.' She asked, if she played well. I said, reasonably well for a queen. The same day, after dinner, my Lord of Hunsdon drew me up to a quiet gallery, that I might hear some music, and (but he said that he durst not avow it) where I might hear the queen play on the virginals. After I had hearkened a while, I took up the tapestry that hung before the door of the chamber, and seeing the queen's back was toward the door, I entered within the chamber, and stood a pretty space, hearing her play excellently well. But she left off immediately, so soon as she turned about and saw me. She appeared to be surprised to see me, and came forward, seeming to strike me with her hand, alleging that she used not to play before men, but when she was solitary, to shun melancholy. She asked how I came there. I answered, as I was walking with my Lord Hunsdon, as we passed by the chamber door, I heard such a melody as ravished me, whereby I was drawn in ere I knew how; excusing my fault of homeliness, as being brought up in the court of France, where such freedom was allowed; declaring myself willing to endure what kind of punishment her majesty should be pleased to inflict upon me for so great an offence. Then she sat down low upon a cushion, and I upon my knees by her; but with her own hand she gave me a cushion to lay under my knee, which at first I refused, but she compelled me to take it. She inquired whether my queen or she played the best. In that I found myself obliged to give her the praise."

If her majesty was ever able to execute any of the lessons that are preserved in a manuscript known by the name of "Queen Elizabeth's Virginal Book," she must have been a very great player; as some of those pieces, which were composed by Tallis, Bird, Giles, Farnaby, Dr. Bull, and others, are so difficult that it would hardly be possible to find a master in Europe who would undertake to play one of them at the end of a month's practice. Besides the lute and virginals, it has been imagined that Elizabeth was a performer on the violin, and on an instrument something like a lute, but strung with wire, and called the poliphant. A violin of singular construction, with the arms of England, and the crest of Dudley, Earl of Leicester, this queen's favorite, engraved upon it, was purchased at the sale of the Duke of Dorset's effects many years since. From the date of its make, 1578, and from the arms and crest engraved upon it, it has been conjectured that Queen Elizabeth was its original possessor. It is very curiously carved; but the several parts are so thick, and loaded with ornaments, that it has no more tone than a mute, or violin with a sordine; and the neck which is too thick for the grasp of the hand, has a hole cut in it for the thumb of the player, by which the hand is so confined as to be rendered incapable of shifting, so that nothing can be performed on this instrument but what lies within the reach of the hand in its first position. The music of the queen's establishment differed but little from those of Mary and Edward. Burney says that the musicians, through all the changes of religion, tuned their consciences to the court pitch, that is, in unison with the orders of their sovereign, the supreme head of the church. But let us see if they had not reason on their side. In the reign of Henry VIII., Testwood, one of the choir at Windsor, was burned for being a Protestant, and another musician only escaped the same fate through the interference of a friend, who obtained his pardon on the ground that it was not worth while to burn him, "as he was only a musician;" and Marbeck was condemned, and saved "because he was a musician."

LISETTE.

My light Lisette
Is grave and shrewd,
And half a prude,
And half coquette;
So staid and set,
So terse and trim,
So arch and prim,
Is my Lisette.

A something settled and precise
Has made a home in both the eyes
Of my Lisette.

The measured motion of the blood,
The words where each one tells,
Too logical for womanhood,
Brief changes rung on silver bells;—
The cheek with health's close kisses warm,
The finished frame so light,
Such fullness in the little form,
As satisfies the sight;—
The boddice fitted and exact,
The nut-brown tress so lightly curl'd,
And the whole woman so compact,
Her like is nowhere in the world.
Such knowledge in the ways of life
And household order, such
As might create a perfect wife,
Not careful, over much,
All these so moved me,
When we met—
I would she loved me,
Trim Lisette.

What if to-morrow morn I go,
And, in an accent soft and clear,
Lay some three words within her ear?
I think she would not answer no.
And by the ribbon in her hair,
And those untasted lips, I swear
I keep some little doubt as yet,
With such an eye,
So grave and sly
Looks my Lisette,
What words may show
Me yes or no
Of my Lisette.
The doubt is less,
Since we last met;
Let it be "yes,"
My dear Lisette.

The Magic of Music.

The sprightly correspondent of the National Intelligencer, who is travelling through Syria, and at last accounts had reached the ancient city of Baalbeck or Heliopolis, gives the following description of the effect which his flute and the negro melody have upon the descendants of Ishmael:

"In travelling through Syria, as in other parts of the world, I always carry my flute with me, to relieve the lonely hours at night, and excite a social feeling among the natives. I had fluted my way after the fashion of Goldsmith, through many a difficulty; and now I was resolved to see what the magic of music would do in removing the prejudices of the Arabs. As soon as it was dark, we had a good fire lit in the corner, and pulling off our shoes, as custom required, we spread our mats close by, and sat down cosily to enjoy the cheerful fire, my friends (the Southerner and the English captain) smoking their chibouks, while I brought forward my knapsack, and commenced putting the pieces of my flute together. The Arabs, who had begun to crowd in, were greatly interested in the strange instrument that I was getting under way, and Yusef, who was rather proud of his civilization, sat by enjoying their remarks, and giving us a running interpretation. Some thought it was a sort of pistol, with a large touch hole; but the notion was ridiculed by the more knowing ones, who said it was plain to see that it was a new fashioned pipe, and that they would soon see me put the bowl to it, and begin to smoke.

"At last I got the pieces adjusted, and commanding silence by a mysterious motion of the hand, commenced playing that classical air of "Old Zip Coon," which I dare say was never heard before among the ruins of Baalbeck. There was the most breathless attention on all sides, interrupted only by the suppressed exclamation of Tahib! Tahib! (Good, good!) when I blew a very shrill or false note, and soon the women and children from the neighboring houses began to crowd in, and there was gradually a large circle formed around the room, and the audience squatting down in rows, till there was scarcely space enough to breathe. I blew away with all my might, for not only was I excited with the success of my experiment, but rather inspired with the music I was making, which I assure you was not bad. The familiar airs of home made me sentimental, and I merged into the doleful air, "Give me back my heart again," which was a miserable failure; not a damsel seemed disposed to listen to it. They commenced in the very middle of the most pathetic strain to call for "Old Zip Coon." When I had ended, there was no end of the tahibs. Mr. Coon was a decided hit.

"In order to vary the entertainment, silence was commanded again, and Yusef was desired to explain that there would be a song; that it was a song of an old black gentleman who lived in America, who was a pacha among the blacks; that he was called Uncle Ned, because he was so venerable, and being very old, the hair all fell off his head, and there was no hair at all in the place where the hair ought to grow; that he hadn't any eyes to see with, and consequently was as blind as a post or stone wall, or anything else that is supposed to be deficient in eyes; that he neither had teeth to eat bread with, and he had to let the bread alone and eat something else; that his fingers were as long as canes in the brake, which was about an average of sixteen feet; and eventually, that one day when he was out in the field, a horrible monster, called Grim Death, came along and caught him by the heel and carried him away, and he was never heard of any more except in this song, which was written in commemoration of these facts.

"Thereupon, having excited the most profound interest in the history of Uncle Ned, I launched forth into the song, keeping as near the tune as possible, and going through all the motions descriptive of the baldness of his head, the absence of his teeth, and the length of his fingers. When I arrived at the final catastrophe, where grim death seizes the old gentleman by the heel, I made a sudden motion at the heel of one worthy who was sitting near by, completely upsetting him with fright, and causing a laugh from the audience that seemed as if it would never come to an end! It was the best hit of the evening, and completely removed all constraint. The women had gradually uncovered their faces, and the men were in such good humor that they paid no attention to it; and we were all as jovial as possible—showing that people all over the world are pretty much the same by nature; and that there are few races so barbarous as not to be moved by music and a spirit of sociability."

Fortunata Tedesco.

[The critic of one of the leading London papers thus describes the debut of a singer well known to the Opera lovers in this country. Tedesco established a high position for herself in Paris during the past year, and appeared for the first time in London, as Fides in the Prophète, on the first of this month.]

The new Fides was warmly, but not enthusiastically, greeted. She had a severe ordeal to undergo, in supplying the place of Grisi and Viardot, and Madame Tedesco evidently felt it, being nervous in the extreme in her opening recitative, and in the duet with Bertha. In the grand aria, "Ah! mon fils," however, in the second part, her timidity was overcome, and the fair debutante sang with all her power, and produced an immense effect, and from that moment her success was assured. In the coronation scene, and in the prison, her vocal and histrionic powers were still further tested, and, at the conclusion, Madame Tedesco was unanimously declared a singer of the highest pretensions.

The chief qualities of Madame Tedesco's voice are power, grandeur, and largeness. In volume and sonority of tone, it more resembles Malibran's voice than any voice we have heard, and, in extent, it almost equals Alboni's. It is, in short, a grand dramatic voice, and wonderfully fitted to the music of Fides. Madame Tedesco is an Italian, but does not betray any tendency to the modern Italian school in singing Meyerbeer's music. In this respect, she exhibits as much art as Viardot, and more—we write it deferentially—than Grisi. Madame Tedesco is, moreover, a highly accomplished vocalist—a true artist, in the best sense of the word. She sings with great ease, and manages her voice with admirable skill. A slight inclination to exaggerate, as exemplified in the production of the lower notes, is the principal defect of her singing; but who that has sung at the Grand Opera of Paris ever escaped from the besetting sin of French singers—exaggeration? Not one whom we have ever heard. The wonder is, that Madame Tedesco displays so little exaggeration. One of the greatest charms of Madame Tedesco's singing is, her perfect intonation. Her voice is always in tune, whether she sings high or low, forte or piano. In that awfully difficult aria, "O, verità! figlia del ciel," in the prison, act 3, which taxes the vocal powers to the very utmost, Madame Tedesco was eminently successful, and created a furor. In rapidity and clearness of articulation, she was perhaps surpassed by Madame Viardot; but, in power of tone, quality of voice, purity, intonation, and every vocal charm, she was far superior. When it is remembered that this scena was written expressly for Madame Viardot, the triumph of Madame Tedesco must be considered the greater.

As an actress, we can hardly speak so unreservedly for Madame Tedesco. She is intelligent, easy, graceful, and exceedingly natural—accomplishments which go no small way to make up the sum total of the great artist—and, moreover, she is full of feeling, and passionate, and is not devoid of energy and abandonment; but, the tongue of flame has not descended upon her, and she is deficient only in genius. This is rather felt than rendered explainable in Madame Tedesco's acting. There is always meaning and the best endeavor in what she does; but she fails to establish that intercommunion of sympathy between herself and the audience which only the highest genius can effect, and which is independent of all art, and all power. In fine, she has not laid down the electric-wires between herself and her hearers, and spectators, and cannot strike a thrill home to the heart. But Madame Tedesco's achievement in Fides has been that which, perhaps, no other living artist (Alboni excepto) could accomplish. To achieve what she has achieved, after the triumphs of Grisi and Viardot, is a feat, all but unparalleled, and must be chronicled as such.

Hector Berlioz.

[From the London Musical World, July 9.]

The departure of this eminent musician and critic is fixed for to-day, his duties in Paris not permitting him a longer absence. The grand concert, which was to have been given under his name, and for his benefit, at Exeter Hall, has, therefore, been abandoned.

As whatever relates to Hector Berlioz must be a matter of interest to those who admire and respect the highest and sincerest qualities of an artist, we shall not hesitate to make public a fact connected with the concert that should have taken place, but is now given up—a fact which confers credit on the committee who combined for the purpose of organizing it, and upon those who came forward spontaneously, as patrons and supporters. We cannot do this better than by publishing a translated extract from a letter which we have received from Hector Berlioz himself.

"My dear —: The concert cannot take place. The gentlemen of the committee, organized to get it up, have conceived the delicate, charming, and generous idea of devoting the sum realized by the subscription opened for the concert to the acquisition of the score of my Faust, which will be published, with English text, under the superintendence of Beale, and other members of the committee. It would be impossible to be more cordial and artist-like at the same time; and I rejoice at the result of the performance at Covent Garden, since it has been the cause of a demonstration so sympathetic, intelligent, and worthily expressed. Give all the publicity in your power to this manifestation; you will render justice to your compatriots, and, at the same time, confer a very great pleasure on

"Yours, &c., HECTOR BERLIOZ."

After a short stay at Paris, Berlioz will leave for Baden-Baden, where he is engaged to direct a musical performance on a grand scale, which will take place in the middle of August. The whole of Romeo and Juliet will be executed. Sophie Cruvelli, and her sister Marie, are also engaged; so that the "solemnity" will be one of irresistible attraction. Vivier, and his enchanted horn, alone are wanted to render it complete. Vivier, however—who has, for some months past, withdrawn himself from society, for the purpose of serious and uninterrupted study—has resolved to try his fortune in America. Il a raison. Vivier, a tousjours raison. His success in the United States is certain.

Correspondence.

LOUISVILLE, July 19th, 1853.

MR. EDITOR:—What does that "Germanian" mean, who, writing to your journal from St. Louis, denounces Louisville as devoid of good musical taste? The Germanians gave five concerts here,—the average attendance was eight hundred persons. At one or two of the concerts, Mozart Hall, which holds from twelve to thirteen hundred, was crowded to its utmost capacity. The best music, such as the overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream," a movement from the eighth symphony of Beethoven, were encored, not noisily, but with the earnestness of "the hart, panting after the water-brooks." Beethoven's C minor symphony was listened to with breathless attention, and was received and spoken of in a manner which plainly showed that the great Prophet "knocked at the door" of every heart present.

The Germanian letter-writer complains of the loud talking among the audience. This was true at the first concert, but it was so sharply rebuked in all the daily papers, that, at all the succeeding concerts, and particularly during the performance of the fifth symphony, the music-lovers, who formed the majority of the audience, were allowed quietly to partake of the rich feast before them. Is it fair to believe what he would imply, that Louisville is the only city, where the vulgar practice of talking in the concert-room still obtains? It is a great pity that the aforesaid letter-writer could not have been more discreet, if not more just—for should he and his brethren again visit Louisville, their good music might not save them from the necessity of playing to four very cold listeners, viz: the walls of the concert-room. [Stay, not so fast! You know your icy indignation would melt at the first hope or anticipation of any more such music!—Ed.]

We of Louisville are not fond of boasting, neither are we fond of having our reputation for musical taste so rudely assailed. Among us may be found many ladies as well as gentlemen, who ardently love and creditably perform the piano-forte works of Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn, and Chopin, as well as those of Thalberg, and the authors of the New School generally.

I had designed giving you at length my impressions of the concerts of the Germania Society, but what could I say that has not been already said? All praise becomes stale, when applied to such performances. I am only sorry that Germanian pen-holders cannot be as just to the tastes of their patrons as Germanian bow-holders are faithful to the composers whose music they interpret.

Yours respectfully,

S.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 30, 1853.

A Greeting from Germany.

For the sake of Boston,—if not for the natural pride of showing our friends what welcome this our journalizing enterprise has met with in the most musical country of the Old World,—we can do no less than print the following document.

We were not, we confess, at all prepared for such a recognition from head-quarters, for such a strong and hearty Hand-druck from such high authority as the first musical journal in all Europe, the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, published at Leipzig. This "New Journal for Music" is the paper founded several years ago by Robert Schumann; and, although it is strongly identified with the new movements in the musical world of to-day,—with what certain English critics sneeringly call "Young Germany," being a zealous exponent and defender of the artistic principles and efforts of Schumann, Wagner, Liszt at Weimar, Berlioz, &c., dating a new era of creative musical life from the ninth symphony of Beethoven;—yet its high and earnest and at the same time genial tone of criticism, and the rare talent and even genius employed in its columns, have made it eminently respected in the musical journalism of Europe. A passing notice for our humble sheet was the most we could have dared expect from it; judge then of our surprise at such a formal public greeting, such an "offenes Sendschreiben," to ourselves, and, what is more important and of far more interest,—to this little corner of the musical world, whose musical activity we have tried from week to week to mirror unto itself and unto the world at large, and also, so far as in us lay, to point to some good end.

For the sake of Boston, we have said, we print our "open letter" here. Because this is really the first appreciative, distinct recognition from the Old World, of what is and has been going on in our good city in the way of musical culture. It is the first admission from head-quarters of our musically artistic character. We at length have credit, where credit is never carelessly or insincerely given, for some genuine love and true pursuit of Art, instead of for our ready welcome to all sorts of humbug. The catalogue we published last spring of the compositions of great masters heard here during the last winter, has operated like a charm to open the eyes of musical authorities abroad. Heretofore the European press has looked exclusively to New York for all indications of a musical movement in this country; its quotations on this subject from the American press, have been and are made almost uniformly from the New York Herald!—and one may judge what notions they must have in Europe both of music and musical criticism upon this side of the ocean. We are truly happy that our small sheet has been the means of carrying abroad some juster and distincter notions. Only let us, in thanking our German friends for their kind welcome, warn them against the impression that the sound, artistic musical efforts in this country centre too exclusively in Boston; for there are genuine artists and art-lovers also in New York, and a Philharmonic Society (not to name other excellent associations) which has educated a public to a permanent demand for music of the highest standard.

We thank the writer of this letter also for his high opinion of our musical catholicity and appreciation of what is genuine in new as well as older Art,—of our preparation for the advent of the Wagner music, whenever its fullness of time shall come for crossing the Atlantic. But we fear our generous welcomer sees and anticipates too much in us. As to the "New School," so called, we cannot stand committed to that of which we personally know so little; but we trust we shall be, (as it is only every honest editor's duty to be), always ready to receive without prejudice what is newest, as well as what is oldest and most long approved, provided it possesses, and we have wit or soul enough to see or feel that it possesses, any of the true vitality of Art. We have continually and glowingly upheld classic models; we have been invidiously called a "classicist" and partial friend of musical old fogey-ism; but our very love of the classics of musical art is with us the ground of the most unfailing faith in Progress. What is genuine is always new, and is an earnest of newer and greater yet to come. O for long life on this earth, or in conscious communication with it, that we may hear and hail the MUSIC OF THE FUTURE!

The letter suggests several topics, the discussion of which might well occupy our editorial columns for some weeks to come. There is one especially, of which this letter presents the great and generous side,—while the small and narrow side was represented in the little squib from a "Native Musician," published in our last,—which must and shall engage our attention at some length when we shall have more room than now: and that is the relation of Germany to America in the matter of musical culture. We wish, if possible, to suggest some thoughts, some facts, which may tend to relieve and cure this miserable and suicidal jealousy about "native" and "foreign," that torments so many who would fain carve a business out of music.

But we will not detain our readers longer from the letter, which is translated as literally and faithfully as we could do it, with the critical revision of one of our best German teachers.

[From the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, Leipzig, June 17.]

A Glance at the "Far West."

OPEN LETTER TO MR. J. S. DWIGHT,
Editor and Proprietor of the "Journal of Music,"
&c. &c., Boston.

The editor of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik,—a journal with which you, dear sir, are well acquainted,—sent to the undersigned, a short time since, the first numbers (for April and May, 1853) of Vol. III. of your "Journal of Music," with the request that he would speak of them at some length in the Zeitschrift, and especially that he would continue to devote particular attention to your "Journal," which has excited universal interest among us.

This commission I have hailed with lively joy, and shall devote myself with zeal to this work. As I had found no opportunity until now of becoming acquainted with the "Journal," established by you last year, I was most agreeably surprised to find in you, dear sir, the founder of this enterprise, a man, who has not only earnestly comprehended his general task, and carried it through with circumspection and with knowledge, but who has also fully recognized and consistently maintained the decided position which a "Journal of Art" must take in the present day—in order to be able to meet with acuteness and convincing power the reactionary efforts of the stand-still party.

The United States, and above all Boston, have already received and distinguished many of our musical friends in a manner, not less honorable to this land, than to the artists who have been thus honored. Though we had been before informed of the brilliant success of individuals (we may allude here for examples to Otto Goldschmidt, A. Jaell, and O. Dresel), yet we were not always clear about the reasons of this success. We confess to you frankly, that here in Germany we had no very high idea of the musical culture of the North Americans in general, and that very unsettled opinions still prevail about the motives, which secure an artistic success in the United States. This may be partly owing to the doubtful attitude which New York especially has maintained towards modest German artists without great celebrity; furthermore to the conduct of Barnum and similar speculators; and finally to the extent to which "Humbug" has undeniably been pushed in North America, with extremely questionable talents, as by Lola Montez, &c.

We are therefore very much indebted to you, dear sir, that you have through your "Journal" convinced us of something better, in that you have thereby given us a more correct insight into the state of music in North America, and have essentially enlightened us about the heart and centre (Kern) of the artistic efforts there. We see with joy the development of a stirring musical life upon the best foundation, and the following up of an earnest artistic direction, the focus and starting-point of which we find in Boston, to which belongs decidedly the precedence herein before the cosmopolitan city [Allerweltsstadt; literally, all-the-world's city] of New York. We do not conceal from you that in this feeling of general recognition there is mingled a certain feeling of fatherland's pride, at having found in the "far West" an important centre for our native and to us sacred tones, for German ways of feeling and for German Art.

I will, so far as I am able, set down my thoughts about this more extendedly in an article, which shall have especial reference to your esteemed paper, and, starting from that text, shall enlarge upon the position which the United States now occupy and will hereafter occupy towards Germany in regard to music.

But first of all I feel impelled,—after finishing the reading of the numbers sent me of your "Journal"—to emphasize the fact, that the vital energy, which announces itself on all hands in the "New World," is already animating and beginning to lift up the musical efforts of that land; so that in matters of Art, as in so many other things, the so often with us underrated America not only disputes the priority with the always overrated Old England with her stiff forms, but has even in some part surpassed the mother country. This, to be sure, holds true hitherto more in regard to artistic intentions and the critical judgments of such independent and free-thinking sheets as your's,—than in regard to the practical execution of these higher intentions.

But, when we have once firmly fixed our eyes on an exalted goal and have consistently pursued it, we finally compel even opposing circumstances to serve us. The means for the attainment of a good end offer themselves at last of their own accord, since preconceived opinions and existing circumstances cannot give law in the long run; but on the contrary, one-sided ends must bend and accommodate themselves to higher ends, to escape annihilation through the controlling might of the Idea.

The surprising development of musical life in Boston offers the best proof of this. Your retrospect (of the 30th of April) upon the "Works of great composers performed in Boston during the past winter," gives truly astonishing results. At the top of that list shine the collective symphonies of Beethoven, every one of which, with the exception of the first (and weakest) was performed two or three times. Boston can boast of having brought out Beethoven's ninth symphony twice in one winter! By this one fact Boston raises herself to a musical rank, which neither Old England, nor many highly celebrated German chapels will dispute with her.

If we add to this, that in one season were represented: Mendelssohn, through all four of his symphonies and six overtures; Franz Schubert, through his C major symphony; Gade, through the C minor symphony; Schumann, through the B flat major symphony, &c., &c.;—that in the way of chamber music there were heard fifteen compositions of Beethoven, ten compositions of Mendelssohn, the clarinet quintet of C. M. von Weber, the E flat major trio of Franz Schubert, Schumann's quintet and variations for two pianos, &c., &c.;—finally that in Boston even songs of Schumann and of Robert Franz were resounding repeatedly,—not to speak at all of the oratorios, symphonies, overtures, &c., of a Bach, a Gluck, a Cherubini, a Handel, a Haydn, a Mozart, a Spohr, and so on,—our high esteem for such a city and our joy and sympathy in such sound artistic efforts will be found fully justified.

It would be impossible to bring the above-named works, as well as Bach's triple concerto and fugues, Chopin's E minor concerto, and the like, into repeated performance,—that is to say, into vogue, unless an equally lively sense for the earnestness of the old classic music, as for the wealth of fancy of the new romantic school and its sequels (which point to a significant future, while they prepare the way to it), had already existed in Boston, so that the forces had only to be awakened, which hitherto had only wanted room for their unfolding. So only is it explainable, how in Boston in a short time such significant musical unions and societies could spring up, as: the "Mendelssohn Club" (for chamber music), the "Musical Fund Society" and the "Serenade Band" (for orchestral works), the "Handel and Haydn Society" and the "Musical Education Society" (for oratorios of the older and the more modern schools), and the "Germanians" (who, among other things, first transplanted the ninth Beethoven symphony to America); societies, of which one must maintain that their origin, but still more their continuance, could be nothing accidental or called out by speculation, but that an actual want created them.

The test for all such societies is a threefold one: their quantitative and their qualitative activity, and their success, which is founded in the sympathy of the public and which commonly determines the duration of such undertakings in the last instance. On all these sides the musical activity of Boston has already been so fully tested, that we may without hesitation declare, that many a German capital, (exempla sunt odiosa), which is very proud of its music, ought to take pattern from the systematic art-endeavors of the Bostonians, instead of remaining always imprisoned in the one-sided prejudice: "that America in regard to Art shows neither earnestness nor effort, but is and remains the land of musical charlatanry and humbug!"

In our fragmentary review of the Boston concert programmes we have purposely laid the emphasis upon the modern Art, from Beethoven to Schumann; although the old artistic tendencies, from Bach and Handel to Spohr and Weber, have been no less richly represented. We have done this on the one hand to show, that Boston has progressed farther with the times, than even German symphony soirées of the latest date! We have done it on the other hand, to point out the distinction herein strikingly exhibited between Old England and the New World.

England, with the single exception of the "New Philharmonic Society," in London, seeks an honor in not going forward. It looks with indignation upon all that has appeared since Beethoven and that is not named Mendelssohn; especially does it persecute Schumann and Wagner with mockery, whenever it finds a chance. On the other hand, it is a matter of fashion there, annually to sing through all of Handel's oratorios, to get enthusiastic about Bach's fugues, to regard Haydn and Mozart as the pinnacle of orchestra music, to accept Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Spohr only because one cannot ignore them, and one must force his nature to pronounce such compositions "very fine pieces." To cultivate old classic works is quite commendable, if that were not with the English on the one hand more a fashion than a conviction; if on the other hand it did not require extremely little understanding to find that "beautiful," which all the world has long ago pronounced so; and if it did not quite too often happen to the very honorable "gentlemen," to make colossal blunders in their judgments and to put, for instance, Czerny, Auber and Halevy into the same category with Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Spohr, and so on.

The more eminent the talents, which annually flow together from the whole civilized world into London, at "the Season," for the sake of—making money; the more imposing all this concentration of musical masses in London; so much the more inexcusable is the stability (not to say the stupidity), which England so stiff-neck-edly maintains against the modern advances of Germany,—i. e., of the land to which England is almost exclusively indebted for her whole musical culture and activity, for her best talents, her finest artistic gratifications and her best concert programmes.

The English criticism, especially, demeans itself toward the Art movements of Germany in such a manner (which you, sir, in a sharp reply to the London Musical World's absurd judgment upon "Young Germany," most indulgently call merely a "demolishing criticism"), that we can at once perceive of what a lamentable, one-sided and, in a word, taste-destroying character the future of the English music will be, when it prides itself on being based on retrogression.

But if it has already got so far, that your Boston

"Journal" enters the lists for SCHUMANN and WAGNER against the English criticism in the Musical World, the Illustrated News &c., and does battle for these spirits with a force of conviction, which inspires us with the highest respect for you—then it scarcely needs to be mentioned that the reverence, paid in Boston to the heroes of a past age, is no mere repeating over after the English "liturgy," but has proceeded out of own conviction, and is already so well balanced by the attention bestowed on the latest German Art period, that an all-sided, complete culture, taking in all the tendencies of Art, is actually striven for and must be reached. Where one sees such fruits, there must one shout out a glad and truly-meant "Glückauf!" (God-speed!) to the fresh and vital New World, and with joy greet in spirit a man, who, while geographically our antipodes, is yet in tendency and in endeavor our confederate (Bundesgenosse). The sympathies of the Art-related stand higher than those of the birth-related, for they are of a more spiritual sort. And the genuine cosmopolitanism reigns in the kingdom of the Ideal!

You will understand my joy,—which is like that which a traveller may have, when he discovers "in the far West" a new tract of fertile soil or a rich gold mine,—only when I betray to you the consequences of my discovery, which, as it seems to me, are neither to be called illogical nor fanciful.

You already study the works of our Robert Schumann with a lively interest; you defend them in fact with warmth and conviction, since you have had opportunity to become acquainted from your own observation with some specimens of his master works. This interest must increase, and never can die out, when you shall have once made acquaintance with Schumann's other works of art: with his second and third symphonies, his overtures to "Genoveva" and "Manfred," his superb piano-forte quartet, and first trio, his quartets for stringed instruments, and his ever young "Paradise and the Peri."

On the other hand, you devote a continued attention to Berlioz in your paper. You produce lengthy articles about him, give translations from his works, &c. Finally, you have repeatedly hailed with joy and have already made your own, (in sich verarbeitet) Beethoven's symphony with choruses, that effective mediator between yesterday and to-day, between the this side and the that side of one-sided Art.

All the very elements calculated to prepare one for the Wagner Art and to mediate between this and the present, you have, then, more or less already taken up into yourself; and therefore I already see in spirit the bridge thrown across the ocean, which, though it be tens of years hence, will lead the Wagner art-works over into the land of freedom!

England, Italy, and perhaps even France will only late or never be the soil, upon which Wagner's works will be domesticated and bear fruits. Italy has lived out forever; she is too prostrate ever to rise again; she shares the fate of noble Greece. England was never the true home of Art, and the few exceptions, which one might enumerate, have remained without fruits in their own land. France is grown too frivolous and is too sorely rent by political storms, to be able to concentrate herself upon the idea of a higher Art.

On the other hand I gain more and more the conviction, that Wagner, the man of free Art and the man of the Future, will one day rise up anew and find an abiding foothold in the land of freedom and the future, in spite of all hostilities, which will as little fail to meet him that side of the ocean, as they are still the order of the day upon our continent, and have made this richly gifted creative mind, alas, forever disgusted with his own fatherland.

This view is necessarily confirmed, since your "Journal" has given me evidence, what powerful elements are already fermenting in North America, working their way out through all the "humbug," through all the mania of speculation and deliberate leading astray of taste, and seeking to assume fixed forms.

But a yet higher point of view leads to the like conclusion. Since we have had any history, the march of the development of humanity has been from East to West, from the rising to the setting sun. Far Asia was the cradle of humanity, as it was of Art; far America is the goal of the latest migrations of the peoples, as Europe was the goal of the earlier barbaric invasions. Though old Europe until now has kept its ideality for itself, and has regarded the new world only as the goal of realism, in trade, in manufacture and in politics; yet Art and Science are transplanting themselves, in often invisible, but vital germs, at first imperceptibly, but ever farther and farther. In science already America takes an honorable position, and Art will and must follow. Europe has an Art history of more centuries, than America counts decades of independent existence, and yet America develops itself with such astonishing rapidity, because the perfect civilization follows close upon the heels of the victims and the outcasts of our over-civilization.

In Art too, as in politics, the proletaries, the virtuosos of the arms and legs, made the first escape to America, and left their head, where they had lost it, there in Europe, which, weary of over-population, scattered its Art-proletaries as the first colonists to all the winds of heaven. It is but a few years now since Germany became satiated with the empty jingling of mere virtuoso-dom, and rid herself of those parasitical plants, which had dared to spread themselves over a soil, which a Gluck, a Mozart and a Beethoven fancied they had conquered for an everlasting possession.

And now that these old sins are scarcely shaken off, (and that in part only), are they supposed to be already forgotten? Shall old infatuated Europe reproach young and inexperienced America, that she too, like the mother country, has received these spirits of nothingness, who were first nursed into full growth at her own breast; misled in part by a false splendor which preceded them from Europe? That were a piece of inconsistency and self-righteousness, of which thoughtless imitators, but no self-thinking men, could be guilty!

America needs scarcely ten years for a transformation, which in our effete Europe would occupy an entire generation of men. Perhaps we shall, within a shorter time than we ourselves imagine, meet again "over there," to witness the first performance of Wagner's Tannhäuser in Boston, and to cry out with newly confirmed conviction to the land of the Future:

WESTWARD MOVES THE HISTORY OF ART!

HOPLIT.

Dresden, 1st June, 1853.

"WHAT DOES IT MEAN?" is often asked of a fine piece of music without words. The truth is, the meaning of music lies hidden in those deeper and more mysterious regions of the human soul's every day experience, which it is as vain to ignore as it is impossible to render into the distinct tones of thought. Music is deeper than speech, and makes its appeal to that within us that is deeper than thoughts of the understanding. Music expresses that part of our best and deepest consciousness, which needs precisely such a fluid, sympathetic language as its tones alone afford. Music begins where words leave off; by it our inmost, spiritual natures commune with each other. Hence the loftiest poetry, the most inspired and subtle charm of conversation, in short that magical something that distinguishes the utterances of genius in its high hour, in whatsoever form, is an approximation to music and sets the finest chords to vibrating within us in somewhat the same way. The effect of music could hardly be described more accurately than in the very terms in which the higher ranges of Coleridge's conversation are described by his nephew, in the preface to the "Table Talk." For example:

I have seen him at times when you could not incarnate him,—when he shook aside your petty questions or doubts, and burst with some impatience through the obstacles of common conversation. Then, escaped from the flesh, he would soar upwards into an atmosphere almost too rare to breathe, but which seemed proper to him, and there he would float at ease. Like enough, what Coleridge then said, his subtlest listener would not understand as a man understands a newspaper; but upon such a listener there would steal an influence, and an impression, and a sympathy; there would be a gradual attempering of his body and spirit, till his total being vibrated with one pulse alone, and thought became merged in contemplation;—

And so, his senses gradually wrapt
In a half sleep, he'd dream of better worlds,
And dreaming hear thee still, O singing lark,
That sangest like an angel in the clouds!

Our Students in Germany.

We have permission to present our readers with the following extracts from a private letter, written by one who, present or absent, is an important member of our musical world here, and by whom the columns of this journal have often been enriched with pleasant correspondence. The names below mentioned are those of persons in whom we all are interested.

"LEIPSIC, June 26, 1853.

"..... I wish you had been here this morning at our musical reunion—which takes place regularly once a fortnight at my rooms, and once in a week at Parker's. Last Sunday we were at Parker's. Mason came down from Weimar, where he is studying with Liszt, to hear Parker's quartet, which was performed for the first time. This opera pleased us all very much, and his professors, Richter and others, think it extremely well written. To-day we had a new quartet of Franz Schubert's, lately published, in G dur. The first two movements are fine—perhaps too dramatic for chamber music, but effective. I played the D dur trio of Beethoven, and we also had a quartet of Haydn.

"Next Sunday we are to have an extra matinee, as David is coming to play 1st violin; we are to hear the great B flat quartet of Beethoven, and the Schubert D minor.

"Fries (Angust), I suppose, is too modest to tell you in his letters what David said about him. He spoke to me in terms of very high praise of his talent as a violinist, and you will see that Fries has greatly profited by the lessons of the Concert Meister. My Quartet is going to be printed, so Fries will bring you a copy. I have a new one half done since my return from Paris, and hope to finish it before we start for the Tyrol, where Parker, Fries and I propose to spend a month from the 20th of July to the 20th of August, going by Munich and returning by Vienna."

Musical Intelligence.

☞ The GERMANIA SERENADE BAND will perform on Boston Common, Wednesday Evening, August 3d.

New York.

ITALIAN OPERA.—The success which has, thus far, attended the performances of the Castle Garden company, has not a precedent in the operatic history of that warlike structure. The price of admission is twice as great as it was during the former summer seasons, but the audiences have averaged two thousand in number. This may not seem large to the reader who has been accustomed to suppose that Castle Garden will seat seven thousand persons. It will do no such thing. The largest number that can be accommodated with seats commanding a tolerable view of the stage, is not more than three thousand; and we doubt if seven thousand have ever been within its walls at the same time. Niblo can seat seventeen hundred and fifty; the Tabernacle twenty-eight hundred; Tripler Hall, we believe, about thirty-five hundred; an average fashionable church, about fourteen hundred; and when two thousand persons are in Castle Garden, Castle Garden looks extremely well attended; and everybody remarks to his neighbor, "Good house to-night." It is worth while, perhaps, to mention these facts, as the most ludicrous misapprehensions prevail among the pleasure-loving multitude with regard to the capacity of the houses they are accustomed to frequent. Of "L'Elizire d'Amore," which was produced last week, we heard favorable accounts,—attendance large, performance satisfactory, Madame Sontag bewitching. On Friday evening, "Don Giovanni"—that opera of operas—to hear which well performed in all its parts, were worth a pilgrimage—attracted a brilliant and much-expecting auditory to Castle Garden. The performance of "Don Giovanni," on this occasion, was, upon the whole, the best that we have heard of late years. Madame Sontag dressed, acted, and sang the part of Zerlina in a manner that left nothing to be desired. Nearly all the gems of her role were encored. Badiali was an effective and satisfactory Don Giovanni; Steffanone we thought particularly successful as Donna Anna; Rovere was a sufficiently comical Leporello; Madame Strakosch as Elvira, and Signor Vietti as Ottavio, were equal to their parts. The effect of the opera, as a whole, was marred by the imperfection of the chorus, by the introduction of an incongruous and ill-executed ballet scene, and by the noise of people leaving during the last act. The opera on Monday evening was the never-tiring "Sonnambula."

Home Journal.

ENGLISH OPERA.—There is no wearing out the popularity of Madame Thillon. As long as people have eyes, they will like to see such pleasing pictures as Madame Thillon is, whenever she appears on the stage. In the "Bohemian Girl," for instance, which has been played lately to overflowing houses, what a captivating creature she is! A jacket of scarlet velvet, fitting closely to her perfect figure, and rolling over each shoulder to display the daintiest of chemisettes,—a white skirt, with a very broad reddish border which brightened into a red and white edge—a little foot in a party-colored stocking and an almost imperceptible shoe—a round and radiant face haloed with curls, and a little blue head-dress—gold chains and all kinds of pretty ornaments about her person—who ever saw such a Gipsy Queen before? Not we. And then her singing—it is not perfect, it is never great, it is not always good; but what her voice cannot effect, her manner does, and every one is pleased, though in spite of himself. Hence, Niblo's Garden continues to be crowded. We must not forget to add, that Madame Thillon is efficiently supported by Mrs. Maeder, Mr. Frizer, Mr. Hudson, Mr. Leach, and a talented orchestra.

Home Journal.

London.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The eighth and last concert of the season took place on the 27th June. The programme was as follows:—

PART I.

Historical Symphony,..... Spohr.
Scena, Mme. Viardot 'Der Freischütz,'..... Weber.
Concerto, Violin, M. Blagrove,..... Molique.
Duet, Mesdames Castellani and Viardot, 'Jessonda,'..... Spohr.
Overture, 'Oberon,'..... Weber.

PART II.

Sinfonia in B flat, No. 4,..... Beethoven.
Aria, 'Non temer,' Mme. Castellani,..... Mozart.
Concerto, Piano-forte, M. Ferdinand Hiller,..... Hiller.
Duet, Mesdames Castellani and Viardot 'Cosi Fan Tutte,' Mozart.
Overture, 'Genuesinn,'..... Liudpauitner.
Conductor, Mr. Costa.

The symphony of Spohr is a work of great interest. Its design is to illustrate the four great epochs in the history of the musical art. The first movement (in G) opens with a kind of fugato, relieved by a pastorale, which is followed by a repetition of the fugato. The schools of Bach and Handel are not unsuccessfully imitated in this part of the symphony. The largo (in E flat) is supposed to represent the time in which Haydn and Mozart flourished. The slow movements in two of Mozart's symphonies (in E flat and D) have evidently served as the basis of this very ingenious parody; but of Haydn no indications whatever are to be found. The scherso (in G minor), designed to illustrate the period of Beethoven, is the least characteristic of the four movements. It is no more like Beethoven than it is like Berlioz. The theme cannot fail to recall the minuet in Mozart's G minor symphony, but the development and instrumentation are Spohr, "unadulterated." The finale (in G), directed at the modern style of orchestral writing, calls in the resources of all the instruments of brass and percussion, which are employed with a really brilliant effect. The opening subject suggests a reminiscence of Auber's Musicaliello, while the abrupt modulations in the second motivo would seem to be aimed at Hector Berlioz; the general character of the whole, however, is as completely Spohr as any movement of the composer in which he professes to be nothing else than himself. The symphony was remarkably well executed: and the composer, who was in the room, was compelled to rise from his place and acknowledge the applause of the audience. Madame Viardot's execution of the great scena of Weber was admirable, and her reading full of poetical sentiment. Had she power of voice enough to realize entirely her conceptions, her performance of this celebrated dramatic piece would be unsurpassable. As far as mechanism was concerned, Mr. Blagrove's execution of Molique's very fine concerto in D minor was beyond reproach. The charming duet in A, from Spohr's Jessonda, was well sung by Mesdames Castellani and Viardot; and the magnificent overture to Oberon, played with great fire and energy, displayed the resources of the Philharmonic orchestra to striking advantage.

Madame Castellani sang the scena of Mozart extremely well; but it was, nevertheless, ineffective. "Non temer" is one of the airs with piano-forte accompaniment—perhaps the most beautiful of all. Its transposition for the orchestra, with the subterfuge of a violin obligato (however well played by M. Sainton) in place of the florid passages written for the original instrument was not only a mistake, but an unwarrantable liberty. Moreover the orchestration was by no means good.

M. Ferdinand Hiller's concerto was not the less welcome because it came at an unreasonably late hour. Both composition and performance were remarkable. The concerto comprised an allegro and rondo finale in E sharp minor, and an adagio, in D, which separates and agreeably relieves them. The allegro is in the "classical" fantasia style; while the rondo adheres closely to the accepted forms. Each of these movements is novel and characteristic, betraying vigor of thought and musical skill of a rare order. The adagio is melodious and expressive; and the whole concerto, while effectively written for the principal instrument, is scored with great ingenuity for the orchestra. M. Hiller has long been accepted as one of the best pianists on the continent, and his mastery playing on the present occasion was worthy of his reputation. His reception, and the applause bestowed upon his concerto, were as genuine as well deserved. The duet from Cosi Fan Tutte (an opera so unaccountably banished from our Italian stage) gave unanimous satisfaction. The overture of Herr Lindpaintner, a spirited and clever work, was admirably played.

The annual visit of Her Majesty the Queen took place on the 4th July, at an extra concert. The selection commanded by Her Majesty was the following:—

PART I.

Notturmo, March & Final chorus (A Midsummer) Mendelssohn
Overture, Scherzo song & chorus (Night's Dream)..... Handel
Aria, 'Return, O God of Hosts,' (Samson)..... Costa Duet, 'Questa volta,' (Don Carlos)..... Beethoven Overture, 'Egmont,'..... Beethoven

PART II.

Sinfonia in A. No. 7,..... Beethoven
Romance, (Joseph)..... Mehul
Terzetto, (Idomeneo)..... Mozart
Overture, 'Euryanthe,'..... Weber

NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The fifth concert on Wednesday drew another crowded audience to Exeter-hall. The grand feature of the programme was the Choral Symphony of Beethoven; and a prominent attraction was the name of the celebrated Dr. Spohr, as conductor. The selection was as follows:—

PART I.

Concert Overture (Opera 126)..... Spohr.
'Ave Verum,' and 'Kyrie Eleison,'..... E. Silas.
Symphony (No. 9)..... Beethoven.

PART II.

Concerto (No. 2)..... Mendelssohn.
Aria (Zauberflöte)..... Mozart.
Overture (Jessonda)..... Spohr.
Aria (Jessonda)..... Spohr.
Flute Solo..... Reichert.
Overture (Prometheus)..... Beethoven.

Dr. Spohr was greeted with enthusiastic applause. His concert-overture, a recent production, is more remarkable as an elaborate piece of orchestral writing than a work of invention. It has all the peculiarities of its composer; but it smells of the lamp, and the labor bestowed upon it is scarcely repaid by the effect produced. The magnificent overture to the opera of Jessonda, magnificently played, was quite another affair; here the genius of the composer is happily evinced.

[From the New York Musical World and Times.]

FAR THE BEST WORK ON THE PIANO-FORTE EVER PUBLISHED.

The "Modern School for the Piano-Forte" is now in press, and will make its appearance and be ready for sale on the 1st of September. The author, Mr. NATHAN RICHARDSON, completed his work some six months ago, but wishing to render it as perfect as possible, he made a tour through Europe, for the express purpose of submitting the manuscript of his Instruction Book to the examination of his former teachers—the most eminent professors of the Piano-forte in the world—who expressed themselves much pleased with the simplicity, and ingenious arrangement of the Scales, as well as the general progressive character which characterizes the whole work; and they were unanimous in their opinion, as to the high estimation in which it should be held as an Instruction Book for the Piano.—The recommendations of the work obtained from the first and most distinguished teachers are of the highest order.

This work is founded upon an entirely new principle, perfectly progressive and simple in its character, and the pieces and exercises are fingered after the most approved and modern method—such as has never appeared in any other work whatever. It contains all necessary explanations, which are given in a manner so simple and perspicuous as immediately to commend itself to young persons and piano novices. Many works are written in such a technical and obscure style that no one but a professor can comprehend their meaning; but in the Modern School for the Piano-forte these serious difficulties in other works are obviated.

Mr. Richardson's work is also illustrated by a series of plates, prepared expressly for the work by one of the most celebrated Anatomists in Europe, showing the anatomical construction of the hands, besides valuable information in regard to Practice, its influence and effect upon the muscles of the hand, &c. This Instruction Book contains all useful exercises found in other works; besides a vast number of new and modern ones; also, many modern and classical pieces from the most celebrated composers, and directions not only informing one how they should be played, but showing how they can be played with ease. The work commences with the simplest exercise and progresses regularly to classical works of the immortal BEETHOVEN.

Advertisements.

The best Book on Piano Instruction existing!

IN PRESS:—JULIUS KNORR'S GUIDE FOR TEACHERS ON THE PIANO. A full system of instruction, from the very outset, to artistic perfection, with full advice to teachers and pupils. Its progressive order, completeness, and the value of the pieces recommended, (about 200,) make it indispensable to teachers, and invaluable to all players. It is

THE BEST SELF-INSTRUCTOR EXTANT.

It is also THE ONLY KEY to the proper use of Julius Knorr's "Materials," and his "Large Method." Price 75 cents.

iii 14 3m

L. O. EMERSON,

Teacher of the Piano-Forte and Singing.

APPLY AT HIS RESIDENCE,

No. 12 INDIANA PLACE, BOSTON.

iii 13 3m.

A. W. FRENZEL,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC, and late Leader of the "SAXONIA ORCHESTRA," having made Boston his residence, is prepared to give Lessons on the Piano-Forte and in Singing, both in the English and German languages; also to accompany with the violin more advanced pupils in the Sonata-duos of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c. During the summer season, Mr. F. offers his services to classes out of town. Or he will receive scholars, from the city or the country, at his Music Rooms, No. 4 Pine Street, Boston, where he may always be found before 10 A. M., and between the hours of 1 and 3 P. M.

iii 6

JONAS CHICKERING,

RESPECTFULLY gives notice to his friends and the public that, having recovered from the late disastrous effects produced by the destruction of his factory, he is now ready to receive orders for PIANOS, which he promises to execute with as much faithfulness and promptitude as heretofore.

379 Washington Street, Boston.

Mar. 5.

tf

HEWS' PATENT AMERICAN ACTION PIANO-FORTE.

THE MANUFACTURER is in possession of numerous testimonials from distinguished Musical Professors, who have used the greatly improved ACTION PIANO, commending it in high terms. The attention of purchasers and amateurs of Music to an examination of its superiority, is solicited.

GEO. HEWS, 365 Washington St., Boston.

Apr. 10.

tf

BEETHOVEN'S CELEBRATED MASS in C, IN VOCAL SCORE:

With an Accompaniment for the Organ or Piano-Forte, by Vincent Novello. With Latin and English text. Just published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

Sold by all Music Dealers.

iii 4

THE SYMPHONIES OF BEETHOVEN:—

ARRANGED FOR THE PIANO-FORTE by J. N. HUMMEL. The above excellent compositions are now in course of publication by the subscriber.

Symphony No. 7, in A, op. 92, is now ready.

Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

Sold by all Music Dealers.

iii 4

J. W. TAVERNER,

PROFESSOR OF EDUCATION,

AT HIS RESIDENCE,

No. 30 CHARLES STREET, BOSTON.

—Edward L. Balch,

BERTINI'S PIANO METHOD—ABRIDGED.

The popularity of Bertini's Celebrated Method for the Piano is sufficient evidence of its great merits. The only objection ever made to the Method has been that the elaborateness with which the subject is treated, renders the task of commencing and completing it, somewhat arduous, and to a young pupil a formidable undertaking.

Teachers as well as scholars have, therefore, seen the want of an Abridged Edition, in which all that was actually necessary might be included—an edition containing the choicest and most important lessons; one that might be commenced and finished by those composing the majority of piano pupils.

To meet a want so long apparent, the publisher has issued this edition, which, as a superior work, is recommended to the musical public of the United States.

Published by

OLIVER DITSON,

115 Washington St.

Sold by all Music Dealers in the United States and Canada.

iii 12

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE,

No. 86 TREMONT STREET, BOSTON.

WHITE BROTHERS,

DEALERS IN MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS,

Best Italian, German, French and English Strings,

AGENTS OF

J. André, Offenbach; and G. André, Philadelphia,

FOR THE SALE OF FOREIGN CLASSIC MUSIC, CHOIR MUSIC, &c.

Instruments Made, Repaired, Tuned, Bought, Sold, or Exchanged, on the most favorable terms.

IRA J. WHITE.

iii 2 3m

A. WARREN WHITE.

THEODORE T. BARKER,

MUSIC STORE,

No. 381 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

Chickering's Pianos to let.

All Foreign and American Musical Publications received as soon as published.

ii 23 3m

N. D. COTTON,

IMPORTER AND DEALER IN

English, French, and American Stationery,

DRAWING & PAINTING MATERIALS,

No. 13 Tremont Row, Boston.

 Wedding and Visiting Cards Engraved and Printed.

16 tf

BEETHOVEN'S ORATORIO OF ENGEDI, or DAVID IN THE WILDERNESS, known as the MOUNT OF OLIVES, is this day published in a neat, convenient form for the singer or concert-goer by

Geo. P. Reed & Co., Publishers,

Jan. 8.

17 TREMONT ROW, BOSTON.

D. B. NEWHALL,

MANUFACTURER AND DEALER IN

PIANO FORTES,

No. 344 Washington Street, Boston.

PIANO FORTES REPAIRED, TUNED, & TO LET.

Apr. 10.

tf

J. C. WOODMAN,

ORGANIST AND CONDUCTOR OF MUSIC AT CENTRAL CHURCH,

Teacher of Singing, Piano Forte, &c.,

No. 94 Chestnut Street, Boston.

iii 2 3m.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.

FOREIGN MUSIC DEPOT,

GIRARD HOUSE BUILDINGS,

NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,

PHILADELPHIA.

N. B. The complete works, for Piano, (Quartets, Trios, Duets for Piano and Violin, Duets for four hands and Piano solo pieces,) of BEETHOVEN and MOZART, as also the Piano solo Works of CLEMENTI and HAYDN, as published by J. André, Offenbach, in sets, at very low prices. We have appointed

Messrs. WHITE BROTHERS,

TREMONT TEMPLE, BOSTON,

our Agents for the sale of the above Standard Editions of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, &c. &c.

iii 2 tf

MRS. ROSA GARCIA DE RIBAS,

TEACHER OF THE

PIANOFORTE, SINGING & GUITAR,

2 Seneca St., corner Harrison Avenue.

MR. De RIBAS will give instruction on the Oboe and Flute. Also MUSIC ARRANGED, TRANSPOSED, &c. Boston, April 23.

3m

Letter-Press, Music and Job Printing-Office,

SIGNOR G. C. GUIDI respectfully informs his former pupils and the public, that he has resumed his instructions in SINGING, after the Italian school, with the intention to settle permanently in Boston. In order to accommodate those who may not wish to take private instruction, he will open classes for ladies and gentlemen, on moderate terms. None but good voices will be admitted. Terms liberal for persons intending to study for professional purposes.

Sig. G. can be consulted free upon any musical subject, daily, from 12 to 2, at Mr. Hew's Piano Manufactory, No. 365 Washington street, where terms and time for classes may be known.

Orders or notes for Sig. G. may be addressed to him at G. P. Reed & Co.'s Music Store, 17 Tremont Row, and at Oliver Ditson's, 115 Washington street.

Feb. 5.

A CARD.

THE SUBSCRIBER respectfully offers his services to the public as Teacher of the Piano-Forte, the Violin and the Guitar, also of Harmony and Singing, after a clear and easy method. He will also accompany pupils, both in seniors and in private houses, in the practice of Duets, Trios, &c.

Address for the present at 168 Tremont Street.

March 26. 3m.

CARL GÄRTNER.

L. H. SOUTHARD,

TEACHER OF MUSIC,

265 Washington Street, Boston.

Oct. 16.

3m

T. BRICHER,

Organist and Conductor of Music

At the Bowdoin Square Church.

OFFICE UNDER THE CHURCH... ENTRANCE ON CHARDON ST.

Jan. 22. 3m.

H. S. CUTLER,

Organist at the Church of the Advent, also of the Boston Harmonic Society.

ADDRESS—(Care of ROLAND CUTLER, No. 4 Market Square, Boston.)

22 tf

F. F. MÜLLER,

DIRECTOR OF MUSIC AND ORGANIST at the Old South Church; ORGANIST of the Handel and Haydn Society; ORGANIST of the Musical Education Society, &c. &c. &c.

Residence, No. 3 Winter Place, Boston.

ii 7 tf

NATHAN RICHARDSON,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC.

Letters may be addressed at the Revere House, Boston.

25 tf

GEORGE F. WILLEY,

TEACHER OF MUSIC.

Private Tuition in the principles of Music and the Cultivation of the Voice.

MUSIC ROOM, THE LECTURE ROOM OF KIRK STREET CHURCH,

RESIDENCE, 34 FRANKLIN SQUARE, SUFFOLK STREET,

Feb. 5.

LOWELL, MASS.

Germania Serenade Band.

THE SERVICES OF THIS ASSOCIATION can be secured by applying to

ii 14 tf

G. SCHNAPP, Leader,

364 Tremont Street.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

AT 21 SCHOOL STREET, BOSTON.

$2 per annum, in advance.

ITS CONTENTS relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time,—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music published at home and abroad. 3. A Summary of the significant Musical News from all parts; gathered from English, German, French, as well as American papers. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, Architecture, Poetry, Aesthetic Books, the Drama, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, short Tales, Anecdotes, &c. Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished. Address, (post paid,) J. S. DWIGHT,

21 School Street, Boston.

RATES FOR ADVERTISING.

For half a square, (8 lines,) or less, first insertion, . . . $0.50

each additional inser. 25

For a square, (16 lines,) first insertion, 1.00

each additional insertion, 50

On advertisements standing three months or longer, a discount of twenty per cent. on the above rates is allowed.

(A column counts as seven squares.)

Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 School St.

DWIGHT'S Journal of Music.

A Paper of Art and Literature.

VOL. III.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 6, 1853.

NO. 18.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

TERMS....TWO DOLLARS PER ANNUM, (IN ADVANCE.)

CITY Subscribers can be served at their houses by the further payment of fifty cents per annum.

For Rates of Advertising, see last page.

POSTAGE, if paid in advance, for any distance within the State, thirteen cents a year; if not in advance, twenty-six cents. To all places beyond the State, double these rates.

J. S. DWIGHT,.....EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St.

By REDDING & CO., 8 State St.

GEO. P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row.

A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.

DEXTER & BROTHERS, 43 Ann Street, N. Y.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 722 Broadway, N. Y.

MASON BROTHERS, 23 Park Row, New York.

GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.

G. ANDRE, 229 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St., Balt.

COLBURN & FIELD, Cincinnati, O.

HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Persons willing to become Agents for procuring subscribers, especially Music-Dealers and Teachers, are invited to correspond with the Editor, as above. Satisfactory references required, and liberal commissions allowed.

Back numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Also bound copies of Vols I. and II. at prices varying from $2.50 to $3.50.

A Sketch of Madame Mara.

From the German of F. ROCHLITZ.

[Concluded.]

Thus passed four years in England; and Gertrude wished to see Italy at last. Having obtained a call, she journeyed in 1788 to the carnival at Turin, where she sang with complete success before the court, and, in the opera, before the public. In the following year she appeared in Venice, and there they prepared a triumph for her, worthy of a queen. Still she felt that the Italian opera (and the Italians then loved none but opera music) was not just her chosen place; add to this the railleries of her fine and envious Italian rivals; and, what perhaps, if not for her, yet for her companion, was the most decisive consideration—that, rich as the rewards proved, still here there were only scudi, instead of English guineas: and we cannot wonder that in 1790 she went back to London, whence she went only once, in fulfilment of a previous contract, to the following carnival at Venice.

She returned this time through France. Singularly it happened that, as she was passing through one of the main streets of Paris, (in the autumn of the unhappy year 1792), she found herself in the midst of a popular emeute. Anxiously she made her companion raise the window of the carriage and inquire what was the matter. With frantic shout, as if he were announcing a popular festival, a fellow replied: "We are carrying the queen to the temple!" (the prison)—the queen—she whom Gertrude had last seen conquering all hearts in the full radiance of her beauty, loveliness and grace, and enhaloed by all the splendor that the world can give! Overpowered with terror and with pain, she uttered a loud, and at that time almost dangerous, cry, and she was thrilled through with a horror, from which she could not for a long time recover.

Her present stay in London was a continuation of the former. The sympathy of the public; the recognition, the reward of her excellencies as a singer remained, scarcely excepting the last years, the same: and that, in a ten years' residence in one place, was a new proof of the greatness of those excellencies, if any proof were needed. About the beginning of her fiftieth year, later than with the vast majority of singers, nature began to assert her supremacy over the powers which she had lent her; Gertrude's voice became considerably weaker. But as this took place in equal proportion through all the tones of her great compass, and as she did not lose the pleasing and euphonious quality, at the same time with the strength and silvery loudness of her voice; as all the other excellencies of the singer remained, requiring only to be used with her experience in other ways and other music; she still remained a wonderful, and where the place was not too large for her present degree of strength, transporting artist. The rooms, in which she had been wont to shine in London, were not such limited ones; the ascendancy, which she had there exercised over men's minds in her singing, had been greatly due to the imposing power and fullness of her voice; she was obliged to descend, but did not wish to do it in the place that had beheld her at her highest height. So she resolved in 1802 to quit London and, by the way of France, return to her German fatherland. Even then, at her departure, the London music lovers gave her a proof of their enduring esteem and sympathy: her last concert was so thronged, that it yielded about seven thousand thalers.

In Paris they departed from the usual custom, out of regard for her great fame and let her have the Grand Opera theatre for a concert. The house was crowded full; but here they were accustomed to the screaming voice of a Maillard and other singers on those boards; so the notorious and dreaded Géoffroy in his journal wrote: "Madame Mara sang excellently, no doubt; only nobody heard any thing."

On her journey through Germany she met everywhere with the most honorable reception, and, for that country, with an uncommonly rich reward. Frankfort, Gotha, Weimar, were stations where she stopped and let herself be heard. From there (in February 1803) she came to us at Leipsic, and here I made her acquaintance. I shall be permitted, therefore, although I have nothing important to relate, to proceed somewhat more in detail.

Gertrude arrived in the evening; on the very next morning her rooms were filled, especially, with such of the most distinguished men of the city as had known, esteemed and loved her nearly forty years before, and had owed many happy young years to her art. I went to Hiller's, and he took me with him. I, who had eagerly read whatever had been written in the praise of Gertrude, but for the rest knew little of her; I, who was then so much younger and inexperienced than now,—accompanied Hiller with heart beating high and with the most certain confidence that here I was to find all far different and more splendid than in the every-day world. What was I not about to hear! what lofty conversations upon Art! and what tender scenes of recognition was I not to witness!—Hiller did not have his name announced, but walked directly in; I after him, lingering full of expectation at the door. We found those much respected men: Platner, Müller, Felix Weisse and some others. Hiller winked to these, and placed himself before Gertrude with his head already bowed with age, regarding her fixedly with a miugled look of seriousness and sport. "Do you know me?" he asked finally.—"No!"—"What?" cried Hiller. "You will no longer know me, Trudel?" This popular diminutive of her first name had been exceedingly disagreeable to her in her maiden years, and they used to plague her with it, when she was in her peevish humors. The word brought that time instantly before her. "Hiller! father Hiller!" she exclaimed with joy. "That am I with your leave!" muttered the old man. And both looked at each other again for some time; "God help us!" resumed Hiller finally; "we have grown old!"—"And ugly, too!" replied Gertrude.—"Certainly!" said Hiller.—And in this tone the talk went on. No sentiment, no singing; not a word, then, or afterwards, of the anticipated high talk on Art. Frau Gertrude was not at home in all that; so that I heard her first tone only in the rehearsal for her first concert. All that might have been excused; but all she said, was expressed—(how else could she have done, after so long an absence from Germany, which had only recently become refined in that respect?)—in the most ordinary forms of speech and in the broadest dialect. This was like pouring ice-cold water over me, and with dripping plumage, it was some time ere I could mount again.

And how did I find her in other respects? As a woman:—I cannot describe it better, than by saying that, in form, in bearing, in features, in the character and manner of her speech, in her view and treatment of men and things, as in her whole demeanor, she seemed like a true-hearted, active, yet composed and self-possessed farmer's wife, perfectly unconcerned about other people and other things, from Thuringia or some other well-to-do, but by no means refined, province. But now: as a singer! That simple, large, unornamented style, which seeks its whole effect through tone, expression, accent;—that style in which she had delivered Handel's works particularly,—she seemed to have renounced: not, one might trust her, from the wish to conciliate the fashion which had just then begun to offer any price to a delivery extremely fluent, richly ornamented, and wrought into superfineness of detail; but because she was conscious, that her voice no longer had the strength and the sonority to execute that earlier style of singing satisfactorily. That voice, in fact, was rather weak: but it was still strong enough for our hall, which holds at the most 800 persons and is excellent in its acoustic structure; and as she was capable of the finest and gentlest diminuendos down to the softest whisper, and still remained distinctly audible; as she could still give, with complete equality as to power and volume, the always wide compass of her tones, from B to thrice-marked D; her feebleness was only noticed with regret by those who had before known her in the fulness of her strength. Nor did the veiled quality of her voice (as musicians say), which had taken the place of its once clear silver ring, injure her at all with others; it only lent to the softer passages a peculiar, milder charm.*

With such a voice, and in the above-named extremely fluent manner, perfectly polished to every fineness of expression or adornment, she sang as we have never heard the like till Mme. Catalani:—she to be sure had greater power, though in a far smaller compass of tones. To make the most of all that still remained at her disposal, according to her own fancy, her own taste and rich experience, Gertrude had prudently selected compositions of a somewhat undecided character and quite simple accompaniment. For instance, she produced a long and figurative aria by Andreozzi, and a smaller one, which her companion, Herr Florio, had, in the etymological sense of the word, "composed"—in which he came in too with the lifeless tones of his flute obbligato, and Gertrude, with equal skill and amiability, blended her voice wonderfully with those tones. Finally she gave the principal scena and aria of Zenobia, from An-fossi's opera of that name. In this we could recognize her exceedingly noble and finished delivery of Recitative: but in the aria, towards the end, her physical strength did not hold out.

From us she went to Berlin. Here too she found, both universal sympathy, and several old friends. The old Friedrich Nicolai, especially, a zealous friend of music from of old, basied himself in many ways for her advantage. He renewed his youth in lengthy reminiscences of the good old times, when the Mara and the Allgemeine Deutsche Bibliothek had found so many friends and venerated. Gertrude's concerts were crowded to excess and richly profitable. But there was one thing which her friends should not have asked of her, or she should not have granted: but Nicolai,—as he then was, if he had once a notion in his head, he never desisted—by continually returning to the same spot, made his way through, as a continual dropping of rain will wear through a stone. He wanted her, in fact, to take the first soprano part in a solemn performance of Ramler and Graun's "Tod Jesu," and by all means to sing "The heavenly prophets," as she had done more than thirty years before. She finally consented and sang. But the success was not, nor could it be, remarkable. Setting aside the fact that the airs in this work, products of the taste of the period about 1750, (the choruses, and essentially the recitatives stand above all temporary tastes) could not, in the wholly changed direction of these modern times, satisfy longer those who had formerly found perfect satisfaction in them, and who now imagined that it would be the same thing now, provided they were only properly delivered:—setting aside this fact, the Mara now possessed only in the smallest degree the qualities wherewith she had transported audiences by these songs, in her youth; and what she still possessed, she could not and ought not to have used here, if she would not profane the hallowed and the venerable; besides, she pronounced the German now as they pronounced it more than thirty years ago, and in a manner that was now considered common. Then there were hearers, who are not accustomed in such cases to ask, why or wherefore? but who simply give themselves up to the impression as a whole, and in no small perplexity; there were friends in despair, and there were newspaper critics puzzled to find terms in which they could as far as possible harmonize the present feeling with the opinion that had been long established.—In Vienna, where the public had not known the Gertrude of the Past, and where they were accustomed then, as now, to confer a high prize on those excellencies commonly summed up in the word virtuosity, even at the expense of what is higher and more intellectual;—in Vienna she was brilliantly received, and, as everywhere else, richly remunerated.

In 1804 she went to St. Petersburg, and in the following year to Moscow. In both capitals she found the same favor, the same good fortune, that she had everywhere before. To this was added the particular good will of some of the greatest houses, in which music was esteemed not as desirable and useful, but as indispensable to their intellectual life; and even many a peculiarity of the mode of life there pleased Gertrude remarkably. Then she resolved to spend the rest of her days in the old and spacious capital of the Czars. Thoughtful, clear and firm, as she had always been in what concerned her Art, she now determined to appear no more in public, but merely to sing by invitation in noble private houses;—nothing in the large and aspiring style, but pieces suited to her present strength, and in which, by her well adapted mode of delivery and finished execution, she could still show herself an admirable artist. Besides this, she gave instruction in singing to young ladies.

Approaching now her sixtieth year, and freed from certain weaknesses of passion and of purposeless abandon, she began at length to grow more thoughtful and firm in matters not pertaining to her Art. There was no Florio now to quarrel with her always large income; she made provision for her long accustomed comforts against the day when age and incapacity awaited her. In about six or seven years she had gained enough to purchase herself a house in Moscow, and soon afterwards a pleasant country seat outside the city, besides investing a considerable capital in a respectable mercantile house. She lived very well contented, and thought this quiet way of life secured to her for the remainder of her days. But fortune played the trick on her, which it has played on every one, to whose skirts it has long clung unappreciated: namely, the trick of suddenly deserting one, just at the very moment when he begins to need it most, to prize its gifts the best, and to feel the most painfully conscious of its absence. Napoleon with his armies was approaching Moscow. Whoever could, was obliged to flee; and all the arrangements for facilitating the flight of so many thousands, were, in order to surprise the enemy and prevent counter-movements, made so short a time before the outbreak of the general calamity, that the most of the fugitives in the bewildering confusion saved barely anything except their lives. Of these was Gertrude.—Napoleon and his hosts retreated; she came back; her house was burned down, the merchant announced his insolvency, the noble and wealthy families did not return to the desolate ruins of the city; nobody was in need of a singer or a music teacher: she had nothing left but to wander on, and no man asked if it were with a bleeding heart.

Here then, she was, as if at the completion of a wide circuit, standing again almost at the very point where she had stood half a century before: poor and homeless, without counsel, without help. But as the child did then, so now the aged lady found sympathizing friends, and help, at least for present necessities. She went into the Germano-Russian provinces: especially in hospitable, music-loving Livonia did she find a favorable reception. She lived, partly at Reval, partly in the country, as an inmate in several respectable families, which shared with her what fortune had vouchsafed to them; and this was done with friendliest good will. She in return instructed the daughters in singing, and entertained the social circles by her own delivery of pieces suited to her present strength. Thus she lived through four years, according to her own confession, very pleasantly, and for the most part more contented than before, when she was heaped with fame and money. But age longs after independence and has need of a secured repose. She tried to prepare this for herself in the two places where she formerly had been universally known and for some time at home: she travelled (in 1819) to Berlin and London; but she did not accomplish her end. Returning to Germany, she tried the same experiment in her native city, Cassel. Here she found the most marked reception, both on the part of the electress and of the entire public; but even here she was not successful in the end for which she came. Then she resolved on a return to Livonia and to the position she had left before her last journey, a continuation of which had been promised her by several respectable families that had grown dear to her; and there, so far as I can learn, she is yet living in her eightieth year (1830).

* Does this recall the Sontag of 1853?—Ed.

So oozes away the rich life of the greatest German singer, like the rich waters of the greatest German river; and since a description of the same, like a description of the Rhine, admits of no conclusion, we will add by way of elose what Ernst Platner, her renowned old friend in Leipsic, said, when she had just gone from us in the year 1803. "It has given me great pleasure," said Platner, "to see her again: but I would gladly have renounced the pleasure, and been reconciled if, ten years ago, after the most perfect rendering of an oratorio of Handel, she had suddenly died; for I know of nothing more depressing and more dreary, than a really significant person who outlives himself."—And even he had to experience that same fate, in superabundant measure, in himself!

Sketches of an Opera Singer.

Did you ever, says a late Paris letter to the Boston Atlas, or rather, are you old enough for the name of FILIPPO GALLI to have reached you? Yet he was a great man . . . once . . . for many years . . . from 1807 to 1837; longer than last winter's great men, eh? He was born in Rome, of a highly respectable family of the middle class; he learned music as a pastime, but so great were his talents for the art, that his parents, not without opposition on the part of his mother, who dreamed a brighter destiny for her son, than that illumined by foot-lights, determined his parents to place him on the stage; accordingly, his education was confided to one of the most celebrated soprano singers of that cathedral-trained band which owes to the surgeon's knife the preservation of their fine voices. He made an early debut; he appeared on the first stages of Italy; tall, handsome, well made, witty, agreeable, his success was immense, especially in Naples, in the San Carlo Theatre, where he was the idol of the day and night.

For seven years of successes, Galli sang on the parts of grave tenor. What a voice! A fever lay on him; when he was cured he found the fever had carried the voice off with it. Imagine his discouragement! After some time, however, he found that he had a magnificent bass voice, and in 1813 he made his debut as a bass in Trieste, in a company where Ronconi's father, and Rosina Pinotti, Lablache's sister-in-law, played. His success was so complete that from this moment Rossini composed for him his best parts, and every part was a new triumph for artist and composer. They were on a footing of most affectionate friendship; one was never seen without the other; on the promenades, at the theatres, cafés, in society,—they shared the same table and often the same bed. They had just arrived in Milan, more affectionate than ever, in consequence of their labors in the Gazza Ladra, then in all the glory of novelty, when on a sudden the strangest rumors were afloat in the vicinity of La Scala Theatre: the composer and artist, in consequence of a quarrel about the way an air in the Gazza Ladra should be sung, had ceased to speak. Poor Italy had then, as now, nothing else to talk about except art and artists, and as she threw into this narrow channel all the intense temperament of her character, this news excited a whirlwind of emotions. Before the curtain rose, the vast audience in La Scala, agitated by its curiosity, was tossed as some storm-lashed ocean. Galli was received with the enthusiastic applause which always greeted him. When he sang, the auditors became silent; perhaps he was never more touching, more impassioned, better in the part of NINETTA's father than this night. When he ceased, the plaudits recommenced; he was recalled five or six times, they would not allow him to leave the stage. Then it was Rossini's turn for applause, (in Italy, you know, the composer always directs the orchestra in person.) there was new excitement, and after the public had applauded and Rossini bowed sufficiently, the audience cried to Rossini and Galli: "Embrace and be friends again; make it up, make it up! Vive Galli! vive Rossini!" The two friends flew into each other's arms, weeping, amid immense acclamations.

In 1821 Galli came to Paris. He first sang at the Grand Opera, with his usual success. In 1825, he joined the company of Italian Opera, then composed of Mmes. Fodor, Pasta, Malibran, Sontag, Monbelli, etc. He staid here a short time and returned to Italy, where for eight consecutive years he remained a "star" of La Scala; successful in every piece but one. Then he went to Rome, to Madrid, and, tempted by the large offers made him, to Mexico. On his return, he sang in Barcelona, Madrid and Milan, where he bade farewell to the foot-lights, and applause, and fortune. During his whole life Galli had received an enormous income, varying between $10,000 and $30,000, but such was his generosity, his extravagance, and his negligence, that he returned even from Mexico poorer than when he went there. His table and his purse were open to all. When Rossini brought to him his engagement for Paris, he begged him to be economical in future. Galli promised readily, and told Rossini he would see the fruits of his kind advice at the end of the season. After the season closed the great maestro asked him if he had kept his promise. "Yes, indeed," replied he; "you know I got 20,000 fr. in debt every year; this year I have gone only 8,000 fr. in debt, so you see I have economized 12,000 fr. clear!" The last years of his life were sad enough; poverty oppressed, disease racked, charity supported him; and after all these triumphs, all these crowns, all this applause, and all this fortune, he had not enough to pay the church and the grave-digger. Jordan's Field was his last home. His friends had forgotten him; the crowd now applaud Napoleone Rossi.

The Ancient Music of Scotland.

The ancient music of Scotland has become a matter of faith or conjecture, so that no one arrogates to himself the knowledge to establish the facts of its truth, or the superiority of the whole, or of any neglected portion of it.

Music, like all other fine arts, has been progressive, being common to all ages and nations. From the accounts of Plato, the study of music was for a long time confined to the priesthood, and was considered sacred, and forbidden on all light occasions; but we can trace no accurate judgment of the relative excellence of the ancient music in the varied nations.

So far as Scotland is concerned, the first real account of its rise and spread is to be learnt in the various meetings of the clans during the rude and warlike times of the country.

The "Blackmatch," as originally organized through the Highlands in the feudal times, on their great days of assembly brought together the finest looking men their chiefs could muster, and also all the wandering and ancient bards, who performed extemporaneous airs and stories, accompanied with their harps and pipes to suit the nature of these occasions. Through these the national music of Scotland was kept alive, and the spirit of poetry kept floating from mind to mind without the aid of the printer, and perhaps, long before the Celtic nation had reduced the science to any positive rules.

Since the harp ceased with the feudal times, there appears to have been no musician of high merit in the Highlands capable of imparting, much less preserving, the music as then sung to its native words, or of giving that effect to its circulation which popular verses never fail to produce, although there have appeared in Edinburgh, and other places, many industrious collections of the Scottish music, among the first of which was that of Oswald and McGibbons, who had the aid of Allan Ramsey, the author of the "Gentle Shepherd," to write verses to the air. It is delightful to look into the creation of the songs and airs of Scotland, because the most of these had a romantic origin in the love of their chiefs, or the return of some wanderer, the birth of an heir, or the settlement of some quarrel—while others, inspired from inward feeling, addressed themselves to the grandeur of the majestic mountains.

Among the most modern authors, King James the First, and also King James the Fourth, were celebrated composers, and onward to the period of James the Sixth may be reckoned the bright era of Scottish music. All these preserved composed, and discoursed most eloquent music and words, while one of the James's invented a new style of music, plaintive and melancholy, in which he was imitated by many of the Italians.

In reference to James the Fourth and Fifth, it would appear that the Scotch are now far behind them in their devotion to the gentle art; and even yet, while all the branches of polite education are fast progressing, the science of music has almost been a dead letter, at least in the education of the Scottish youth, except the small stir now beginning in the education of young ladies in superior seminaries; while, in Germany and other parts of the continent, it has long been one of the elementary branches of education.—Cock's Miscellany.

A GERMAN'S IDEA OF TIME.—"Vivian," the sprightly Art critic of the London Leader, hits it off, characteristically, thus:

Immanuel Kant was the curse of his nation; an illustrious iconoclast, he dashed the majestic idol, Time, from its pedestal, proved to his countrymen that Time did not exist—was a fiction—an idea—a mere subjective phenomenon; and from that time (which was no time) the Germans have severely ignored the existence of Time! Hence their immeasurableness in all things! their long books, long dinners, long pipes, long hair, long ballets, long operas, long-winded orations, long epithets—their slow coaches, slow movements, and slow conversaciones! Why should they hurry? Tempus edax rerum? A figment! Even those who recognize Time only think of killing it; Kant killed it! s'ist doch wahr! Amusingly illustrative of this contempt of Time, and utter disbelief in that venerable party's existence, was the display of Herr Schneider, the organist, at Exeter-Hall lately. He was engaged to play two solos in the intervals of the choral performances of our friends the Cologne singers. A splendid player Herr Schneider showed himself to be; but having once seated himself and commenced the performance, he, not recognising Time as more than a subjective phenomenon, fairly wearied the patience of a British time credulous public. He played and played and played and played. We yawned and fidgeted, and fidgeted and yawned, but still the terrible German held on his relentless way! At every moment he seemed coming to a close; delusive hope! he started off again to "fresh chords and quavers new," away! away, as if his life depended on it. A few mild hisses, monitory and minatory, produced no result. On! on! he went without a thought of pausing. Exasperated patience burst forth into ironical cheers and stampings; it was thought that by brave applause we might politely suggest to him that we had had enough. But still he kept on. He was not the man to be put down by clamour, sir! At last the thing became a joke—a painful joke—and only after five-and-twenty minutes assault upon our endurance would this fanatic quit his seat! Do you not see the necessary connexion between such an exhibition and the spirits of a nation whose language delights in words of this airy lightness and compendious brevity:

Schwerfallendes gesantaumelrhythmen trunkenbold!

Kant has done it all!

A Glance at the Present State of Music.

By DR. MARX.

From the "Universal School of Music."

The first glance we take at the present state of musical art, reveals to us a picture of musical activity so great and universal as may scarcely have existed at any previous period; excepting, perhaps, during those lovely days once shining upon Italy and Spain. Then, indeed, the stream of holy song gushed from the open doors of every church, flowed down from every pilgrim-crested eminence; from every balcony the clang of festive trumpets enlivened the banquets of nobles and princes, and, in the stillness of the balmy night, the trembling chords of mandolines and citherns mingled with the voices of tender singers. So our own country also resounded, in the days of Luther, with his songs of warfare. Powerfully exciting, inspiring, and confirming, they swelled from the church choir, and through the open doors spread over the crowded market-place; they filled the busy street with shouts of religious enthusiasm, and penetrated to the private family circle, the lonely chamber of the pious Christian.

That which, in those countries and those days, arose spontaneously as the inborn medium of expression of a people more easily excited, and inhabiting a country rich in nature's sweetest charms, or as the natural voice of holy zeal, has come down to us; not, it is true, as something foreign to our nature—for it had been lying dormant in the deeply poetic mind of our German nation long before it was awakened—but still as something acquired, in the form of a gift presented to us for our enjoyment, and as an ornament of our existence.

Thus are our public gardens, our social circles, and our festivals, everywhere filled with streams of harmony; bands of music, consisting of numerous instruments, the number of which is ever increasing, parade before our military hosts, or make the ball-room tremble with the "phrensy of delight." Where is the town, however small, which does not attempt to get up, at least, a series of winter concerts? How many virtuosi, how many quartet-societies, how many concerts of every kind and description, divert the music-loving multitudes of our larger cities! At what time were there seen almost everywhere so many opera performances almost the whole year round? What time or country* can show any thing equal to our musical festival and musical societies? Or, lastly, in what age, before the present, has music been so universally recognized as an indispensable branch of education, both in word and in deed, and with such sacrifices of time and money?

For this diffusion of music, the lively interest universally taken in its cultivation, in every sphere of life, accords proportionate means. However great the cost of instruction, instruments, printed music, &c., every family in the middle as well as the higher ranks of society endeavours to obtain them. There is no where a lack of teachers; singing is practised in every school; seminaries, universities, and special music schools, continue the instruction and lead it to a higher point; everywhere academies of singing, instrumental and general musical societies, established for the purpose of collective practice and performance, are found increasing. Municipal authorities and governments bestow attention upon, and provide means for the performance of works of art in chapels and in choirs, or for the musical instruction of the people; our publishers and music-sellers diffuse the works of all nations and all times to an extent and in a form unprecedentedly cheap and convenient; even the acquisition of good instruments has been considerably facilitated by the progress of the mechanical arts.

Wonderful power of the art of sound! To open all hearts! engaging the interest and drawing contributions even from those who, for want of instruction, or from a naturally defective organization, are denied a participation in its pleasures; who willingly make sacrifices for those belonging to them, and then step aside, content with the feeling of having afforded to others a pleasure which they themselves cannot enjoy!

Whence has music this power? and how does it reward our love and sacrifices?

It has this power, and is all-powerful over mankind, because it seizes upon every fibre, sensually and spiritually, upon the whole body and soul, sensations and ideas. The rudest nature thrills under the effect of its powerful strains, and is soothed by its sweetness. Its sensual effect is in itself irresistibly enchanting; for the merely sensual hearer feels that this trembling of the nerves penetrates to the inmost depth of the soul, that this corporeal delight is purified and sanctified by its hidden connection with the origin of our existence. But he who has experienced in his own person how music calls forth, and leads, at pleasure, the most tender, powerful, and secret feelings of the soul, imparting brightness to its mysterious twilight, awakening it to a dreamy consciousness; he to whom the deepest perceptions and ideas present themselves as spirits diverting him from, and raising him above, the fluctuating play of feelings and emotions; who is, in short, aware that our existence would be imperfect, did not the world of sound supply the deficiency: such a one knows that the most intellectual pleasure of the senses derived from hearing music is merely an attraction to its spiritual fountain, from which are drawn purity of feeling, elevation of mind, the contemplation of a new and boundless world of ideas, and a new sphere of existence.

The one is the all-penetrating, universally prevailing power of sounds; and the other, the promise of this art—a more elevated and blissful existence, which we, knowing or anticipating, confide in, and to which so many of us and ours are devoted.

But its nature, like man's own, is twofold; partaking both of the sensual (material), and the mental (spiritual). It has power to raise us from a rude and barren state of being, to a higher, more susceptible, and spiritual existence; to soften and refine our feelings, to awaken in us ideas of pure and perfect humanity; to exalt us above the human sphere to the confines of the Divine, and, in this mental elevation, fill our hearts with love and holy zeal for every thing that is good and noble. But this self-same power of melody and harmony may also bury the yet unrevealed indwelling spirit in the alluring waves of excited sensuality, obliterating from the soul every noble feeling, and every virtuous power, and gradually leading it to that thoughtlessness, that want of principle and desire for sensual pleasure which dissolves or stifles every noble disposition, and in which train are found those strange twins, satiety and insatiability, and that terrible condition of the mind, utter indifference.

How then does this dangerous but dear art reward our love and our sacrifices?

In art itself, all is pure, noble, and good. It is the fault of our weakness, if to us its gifts become poison; if we linger inactively upon the threshold of its sanctuary, or allow its call to die away unheeded, and, instead of joining the company of the initiated in its sacred halls, lose ourselves in the courts destined for the offal of the sacrifices.

Many things have conspired to enbitter the pure enjoyment and interrupt the pure and honest cultivation of the art of music in the present times. The waves of mighty events are penetrating into, and acting upon, every form of social and spiritual life, while the nations are still without a uniting and guiding principle of mental elevation*. Stupendous events and recollections have called forth, on the one hand, vehement desires, and a prevalence of violent and suddenly changing impressions; on the other hand, its opposite—inanition, and a deep longing for peace and quietness. In both directions, the material, as a means of violent excitement, or of soothing the mind into a pleasurable repose, has acquired undue preponderance over the spiritual element of art, and we see repeated a spectacle often witnessed before: that, in such moments when the tension of the German mind and character, in the masses of the people and those who speak to their hearts, suffers relaxation, foreign influences, especially the frivolity and ready loquacity of the French, and the enervated sensuality of the Italians, wrest the sceptre from native talent. In respect to music, it is in the opera especially that foreign mediocrity at such times gains its easiest victories, and carries everything before it in its rapid march. For, how many different means are not resorted to in these productions, to take the hearer by surprise and confound his judgment, so that their worthlessness remains concealed beneath that novelty of their effects! And how can the evil influence thus brought to bear upon the highest and most commanding point, fail to affect, in a similar manner, every other sphere and branch of art?

Are we compelled, on the one hand, to censure the mind-debasing materialism of the foreign opera, whose tendency in our days is the more irresistible, because we are still accustomed, indeed forced, on account of the more highly developed political and public life of our western neighbours, to look to their country as the balance-wheel of the great European clock; so, on the other hand, we acknowledge that which is positively good in those operas, and which has been too much neglected by our writers and composers for the theatres; viz. dramatic, or at least scenic, animation, and the progression from mere individual conditions to public and more universally intelligible and interesting relations of life. Only when this positive element shall have been more generally perceived and appreciated by our poets and musicians, amongst all the poverty, lowness, and errors of the foreign opera—then, and not till then, will German art, in all other respects so much more pure and true, be able to triumph over its rival in the theatre, as certainly and signally as it has done everywhere else.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

SONGS*

From the German of H. HEINE.

Evening Song.

When I on my couch reclining,
Lie veiled in night,
Then a sweet form floats before me,
A beautiful child of light!

And when in silent slumber
Just closing my eyes do seem,
Then glides that form so softly
Into my happy dream.

And with the dream at morning
It melteth not away,
But in my heart I bear it
About with me all day.

The Voyage.

I stood and leaned upon the mast,
And every wave I counted;
Adieu, adieu, my fatherland!
O fast the good ship bounded!

We passed the home of her I love,
The window panes were blinking;
I gazed, and gazed, but saw no sign,
Ah! none of me was thinking.

Ye tears, O do not dim these eyes,
That clear shall meet the morrow!
My poor, poor heart, O do not break
With all this weight of sorrow! J. S. D.

* Mendelssohn has composed music to these songs, for two voices, which is soon to be published here by Messrs. G. P. Reed & Co.

IMPROVEMENT IN ORGANS.—Few people who were at the Inaugural ceremonies of the Crystal Palace will fail to recollect with what fine effect the sacred chants and choruses were given, nor how greatly that effect was enhanced by the pealing tones of the magnificent organ that swelled forth with such majestic beauty and grandeur, filling the vaulted transepts and reverberating the solemn echoes from the dome and the remotest angles of the building.

* Be it remembered Dr. Marx is writing in and of Germany.

* The reader will recollect that this was written at the commencement of the struggles on the continent.—T7.

The peculiar sweetness, softness, fulness and richness of these sounds still linger pleasantly in the ear, and it will be long ere we forget either its deep-toned bass or its clear and silvery treble. Being a connoisseur in such matters we had the curiosity to examine this organ, and found that its superior excellence was owing to a new and marked improvement in organs that has not yet been brought before the public. We will attempt a description of the instrument.

This organ, which is constructed on a new principle, surpasses all other common organs by an important improvement in the wind-chest. The invention consists, in constructing air chambers running the entire length of the scale and sounding board, each chamber supplying all the pipes of a single stop with wind; consequently there are as many air chambers as stops; also, each pipe has its own wind connected with the air chamber. Sliders are entirely dispensed with; it is not easy to adjust sliders, so that they may move readily and yet fit closely enough to prevent the escape of wind, as they are affected by the atmosphere. In this organ, that great defect will never occur, and the stops will move easily in every state of weather, without escape of wind.

By this improvement, there is also attained almost double power, more promptness, evenness and sweetness of tone, and there is an especial advantage gained by its easy wind and attachment of action. This improvement was invented and patented June 15th, 1852. This organ was manufactured and exhibited by Alb. Gemunder & Brothers, Springfield, Mass., and may be examined at any time at the Crystal Palace.—N. Y. Mirror.

FROM A FORTHCOMING OPERA.—The scene represents a dark wood in all the murkiness of midnight, which will, however, be rendered distinctly visible from all parts of the house by means of additional lamps.

(Music—Adagio movement to express that the moon is behind a cloud, but may shortly be expected to rise.)

(Enter Florello.)

Flo. "No sound is heard."

(Trombones, bassoons, etc., growl their lowest notes to imitate the profundity and depth of the silence.)

"No human form I see."

(Here he stares earnestly at a numerous and fashionable audience, who confirm his assertions with bravos and clapping of hands.)

"I falter—faint—my breath begins to flee."

(Wind instruments to suggest the deficiency of breath, and express his want of expression.)

"With two stiletos in my heart I lie."

(Adagio movement. Florello puts his hand to his heart, and draws two sighs, but not one of the daggers. He rises, falls back against the stump of a tree, and the music expresses that he has torn his inexpressibles.)

"Unseen," (Rub-adub-dub) "unheard,"—(Tan-ta-ra-ra) "alone," (Jang-jang-crash) "I die—die—die!" (Diminuendo—Tweedle-dum! Tweedledee! Twee-wee-ee-e)—and the music and the hero die away together.—Geo. University Mag.

SUPERIOR VIOLINS.—George Gemunder, 304 Broadway, New York—to whom was awarded, by a jury of the Royal Commissioners, connected with the exhibition of the Industry of all Nations at London, in the year 1851, in consideration of having exhibited a Joseph Guarnerius Violin, (chiefly) and for three other Violins and a Viola—a Prize Medal, has now, by a new method, improved the tones of his instruments in such a high degree, that they produce the same character of tone as those of the best far-famed Italian makers,—without having the French method of preparing the wood by chemical process. By this mode of making Violins, the wood retains its whole power, whereby the tone is not only constantly improving, but is preserved as long as the instrument last.—N. Y. Mirror.

—A curious relic, lately sold in London for £2 15s., was Handel's tuning fork, giving the note A, interesting "not only from its connection with the immortal composer, but as showing the rise in pitch since his time, amounting to nearly a whole tone."

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUGUST 6, 1853.

READ—REFLECT—ACT!—For the benefit of our readers and ourselves (for are not our interests identical?) we copy here a nice little article which we find in an exchange paper. The case is certainly "well put," and we can assure our readers that it matches our case point for point:

"To Each and Every Delinquent!"

"We want our dues."

"We are compelled to pay cash for our paper and printing."

"We pay cash for rent—cash for type-setting—cash for bread and butter for our families, &c."

"The paper that you now hold in your hand is furnished to you at a heavy outlay of time, labor, anxiety and money, and you do wrong to withhold your subscription!"

"Stop the paper if you please but first pay what you owe."

This, of course, is addressed to "whom it may concern," and not to those who have long since graduated from or who never entered the aforesaid class of "delinquents." The system of payment in advance is indispensable to the existence of a journal that must pay its way punctually from day to day. The fifty or sixty dollars which this day's paper costs us, we must pay this day: how then can we wait to the end of the year with the uncertain chance of getting the little two dollar subscriptions on which our enterprise depends?

The New Piano Forte of M. Sax, Senior.

The newspapers, for some weeks, have contained hints of a great improvement in our universal parlor instrument, recently made in Belgium, by M. Sax, the father of the father of the numerous family of Sax-horns, Sax-tubas, and the various intermarrying cousins which compose the homogeneous, or we might say homo-tonous elements of each and every brass band now in vogue. This latter gentleman is named Adolph Sax. And if Sax filis has opened a new era of brass, Sax père has perhaps atoned for it by a beautiful and simple method of enhancing the heavenly resonance of strings in that little domestic temple or pantheon of harmony which a good piano-forte is. The peculiarity of the Sax piano, as we find it described, is just one of those very beautiful, very complete, and seemingly very obvious suggestions, which one would fancy might occur to any thinking person, but which it is the privilege of genius once in a century or two to "happen" to get hold of. As we have seen no full description of it in English, we translate for our readers a very clear account furnished by M. Léon Kreutzer to the Revue et Gazette Musicale de Paris of May 29th. He is reporting of a reunion of artists, which took place, by invitation of M. Sax, in Paris, where he heard the new piano played upon by several of the best performers.

"Compare," says M. Kreutzer, "the tone of the violin with that of the guitar: the force and brilliancy of the first are not more characteristic, than the feebleness and thinness of the second. Is it owing to dimension? Surely not, for the violin has altogether the disadvantage in respect of size. It depends solely on the arrangement of the strings. Look at the violin: from the fret where the pins hold them prisoners, they rise by a gentle ascent to the bridge which supports them, and then sink on the other side of the instrument. Look, on the contrary, at the guitar: its strings follow a direction absolutely parallel with the plane of the sounding-board. From this seemingly slight and unimportant difference results the beauty of the sounds of the violin, and the meagreness of the sounds of the guitar. Given the angular arrangement of the strings, and we have brilliancy and vigor; given the horizontal arrangement, and we have feebleness and impotence. This fact established, let us consider the case of the piano.

"Open it, and what do we see? An infinite number of strings arranged parallel as in the guitar, and drawing with a weight of 5,000 kilograms upon a frail plank of pine, which has to be supported by a double, or even triple barrier, of oak or iron. Now, with these barriers applied to the sounding-board, the vibration is gone, it is the mute upon the violin, it is the cold in the singer's throat. Yes; but various remedies may be employed to obviate these inconveniences in the piano. Adopt, for example, the system of angles used for the strings of the violin. Very well; but then the strain of the strings will become enormous. We shall no longer have to deal with 5,000, but with 20,000 kilograms, it may be; a bridge of iron would not resist that. Happily, M. Sax, senior, had a resource in readiness. In the first place he says to himself: The principle of angles by means of a bridge, for the direction of the string, is one of absolute utility; then, by a very simple calculation, he evades those stern requirements of the sounding-board, which have caused, alas! the death of so many pianos. The string A shall weigh upon the bridge with a weight, we will say, of ten kilograms; but the string B, its obliging sister, passing underneath the bridge, shall raise it by as many kilograms; then, after having traced an angle in opposite directions, the two strings will run along parallel to the point where the hammer is to come to strike them; and so on, in the same way, throughout the vast scale of the entire instrument, so that the sounding-board, delivered, like a vigorous child, from its barriers, its restraints, its leading-strings, shall vibrate in full liberty. The bridge, depend upon it, will support the entire burden, a burden really light, or rather none at all through this equipoise and neutralization of forces. Then the sounding boards, free and independent, may grow old with impunity, and will even grow better as they grow older, like those marvellous ones of Amati and of Stradivarius, which sound more pure and brilliant two centuries after they were made.

"Persuaded of the perfect exactness of the principle, which I have just explained, M. Sax constructed a first piano according to his theory; an imperfect piano, no doubt, in its mechanism; but he reasoned wisely in overlooking imperfections of detail, and fastening first of all upon the principle as such.

"In Belgium this discovery made a great sensation; it was approved, appreciated at its full value by men the most experienced and the least liable to the attraction of mere novelty. M. Fétis, the profound theoretician, in a Report addressed on the 8th of May, 1851, to the Brussels Royal Academy of Science, Letters and Fine Arts, learnedly pointed out the advantages which the manufacture of the piano will receive from the discovery of M. Sax. He describes the impression which the new instrument produced the first time it was heard. 'M. Sax,' says he, 'at first saw fit to apply his system to a little old square piano of Lichtenthal, an instrument of dull and short sonority; its mechanism, completely used up, was composed only of hammers too small, which wavered and had no rectitude nor firmness of action; and finally the keys were in perpetual oscillation and continually rattling. With this fine instrument the artist sought to realize his great ideas. Having removed the sound board, he replaced it by another of only half the thickness of those generally used, and he employed no barrier. Then he established his bridge according to the principles before explained, stretched his wires, readjusted for better or worse the old Lichtenthal mechanism, and finally one of the intelligent sons of this man of genius sat down to play upon this cheaply made piano. Instantly the passers in the street stopped and tried to divine where the great orchestra they seemed to hear could be. It got rumored about. Several artists hastened to go and try the new instrument for themselves, and they were struck with admiration. What particularly astonished them was the long reach of the vigorous and pure sounds, and the power of the bases in a square piano of the smallest size. These results had been obtained at the first effort, without any gropings, and with the certainty which every high intelligence derives from a principle.

"M. Sax, senior, being, as great inventors often are, a little careless and indifferent, let the time pass without turning his discovery to much account, when a mournful event led him to Paris. In the space of a few weeks M. Sax lost two daughters and a son; it was then that M. Adolph Sax earnestly besought his father to quit a place so fraught with sad remembrances, and to come and establish himself in Paris. M. Adolph Sax saw that the progress of the art, as well as the reputation of his father, were interested in having the new principle, that should preside over the construction of pianos, placed in the clearest light before competent artists. Such was the purpose of the little rennion of which I have spoken, and at which were present M. Adolph Adam, member of the Institute, the distinguished pianists, MM. Fumagalli, Brisson, Dollingen, &c., and where all possible experiments were made with most minute exactness and impartiality.

"MM. Adam, Fumagalli, &c., first executed on the Sax Piano,—a square piano of small size and with strings perpendicular,—a piece, which they afterwards repeated on a square piano with strings oblique (and consequently longer), the most perfect one that could be selected from those made on the received plan. I do not believe that I deceive myself when I affirm that the superiority of the Sax piano was universally recognized, and that the sonorous power of the instrument constructed on his system, seemed at least triple that of the rival instrument.

"The new piano was then tried against a Grand piano, of large model, which combined all the desirable improvements. Here there was very nearly an equality as regards intensity, but not as regards purity, of sounds. The same note, struck first on one and then on the other of the instruments, gave almost the same resonance. In the piano made upon the old system, it seemed equally powerful, but less pure and less homogeneous.

"For myself, I was not contented with these tests alone. I had heard it objected, that the intensity of the sound would injure its clearness and make it confused. I wished at once to bring this to the test of observation; I interrogated the new piano carefully; I confined myself to executing, on the lower portions of the instrument, close harmonies and those intentionally somewhat harsh, in order to convince myself of the perfect independence of the various resonances; and I acquired the conviction that if the Sax piano is remarkable for the power of its sonority, it is perhaps still more so for its incorruptible precision. I tried for instance such harmonic sequences as these: C (the low C of the violoncello), E♭, G♭, A; B, D, F, A♭; B♭, D♭, E, G; and musicians endowed with a fine ear easily recognized each of these notes individually, whereas upon other pianos they perceived only the vague and blurred sensation of the diminished seventh. The Sax piano, then, may seem created not only to vie against the orchestra in power, but also to elucidate and purify, if I may use the word, the execution of those learnedly and closely woven works of the composers of the last century,—works over which the modern piano, in spite of its immense improvements, has always cast a light veil of confusion.

"Such are the fruits of the invention of M. Sax. And when we reflect that these beautiful results have been obtained in the most defective conditions, upon an instrument of the smallest dimension, we cannot but do justice to the fecundity of the principle which has guided the ingenious maker, and predict for his discovery the most brilliant future, the most legitimate renown."

A Monster Concert by Young Ladies.

Seldom has it been our lot in sweeping the musical firmament with our telescope, to report a new phenomenon of such entirely strange and formidable size and aspect, as the sign which we have just read in the Southern heavens. We have given our readers a pretty faithful almanac of the motions of the regular planets, of the risings and settings of the fixed stars, the comings and goings of the comets, &c., in the universe of music. But neither the blazing "monsters" in England, nor the Great and Little Bears of St. Petersburg, nor Mozart's "Jupiter" with all his satellites; nor the meteoric Wagners of Germany; nor the far streaming comets of Julliens coming and DeMeyers gone, shaking their horrid hair in wonderful fantasias; nor Sontag and the sweet influences of vocal Pleiades (the queen one of whom is silent since last year); nor, in short, the whole Milky Way of Yankee musical "Conventions;"—can offer anything as novel and as startling as this long chart that just now lies before us.

It is the programme of an annual Concert by the pupils of the "Madison Female College," in Madison, Georgia, which came off on the evening of July 27th, under the auspices of Prof. G. C. Taylor, "musical manager and director." And if this is a specimen of the scale on which they "do up" the music in the educational seminaries down South, we would advise our German encomiast, "Hoplit," to look there rather than to Boston, for the "music of the Future."

Said programme first sets forth the names of each and every performer, to the number of one hundred and thirty, each with the prefix of Miss, with the solitary exception of one young "master Rossini," bearing the professorial patronymic. These consist of 97 young lady pianists, 11 young lady guitarists, 3 young lady harpists, 13 young lady violinists (!), 1 young lady violist (!!), 4 young lady violoncellists (!!!), and 1 young lady contrabassist (!!!!). These are the regulars (pupils); besides whom 22 "irregulars" are mentioned. The entire programme, reader, would be too much for you; we select a few of the most notable items. It seems these young pianists fire in platoons, occasionally flanked in some of their exploits by the light archery of fiddle and guitar strings, or the deep artillery of that Amazonian double bass. After an introductory Grand March, comes Part First, of which we may as well give the whole:

1. Overture—To the Caliph of Bagdad, (on one, three, seven and nine pianos,)..... Boieldieu.
2. Wild Bird—Class; with Piano and Contra Basso Accompaniment,..... Von Weber.
3. Polka—Fire Fly, (9 Pianos,)..... Fowler.
4. Duet—Josephine Polka, (9 Pianos,)..... Thos. A. Becket.
5. Song—Ossian Serenade—Class; with Piano, Harp and Contra Basso Accompaniment, (By request,)..... Dodge.
6. Airs—Selections from "Daydare," (5 and 3 Pianos,)..... Auber.
7. Duet—Tyrolienne; from "La Fille du Regiment," (3 Pianos,)..... Donizetti.
8. Song and Chorus—Gypsy—Class; with Piano Accompaniment,..... M. Dix Sullivan.
9. Duet—Polka Favorite, (9 Pianos,)..... Julien.

From Part Second we may single out two items, viz:

1. Quintetto—Composed and Arranged for 114 hands on 9 Pianos, 4 Violins, 3 Guitars, 2 Violoncellos, 1 Viola, 1 Harp and 1 Contra-Basso—(First Violins played by the Leader and Master Rossini A. Taylor, aged 7 years—all other instruments by Young Ladies,)..... Geo. C. Taylor.
4. Song—Sweet Home—Accompanied with the Harmonicon or Musical Glasses, an instrument invented by Beej. Franklin, (By request,)..... Paine.

Of the third part it certainly will be enough to give the leading item; how the senses and imagination of the audience after the intensely harrowing excitement of such a composition, could hold out to hear the eight more pieces on the programme, is a mystery to us, unless there were the quickening power of genius in it. It reads as follows:

1. Battle—Musical Combat, or Struggle for American Independence, being a Descriptive Fantasia, in which "God save the King" represents England, and "Yankee Doodle" the United States.
Argument.—Heavy Cannonading—God save the King (England) makes the attack—is repulsed by Yankee Doodle (United States)—God save the King in the ascendancy with light cannonading on both sides; Yankee Doodle gaining with heavy cannonading on both sides—God save the King almost victorious—Yankee Doodle makes a last effort, when during a desperate struggle on both sides, Yankee Doodle becomes sole occupant of the (musical) field; After which Hail Columbia is introduced, illustrative of the heartfelt gratitude of "Our Country"—(9 Pianos, 17 performers. The Pianists to the Audience's left take God save the King—those to the right, Yankee Doodle,)..... Geo. C. Taylor.

New Music.

Oliver Ditson, from his ever-multiplying publications, sends us copies of a great variety, both of sheet music and of entire works. We notice for the present, only one:

The opera of Norma, by V. BELLINI, with Italian and English words. This is the first of a promised series to be called "Ditson's Edition of Standard Operas." Here we have the vocal score complete, with piano-forte accompaniment, of the great modern Italian lyric tragedy, which has made the fame of Grisi and so many prime donne, and which put the crown upon Bellini's reputation. As a whole we never liked it as well as the Sonambula with its fresher and more wholesome melody; its pathos, exquisite as it is, has seemed too prolonged, too uniform in tone and hence enfeebling to the hearer. Yet there can be no doubt of its great merits. Its popularity has been almost unbounded; and is it not the fertile treasury whence were drawn year after year the caratina for the debut of each star soprano, duets for concert-room and parlor, themes for piano-forte fantasias, and for innumerable instrumental show-pieces for violin, flute, oboe, clarinet, arrangements for brass bands?—and we are not sure but it has served the turn of psalm-book makers. At all events, a library of modern standard operas would be a strange thing without Norma.

But of Norma we have no need to speak; it is the new edition that claims our attention. And we can freely say that Mr. Ditson, at the low price of two dollars, has here made this opera accessible to almost every music-lover, and in a form convenient and beautiful; type small, but very clear and neatly, elegantly cut; good paper; good shape, namely a small quarto; and a substantial paper binding with old gothic-looking illuminated sides and red edges. Hundreds of opera habitués, though they may have but the barest smattering of the art of reading music, will wish to possess for reference sake this copy of the entire Norma; how it will brighten up melodious reminiscences, and reconnect the broken threads of memory!

Then again, when the amateur singer of a single song or two from Norma, can have the whole opera so cheap, will he not seize the opportunity to furnish himself therewith, instead of with the mere sheet music, that he may enjoy his song in its dramatic connection with the whole? We think the publisher can hardly count upon many purchasers who would ever think of attempting to sing the opera through in any of its characters; and therefore it strikes us that it was a needless precaution to accommodate some of the pieces to the ordinary compass of the voice by transposing them out of the original key. This, depend upon it, does impair the integrity of the work. Think of Casta Diva in the key of D, with two sharps! Must it not lose something of its character? And even if the transpositions are more available and therefore quite acceptable to the majority of amateurs, yet among musicians a transposed edition of a musical work never can pass for a standard one. We really hope that Mr. Ditson will reconsider this matter in the operas that are to follow.

One other deformity we could wish removed. The English words (copied from a London edition) are uncouth, often unsingable, and ridiculous. Think of Pollio, in quick conversational accent, at the suggestion of Norma's name exclaiming:

"Icy shudd'ring's probe me
At her mere mention!"

The Italian is:

Proferesti un nome
Che il cor m'agghiaccia.

And then think of rendering the beautiful Casta Diva: (Chaste goddess, who dost silver o'er these sacred ancient trees, turn to us thy beautiful face without cloud, without veil!) in this way:

"Queen of Heaven! while thou art reigning,
Love upon us is still remaining,
Clad in pureness, alone disdaining
Grosser earth's nocturnal veil." (2)

But this is practically a trifling inconvenience, since we hold it pretty certain that whoever sings Norma at all will sing it in Italian, and the original Italian is here given. Besides it is easier to criticize a bad version than to make a good one. The truth is, there is no task more hopelessly difficult than that of rendering the Italian words of an opera into singable English, preserving at the same time rhyme and reason.

The interest of this volume is enhanced by some prefatory matter, containing a short Life of Bellini, a synopsis of the plot, &c. We cannot doubt the success and popularity of so fine an enterprise as this of furnishing the favorite operas entire and cheap. We only hope the future issues will be unimpeachable on the score of transposition; and if they must have English words at all, may they do better than copy the miserable London doggerel.

HOPLIT.

"HOPLIT," the name attached to the flattering German letter in our last, is literally a nom de guerre. It is simply the Greek ὁπλίτης (hoplites) which means a warrior, an armed man. Rühlmann, of Dresden, is, we understand, the real person, who has written many a sharp polemic article in defence of the Schumann and the Wagner School.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

The Music on the Common, by the "Germania Sereinade Band," on Wednesday Evening, was generally well selected and very beautifully executed. They adhered closely to their programme, which consisted of three parts, the first and last with reed instruments, and the second by brass band alone. Certainly the clarinets, flute, and bassoon, gave a much finer outline to the melody, and a softer richness of contrast to the harmonious ensemble. Particularly pleasing were that delicate and florid overture by Persiani, the two-part song of Mendelssohn, and a luscious Labitsky waltz, with slow introduction. The operatic arrangements from Ernani, Belisario, La Favorita, and Lucrezia Borgia, had the most familiar sound, and probably most captivated the ears of the multitude; but we should rather have heard something from Freyschütz or Don Juan.

There was one serious drawback in the difficulty of hearing so small a band of this sort. Out of the crowd we could hear nothing but the forte passages; while near the platform, in the crowd, though there were hundreds and hundreds of eager listeners, we were disturbed by the continual loud talk and play of restless boys. Probably the mere fact that it cost a voluntary effort of the mind to hear, was in a great measure the cause of the restlessness and noisiness. As the stiller hours came on, however, during the third part, we heard much more satisfactorily. On the whole, it was the most refined, artistic entertainment we have yet had on the Common; there were no "Wood-Ups," "Jordans," "Yankee Doodles,"—nothing more hacknied than the opera airs. Some day we hope to hear a band twice or thrice as large as this, organized on the same principle. Large it must be in order to vie in far-reaching sonority with the brass bands, which are all military bands, and organized upon the principle of loudness. Meanwhile, is it not worth a little extra stillness and attention, to hear such nice music as the Germanians give us!

Foreign.

WILHELMINA CLAUSSE has given a second concert in London, in which she seems to have surpassed herself. She played a sonata of Mendelssohn, with violin by Piatti; a Suite de Pièces, of Bach; the "deep, nay almost fathomless" Beethoven Sonata in A flat, (op. 110); the little "Duet" among Mendelssohn's Songs without Words; and Chopin's Impromptu in A flat.

NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The sixth and last concert (July 8th) attracted a crowded audience to Exeter Hall, and brought the second series to a close with distinction. The programme, if not precisely the best of the season, was that which contained the greatest variety. A large part was devoted to the orchestral music of Dr. Spohr, who again held the baton, and was greeted with the heartiest applause.

The concert commenced with a clever and ably instrumented overture in F minor, called Genevra, by Mr. Charles Horsley, whose oratorios of David and Joseph have made his name familiar to the public. The next piece was a quartet, for the ordinary stringed instruments, with orchestral accompaniments, one of the latest productions of Dr. Spohr. The form of this composition is unprecedented; nor is it likely to find imitators. The quartet is so complete in itself that the addition of orchestral accompaniments appears, to say the least, superfluous. Nevertheless, as a display of learning and ingenuity, Dr. Spohr's work is entitled to admiration. The manner in which he has preserved the fulness of the quartet, while making elaborate use of the orchestra, avoiding monotony while heightening and varying the coloring, cannot be too warmly praised.

Another remarkable composition, and one of a higher order, deeper interest, and loftier aim, was the symphony in C, for two orchestras, which Dr. Spohr has christened Irisches und Göttliches im Menschenleben ("The earthly and the heavenly in man's life.") The two orchestras consist of a small band of eleven instruments (two violins, tenor, violoncello, double-bass, flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, and two horns), supposed to represent the "Göttliches," or heavenly, and a grand orchestra, which stands for the "Irisches," or earthly. These are in continual opposition; but in the end the good prevails, and man is saved. No musician ever set himself a grander task. The illustration of a theme so solemn and magnificent demands the loftiest qualities in an artist. That Dr. Spohr has wholly succeeded we are not prepared to assert; but that, in many places, he has risen to the highest flight of his subject is undeniable. The first movement (Kindervelt) consisting of a short adagio, leading to an allegretto of great length, is intended to represent the innocence of the child, who unconscious of sin, cannot, even when yielding to temptation, be said to be corrupted. The little orchestra is principally employed in this, and with the happiest effect. No instrumental movement of Dr. Spohr's bears more continuously the mark of inspiration. The melodies—from the solo for the horn, in the introduction, to the end—are genuinely beautiful—fresher and more spontaneous, indeed, than are often suggested to their composer. Upon the instrumentation the greatest of living masters has lavished all his art. The second movement (Zeit der Leidenschaften) describes the period of life when passion exerts its sway. The conflicting elements which regulate the world's pursuits and pleasures here usurp the place of innocence; the past is forgotten and the future disregarded in the undivided contemplation of the present. Selfishness becomes the guiding principle, and worldly advantage the ruling influence. This portion of the symphony consists of a largo, depicting the serene state of man's mind until thus disturbed, and an allegro agitato in F minor, which paints the conflict that ensues. The first is appropriate, if nothing more, the last is exceedingly fine, and as suggestive as any other part of the work. In this and the third movement (Endlicherseeg des Göttlichen)—a presto, followed by an adagio, the first embodying the final combat between good and evil, the last the triumph of the former—the great orchestra is always prominent. The presto in C minor; while the adagio, with which the symphony concludes, in the major key, assimilates the holy rest that comes to man after the triumph of the good over the evil principle. The conception of the whole symphony is in the highest degree poetical, and its general development worthy of Dr. Spohr, among whose greatest and most lasting works it will undoubtedly rank.

VIENNA.—The Archduchess Sophia has given a musical soirée in her apartments, in which Teresa Milanollo, Thalberg and the notabilities of the Italian troupe took part.—Alexander Dreyschock is to pass the summer at Prague.—Guillelme Tell failed with the Italian troupe, but passed off with éclat at the Court theatre.—The German season opens under most brilliant auspices; among the artists expected from abroad, was Mlle. Johanna Wagner. Mme. Koester had sung with great success the rôles of Valentine and Bertha. Plotow's Indra was to be put upon the stage with a new distribution of parts, Mme. Koester replacing Mlle. Ney.

ST. PETERSBURG.—The Concert society has given its three annual concerts, in which Beethoven, Haydn and Mozart, were especially honored. Beethoven's Ninth Symphony was performed; think of Schiller's hymn to Joy: "Embrace, ye millions," &c., in Russia!—HENSELT, the gifted pianist, who had scarcely been heard in public for fifteen years, broke through his reserve and played Weber's Concertstück and a waltz of his own composition. His appearance in the musical world has called forth great enthusiasm.

DRESDEN.—A late number of the Police Gazette contains under the head of "Politically dangerous Individuals," the following: "WAGNER, RICHARD, late chapel-master from Dresden, one of the most prominent adherents of the revolutionary party, who was prosecuted for his participation in the revolution in Dresden in May 1849, is supposed to have the intention of quitting Zurich, where he has for some time resided, to come into Germany. A portrait of Wagner is here appended; should he be identified, he is to be handed over to the Royal State Tribunal in Dresden." Beethoven would probably be hunted in the same category, if he were living in these times.

JENNY NEY, the new-found jewel of the German Opera, has made here her debut as Norma, with the greatest éclat. TICHATSEHEK excelled also as Pollio.

BADEN, July 17.—A letter in a French journal says:—"The musical season promises to be very brilliant; the fashionable world is here in full force; nothing to be seen but kings, princes and dukes, not to speak of multitudes of gentlemen of ancient stock. The ladies make fabulous toilets, and in the most elegant circles of Paris you could hardly find more wealth, more luxury, or more taste. The orchestra which plays in the kiosk before the maison de conversation three times a day, is composed of fifty musicians under the direction of Herr Eichler; it is excellent, and contains solo-ists of great talent: Arban is one of them. For some days past we have had here Mme. Lagrange and M. Cavallini, who will give a concert in the Salle des Fleurs.

"From the 15th of July there will be a concert given every week by Ernst, the great violinist, Seligmann and Ehrlich." [Such a combination of significant names ought to make a good concert; think of it: earnest man, happy man, and honorable, is what they mean in English.—Ed.] "On the 20th of August there will be a concert on a grand Parisian scale. Berlioz, with the entire orchestra and choirs of Carlsruhe, and the music of an Austrian regiment, will bring out his Romeo and Juliet symphony, and other works. Miles. Cravelli, Wertheimer and other singers are engaged for it. We have a German opera and a French troupe; 'the latter plays vaudevilles and comedies with a perfect ensemble. . . . Add to this that every Thursday we have excellent Austrian band music, by 80 musicians, under the direction of Herr Koenneemann; every Tuesday the bands of Carlsruhe; and every Monday and Wednesday a ball in the hall of the Conservatoire."

Advertisements.

The best Book on Piano Instruction existing!

IN PRESS:—JULIUS KNORR'S GUIDE FOR TEACHERS ON THE PIANO. A full system of instruction, from the very outset, to artistic perfection, with full advice to teachers and pupils. Its progressive order, completeness, and the value of the pieces recommended, (about 200,) make it indispensable to teachers, and invaluable to all players. It is

THE BEST SELF-INSTRUCTOR EXTANT.

It is also the ONLY KEY to the proper use of Julius Knorr's "Materials," and his "Large Method." Price 75 cents.

G. A. SCHMITT, Petersburg, Va.

iii 14 3m

L. O. EMERSON,

Teacher of the Piano-Forte and Singing.

APPLY AT HIS RESIDENCE,

No. 12 INDIANA PLACE, BOSTON.

iii 13 3m.

A. W. FRENZEL,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC, and late Leader of the "SAXONIA ORCHESTRA," having made Boston his residence, is prepared to give Lessons on the Piano-Forte and in Singing, both in the English and German languages; also to accompany with the violin more advanced pupils in the Sonata-duos of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c. During the summer season, Mr. F. offers his services to classes out of town. Or he will receive scholars, from the city or the country, at his Music Rooms, No. 4 Pine Street, Boston, where he may always be found before 10 A. M., and between the hours of 1 and 3 P. M.

iii 6

JONAS CHICKERING,

RESPECTFULLY gives notice to his friends and the public that, having recovered from the late disastrous effects produced by the destruction of his factory, he is now ready to receive orders for PIANOS, which he promises to execute with as much faithfulness and promptitude as heretofore.

379 Washington Street, Boston.

Mar. 5.

tf

HEW'S PATENT

AMERICAN ACTION PIANO-FORTE.

THE MANUFACTURER is in possession of numerous testimonials from distinguished Musical Professors, who have used the greatly improved ACTION PIANO, commending it in high terms. The attention of purchasers and amateurs of Music to an examination of its superiority, is solicited.

GEO. HEW'S, 365 Washington St., Boston.

Apr. 10.

tf

BEETHOVEN'S CELEBRATED MASS in C, IN VOCAL SCORE: With an Accompaniment for the Organ or Piano-Forte, by Vincent Novello. With Latin and English text. Just published by Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

Sold by all Music Dealers.

iii 4

THE SYMPHONIES OF BEETHOVEN:— ARRANGED FOR THE PIANO-FORTE BY J. N. HUMMEL. The above excellent compositions are now in course of publication by the subscriber.

Symphony No. 7, in A, op. 92, is now ready.

Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

Sold by all Music Dealers.

iii 4

J. W. TAVERNER,

PROFESSOR OF ELOCUTION,

AT HIS RESIDENCE,

No. 30 CHARLES STREET, BOSTON.

—Edward L. Balch,

BERTINI'S PIANO METHOD—ABRIDGED.

The popularity of Bertini's Celebrated Method for the Piano is sufficient evidence of its great merits. The only objection ever made to the Method has been that the elaborateness with which the subject is treated, renders the task of commencing and completing it, somewhat arduous, and to a young pupil a formidable undertaking.

Teachers as well as scholars have, therefore, seen the want of an Abridged Edition, in which all that was actually necessary might be included—an edition containing the choicest and most important lessons; one that might be commenced and finished by those composing the majority of piano pupils.

To meet a want so long apparent, the publisher has issued this edition, which, as a superior work, is recommended to the musical public of the United States.

Published by

OLIVER DITSON,

115 Washington St.

Sold by all Music Dealers in the United States and Canada.

iii 12

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE,

No. 86 TREMONT STREET, BOSTON.

WHITE BROTHERS,

DEALERS IN MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS,

Best Italian, German, French and English Strings,

AGENTS OF

J. André, Offenbach; and G. André, Philadelphia,

FOR THE SALE OF FOREIGN CLASSIC MUSIC,

CHOIR MUSIC, &c.

Instruments Made, Repaired, Tuned, Bought, Sold, or Exchanged, on the most favorable terms.

IRA J. WHITE.

A. WARREN WHITE.

iii 2 3m

THEODORE T. BARKER,

MUSIC STORE,

No. 381 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

Chickering's Pianos to let.

All Foreign and American Musical Publications received as soon as published.

iii 23 3m

N. D. COTTON,

IMPORTER AND DEALER IN

English, French, and American Stationery,

DRAWING & PAINTING MATERIALS,

No. 13 Tremont Row, Boston.

* * Wedding and Visiting Cards Engraved and Printed.

16 tf

BEETHOVEN'S ORATORIO OF ENGEDI, or DAVID IN THE WILDERNESS, known as the MOUNT OF OLIVES, is this day published in a neat, convenient form for the singer or concert-goer by

Geo. P. Reed & Co., Publishers,

Jan. 8.

17 TREMONT ROW, BOSTON.

D. B. NEWHALL,

MANUFACTURER AND DEALER IN PIANO FORTES,

No. 344 Washington Street, Boston.

PIANO FORTES REPAIRED, TUNED, & TO LET.

Apr. 10.

tf

J. C. WOODMAN,

ORGANIST AND CONDUCTOR OF MUSIC AT CENTRAL CHURCH,

Teacher of Singing, Piano Forte, &c.,

No. 94 Chestnut Street, Boston.

iii 2 3m.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.

FOREIGN MUSIC DEPOT, GIRARD HOUSE BUILDINGS,

NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,

PHILADELPHIA.

N. B. The complete works, for Piano, (Quartets, Trios, Duets for Piano and Violin, Duets for four hands and Piano solo pieces,) of BEETHOVEN and MOZART, as also the Piano solo Works of CLEMENTI and HAYDN, as published by J. André, Offenbach, in sets, at very low prices. We have appointed

Messrs. WHITE BROTHERS,

TREMONT TEMPLE, Boston,

our Agents for the sale of the above Standard Editions of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, &c. &c.

iii 2 tf

MRS. ROSA GARCIA DE RIBAS,

TEACHER OF THE

PIANO-FORTE, SINGING & GUITAR,

2 Seneca St., corner Harrison Avenue.

MR. De RIBAS will give instruction on the Oboe and Flute. Also MUSIC ARRANGED, TRANSPOSED, &c. Boston, April 23.

3m

Letter-Press, Music and Job Printing-Office,

SIGNOR G. C. GUIDI respectfully informs his former pupils and the public, that he has resumed his instructions in SINGING, after the Italian school, with the intention to settle permanently in Boston. In order to accommodate those who may not wish to take private instruction, he will open classes for ladies and gentlemen, on moderate terms. None but good voices will be admitted. Terms liberal for persons intending to study for professional purposes.

Sig. G. can be consulted free upon any musical subject, daily, from 12 to 2, at Mr. News's Piano Manufactory, No. 365 Washington street, where terms and time for classes may be known.

Orders or notes for Sig. G. may be addressed to him at G. P. Reed & Co.'s Music Store, 17 Tremont Row, and at Oliver Ditson's, 115 Washington street.

Feb. 5.

A CARD.

THE SUBSCRIBER respectfully offers his services to the public as Teacher of the Piano-Forte, the Violin and the Guitar, also of Harmony and Singing, after a clear and easy method. He will also accompany pupils, both in seminars and in private houses, in the practice of Duets, Trios, &c.

Address for the present at 168 Tremont Street.

March 26. 3m.

CARL GÄRTNER.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
265 Washington Street, Boston.

Oct. 16.

3m

T. BRICHER,

Organist and Conductor of Music
At the Bowdoin Square Church.

OFFICE UNDER THE CHURCH. . . . ENTRANCE ON CHARDON ST.
Jan. 22. 3m.

H. S. CUTLER,

Organist at the Church of the Advent, also of the Boston Harmonic Society.

ADDRESS—(Care of ROLAND CUTLER, No. 4 Market Square, Boston.)

22 tf

F. F. MÜLLER,

DIRECTOR OF MUSIC AND ORGANIST at the Old South Church; ORGANIST of the Handel and Haydn Society; ORGANIST of the Musical Education Society, &c. &c. &c. Residence, No. 3 Winter Place, Boston.

ii 7 tf

NATHAN RICHARDSON,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC.

Letters may be addressed at the Revere House, Boston.

25 tf

GEORGE F. WILLEY,

TEACHER OF MUSIC.

Private Tuition in the principles of Music and the Cultivation of the Voice.

MUSIC ROOM, THE LECTURE ROOM OF KIRK STREET CHURCH, RESIDENCE, 94 FRANKLIN SQUARE, SUFFOLK STREET, Feb. 5. LOWELL, MASS.

Germania Serenade Band.

THE SERVICES OF THIS ASSOCIATION can be secured by applying to

G. SCHNAPP, Leader,

364 Tremont Street.

ii 14 tf

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

AT 21 SCHOOL STREET, BOSTON.

$2 per annum, in advance.

ITS CONTENTS relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time,—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music published at home and abroad. 3. A Summary of the significant Musical News from all parts; gathered from English, German, French, as well as American papers. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, Architecture, Poetry, Aesthetic Books, the Drama, &c.—8. Original and Selected Poems, short Tales, Anecdotes, &c.—Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished. Address, (post paid,) J. S. DWIGHT,

21 School Street, Boston.

RATES FOR ADVERTISING.

For half a square, (8 lines,) or less, first insertion, . . . $0.50
each additional inser.25
For a square, (16 lines,) first insertion,1 00
each additional insertion,50

On advertisements standing three months or longer, a discount of twenty per cent. on the above rates is allowed.

(A column counts as seven squares.)

Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 School St.

DWIGHT'S Journal of Music.

A Paper of Art and Literature.

VOL. III.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 13, 1853.

NO. 19.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

TERMS....TWO DOLLARS PER ANNUM, (IN ADVANCE.)

CITY Subscribers can be served at their houses by the further payment of fifty cents per annum.

For Rates of Advertising, see last page.

POSTAGE, if paid in advance, for any distance within the State, thirteen cents a year; if not in advance, twenty-six cents. To all places beyond the State, double these rates.

J. S. DWIGHT,.....EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St.

By REDDING & CO., 8 State St.

GEO. P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row.

A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.

DENTER & BROTHERS, 43 Ann Street, N. Y.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 722 Broadway, N. Y.

MASON BROTHERS, 23 Park Row, New York.

GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.

G. ANDRE, 229 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St., Balt.

COLBURN & FIELD, Cincinnati, O.

HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Persons willing to become Agents for procuring subscribers, especially Music-Dealers and Teachers, are invited to correspond with the Editor, as above. Satisfactory references required, and liberal commissions allowed.

Back numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Also bound copies of Vols I. and II. at prices varying from $2.50 to $3.50.

Translated for this Journal.

Mendelssohn at Rome and at Leipzig.

By HECTOR BERLIOZ.

[Berlioz, in his "Musical Tour in Germany," describes his first visit to Leipzig in a letter to his friend Stephen Heller. This was in 1843, when he met Mendelssohn for the second time; and on this occasion he recalls their first youthful acquaintance at Rome in 1831. We translate a portion of the letter.]

On quitting Weimar, the musical city which I could most easily visit, was Leipzig. Yet I hesitated about presenting myself there, in spite of the dictatorship with which Mendelssohn was there invested, and of the friendly relations that united us at Rome, in 1831. We had followed since this epoch two such diverging lines in Art, that I confess I feared I should not find very lively sympathies in him. Chélaré, who knew him, made me blush at my doubt, and I wrote to him. I had not to wait long for an answer; here it is:

"MY DEAR BERLIOZ:—I thank you heartily for your good letter, and for your still cherishing the memory of our Roman friendship! As for me, I never shall forget it, and I rejoice that I shall soon be able to tell you so viva voce. All that I can do to render your sojourn at Leipzig happy and agreeable, I shall do as a pleasure and as a duty. I think I can assure you that you will be contented with the city, that is to say, with the musicians and the public. I was not willing to write you without consulting several persons who knew Leipzig better than I do, and they have all confirmed me in the opinion that you will make here an excellent concert. The expenses of orchestra, hall, announcements, &c., are about 110 crowns: the receipts may amount to from 600 to 800 crowns. You ought to be here to fix the programme, and whatever else is necessary, at least ten days beforehand. Furthermore, the directors of the Society of Subscription Concerts charge me to ask you if you are willing to have one of your works performed in the concert to be given on the 22d of February, for the benefit of the poor of the city. I hope you will accept their proposition after the concert which you shall have given on your own account. I beg you, then, to come here as soon as you can leave Weimar. I rejoice that I shall be able to clasp your hand and bid you 'welcome' in Germany. Do not laugh at my bad French, as you did at Rome, but continue to be my good friend, as you were then, and as I shall ever be your devoted

"FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTOLDY."

Could I resist an invitation couched in such terms? . . . I set out for Leipzig, not without regretting Weimar and the new friends I left there. My connection with Mendelssohn had commenced at Rome in rather an odd fashion. At our first interview he spoke to me of my Cantata of "Sardanapalus," which had been crowned at the Institute of Paris, and of which my co-laureate, Montfort, had let him hear some portions. When I myself manifested to him a real aversion to the first Allegro of the said Cantata: "Yes, yes," exclaimed he, full of joy, "I make you my compliment . . . upon your taste! I feared that you would not be contented with that Allegro; frankly, it is quite miserable!" We came near quarreling the next day because I had spoken with enthusiasm of Gluck, and he replied to me in a tone of raillery and surprise: "Ah! you love Gluck!"—as much as to say: "How can a musician, such as you seem to me to be, have enough elevation in his ideas, or a lively sentiment enough of grandeur of style and truth of expression, to love Gluck!" I soon had an opportunity to avenge myself on this little taunt. I had brought from Paris the air of Asteria in the Italian opera Telemaco; an admirable morceau, but little known. I placed on Montfort's piano a manuscript copy of this, without the name of the author, one day when we were expecting a visit from Mendelssohn. He came; seeing this music, which he took to be a fragment of some modern Italian opera, he set himself at work as a matter of duty to execute it, and at the four last measures, at the words: O giorno! O dolce squardi! O rimembranza! O amor!, whose musical accent is truly sublime, as he parodied them in a grotesque fashion, counterfeiting Rubini, I stopped him. and with a confused air of astonishment, I said:

"Ah! you don't love Gluck!"

"How! Gluck!"

"Alas! yes, my dear, this piece is his and not Bellini's, as you thought. You see that I am of your opinion . . . more so than yourself!"

He never pronounced the name of Sebastian Bach without ironically adding: "your little pupil!" In short, he was a very poreupine, whenever there was talk of music; one knew not on what side to take him to avoid getting wounded. Endowed with an excellent character, with a sweet and charming humor, he easily bore contradiction upon everything else, and I in my turn abused his tolerance in the philosophical and religious discussions which we sometimes raised.

One evening, we were exploring together the baths of Caracalla, debating the question of the merit or demerit of human actions and their remuneration during this life. As I replied with some enormity, I knew not what, to his entirely religious and orthodox opinions, his foot slipped, and down he rolled, with many scratches and contusions, in the ruins of a very hard staircase. "Admire the divine justice," said I, helping him to rise; "it is I who blaspheme, and it is you who fall!" This impiety, accompanied with peals of laughter, appeared to him too much, it seemed, and from that time religious discussions were always avoided.

It was at Rome that I for the first time appreciated that delicate and fine musical tissue, variegated with such rich colors, which bears the name: "Overture to Fingal's Cave" (Die Hebriden). Mendelssohn had just finished it, and he gave me a pretty exact idea of it; such is his prodigious skill in rendering on the piano the most complicated scores. Often, on days that weighed one down with the sirocco, I went to interrupt him in his labors (for he was an indefatigable producer); then he would lay down the pen with a very good grace, and, seeing me all swollen with spleen, he would seek to mitigate it by playing to me what I designated among the works of masters whom we both loved. How many times, suddenly stretched upon his sofa, I have sung the air from "Iphigenia in Tauris": D'une image, hélas! trop chérie, which he accompanied, decently seated before his piano. And he cried out: "That is beautiful! beautiful! I could hear it from morning to night, always, always!" And we recommenced. He was very fond also of making me murmur, with my constrained voice and in that horizontal position, two or three melodies which I had written to verses of Moore, and which pleased him. Mendelssohn has always had a great esteem for my . . . chansonnettes. After a month of such intercourse, which had finished with becoming so full of interest for me, Mendelssohn disappeared without bidding me adieu, and I saw him not again. Consequently his letter, which I have just quoted, must have caused me a very agreeable surprise. It seemed to reveal in him a kindness of heart, an amenity of manners, which I had not known in him: I was not slow to recognize, upon arriving in Leipsic, that these excellent qualities were actually his. He has lost nothing at all of the inflexible rigor of his principles of Art; but he does not seek to impose them on you violently, and he limits himself, in the exercise of his functions as chapel-master, to exhibiting what he judges beautiful, and leaving in the shade what seems to him bad or of a pernicious example. Only he is always a little too partial to the dead.

The Society of Subscription Concerts, of which he had spoken to me, is very numerous and could not be better composed; it possesses a magnificent Academy of Singing, an excellent orchestra and a hall, that of the Gewandhaus, of a perfect sonority. It was in this vast and beautiful place that I was to give my concert. I went to see it as soon as I got out of the carriage; and I happened there precisely in the midst of the general rehearsal of a new work of Mendelssohn (the "Walpurgis Night.") I was marvellously struck at the outset by the beautiful timbre of the voices, by the intelligence of the singers, the precision and verve of the orchestra, and above all by the splendor of the composition. I am strongly inclined to regard this species of oratorio (La Nuit du Sabbat) as the most finished thing that Mendelssohn has produced to this day. The poem is Goethe's, and has nothing in common with the scene of the witches' sabbath in "Faust." It is founded on the nocturnal assemblies held on the mountains, in the first days of Christianity, by a religious sect faithful to the ancient customs, at a time when sacrifices upon the high places had been interdicted. Their custom was, during the nights destined to the holy work, to station in the mountain passes a great number of armed sentinels, covered with strange disguises. At a given signal, and when the priest ascending to the altar intoned the sacred hymn, this troop, of diabolical aspect, brandishing their pitchforks and their torches with a frightful air, set up all sorts of noises and terrific cries, to cover the voices of the religious choir and to frighten the profane ones who might be tempted to interrupt the ceremony. From this, no doubt, has sprung the custom in the French language of using the word sabbath as synonymous with a great noise at night. One must hear Mendelssohn's music to have an idea of the varied resources which this poem offered to an able composer. He has turned it to admirable account. His score is of a perfect clearness, in spite of its complexity; the vocal and instrumental effects cross, contradict, and jostle each other in every way, with an apparent disorder which is the height of art. I will cite especially, as magnificent things in two opposite genera, the mysterious piece of the placing of the sentinels, and the final chorus, where the voice of the priest rises at intervals, calm and pious, above the infernal fracas of the troop of quasi sorcerers and demons. One knows not which to praise most in this finale: the orchestra, or the chorus, or the whirlwind movement of the whole! It is a masterpiece!

At the moment when Mendelssohn, full of joy at having produced it, came down from the desk, I advanced, in raptures at having heard it. The moment for such a meeting could not have been better chosen; and yet, after exchanging the first words, the same sad thought struck us both simultaneously:

"How! it is twelve years! twelve years! since we dreamed together in the Campagna at Rome!"

"Yes, and in the baths of Caracalla!"

"Oh! always a mocker! always ready to laugh!"

"No, no, I rail no more; it was to try your memory and see if you had pardoned me my impieties. So little am I disposed to raillery, that now, from our first interview, I am going to beg you very seriously to make me a bequest to which I attach the greatest value."

"What may it be?"

"Give me the bâton, with which you have just conducted the rehearsal of your new work."

"Oh! very willingly, on condition that you will send me yours."

"I should then be giving brass for gold; no matter, I consent."

And so the musical sceptre of Mendelssohn was brought to me. The next day, I sent him my heavy oak stick, with the following note, which, I trust, the "Last of the Mohicans" would not have disdained:

"To Chief MENDELSSOHN!—

"Great Chief! We have promised to exchange our tomahawks; here is mine! It is larger, thine is simple; only the squaws and the pale faces love ornamented weapons. Be my brother! and when the Great Spirit shall have sent us to hunt in the land of spirits, may our warriors hang up our tomahawks together in the hall of council."

Such is, in all its simplicity, the fact, which an innocent malice has wished to render ridiculously dramatic. Mendelssohn, when it came to the matter of organizing my concert, a few days after, really acted like a brother in my behalf. The first artist whom he presented to me as his fidus Achates, was the concert-master David, an eminent musician, a composer of merit and a distinguished violinist. David, who moreover speaks French perfectly, was of great service to me.

(Conclusion next week.)

STIRRING THE FIRE IN TIME.—A gentleman at a musical party, where the lady was very particular not to have the concert of sweet sounds interrupted, was freezing during the performance of a long concert piece, and seeing that the fire was going out, asked a friend in a whisper:—"How he should stir the fire without interrupting the music?" "Between the bars," replied his friend.

GRÉTRY.

The composer of the music of "Richard Cœur de Lion," was born at Liege, a well-known town in Westphalia, in the year 1741. At an early age he became sensible to the charms of music, and, to this sensibility, when he was only four years old, he was near falling a sacrifice. It is related of him, that being left alone in a room where some water was boiling in an iron pot over a wood fire, the sound caught his ear, and for some time he amused himself by dancing to it. The curiosity of the child, however, at length prompted him to uncover the vessel, and in so doing he overset it; the water fell upon and dreadfully scalded him from head to foot. From the care and attention that were paid to him by his parents and medical attendant, he at length recovered in every respect from this accident, except having a weakness of sight, which continued ever afterwards. When he was six years old his father (a teacher of music) placed him in the choir of the collegiate church of St. Denis, and unfortunately, but necessarily, under the tuition of a master who was brutal and inhuman to all his pupils. Young Grétry had his full share of ill-treatment; yet such was his attachment to this man, that he never could prevail upon himself to disclose it to his father, fearing that by his influence the chapter might be induced to take some steps that would be injurious to him. An accident, which for a time put a stop to his studies, deserves to be related here. It was usual at Liege to tell children that God will grant to them whatever they ask of him at their first communion: young Grétry had long proposed to pray on that occasion that he might immediately die if he were not destined to be an honest man, and a man of eminence in his profession. On that very day, having gone to the top of the tower to see the men strike the wooden bells which are always used during the Passion week, a beam of considerable weight fell on his head, and laid him senseless upon the floor. A person who was present ran for the extreme unction; but on his return he found the youth upon his legs. On being shown the heavy log that had fallen upon him,—"Well, well," he exclaimed, "since I am not killed, I am now sure that I shall be an honest man and a good musician." He did not at first appear to have sustained any serious injury, but his mouth was full of blood, and the next day a depression of the cranium was discovered; on which, however, no operation was attempted, and which was suffered to continue. From this time, but whether owing to the accident or not, it is not known, his disposition was considerably altered. His former gaiety gave way in a great measure to sadness, and never afterwards returned, except at intervals. On his return to the choir he acquitted himself by no means to the satisfaction of his father, who for a time withdrew him for the purpose of his receiving further instruction. He was now placed under the care of a master as mild as the other had been severe. When his father replaced him in the choir, his improvement both in singing and playing was found to have been very great. The first time he sang in the choir, the orchestra, delighted with his voice, and fearing to lose the sound of it, was reduced to the pianissimo; the children of the choir around him drew back from respect; almost all the canons left their seats, and were deaf to the bell that announced the elevation of the Host. All the chapter, all the city, all the actors of the Italian Theatre applauded him; and the savage master himself took him by the hand, and told him that he would become a musician of great eminence.

Some little time afterwards his voice began to break. It would then have been prudent to have forbidden his singing; but this not being done, a spitting of blood was brought on, to which, on any exertion, he was ever afterwards subject. Not long subsequently to this he was placed under the care of Moreau; but such was the exuberance of his genius, that he had previously attempted several of the most complicated kinds of music. "I composed six symphonies," says Grétry, "which were successfully executed in our city. M. Hasler, the canon, begged me to let him carry them to the concert. He encouraged me greatly, advised me to go to Rome in order to pursue my studies, and offered me his purse. My master in composition thought this little success would be mischievous to me, and prevent me from pursuing that regular course of study so necessary to my becoming a sound contrapuntist. He never mentioned my symphonies." Grétry walked to Rome in the early part of 1759, being then only eighteen years of age. Here, in order that his genius might be as much unfettered as possible, he studied under several masters, and he almost every day visited the churches in order to hear the music of Casali, Eurisecchio, and Lustrini, but particularly that of the former, with which he was greatly delighted. The ardour with which he pursued his studies was so great, that it suffered him to pay but little attention to his health. This consequently became much impaired, and he was obliged for a while to leave Rome and retire into the country. One day, on Mount Millini, he met a hermit, who gave him an invitation to his retreat, which he accepted, and he became his inmate and companion for three months. He returned to Rome, and, young as he then was, he distinguished himself by the composition of an intermezzo, entitled "Le vendémiaire." His success was so decisive that he was very near suffering fatally from the jealousy of a rival in his profession.

Admired and courted in the capital of Italy, Grétry here continued his labors and his studies with assiduity and perseverance, till Mr. Mellon, a gentleman in the suite of the French ambassador, incited in him a desire to visit Paris. In his way to that city in the year 1767, he stopped at Geneva, and there composed his first French opera of "Isabelle et Gertrude." Respecting the performance of this work he relates an amusing anecdote. "One of the performers in the orchestra, a dancing-master, came to me in the morning previously to the representation, to inform me that some young people intended to call for me on the stage with acclamation at the end of the piece, in the same manner as at Paris. I told him I had never seen that done in Italy. 'You will, however, see it here,' says he, 'and you will be the first composer who has received this honor in our republic.' It was in vain for me to dispute the point; he would absolutely teach me the bow that I was to make with a proper grace. As soon as the opera was finished they called for me sure enough, and with great vehemence, I was obliged to appear to thank the audience for their indulgence; but my friend in the orchestra cried out aloud, 'Poh! that is not it!—not at all!—but get along!'—'What's the matter?' asked his brethren in the orchestra. 'I am out of all patience,' said the dancing-master. 'I went to his lodgings this morning, on purpose to show him how to present himself nobly; and did you ever see such an awkward booby?' It was some time before Grétry could obtain in Paris a piece to compose; and he was first introduced to public notice there, in 1768, by writing the music to Marmontel's opera "Le Huon." This met with the most flattering success. The opera of "Lucile" followed, which was even more successful. His fame was now established in France, and he produced near thirty comic operas for the great opera house in Paris. Of these "Zemire et Azor," and "Richard Cœur de Lion," have been translated and successfully brought on the English stage. The taste of the Parisians tended greatly to corrupt that of Grétry; but he has done much towards improving theirs: they have met about half way; and perhaps the genius of the French language, the style of singing, and the national prejudices, even if he had determined to continue inflexible, could not have admitted of a nearer approximation than we find in his music. Sacchini has been known to say of Grétry, that he remembered him at Naples, where he regarded him as a young man of great genius, who wrote as much in the style of that school as even any of the Italian masters; but that when he heard his comic opera at Paris, many years afterwards, he did not find that his style had much improved by composing to French words and for French singers. Grétry, during the times of anarchy in France, became tainted with revolutionary principles: he went so far as to publish a work on the subject of religion, intitled, "De la vérité de ce que nous fumes, ce que nous sommes, et ce que nous devons être," which shows him also to have been deeply tinctured with infidelity. He died at Montmorency on the 24th of September, 1813.

The Gondolier's Song.

From "Venice," by EDMOND FLAGG.

The voices of the gondoliers are more remarkable for strength than for sweetness—for power than melody: yet, at night, in the open air, at a distance, on the Lagune, the Giudecca, or the Grand Canal, singly or accompanied by half a dozen other voices, nothing can be more delightful than the song of the Venetian gondolier. "Idle and alone in his barque, awaiting his company, or his fare, he abbreviates the night and breaks the silence of the Lagune. Solitary in the heart of a crowded city, he sends his voice over the tranquil mirror; and the sleepy canals, the calm of the heaven, the splendor of the moon, the shadows of the lofty palaces prolonged on the water, the distant moaning of the Adriatic, the noiseless gliding of the sable gondolas, which move like spirits hither and thither—no rattling of wheels, no echo of footsteps, only the fitful and unfrequent plash of an oar—all these circumstances impart an indescribable charm to these world-renowned melodies." The wives and children of the fishermen of the Adriatic are said, at nightfall, to go down to the sea-shore of the Chioggia, Malamocco, Pelestrina, and the Lido, and shout their well-known and not unmusical songs, until each can distinguish in the distance, through the twilight, over the waves, the husband's and father's peculiar response. A like custom is said to prevail in the Tyrol.

But nowhere is the "Gondolier's Song" so indescribably charming as on the Grand Canal of a moonlight midsummer night. This is the great salon musicale of Venice; and, upon principles of acoustics, is admirably calculated to heighten harmonious effect. The silence of the night, the gondola gliding noiselessly over a waveless surface which acts like a harmonic mirror on the voice; the facades of marble palaces on either side, with their overhanging balconies, their open portals, their endless halls and galleries, and their leafy gardens beyond, augmenting without echo, the intensity of the sounds, all concur to aid effect. At midnight you stand on the Pergola of the Palazzo Buzinello, opposite the Posta, the ancient Palazzo Grimani. You hear the accord of distant voices rising on the still night. A choir of gondoliers in their barques are slowly ascending from the Molo, half a mile below, and singing "La Biondina," as they advance. The voices are full and round, the harmony perfect—air, tenor, bass, counter—every part is complete. The moon is riding high over the slumbering city in a cloudless sky—the marble piles are throwing their deep shadows over the slumbering canal; the trabaccoli, lying at anchor, seen slumbering, too. Nearer—nearer—nearer—by a crescendo which no art can match, the barque and the barcarola approach: louder and louder rise the notes on the ear, until, at length, beneath your balcony, the song has attained its fortissimo. It passes—the rougher sounds soften—they lessen—they lessen, as the barque ascends. At length it is beneath the Rialto arch, which, for a moment with its echoes, augments and rounds the air. It passes on—it turns the winding of the stream—it dies away—it is dead—it is gone! You hear no more; but you listen still; you listen—hushed—entranced—your very soul absorbed in the departed harmony. You draw a long breath—you speak to the friend at your side—your voice sounds to you harsh—you relapse into silence; and for hours after, those sweet melodies play like a rapture around your heart. And your thoughts, your dreaming fancies—they are far, far away—away from fair Venice, away from Italy, away from the grand Old World, away over the wide, wild ocean—away—at your home! Who that has listened to the moonlight, midnight serenade of the Venetian gondolier, can, while his life lasts, forget?"

A Novel Violin.

[The N. Y. Mirror thus describes an arrangement called "Robertson's Keyed Stop Violin," at the Crystal Palace:]

This is a new and excellent arrangement, consisting of a finger-board made of ebony, with thirty-three stops, called key stops, which stand above the strings, projecting one-sixteenth of an inch, and acting upon them perpendicularly; which must be admitted by all who know anything of the instrument to be a great desideratum. The violin is universally conceded to be the king of all instruments, and the very simplicity of its construction makes its mastery a matter of the utmost difficulty.

A beginner finds it almost impossible to hit with his finger the exact place upon the string to produce the proper note. Formerly this could only be attained by long practice, coupled even then with a correct musical ear and a sound judgment; now, thanks to this ingenious and simple contrivance, it is impossible to produce a false note, and the progress of the player is so greatly facilitated, that the study of the instrument, and its practice, are pleasant and easy.

The performer does not bother his brains about the scale—this does not exist in his mind at all as formerly it did, but is brought out to view at a glance, and the execution becomes purely mechanical. The tone of the instrument is not sacrificed a particle, and the most critical could not detect without the aid of the eye, whether this stop-board was on or off of any instrument. This board may easily be attached to any violin, and may be removed at pleasure.

This scale is laid out by ear, by the Harmonics and by a correct mathematical rule, which enables a new beginner, no matter how unpractised or unmusical his ear, to play the tune without producing those discordant sounds that always make us anathematize the practising of tyros upon this instrument. We are told that Spohr, of Germany, the greatest teacher of the age, fingers the violin upon the scale adopted by this inventor. They are manufactured at 181 Broadway, at a price ($10 and upwards) that places them within the reach of all.

Spohr in England.

The London Musical World, of July 16, has the following:

We are informed that Dr. Spohr will not remain in London to conduct the opera of Jessonda, at the Royal Italian Opera. The presence of the illustrious composer being demanded at home, it is, we believe, his intention to start on Wednesday next for Cassel.

Since his arrival in London, Dr. Spohr has been reviving old and achieving new artistic triumphs. On the day of his coming he attended the Quartet Association of MM. Santon, Cooper, and Patti, where he heard a very fine performance of his Nonetto for stringed and wind instruments. At the eighth concert of the Old Philharmonic Society, his Historical Symphony (in G, No. 6) was given. On both occasions, being recognised among the audience, Dr. Spohr was compelled to rise from his place to receive their felicitations. At the fifth concert of the New Philharmonic Society, the performance of his "Concert-Overture," and the overture to Jessonda, and at the last the execution of his Quartet with orchestral accompaniments, the Symphony for two orchestras, and the overture to Der Berggeist, under his own direction, added new laurels to the brow of the great musician. Again, at the closing séance of Mr. Ella's Musical Union, a new sesteto in C major, for stringed instruments, was produced—a work which, while showing all the experience of age, displays in an astonishing degree that freshness and spontaneity which are supposed only to belong to youth. One of the last chamber productions of Dr. Spohr, this sestet is equally one of the finest and most captivating of them all.

In private circles the illustrious composer has been fêted as usual. At his own house he has received his friends, and made them acquainted with some new quartets of his own composition. His activity is remarkable, and his vigor and artistic enthusiasm are as extraordinary as though forty instead of seventy had numbered the winters of his life. Last night, Dr. Spohr was received at the Réunion des Arts, where a programme, containing much of his own music, was performed in his honor. The fine quintet in G began the concert, Dr. Spohr (in consequence of the indisposition of Herr Molique, who was to have led it) himself filling the first violin. Every one present paid homage to the great composer, who bore the honor lavished upon him with his usual calm and modest dignity.

It is said that Dr. Spohr considers this his last visit to England. Not so we hope. His occasional appearance among us is indispensable to put fresh blood into the veins of our musicians. The example of such a man is precious, and his personal presence gives it immediate weight and consequence.

MUSIC.—Let taste and skill in this beautiful art be spread among us, and every family will have a new resource. Home will gain a new attraction. Social intercourse will be more cheerful, and an innocent public amusement will be furnished to the community. Public amusements, bringing multitudes together to kindle with one emotion, to share the same innocent joy, have a humanizing influence; and among these bonds of society perhaps no one produces so much unmixed good as music. What a fulness of enjoyment has our Creator placed within our reach, by surrounding us with an atmosphere which may be shaped into sweet sounds! And yet this goodness is almost lost upon us, through want of culture of the organ by which this provision is to be enjoyed.—Dr. Channing on Temperance.

A Musical Parson.

Dr. Ford, the rector of Melton, England, was an enthusiast in music, very singular in his manner, and a great humorist. His passion for sacred music was publicly known from his constant attendance at most of the musical festivals in the kingdom. One who knew him says, "I have frequently met him, and always found him in ecstasies with Handel's music, especially 'The Messiah.' His admiration of this work was carried to such an excess, that he told me he never made a journey from Melton to Leicester, that he did not sing it quite through. His performance served as a pedometer by which he could ascertain his progress on the road. As soon as he had crossed Melton bridge he began the overtures, and always found himself in the chorus 'Lift up your heads,' when he arrived at Brooksby gate, 'Thanks be to God' the moment he got through the Thurmasten toll gate. As the pace of his horse was pretty regular, he contrived to conclude the Amen chorus always at the cross in the Belgrave gate. Though a very pious person, eccentricity was at times not restrained even in the pulpit. It need not be stated that he had a pretty good opinion of his own vocal powers. Once, when the clerk was giving out the tune, he stopped him, saying, 'John, you have pitched too low—follow me;' then clearing up his voice, he lustily began the tune. When the psalmody went to his mind, he enjoyed it, and in paroxysms of delight, would dangle one or both of his legs over the side of the pulpit during the singing. When preaching a charity sermon at Melton, some gentlemen of the hunt entered the church rather late. He stopped, and cried out, 'Here they come; here come the red coats; they know their Christian duties. There is not a man among them that is not good for a guinea!' The doctor was himself a performer. I think it was at the Birmingham festival that he was sitting with his book upon his knee, humming music to the performers, to the great annoyance of an attentive listener, who said, 'I did not pay to hear you sing.' 'Then,' said the doctor, "you have that into the bargain."

When a true genius appears, all the dunces are leagued against him.

TO A WILD FLOWER.

[We find this beautiful little poem in a volume entitled Poetical Aspirations, by William Anderson. That a poet who can write such things, should be so little known, is a strong signification of the difficulty which characterizes the present age, with all its advantages, of attaining almost any degree of literary celebrity.—Chambers' Pocket Miscellany.]

In what delightful land,
Sweet-scented flower, did'st thou attain thy birth?
Thou art no offspring of the common earth,
By common breezes fanned.

Full oft my gladdened eye
In pleasant glade or river's marge has traced
(As if there planted by the hand of taste)
Sweet flowers of every dye.

But never did I see,
In mead or mountain, or domestic bower,
'Mong many a lovely and delicious flower,
One half so fair as thee!

Thy beauty makes rejoice
My inmost heart. I know not how 'tis so—
Quick coming fancies thou dost make me know,
For fragrance is thy voice.

And still it comes to me,
In quiet night, and turmoil of the day,
Like memory of friends gone far away,
Or, haply, ceased to be.

Together we'll commune,
As lovers do, when, standing all apart,
No one o'erhears the whispers of the heart,
Save the all-silent moon.

Thy thoughts I can divine,
Although not uttered in vernacular words;
Thou me remind'st of songs of forest birds;
Of venerable wine;

Of earth's fresh shrubs and roots;
Of summer days, when men their thirsting slake
In the cool fountain or the cooler lake,
While eating wood-grown fruits.

Thy leaves my memory tell
Of sights and scents, and sounds that come again,
Like ocean's murmurs, when the balmy strain
Is echoed in its shell.

The meadows in their green,
Smooth-running waters in the far-off ways,
The deep-voiced forest, where the hermit prays,
In thy fair face are seen.

Thy home is in the wild,
'Mong sylvan shades, near music-haunted springs,
Where peace dwells all apart from earthly things,
Like some secluded child.

The beauty of the sky,
The music of the woods, the love that stirs
Wherever nature charms her worshippers,
Are all by thee brought nigh.

I shall not soon forget
What thou hast taught me in thy solitude;
My feelings have acquired a taste of good,
Sweet flower! since first we met.

Thou bring'st unto the soul
A blessing and a peace, inspiring thought;
And dost the goodness and the power denote
Of Him who formed the whole.

Whistling a Psalm-Tune.

[From 'The Church-Goer,' published in the Mass. Life-Boat.]

We were, some years ago, paying a visit in Devonshire, England, and of course on the Sunday accompanied our friends to their parish church. It was one of those sweet rural places which it does one's heart good to go to; the ancient ivy-clad tower rose from amidst its multitude of surrounding graves, on which, as we passed towards the porch, sat the villagers, chatting on various topics. It was what is called Palm, or Flowering Sunday, and according to immemorial custom, every grave in that country churchyard was covered with flowers. We shall not, however, attempt to describe minutely the scene which ensued on the Paason's arrival, nor tell how, as he passed down the churchyard walk, with his rusty cassock flying in the breeze, his sermon-book in one hand, and a huge clasped prayer-book under his arm, he with his right hand stroked the heads of the children near him, or courteously lifted his shovel hat, in acknowledgement of the bows of aged folk; nor how we observed a pale, consumptive-looking girl sitting on a tomb, (appropriate resting place for her) supported by her grandmother, watching, with large, hopeful, languid eye, for a smile from the good man whom she knew she should not hear many times more; nor how young bumpkins, with buxom girls on their arms, pulled front locks with their big fist, and blushed stupidly; nor, when we entered the sacred building and the service commenced, how the church was decorated with evergreens; nor how the ambitious choir, consisting of a bass viol, two fiddles, (neither of them being a Stradivarius nor a Cremona,) a reedy sounding clarionet, (it had been bought at a great bargain at a pawn shop in the neighboring town,) a bassoon, and a fife, executed "Awake my soul, and with the sun," in a very extraordinary style and manner; nor how all the little charity children in the gallery bawled prodigiously, nor how the cracked voices of the alms-house people quavered at the end of every verse, long after the other people had done singing, to the great indignation of the red-nosed beadle, who looked at the poor old creatures as if they had not souls worthy of singing at all when the Squire was present. We merely supply the outlines, the reader's imagination will readily fill them up.

One of the psalms of the day was written in a peculiarly "peculiar metre," or "perculer," as the clerk pronounced it; and, unfortunately, neither the fiddles, nor the bassoon, nor the clarinet, nor the fife, could for the life of them fit a tune to it; but we will do them the justice to say, that they did the best in their power to suit it, by mixing "long, short, and common metre" tunes together very ingeniously. They tried many ways, and very often—sometimes they would proceed very pleasantly through a few bars; first the bassoon would grumble discordantly,—then the fife would stop playing, although the violins fiddled away most perseveringly. In a little time the clarinet would wander away into a wilderness of sounds, lose itself and die in the distance with a feeble quaver, and lastly, a crash of discord would end the matter; and then came a new trial. But all would not do—and so, as a last resource, the old clerk got up, and to our utter astonishment, whistled a tune, which the choir caught cleverly; and the fiddles rejoiced, the clarinet went into ecstasies, the fife flourished wonderfully, the bass viol solemnly sounded—and the church-warden's face brightened up—so did the beadle's; the boys also bawled lustily; and from that time to this Palm Sunday and Whistling Sunday have ever been with us synonymous terms.

Musical Review.

Gems of German Song. Eighth Series.

Messrs. George P. Reed & Co. have issued four numbers of the Eighth Series of their valuable miscellany of German Songs. These are:

1. The Orphan Wanderer, by CURSCHMANN, to whom we have already owed some fine songs. The German words here are not given, which detracts from the complete idea of the "Gems." The English words are tame as poetry, but singable. The melody is a simple, mournful one in F minor, 4-4 measure, the accompaniment broken into arpeggio triplets in the right hand, with firm octaves in the bass. It brightens into the major of the key at the last lines of each verse, where the wanderer sees a ray of light. An easy, pretty song enough, but hardly a gem among so many choice and shining ones as Schubert, Schumann, Franz, and others have produced.

2. A Song is oft the Sigh of Anguish, by C. KREUTZER. Merely English words again, and very tame and prosy ones. The music simple and hardly above the average of the lesser host of German song-writers.

3. To the Sunshine, by SCHUMANN:—O Sonnenschein! O Sonnenschein! The German words are given, with a translation that comes nearer to their meaning than their melody; but they sing easily. The music has a corresponding playful quaintness and is charmingly original. This is a gem.

4. Ah! had I Pinions, by RAHLES. English words only. A simple, pleasing style of Allegretto song, but not enough unlike a thousand others.

Rondo Capriccioso, for the Piano, by MENDELSSOHN. (9 pages.)

Oliver Ditson has done us a good service by the publication of this charming, characteristic fancy of the rare composer. The work is finely conceived and gracefully finished, consisting of a noble and delicately ornate Andante introduction in 4-4, key of E major, followed by one of those airy, fairy minor dances, in light (Presto leggiero) 6-8 measure, which are the genuine and undisputed property of Mendelssohn. Jaell, Dresel and others proved its fascination in last winter's concerts. It is not very difficult, but requires a light, rapid, and unflinching finger.

The Beauties of "Rigoletto," by VERDI.

Under this title Mr. Ditson is publishing a series of twelve numbers of the opera, which has just been exciting attention in Europe. They are arias, ballatas, cavatinas, cabalettas, duettos, &c., arranged with piano accompaniment, and with Italian and English words. This is a copy from a Vienna edition, designed for popular effect, in which the original key is freely altered to suit common voices. Each title-page bears a lithograph representation of the famous quartet scene; also a thematic index to the whole series. The melodies are pretty and Verdianish,—some of them indeed seem like Verdi gone to seed. But of the two already published, the duet: Addio speranza has considerable beauty. The other, a very simple cavatina: "Love is the soul, &c.," is of that taking, sentimental style which always enjoys a large popularity; though it seems to us such a thing as Verdi might in his common-place moods produce by force of habit, rather than to have sprung from any vital inspiration.—It would have made the edition more interesting if to each song had been attached the name of the dramatic character to whom it belongs in the opera: but that might have sadly interfered with the unlimited license of transposition!

Six Celebrated Duets, by MENDELSSOHN.

Published by Reed & Co. That word "celebrated" makes an awkward title; it is too much of the vulgar, show-bill order of announcement for so select a name as Mendelssohn. But we find the true thing when we look inside. The two last numbers of the six are just issued, called "Evening Song" and "The Voyage," with German words by Henri Heine, and a somewhat literal English version. Heine's name, however, is not mentioned, as it ought to be. These duets are simple, in that sweet, dreamy, pensive, wild, old ballad-like vein of melody, which came so native to the composer. They both deserve popularity, and are likely to have it.—The three earlier numbers of the series were published separately some time since, and are here grouped with these which were originally not published with them. They are, "I would that my love;" "Greeting;" and "O wert thou in the cauld blast," in which last Mendelssohn has so fully caught the spirit of the old Scotch melody.

Fine Arts.

The Athenæum Gallery.

The Athenæum exhibition has now been open for some time, and the visitor is well rewarded for an hour spent there. It is, as it seems to us, the best collection that has been exhibited for several years; larger and more tastefully arranged than usual, and including, with the well known pictures so familiar for many years to the visitors of the Athenæum, a very considerable number of works by both ancient and modern artists, never before exhibited here, the property of private individuals, who deserve the grateful thanks of the public for thus liberally making them accessible and visible to all. The importance of the benefit thus conferred cannot be too highly estimated, nor can the good effect on Art and artists be too strongly dwelt upon. We have no princes here, as in the older countries, who can throw open to public inspection the priceless treasures of their galleries,—the accumulation of centuries. We have few or no private collections of works of Art. These luxuries are for the great and the rich alone to possess, and the moderate share of wealth that falls even to the most favored of us, under our institutions, renders it impossible that any individual should have more than a very few treasures of this sort. The best of which most of us are able to boast, is perhaps a choice engraving or two, or a plaster cast of some master-piece of sculpture. We have no Guidos, no Claudes, no Canovas, no Allstons, in our rooms. Yet the love of Art, in some form or other, is universal, and the craving must be satisfied; thus we adopt the democratic fashion of establishing, as best we may, public institutions, such as the Athenæum, (which reflects such honor on the city of Boston), which shall be open to all, at a moderate price, and where all may see such works of ancient and modern Art, the productions of native and foreign genius, as the means of such institutions can collect.

We have princes, too,—our Merchant Princes—(the true prince), whose forethought and liberality long ago founded this Institution, and still maintain it. They scour the whole world in search of gain, and scarce anywhere can you go that you do not come across a Boston merchant; and there are few who come home, bearing their sheaves with them, who do not also bring some picture, some statue, some beautiful memento of foreign lands to ornament their New England homes. Nor need we say that our true prince does not hide his light under a bushel. He does not keep his pictures secluded in his darkened best parlor, all the year round, but here they are, all hanging on the walls of the Athenæum, to be seen by all men. The catalogue is full of the names of our public spirited-citizens who so nobly share their abundance with us all. All honor to them! They have done well, and we trust this spirit will still more prevail, and that we may occasionally see more, in this way, of the treasures that ornament the drawing-rooms of our city.

Our visits to the Athenæum have not been to criticise, but to enjoy, and so, now that we have pen in hand, we will not play the part of critic, but rather of cicerone. There is much in this exhibition of what we want most to see—of American Art. Many names in the history of Art among us are here represented; from the venerated name of ALLSTON, whose great unfinished last work, (like the antique Torso,) attracts irresistibly the attention of the appreciating visitor, down to the very latest of our resident artists who exhibits his first picture. Kensett, Ames, Champney, Wild, Hunt, 'Young America,' are all there, and honorably represented. Of Page we see nothing but the beautiful "Holy Family," full of the promise which late accounts (placing him at the head of modern artists in Rome,) tell us he has amply fulfilled. Has no one a specimen of his later pictures?

Two fine pictures by Leutze are among the chief attractions of this exhibition: "The Landing of the Northmen," and "Columbus' Reception at Barcelona by Ferdinand and Isabella, on his return from his first voyage." These pictures are fine specimens of Leutze's style, and attract universal attention. They are owned by gentlemen of Philadelphia, and have never before been exhibited here. But we have neither the space nor the ability to speak critically of them, but must pass on to the Gallery of Sculpture.

It may be that our great American composers are yet unborn, but it is now no longer asked: "Who reads an American book?" (for nobody reads anything else,) and the transcendent merit of our American Sculptors stands everywhere acknowledged and confessed. And here are fine specimens of all of them. Crawford's "Orpheus," and Brackett's "Shipwrecked Mother," (concerning which a very interesting letter from the late Horatio Greenough will be found in the Catalogue,) are the chief of the larger works of our sculptors; and many fine busts by Greenough, Powers, Clevenger, Crawford, Dexter, R. S. Greenough, and others, are there, doing no small honor to the artists. Our sculptors surely, live, and will live as long as the marble in which they have wrought shall endure. But we must bring this rambling talk to a close, and recommend all who are doomed to pass the sultry summer in the hot city, to spend occasionally, a leisure hour at the Athenæum Gallery.

If you cannot take wing and go to the Falls, the Sea-side or the Crystal Hills, like your more favored neighbor; go and take a refreshing look at the skies, and lakes, and mountains, that our artists have brought down here to your very door. Here is the mountain come down to meet you, O Mahomet! Go and look upon it! You need not look always upon bricks and mortar; here are blue skies, green meadows, and cool, flowing streams, where you may wander in imagination at your pleasure. Italy and New Hampshire are spread out before you. Open your eyes and be glad!

We would also, especially direct the attention of strangers to an Institution which by its Gallery of Fine Arts, and not less by its Library, fills so important and honorable a place among the institutions of our city. W.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUGUST 13, 1853.

Music at the Museum.

It has not been in our power to be present since the re-opening of this little pet theatre of Boston, which has long since acquired the character of affording, in the long run and the year round, the best as well as the cheapest dramatic entertainment, and which, guarantying the absence of many of the old vices of the theatre, has won over many a moral enemy to theatres and actors, and made its spectacles and plays a favorite resort for families with and for the sake of the children. We are told, that, in addition to the annual renaissance of paint and paper, the orchestra has begun to make all vibrate with unmistakable symptoms of new life. Mr. HERMANN ECKHARDT, the successor of Mr. COMER in the directorship, passed the opening ordeal to the satisfaction of all; and by his own spirited compositions (among which we hear of waltzes "worthy of Labitzky," and an overture woven out of national airs with "no small skill of counterpoint") actually inspired the hope of good times coming in the way of popular theatrical music. We can readily believe it, for Mr. Eckhardt is known to us as a good musician from the time that he first appeared among us as conductor of the "Saxonia Band," when he conducted Haydn Symphonies as well as waltzes. Before that, he had formed his artistic ideas and habits in so musical a capital as Dresden, where he played in the orchestra of the Royal theatre and chapel for five years under the celebrated Richard Wagner, and is of course familiar with what is classical, and what is new of note in music.

In the Museum, Mr. Eckhardt is placed, to be sure, over a sphere of light, popular, ad captandum music, where ears uncultivated are to be won, and very listless, roving, careless thoughts pre-occupied. But it is an important sphere to preside over. The Museum, thanks to Mr. Kimball, is essentially the people's and the children's place for imagination-kindling amusement. Amusement it must be first of all, and all its appeals must be exciting, piquant, quickly apprehended, engaging the senses first, and then through them the mind, the heart and even the higher spiritual faculties and aspirations. A vast deal of culture, we all know, may come through amusement. And a well-ordered theatre, if only Art and Taste and Genius preside, instead of the mere mountebank tact and talent for clap-trap, combines all the means for infusing fine artistic culture in the shape of mere amusement.

What might not be made of those fairy spectacles which have enjoyed such popularity at the Museum. Suppose that, instead of the harrowing martyrdom of a "Jewess," and such feasts of horrors, enuring the delicate moral palate to most questionable mustard and red pepper, we could have something as fine and as instinct with genius, as the "Midsummer Night's Dream" represented on the stage, with the young Felix Mendelssohn's felicitous, congenial music! Something far short of that, even, were a consummation devoutly to be wished for. We are glad to learn that Mr. Eckhardt has had experience in the art of arranging musical spectacles, in which our friend COMER has long been so serviceable.

It is from this point of view that we regard it as a fact worth notice that an artist takes the lead of the Museum orchestra. Why shall it not lead by due degrees to the building up and making permanent there a really fine orchestra. There is nothing like an orchestra for giving people an idea, a sense of real music. And there is no place in Boston, (if we except the churches and the streets most paraded through by military bands,) where the people, the masses, especially the rising generation, get their ideas of music formed so much as at the Museum. Think of the responsibility of that. Mr. Kimball! think what an opportunity! Can a public-spirited, philanthropic manager be willing to have humdrum, empty, mere foot-lifting music in his theatre, when he is able to have good. But of that ability of course we are not the judge. We simply throw out a hint of what may be done in raising and refining popular taste in places and through instrumentalities which have already won and for a long time held the prestige of popularity.

The Prelude.

We translate the following from the first part of a critique, in the Gazette Musicale, on the "Twenty-four Preludes" of Stephen Heller, already noticed in this Journal.

"The Prelude is a form given by nature, and of which Art has no right to take possession save on the condition of leaving it that character of liberty, of spontaneity, of audacity, which must ever remind us of its origin. One prelude in all things and for all things: but in music alone have the great masters adopted the prelude into the order of regular things, under the semblance of an absolute independence; and this is what constitutes the real difficulty of the genus. There are fixed points in the concerto, in the sonata, just as there are in a sermon: with a little practice and a little savoir faire, these fixed, conventional formulas, so far from cramping one, become a support. The prelude lives only by the idea, the sentiment that there is in it, and as it does not live a long time, it is bound to produce its effect forthwith. It has not the resource of long developments, or charmingly contrived returns; it has only the aid of surprise. We can always dispense with it: which is one more reason why it should carry the vote at once and justify its usefulness by pleasure.

"In our days, when there is such exploitation of all sorts of means, when lassitude is fashionable, especially among critics, it has often happened to me to read judgments upon dramatic works, expressed as follows: 'This piece pleases me, precisely because it is not a piece.' Might we not say also of such or such a prelude: 'This piece pleases me because it is not a piece.' But if it is not a piece, it should be something which gives us the desire for one, which opens at some corner the perspective of one, which inspires occasionally a regret that the author has stopped in so beautiful a road and so soon, as in a conversation interrupted at the most interesting point.

"I do not profess to write the theory of the prelude, but I could not help saying what has come into my mind on hearing and reading the charming collection which Stephen Heller has just published. It is in studying his fine and delicious compositions that the rules of the genus have appeared to me, and that, following the example of makers of an Ars Poetica, from Aristotle down, I have deduced the principle from the fact. All the natural conditions of the prelude, Stephen seems to me to have realized. I will say more: If Stephen Heller had not composed preludes, he would have violated one of the essential laws of his destiny and his vocation. By temperament, by taste, by instinctive and reflective tendency, he belongs to that class of minds, who, without precisely having a fear of long works, love much better to gather the flower of a matter, than to exhaust it. He is the sworn enemy of those people who incrust themselves in a happy word and never let it go before they have made a silly common-place of it. Music also has its happy words; and it is a fault, alas! too common, to spoil them by wanting to exaggerate and prolong their impression.

"In the twenty-four preludes of Stephen Heller are found some, like the first, for example, which are less than a page in length: the longest are three pages, and most of them are only two. Each is distinguished by its movement, its color, and all together offer the merit of an extreme variety. I doubt not that their places have been marked with care in the collection, while at the same time chance may not have passed for nothing. It is a powerful attraction, that of contrast, and Stephen has known how to secure it very skilfully. To those who are not acquainted with his style or works, I should in vain attempt to convey a comprehension of what there is truly superior and exquisite in this suite of little pieces, some sad and dreamy, but with an amiable sadness and spiritual dreaminess; others impetuous, impassioned, but with a passion which has nothing brutal nor savage. Fortunately, the talent of Stephen Heller enjoys so large a popularity in France, in Germany, in England, that I may dispense with any definition. In his preludes, as in all his previous productions, he has written not a phrase, a note without knowing why. Nothing escapes him that is insignificant, indifferet, vague. It is always the tradition of the immortal Haydn, the master of masters in the art of writing with distinctness and with spirit. It is always a music with which the mind is satisfied, at the same time that the ear is seduced and charmed."

The Chimes of Lancashire.

(Extract from a private letter.)

ADELPHI HOTEL, LIVERPOOL, }
Tuesday, July 19, 1853. }

We arrived in the noble, broad river Mersey, the harbor of this great city, Sunday morning about six o'clock, and in two hours more were passed through the Custom House without trouble, and were seated at breakfast in the charming, quiet coffee-room (just like the Albion), in which I now write.

Now let me tell you, my delights began. Hearing a most musical sound swelling on the air above the noise of the carriages in the street, I asked the waiter, (a clergyman, as the Americans call them, for all the waiters here dress in black, with white cravats.) "Is that a chime?" "Yes sir," said he, "it's the chime of old St. Peter's Church, sir, close by, sir, in the next street, sir, Bold Street, sir, opposite and turn to the first right, sir." Leaving my breakfast half finished, I had seized my hat, and was at the hall door before he had concluded his information. Guided by the sound, I found the queer old tower, and soon groped my way up a narrow stone staircase, to the ringer's chamber. Ten men, mostly old men, were all lustily pulling at the ropes, and I sat with them half an hour. Lancashire is the head-quarters of bell-chiming, and Liverpool is the capital of Lancashire, and this was the best chime in Liverpool:—and all this heard within half an hour of landing. When I told the ringers I had come from America that morning, specially to hear the chimes of Old England, and that this was the first I had heard, I thought they would have smothered me with all sorts of civilities. An English gentleman since told me, that if you wish to win the heart of a Lancashire man, it is only necessary to "like the bells." But wherever I have been in these three days—whoever I have met, I have invariably found that it is only necessary to mention that I am an American, to ensure the utmost cordiality and heartfelt politeness. Shamefully, abominably, do our travelling countrymen misrepresent this most amiable and hospitable people. I cannot conceive the reason, unless it be the old Revolutionary grudges; quite sure am I that the feeling is all on our side. I can't say enough on this point. Every face brightens up at once with an expression of kind interest when you mention America here. You must see it to believe this after all the lies which the thin-skinned Yankees have told us.

"Native Musician." No. 2.

Boston, August 9th, 1853.

To the Editor of the Journal of Music.

DEAR SIR:—I was present at the performance of the Germania Serenade Band upon the Common last Wednesday evening, and I think it must have been very gratifying to the performers themselves to have had the nearly exclusive pleasure of hearing their own sweet artistic sounds.—Throughout the performance of part first, had not my attention been startled occasionally by a blast from some brassy instrument, I should have thought that a large portion of their programme consisted entirely of Rests. But in part second they seemed to gain new animation, and could be heard somewhat better, yet not sufficiently to please the audience. I think the Boston Brass Band, or the Brigade Band, with their brilliant pieces, would have been far preferable to seven-eighths of the people present on that occasion.

Part third, in regard to hearing, was about the same as part first, with the exception of two pieces, one of which you, in your last number, seemed to infer as "hacknied." I mean Yankee Doodle. Hail Columbia, if I mistake not, you, in a former number of your Journal, have called hacknied. This they also performed. My dear sir, I, for one can never listen to my country's national melodies but with feelings of pleasure and delight; and in saying this, I feel confident that I speak the sentiment of every true American; but I presume your foreign ideas prevent you from thinking so.

P. S.—In my note of the 19th of July, which you published in your Journal, I noticed that you left out (by mistake, probably, in reading the proof-sheet) the letter t in the word "contents;" also you put a small a, instead of a capital, at the commencement of the word "American." But I excuse you, on the ground that you might have been excited by reading the touching remarks it contained at the time you revised the proof for the press.

Yours Respectfully,

NATIVE MUSICIAN.

[We trust the writer will favor our columns occasionally with communications as curt and spicy as the above, and one before. As to the "contents," there was no neglect of proof-reading, but the note was printed literatim et punctatim after the MS., which is scrupulously preserved. Two theories of the peculiar spelling suggested themselves: one was hurried penmanship, the other was illiterate origin. Now the moral animus of the note naturally inclined us to the latter theory; for, if a blackguard may be presumed to wear a slouched hat, so the writer of an ill-tempered anonymous squib may very naturally be not entirely precise in his spelling.—ED.]

["Native Musician" may now sound his B♭ for "a spell," we think.—Printer.]

The Rhenish Men Song Union.

The New York papers announce the arrival in that city of one of those German companies of male part-singers, so celebrated in Europe, and one of which (the Cologne Union) has recently produced so great a sensation in London, by a series of ten concerts, of which we have already copied some accounts.

The Union now in New York is called the Rheinischer Männer Gesang Verein, and includes, as we are informed by private letter, the solo quartet singers of the aforesaid Cologne Union. This Quartet have sung together during the last six years in the principal cities of Northern Germany, and have been crowned as the best Quartet at nearly all the great German Song Union festivals. Their repertoire consists of nearly two hundred pieces, consisting of quintets, quartets, trios, duets and solos, exclusively of German composers, such as Kücken, Mendelssohn, Zöllner, Gade, Marschner, Fesca, Lachner, Becker, Wagner, Ries, Weber, Reichardt, &c. (By the way, the one fault found with the Cologne singers by the London critics was the second or third-rate character of too many of the compositions which they sang. This need not be, and we trust here will not be, as they have plenty of first-rate ones to draw from.) They are said to excel in slow music, yet they sing several comic pieces with great humor, delicacy and exactness. The voices are good, and the first tenor sings the C sharp above the lines with full chest voice.

They are accompanied by Sig. CRUVELLI (or Herr Kriivell), a baritone, who is a brother of the prima donna Cruvelli, and has a fine voice, though with little school. It is their intention to engage GÖCKEL the pianist, who as pupil of Mendelssohn gave a concert not long since in New York, and little PAUL JULIEN with his violin, and with this array of talent to commence from New York a concert tour through the United States.

Such is the account we have of them; but of course the proof of the pudding is in the eating. We can imagine nothing more interesting or more serviceable to the cause of musical taste in this country, than to have our people hear a model of the fine part-singing of Germany; especially if we could have a full chorus, like the Cologne Union:—why cannot this quartet constitute itself the heart and nucleus of a larger band of singers, who may be easily found and trained, if they (the quartet) are all that is represented?

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

NEWPORT.—The "GERMANIANS," with the assistance of OTTO DRESEL, have been giving a series of classical matinées musicales in the hall of the Ocean House. The following was the programme for Friday noon, Aug. 5th:

PROGRAMME.

1. Quartetto No. 2, D minor, for two violins, viola and violoncello,.....Mozart.
Allegro moderato.
Andante.
Menuetto allegretto.
Allegretto ma non troppo.
Performed by Schultze, Meissel, Meyer and Luhde.
2. Trio in C minor, op. 66, for piano, violin, and 'cello,.....Mendelssohn.
Allegro energico e con fuoco.
Andante espressivo.
Scherzo, molto allegro quasi presto.
Finale, allegro appassionato.
Performed by Otto Dresel, Schultze and Luhde.
3. Septetto, op. 20, in E flat major, for violin, viola, 'cello, contrabasso, clarinetto, horn and fagotto,.....Beethoven.
Adagio, allegro.
Scherzo.
Andante con variazione.
Performed by Schultze, Meyer, Luhde, Balcke, Schulz, Küstenmacher and Thiede.

ALFRED JAEHL has arrived, and the charming little CAMILLE URSO is the pet here as everywhere. The Germanians gave their first Soirée Dunsante at the Atlantic House, on Thursday evening.

We understand that the Germanians have deputed one of their number to Europe to engage new members for their orchestra. They propose to increase their regular force to forty instruments against the winter campaign in Boston. This, with such assistance as they can command from quasi members resident in and about Boston, will enable them to man a Beethoven symphony with fifty instruments. What will they have to fear from Jullien and all his hosts?

NEW YORK.—The great JULLIEN, the "Mons," and grand mogul of "monster concerts," has arrived, and puts up at the Clarendon. Dodworth's Band have serenaded him. The next steamers will bring his principal artists, such as ANNA ZERR, the high-voiced soprano, BOTTESINI, the king of contrabassos, WUILLE, the hornist, LAVIGNE, the oboist, KOENIG, the cornet-a-piston player, &c. &c.:—a goodly number of prime artists for a nucleus; the rank and file of the hundred, or musically speaking, the ripienists, will, we presume, be picked up in this country. Shop windows are full of portraits of the great Jullien and his men; one or two of them fine-looking fellows, while the bright, qui-vive, shrewd, Jewish, Leopold de Meyer-like face of the "Mons" himself, looks the impersonation of an advertisement.

Music publishers have Jullien waltzes ad libitum; and the London Musical World has teemed, for weeks and weeks past, with a seemingly ever "to be continued" romantic and thrilling biography of Jullien, from the time of his infant Mozart-ship up to his present full-blown summer,—all nicely cooked and savored for the American market. We shall see what we shall see; if he does well, he shall surely have credit for it. But the "mons" that trumpets its labor too ferociously, is apt to awaken expectation of a—Jullien is to open at Castle Garden on the 25th. Thence the SONTAG opera will remove to Niblo's, to commence there on the 26th.

GOTTSCALK is in New York again, and may be expected to give concerts soon. We trust that he will let himself be heard in Boston.

LIMA.—The Spanish papers of this city are still full of the unbounded praise of BISCACCANTI. The poetic rhapsodies, the triumphal doves and processions, (such as that of which we copied a description not long since,) the earnest solicitations through the newspapers for the repetition of this or that "sublime" rôle, are all characteristic of the South American Spanish enthusiasm. Making all allowance for that, her genuine artistic success must still have been very great. The Signora's health obliges her to desist from singing for the present, but the management have made her the most liberal offers, and the opera-going public seem determined to have her re-engaged at any price, and made the fixed star there during the next autumn and winter. Catharine Hayes arrived at Lima, heard the Biscaccianti, and at once passed on to Valparaiso.

Private letters inform us that our Boston prima donna has improved wonderfully in voice, in singing, and above all in acting, so as to be considered there as really a great actress. We wish her continuance of all success there or elsewhere; but in the Spring, at all events by May, our new Boston opera house will be ready for opening; and what artist can more fitly appear at that opening, and lend lustre (whether alone or with other stars) to the first season, than our own Boston Biscaccianti! We trust the directors will see their interests, as well as the public pleasure, in taking early measures to procure her. It is some five years since we have heard her here in opera. If her gain in acting has been equal to her gain in singing, as we heard her in her concert after her second return from Europe, she is indeed an artist. More anon.

Advertisements.

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE,
No. 86 TREMONT STREET, BOSTON.

WHITE BROTHERS,
DEALERS IN MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS,

Best Italian, German, French and English Strings,

AGENTS OF

J. André, Offenbach; and G. André, Philadelphia,

FOR THE SALE OF FOREIGN CLASSIC MUSIC,
CHOIR MUSIC, &c.

Instruments Made, Repaired, Tuned, Bought, Sold, or
Exchanged, on the most favorable terms.

IRA J. WHITE.
iii 2 3m

A. WARREN WHITE.

Pianos and Melodeons to Let.

OLIVER DITSON,

Music Dealer, 115 Washington St., Boston.

HAS a good variety of Piano Fortes, Melodeons, Seraphines, and Reed Organs, to let, for city or country, on low terms. If, within one year from the time of hiring, the party should conclude to purchase the instrument, no charge will be made for rent of it, except the interest on its value. 25 tf

The best Book on Piano Instruction existing!

IN PRESS:—JULIUS KNORR'S GUIDE FOR TEACHERS ON THE PIANO. A full system of instruction, from the very outset, to artistic perfection, with full advice to teachers and pupils. Its progressive order, completeness, and the value of the pieces recommended, (about 200,) make it indispensable to teachers, and invaluable to all players. It is

THE BEST SELF-INSTRUCTOR EXTANT.

It is also the ONLY KEY to the proper use of Julius Knorr's "Materials," and his "Large Method." Price 75 cents

G. A. SCHMITT, Petersburg, Va.

iii 14 3m

L. O. EMERSON,

Teacher of the Piano-Forte and Singing.

APPLY AT HIS RESIDENCE,

No. 12 INDIANA PLACE, BOSTON.

iii 13 3m.

A. W. FRENZEL,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC, and late Leader of the "SAXONIA ORCHESTRA," having made Boston his residence, is prepared to give Lessons on the Piano-Forte and in Singing, both in the English and German languages; also to accompany with the violin more advanced pupils in the Sonata-duos of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c. During the summer season, Mr. F. offers his services to classes out of town. Or he will receive scholars, from the city or the country, at his Music Rooms, No. 4 Pine Street, Boston, where he may always be found before 10 A. M., and between the hours of 1 and 3 P. M.

iii 6

JONAS CHICKERING,

RESPECTFULLY gives notice to his friends and the public that, having recovered from the late disastrous effects produced by the destruction of his factory, he is now ready to receive orders for PIANOS, which he promises to execute with as much faithfulness and promptitude as heretofore.

379 Washington Street, Boston.

Mar. 5.

tf

HEWS' PATENT

AMERICAN ACTION PIANO-FORTE.

THE MANUFACTURER is in possession of numerous testimonials from distinguished Musical Professors, who have used the greatly improved ACTION PIANO, commending it in high terms. The attention of purchasers and amateurs of Music to an examination of its superiority, is solicited.

GEO. HEWS, 365 Washington St., Boston.

Apr. 10.

tf

THEODORE T. BARKER,

MUSIC STORE,

No. 381 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

Chickering's Pianos to let.

All Foreign and American Musical Publications received as soon as published.

iii 23 3m

N. D. COTTON,

IMPORTER AND DEALER IN

English, French, and American Stationery, DRAWING & PAINTING MATERIALS,

No. 13 Tremont Row, Boston.

* * Wedding and Visiting Cards Engraved and Printed.

16 tf

D. B. NEWHALL,

MANUFACTURER AND DEALER IN

PIANO FORTES,

No. 344 Washington Street, Boston.

PIANO FORTES REPAIRED, TUNED, & TO LET.

Apr. 10.

tf

BERTINI'S PIANO METHOD—ABRIDGED.

The popularity of Bertini's Celebrated Method for the Piano is sufficient evidence of its great merits. The only objection ever made to the Method has been that the elaborateness with which the subject is treated, renders the task of commencing and completing it, somewhat arduous, and to a young pupil a formidable undertaking.

Teachers as well as scholars have, therefore, seen the want of an Abridged Edition, in which all that was actually necessary might be included—an edition containing the choicest and most important lessons; one that might be commenced and finished by those composing the majority of piano pupils.

To meet a want so long apparent, the publisher has issued this edition, which, as a superior work, is recommended to the musical public of the United States.

Published by OLIVER DITSON,

115 Washington St.

Sold by all Music Dealers in the United States and Canada.

iii 12

BEETHOVEN'S ORATORIO OF ENGEDI, or DAVID IN THE WILDERNESS, known as the MOUNT OF OLIVES, is this day published in a neat, convenient form for the singer or concert-goer by

Geo. P. Reed & Co., Publishers,
17 TREMONT ROW, BOSTON.

Jan. 8.

Edward L. Balch,

NEW SINGING BOOK!UNION OF POPULAR AUTHORS!!

WM. B. BRADBURY,

GEORGE F. ROOT,

THOMAS HASTINGS,

T. B. MASON.

THE SHAWM.

A COMPLETE LIBRARY OF CHURCH MUSIC. By WILLIAM B. BRADBURY and GEORGE F. ROOT, assisted by THOS. HASTINGS and T. B. MASON.

It is believed that by a union of the experience and resources of so many distinguished authors, a work of peculiar interest and usefulness has been produced. It contains in all about one thousand compositions, thus affording opportunity to collect together all the old favorites, and yet to give an increased amount of new music.

Some features of the work may be mentioned as follows:

1. PSALM AND HYMN TUNES.—These may be divided into two classes, the old and the new. It is safe to assert that no previous similar work has contained nearly as many of the favorite compositions of all our most popular American as well as foreign authors. But few tunes are in familiar use in the vestries, social meetings or congregations of any portion of the land, which are not here preserved. Besides their own compositions, the authors have, by special arrangement, been permitted to make use of many of the favorite works of Mr. LOWELL MASON, and other distinguished authors.

The quantity of new tunes presented is also unusually large. Assistance from abroad has been enjoyed by foreign correspondence, as well as by studying research among the works of the greatest composers of the past and present. But especially will the Shawm be found rich in its home department. Besides the authors themselves, many of our most celebrated American musicians have contributed to its pages.

2. VARIETY OF METERS.—While the chief portion of the work is devoted to those meters which are in most common use, there will be found tunes of every meter in use by any denomination. Some idea of the variety and completeness in this respect, may be obtained from the fact that there are over one hundred different meters represented.

3. ANTHEMS, CHANTS, SET-PIECES, &c.—Due attention has been paid to this portion of the work, and there will be found pieces appropriate to almost every possible religious occasion.

4. The new Cantata (or Oratorio) entitled DANIEL; OR THE CAPTIVITY AND RESTORATION, in three parts. The words are by C. M. Cady, Esq., assisted by Miss Frances Jane Crosby; the music by George F. Root and Wm. B. Bradbury. Though complete as a whole, and designed especially for Societies, Choirs, Singing Schools, &c., nearly all the choruses may be used as original pieces in the regular sanctuary service.

5. THE SINGING CLASS, is a department designed as a complete manual for Music Classes, which has received most careful attention. The brief space of time usually allotted to the study of the Elementary in Singing Schools has been kept in mind, and a new arrangement has been adopted, intertwining the practical with the theoretical from the very first lesson, and combining simplicity with progression. The introduction of quite a number of easy glees and part songs in this elementary department is a feature which will help to keep in active exercise the interests of a class.

6. INDEXES.—The completeness of these will add much to the convenience of the work. The Chorister's Index refers to nearly every Hymn Book in use.

7. THE BEAUTY OF THE TYPOGRAPHY will elicit admiration.

8. THE CHEAPNESS OF THE WORK; though containing so greatly increased an amount of matter, and combining the labors of several authors, the price will not be greater than that of previous works.

Other points might be alluded to, but it is hoped every teacher of music and chorister will be sufficiently interested to make a careful examination of the work for himself. Any such can have a copy sent him free of postage, for examination, by remitting 60 cents to the publishers.

MASON BROTHERS,

No. 23 Park Row, New York.

aug 13 4t

J. C. WOODMAN,

ORGANIST AND CONDUCTOR OF MUSIC AT CENTRAL CHURCH,

Teacher of Singing, Piano-Forte, &c.,

No. 94 Chestnut Street, Boston.

iii 2 3m.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.

FOREIGN MUSIC DEPOT,

GIRARD HOUSE BUILDINGS,

NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,

PHILADELPHIA.

N. B. The complete works, for Piano, (Quartets, Trios, Duets for Piano and Violin, Duets for four hands and Piano solo pieces,) of BEETHOVEN and MOZART, as also the Piano solo Works of CLEMENTI and HAYDN, as published by J. André, Offenbach, in sets, at very low prices. We have appointed

Messrs. WHITE BROTHERS,

TREMONT TEMPLE, BOSTON,

our Agents for the sale of the above Standard Editions of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, &c. &c.

iii 2 tf

MRS. ROSA GARCIA DE RIBAS,

TEACHER OF THE

PIANOFORTE, SINGING & GUITAR,

2 Seneca St., corner Harrison Avenue.

MR. De RIBAS will give instruction on the Oboe and Flute. Also MUSIC ARRANGED, TRANSPOSED, &c. Boston, April 23.

3m

Letter-Press, Music and Job Printing-Office,

SIGNOR G. C. GUIDI respectfully informs his former pupils and the public, that he has resumed his instructions in SINGING, after the Italian school, with the intention to settle permanently in Boston. In order to accommodate those who may not wish to take private instruction, he will open classes for ladies and gentlemen, on moderate terms. None but good voices will be admitted. Terms liberal for persons intending to study for professional purposes.

Sig. G. can be consulted free upon any musical subject, daily, from 12 to 2, at Mr. Hews's Piano Manufactory, No. 365 Washington street, where terms and time for classes may be known.

Orders or notes for Sig. G. may be addressed to him at G. P. Reed & Co.'s Music Store, 17 Tremont Row, and at Oliver Ditson's, 115 Washington street.

Feb. 5.

A CARD.

THE SUBSCRIBER respectfully offers his services to the public as Teacher of the Piano-Forte, the Violin and the Guitar, also of Harmony and Singing, after a clear and easy method. He will also accompany pupils, both in seminaries and in private houses, in the practice of Duets, Trios, &c.

Address for the present at 168 Tremont Street.

March 23. 3m.

CARL GÄRTNER.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
265 Washington Street, Boston.

Oct. 16.

3m

T. BRICHER,

Organist and Conductor of Music

At the Bowdoin Square Church.

OFFICE UNDER THE CHURCH... ENTRANCE ON CHARDON ST.

Jan. 22. 3m.

H. S. CUTLER,

Organist at the Church of the Advent, also of the Boston Harmonic Society.

ADDRESS—(Care of ROLAND CUTLER, No. 4 Market Square, Boston.)

22 tf

F. F. MÜLLER,

DIRECTOR OF MUSIC AND ORGANIST at the Old South Church; ORGANIST of the Handel and Haydn Society; ORGANIST of the Musical Education Society, &c. &c. &c.

Residence, No. 3 Winter Place, Boston.

ii 7 tf

NATHAN RICHARDSON,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC.

Letters may be addressed at the Revere House, Boston.

25 tf

GEORGE F. WILLEY,

TEACHER OF MUSIC.

Private Tuition in the principles of Music and the Cultivation of the Voice.

MUSIC ROOM, THE LECTURE ROOM OF KIRK STREET CHURCH,

RESIDENCE, 34 FRANKLIN SQUARE, SUFFOLK STREET,

feb. 5. LOWELL, MASS.

Germania Serenade Band.

THE SERVICES OF THIS ASSOCIATION can be secured by applying to

ii 14 tf

G. SCHNAPP, Leader,
364 Tremont Street.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

AT 21 SCHOOL STREET, BOSTON.

$2 per annum, in advance.

ITS CONTENTS relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glimpses at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time,—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music published at home and abroad. 3. A Summary of the significant Musical News from all parts; gathered from English, German, French, as well as American papers. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, Architecture, Poetry, Aesthetic Books, the Drama, &c.—8. Original and Selected Poems, short Tales, Anecdotes, &c. Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished. Address, (post paid,) J. S. DWIGHT,
21 School Street, Boston.

RATES FOR ADVERTISING.

For half a square, (8 lines,) or less, first insertion, . . . $0.50
each additional inser. 25
For a square, (16 lines,) first insertion, 1.00
each additional insertion, 50

On advertisements standing three months or longer, a discount of twenty per cent. on the above rates is allowed. (A column counts as seven squares.)

Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 School St.

DWIGHT'S Journal of Music.

A Paper of Art and Literature.

VOL. III.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 20, 1853.

NO. 20.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

TERMS....TWO DOLLARS PER ANNUM, (IN ADVANCE.)

CITY Subscribers can be served at their houses by the further payment of fifty cents per annum.

For Rates of Advertising, see last page.

POSTAGE, if paid in advance, for any distance within the State, thirteen cents a year; if not in advance, twenty-six cents. To all places beyond the State, double these rates.

J. S. DWIGHT,.....EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St.

By REDDING & CO., 8 State St.

GEO. P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row.

A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.

DEXTER & BROTHERS, 43 Ann Street, N. Y.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 722 Broadway, N. Y.

MASON BROTHERS, 23 Park Row, New York.

GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.

G. ANDRE, 229 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St., Balt.

COLBURN & FIELD, Cincinnati, O.

HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Persons willing to become Agents for procuring subscribers, especially Music-Dealers and Teachers, are invited to correspond with the Editor, as above. Satisfactory references required, and liberal commissions allowed.

Back numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Also bound copies of Vols. I. and II. at prices varying from $2.50 to $3.50.

Translated for this Journal.

Mendelssohn at Leipsic.

HECTOR BERLIOZ to STEPHEN HELLER. (1842.)

[Concluded.]

The orchestra at Leipsic is not more numerous than those at Frankfort and at Stuttgart; but as the city is not wanting in instrumental resources, I wished to augment it a little, and the number of violins was consequently raised to twenty-four:—an innovation which, as I afterwards saw, excited the indignation of several critics who had taken their ground. Twenty-four violins instead of sixteen, which had always until then sufficed for the execution of the symphonies of Mozart and Beethoven! What an insolent pretention! . . . We tried in vain to procure three other instruments designated in several of my pieces (another enormous crime); it was impossible to find the corno inglese, the ophicleid and the harp. The English horn (I mean the instrument) was so bad, so dilapidated, and consequently so extraordinarily false, that, in spite of the talent of the artist who played it, we had to renounce the use of it and give its solo to the first clarinet.

The ophicleid, or at least the feeble instrument of brass which they presented to me under that name, did not resemble the French ophicleids; it had scarcely any tone, and besides it was in B natural, which obliged the performer to transpose by a semitone and consequently to play in keys almost impracticable; in G flat, for instance, when the orchestra was in F, or in C flat when it was in B flat. The ophicleid therefore was considered not arrived; its place was supplied, for better or worse, by a fourth trombone. As for the harp, it was not to be thought of; for, six months before, Mendelssohn, wishing to bring out fragments of his Antigone in Leipsic, was obliged to have harps brought from Berlin. As they assured me that he had been but indifferently satisfied with them, I wrote to Dresden, and Lipinski, a great and worthy artist of whom I shall have occasion to speak, sent me the harpist of the theatre. It only remained to find an instrument. After much useless hunting among various makers and music-sellers, Mendelssohn at length learned that an amateur possessed a harp, and he obtained the loan of it for some days. But, admire my luck, the harp once brought and nicely furnished with new strings, it turned out that M. Richter (the harpist from Dresden, who had so obligingly come to Leipsic at the request of Lipinski) was a very clever pianist, moreover that he played the violin very well, but the harp scarcely at all. He had studied its mechanism for eighteen months only, so as to execute the most simple arpeggios, which commonly serve for accompaniment to the singing in Italian operas. At the sight of the diatonic passages and cantabile designs which are often met with in my symphony, his courage failed him altogether, and Mendelssohn had to sit down at the piano on the evening of the concert and represent the harp solos and ensure the entrées. What embarrassment about so small a thing!

However, my course once taken with regard to these inconveniences, the rehearsals commenced. The arrangement of the orchestra, in this fine hall, is so excellent; the relations of each performer with the chief are so easy; and the artists, who are perfect musicians, have been accustomed by Mendelssohn and David to give such attention to the studies, that two rehearsals sufficed for the long programme, in which figured, among other difficult compositions, the overtures to "King Lear" and the Franc-Juges, and the Symphonie fantastique. David moreover had consented to play the violin solo (Rêverie et Caprice) which I wrote two years ago for Artôt, and of which the orchestration is quite complicated. He executed it in a superior manner, and with the great applause of the assembly.

As for the orchestra, to say that it was irreproachable after two rehearsals only, in the execution of the pieces just named, is to bestow on it an immense praise. All the musicians of Paris, and many more besides, will, I am sure, be of that opinion.

This soirée troubled the musical consciences of the inhabitants of Leipsic, and, so far as I was allowed to judge from the newspaper polemics, discussions ensued, which were at least as violent as those of which the same works were the subject some ten years since in Paris. While they were thus debating the morality of my harmonic doings and achievements, some treating them as fine actions, others as premeditated crimes, I made the trip to Dresden, which I shall soon have to relate. But, not to divide the recital of my experiences at Leipsic, I proceed to tell you, my dear Heller, what occurred, on my return, at the concert for the benefit of the poor, of which Mendelssohn had spoken to me in his letter, and in which I had promised to take part.

The soirée being organized entirely by the Society of Concerts, I had at my disposal the rich and powerful Academy of Singing, of which I have already expressed myself with such merited praise. You may imagine, I took care to profit by this fine mass of voices, and I offered to the directors of the Society the finale for three choirs to the "Romeo and Juliet," of which the German translation had been made at Paris by the learned professor Duesberg. It was only to fit this translation to the notes of the vocal parts. This was a long and painful labor; besides, the German prosody not having been observed by the copyists in their distribution of long and short syllables, there resulted for the singers such great difficulties, that Mendelssohn was obliged to lose his time in the revision of the text and the correction of such faults as were most troublesome. He had moreover to exercise the chorus during nearly eight days. (Eight rehearsals of so large a chorus would cost in Paris 4,800 francs. And I am asked why I do not give "Romeo and Juliet" sometimes in my concerts!) This Academy, in which there figure, it is true, some artists from the theatre and the pupils of the Thomas-Schule, is nevertheless composed almost entirely of amateurs belonging to the cultivated classes of the city of Leipsic. That is why, when any serious work is to be learned, it is so much more easy to obtain a great number of rehearsals. When I returned from Dresden, the studies were far from being terminated; the male chorus especially left much to be desired. It pained me to see a great master and great virtuoso like Mendelssohn, charged with this subaltern task of singing-master, which he fulfils, I must say, with an indomitable patience. Each of his observations is made with gentleness and a perfect politeness, which one would enjoy the more in him, if he but knew how rare these qualities are in all such cases. As for myself, I have often been accused of ungallantry by our ladies of the Opera; my reputation in this regard, is perfect. I deserve it, I confess; as soon as there are to be studies of a grand chorus, and even before commencing them, a sort of anticipatory cholera chokes my throat, my bad humor manifests itself, although nothing as yet can have given cause for it, and my looks convey to all the choristers the idea of that Gaseon who, having kicked an unoffensive little boy that was passing by him, when the boy remarked that he had done nothing to him, replied: "Judge a little, then, what you would get if you had done anything to me!"

Meanwhile, after two more sessions, the three choruses were learned, and the finale, with the support of the orchestra, would undoubtedly have gone perfectly well, had not a singer from the theatre, who for several days had complained of the difficulties of the part of Friar Lawrence, with which he was charged, come to demolish our whole noble edifice of harmony, which we had raised with so much pain.

I had already remarked at the piano rehearsals that this gentleman (I forget his name) belonged to that numerous class of musicians, who do not know music; he counted his rests badly, he did not come in at the right time, he was unsure in his intonation, &c.; but I said to myself: perhaps he has not had time enough to study his part; he learns very difficult parts for the theatre, why may he not get through with this? Meanwhile I often thought of Alizard, who always sang this scene so well, and I regretted that he was at Brussels and did not know German. But at the general rehearsal, the night before the concert, as this gentleman had made no farther progress, and, what was more, as he grumbled between his teeth I knew not what Teutonic imprecations, every time they were obliged to stop the orchestra on his account, or when Mendelssohn or I sang his phrases to him, my patience finally forsook me, and I thanked the chapel, begging them no longer to occupy themselves with my work, seeing that this bass part rendered its execution impossible.

On returning, I made this sad reflection: Shall two composers who have devoted for long years whatever of intellect and imagination nature has given them, to the study of their art; shall two hundred musicians, singers and instrumentists, attentive and capable, fatigue themselves for eight days to no purpose, and then renounce the production of the work which they have undertaken, merely because of the insufficiency of one single man!! O singers who do not sing, you, you too are gods! . . . The Society was greatly embarrassed how to supply in the programme the place of this finale, which is half an hour in length; by means of an extra rehearsal which the orchestra and chorus were willing to undergo on the morning of the concert, we got through it. The overture to "King Lear," which the orchestra were masters of, and the offertory in my Requiem, in which the chorus has but a few notes to sing, were substituted for the fragment of "Romeo," and executed in the evening in the most satisfactory manner. I may even add that the piece from the Requiem produced an effect which I did not anticipate, and won me an inestimable suffrage, that of Robert Schumann, one of the most justly renowned composer critics of Germany. Some days after, this same offertory called forth an eulogium, upon which I had counted still less. It was in this way. I had been taken sick at Leipsic, and when, as I was about departing, I asked what I was indebted to the physician who had attended me, he replied: "Write for me, on this sheet of paper, the theme of your offertory, with your signature, and I shall be beholden to you forever; never has a piece of music struck me so much!" I hesitated a little about remunerating a doctor's cure in that fashion, but he insisted, and chance having furnished me an occasion of responding to his compliment by another better merited, would you believe that I had the simplicity not to seize it? I wrote at the top of the page: "A. M. le docteur Clarus."

"Carus," said he, "you give my name an l too much."

Instantly I thought: "Patientibus carus, sed clarus inter doctos,—and I did not dare to write it. . . . There are moments when I am guilty of a rare stupidity.

A composer-virtuoso like yourself, my dear Heller, has a lively interest in every thing relating to his Art; I find it very natural therefore that you have addressed to me so many questions on the subject of the musical richness of Leipsic; I will reply laconically to some of them. You ask me if the great pianist, Madame Clara Schumann, has any rival in Germany, whom they can decently oppose to her?

—Je ne crois pas.

You beg me to tell you if the musical sentiment of the great heads at Leipsic is good, or at least directed towards that which you and I call the beautiful?

—Je ne veux pas.

If it is true that the confession of faith of every one who pretends to love high and serious Art is this: "There is no god but Bach, and Mendelssohn is his prophet?"

—Je ne dois pas.

If the theatre is well composed, and if the public is much to blame for amusing itself with the little operas of Lortzing, which are represented so often?

—Je ne puis pas.

If I have read or heard some of those old masses for five voices, with continuous bass, which they praise so much at Leipsic?

—Je ne sais pas.

Adieu, dear Heller! Continue to write beautiful caprices, like your two last, and may God preserve you from fugues with four subjects on a choral!

Melody.

The following remarks, evidently from the pen of a musician, form a portion of a series of articles on "The Progress and Influence of Music,"—published a few years ago in the London Morning Post:

One of the branches of musical Art least understood, and upon which the most uninstructed consider themselves qualified to give an opinion, is Melody. It is the fancied stronghold of the amateur critic; and even our budding misses venture to hiss melodious judgments. Melody, properly understood, answers to the single-figure principle in the sister Art, in regard to which Sir Joshua Reynolds has left us the following precepts:—"When the picture consists of a single figure only, that figure must be contrasted in its limbs and drapery with great variety of lines. It should be as much as possible a composition in itself. It may be remarked that such a complete figure will never unite and make part of a group; as, on the other hand, no figure of a well-conducted group will stand by itself.

These principles, applied to music, will furnish us with a complete definition of melody. A strongly marked musical figure will no more admit of great variety in the accompanying parts, redundancy of accessory ideas, or contrapuntal development, than will the single figure in drawing of complicated grouping or undue prominence of the component parts. The principles of fine melody are as fixed and immutable as those which regulate the mazy convolutions of counterpoint and fugue, or the progressions and modulations of harmony. It is not to be produced by chance. It is the result of knowledge, as distinguished from mere intuition. Its fundamental laws are rhythmical symmetry, a natural succession of intervals and tonal consistency. Harsh and extreme distances are as contrary to its nature as is a vague and diffused style of rhythm. The excellent precepts transmitted to us from the ancient contrapuntists for the carriage of voices, form the basis of our laws respecting the production of pure melody. Diatonic intervals should ever be preferred to chromatic, monotony avoided, and "variety in unity" never lost sight of.

The principle laid down by Sir Joshua Reynolds, that the single figure should form a composition in itself, means, when applied to music, that a well-constructed melody should, even without the accompanying parts, be gratifying and satisfactory to the ear. If this condition be fulfilled, its general popularity will be inevitable. General popularity, however, must be understood to convey a much more extended meaning than a mere barrel-organ circulation. The indiscriminate zeal with which the unlettered crowd occasionally adopts a vulgar tune cannot be admitted as a proof of its excellence. The ascendancy of such productions over the public mind is invariably of short duration, and generally to be ascribed to local influence, or their popular association with some passing event, and always to the absence of something better. The truly popular airs are those which have stood the test of ages; the compositions of those inspired writers who, like all true poets, are the exponents of those eternal ideas of the true and beautiful implanted in the human breast, and who, as they tell of things already known and felt by all, though never so well expressed, have but to speak to be understood. The true poet, whether of words, tones, or colors, is an oracle in which the undying spirit of truth finds a voice. It is for him alone to "strike the electric chain with which we are darkly bound," causing it to vibrate through all time.

An idea prevails that the national airs of various countries are evidences that melody is the offspring rather of nature than art; but to establish this theory it will be necessary to prove that uncouth distances and rhythmical deformity are as agreeable as the opposite qualities; that a defective scale is equal to a perfect one; that monotony and mannerism are as admirable as variety in unity—in short, that melodies composed by a barbarous and ignorant people are as excellent as those invented by the great writers. The most rabid admirer of those interesting old acquaintances will, we opine, scarcely go so far. Far be it from us to evince any lack of reverence for antique, time-honored melodies. They are entwined with our earliest recollections; they surprised us into admiration before the reign of judgment commenced; they are associated in our minds with thoughts of hope and dreams of happiness; some of our best poets have wedded to them their worthiest inspirations; they are endeared by a thousand ties to our memory; and we cannot listen unmoved to—

"The melody of youthful days Which steals the trembling tear of speechless praise."

These, however, are adventitious circumstances, to which we have alluded merely because we feel convinced that they have very much influenced the public mind. People love to hear that which reminds them of the time when "pale pain" was unknown to them—hence the erroneous conclusions they arrive at.

One peculiarity of melody is that it more easily takes the stamp of individuality than the more complex branches of the Art; and we shall hazard the reproach of having made a trite observation when we remark that the native airs of various countries are impressed with the general features of the national mind and character. The conception of melody, owing to the singleness of its nature, is more immediate, and emanates more directly from the feelings and emotions, than the complexities of harmony and counterpoint, which demand more consideration and calm reflection. The mind, always subject to local and physical influences, takes its color from surrounding objects; and its first musical impulse, which is melody, becomes naturally imbued with the circumambient spirit of the time and place. Hence the distinct character of national melodies. We must, however, warn the true student against giving undue importance to this fact, and urge him not to consider, because he may be an Englishman, that he is bound to imitate English composers. Let him rather reflect that great works are of no country, but are as universal as the immutable principles upon which they are constructed, and that it is better to strive to be great in Art than merely national."

Music in Russia.

St. Petersburg possesses two theatres—the Little and the Great. A third was provisionally constructed for an Italian company, but destroyed by fire, shortly after the opening. The Little Theatre, devoted to Thalia, is occupied alternately by the Russian comedians and the French company, who represent vaudevilles, comedies of Moliere, and sometimes even dramas. The second, or the Great Opera, is destined to the performance of Russian tragedies, operas, ballets, and to the German company, which some years ago gave Weber's chef d'œuvre there. The decorations are beautiful, and the costumes rich; but the orchestra is bad and incomplete; and vainly would you look for a distinguished singer in the company. Hence the theatre is generally deserted and the higher classes, who alone frequent plays, go only to the vaudevilles of M. Scribe, whose success is as certain at Petersburg as at Paris. Many causes are opposed to the formation of good musicians at Petersburg. If even there were an academy of music, or any similar institution, they would be useless; for the title of artist is too exalted for the people to indulge any hope of attaining it; the nobility will not descend to it; and a middle class, which might have it, does not exist.

These two theatres are under the imperial direction, which obliges them to close during the six weeks of Lent and Easter. Then begins the era of Musique du Salon, which terminates on Maundy Thursday. This ephemeral existence is marked by daily concerts, given in the Philharmonic Rooms, a magnificent building. Some distinguished artists are heard at these concerts. Field or Mayeron the piano-forte; Boehm and Maurer on the violin, Vandes on the clarion, and Sussmann on the flute, are names which appear daily on the bills, varying only the order in which they are printed. Never is a Russian name found among them. The vocal department is very weak as to the solos; but the choruses are perfectly executed by the singers of the court. The orchestra is not numerous; it performs with tolerable precision, but without expression; and it would, probably, be much embarrassed if required to execute one of Beethoven's symphonies in its true character.

The church-music, all in plain chant, shows sufficiently the happy results which might be expected under another government, from the astonishing musical dispositions of the Russian people. It is impossible to describe the effect produced by three hundred infantine voices singing, without accompaniment of any kind, the soft and simple melodies of the Greek rite.

Military music is generally very good in Russia—the intonation of the horns and trumpets is peculiarly remarkable. A sort of music, peculiar to Russia, remains to be mentioned. It is produced by a kind of tubes, which give but one note each. Such an orchestra, to be effective, must, of course, be very numerous; but the effect is admirable. The sound, better supplied than that of any other wind instrument, may be swelled and diminished at pleasure, and thus joins force to expression. This music which is sufficiently rare in Russia, is in great requisition at the fetes; it is generally played in a garden, and the effect produced at a great distance, on a delightful Russian night, is wonderful.

The Russians possess a great number of national songs, which, at first hearing, are not without a certain charm; but they have the fault of being all formed on the same model, which gives them a monotonous tinge, by which one is soon fatigued. But a more complicated kind of music could not be executed on the balalaika, the only instrument by which the Russian moujik is accompanied. A piece of wood, rudely shaped, narrower and more flat than the guitar, furnished with three strings, has neither great resources, nor very attractive charms. As to the words of these songs, they are for the most part but little honorable to the poetic spirit of the Russian troubadour.—Old English Magazine.

From the Dublin University Magazine.

A B A T H.

O Summer! Summer, with thy golden crown!

Thou comest o'er the wolds with fiery feet:

The white-skinned Naiads languidly lie down

Amid the sultry heat.

O! now to bathe in some sweet marble fount

In those fair gardens Epicurus founded;

Where in bright streamlets icy waters mount,

By myrtle trees surrounded;

Or in a bath where old Boccaccio

Made murmur to the air with gentle cadence,

Where oft with zoneless waists and cheeks a-glow,

Came Florentine fair maidens.

But no! we have the sea, the flashing sea,

And tread the wild expanse of silver sands;

We hear old poet Ocean chanting free

His tales of alien lands.

Strip to the wooing wind. From rocks romantic

Plunge in the fresh, green, laughing, quivering brine;

Sate thee with kisses of the fair Atlantic,

And then—go home and dine.

CATALANI AND GOETHE.—Her want of literary attainments joined to her vivacity in conversation, sometimes produced ludicrous scenes. When at the court of Weimar, she was placed, at a dinner-party, by the side of Goethe, as a mark of respect to her on the part of her royal host. The lady knew nothing of Goethe, but, being struck by his majestic appearance, and the great attention of which he was the object, she inquired of the gentleman on her other side what was his name. "The celebrated Goethe, madame," was the answer. "Pray, on what instrument does he play?" was the next question. "He is no performer, madam,—he is the renowned author of Werter." "Oh, yes, yes, I remember," said Catalani; and turning to the venerable poet, she addressed him,—“Ah, sir, what an admirer I am of Werter! A low bow was the acknowledgment for so flattering a compliment. 'I never,' continued the lively lady, 'I never read anything half so laughable in all my life. What a capital farce it is sir!' 'Madame,' said the poet, looking aghast—'the Sorrows of Werter a farce?' 'Oh, yes; never was anything so exquisitely ridiculous!' rejoined Catalani, laughing heartily as she enjoyed the remembrance. And it turned out that she had been talking all the while of a ridiculous parody of Werter, which had been performed at one of the minor theatres of Paris, and in which the sentimentality of Goethe's tale had been unmercifully ridiculed. The poet did not get over his mortification the whole evening; and the fair singer's credit at the court of Weimar was sadly impaired by this display of her ignorance of the illustrious Goethe and the Sorrows of Werter. Hogarth's Reminiscences of the Opera.

MUSICAL CATECHISM.—We find the following afloat in the papers:

"What is a slur?"

"Almost any remark one singer makes about another."

"What is a rest?"

"Going out of the choir to eat some refreshments during sermon time."

"What is called singing 'with an understanding?'"

"Marking time on the floor with your foot."

"What is a staccato movement?"

"Leaving the choir in a huff, because one is dissatisfied with the leader."

"What is a swell?"

"A professor of music, who pretends to know everything about the science, while he cannot conceal his ignorance."

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

"Massachusetts Musick" a Century Ago.

In looking through the valuable collections of the Antiquarian Society, the other day, the writer found a few items of some musical interest. Besides works of a later date, in the eighteenth century, a quaint production was discovered, bearing upon its dilapidated title-page the year 1721, (the last figure only, somewhat dubious) and comprising twenty-four "Sacred Tunes, with Some brief and very plain Instructions for Singing by Note." This collection is probably the one referred to in some histories, as edited in 1721, by Rev. Thomas Walter of Roxbury, Mass., and with the exception of the "Bay Psalm Book," used in the seventeenth century, is believed to be the first book of sacred music printed in this State. It is said to have been recommended by fourteen divines!

I may be permitted, perhaps, to add a few extracts from the learned author's "Instructions," wherein he refers more particularly to the prevailing "Ways of Singing Sacred Musick," in those days, and to the need of reformation therein. Possibly our author's strictures upon the quavering style of execution, and the tedious protraction of musical notes,—a fault paralleled nowadays by too great rapidity, as well as an absurd excess of accentuation among singers,—might prove a salutary admonition to more modern performers; certainly, in several "churches which I purposely forbear to mention."

"My Rules will be Serviceable upon a three-fold Account. First, They will instruct us in the right and true Singing of the Tunes that are already in Use in our Churches; which when they first came out of the Hands of the Composers of them, were Sung according to the Rules of the Scale of Musick, but are now miserably tortured, and twisted, and quavered, in some Churches, into all horrid Medley of confused and disorderly Noises. Our Tunes are, for want of a Standard to appeal to in all our Singing, left to the Mercy of every unskilful Throat to chop and alter, twist and change, according to their infinitely divers and no less odd Humour and Fancies. Yea, I have myself heard (for instance) Oxford Tune sung in Three Churches (which I purposely forbear to mention) with as much Difference as there can possibly be between York and Oxford, or any two other different Tunes. Therefore any man that pleads with me for what they call the Old Way. I can confute him only by making this Demand. What is the Old Way? which I am sure they cannot tell. For, one Town says their's is the true Old Way. another Town thinks the same of their's, and so does a Third of their Way of Tuning it.

"Again, It will serve for the Introduction of more Tunes into the Divine Service. For at present we are confined to eight or ten Tunes, and in some congregations to little more than half that Number, which being so often sung over, are too apt, if not to create a Distaste, yet mightily to lessen the Relish of them.

"One more advantage is this. That by the just and equal Timing of the Notes, our Singing will be reduc'd to an exact Length, so as not to fatigue the Singer with a Protraction of the Notes beyond the Compass of a Man's Breath, and the Power of his Spirit: A Fault very frequent in the Country, where I myself have twice in one Note paused to take Breath. And then the even, unaffected, and smooth sounding the Notes, and the Omission of those unnatural Quaverings and Turnings will serve to prevent all that Discord and lengthy Tediousness which is so much a Fault in our Singing of Psalms; For much time is taken up in shaking out these Tunes and Quavers: and besides, no two Men in the Congregation quaver alike, or together."

The very plain "Instructions" of the author are contained in about twenty-five pages, very much after the stereotyped order of modern singing-books. The music, designated by diamond-shaped notes, and divided into "Cantus," "Medius," and "Bassus" parts, upon the respective "Cliffs," comprises "Canterbury Tune," "St. Mary's Tune," "The One Hundredth Psalm Tune," "Peterborough Tune," and some twenty others of a like character. A few pages of manuscript sacred music, are added, quite evidently the work of some ancient chirographer.

I will only presume to trespass further, in order to give the title of a single pamphlet, published in Philadelphia in 1783, in which the author anticipates the "Complete Introduction of the Organ," and its great "Excellency," in all places of Public Worship. Possibly the "Introduction" of competent Organists, in some of our Country Churches might be equally practicable and beneficial!

"The Lawfulness, Excellency, and Advantage of Instrumental Music in the Publick Worship of God. Urg'd and Enforc'd, from Scripture, and the Example of the far greater part of Christians in all ages. Address'd to All (particularly the Presbyterians and Baptists) who have hitherto been taught to look upon the Use of Instrumental Musick in the Worship of God as unlawful. By a Presbyterian."

"Musick has charms to sooth the Savage Brest,
To soften Rocks, and bend the knotted Oak!"—Congress.

Yours, W. S. B.

Worcester, Mass., 10th August.

"There is something in it (music) of Divinity more than the ear discovers. It is an hieroglyphical and shadowed lesson of the whole world and creatures of God: such a melody to the ear as the whole world, well understood, would afford the understanding. In brief, it is a sensible fit of that harmony which intellectually sounds into the ears of God. I will not say, with Plato, that the soul is an harmony, but harmonical, and hath its nearest sympathy unto musick."—Sir Thomas Brown's Religio Medici.

I pant for the music which is divine;
My heart in its thirst is a dying flower;
Pour forth the sound like enchanted wine,
Loosen the notes in a silver shower:
Like an herbless plain for the gentle rain,
I gasp, I faint, till they wake again!"—SHELLEY.

CHILDE JULLIEN'S FAREWELL.

Childe Julien had a concert and a ball,
The one was given to him, and one he gave;
The former was a "testimonial,"
The latter was a "Masqué"—and the waltz
Of his conducting baton thereat clavé
The air till day was fully up, and then Quaint figures (Débarleurs and Pirates brave)
Bought: Covent-garden strawberries, and men
And women yawned to see the sunlight come again.

So when his Brougham-horse homeward turned his head,
Childe Julien mused within his Brougham upon
The hours that erst o'er Drury-lane had sped,
When he his spotless gloves and shirts would don,
And tap his desk till every mother's son
Of all his band sat as beneath a spell,
Waiting his signal; these were past and gone—
Thinking how soon he'd breast th' Atlantic's swell,
'Twas thus he softly hummed to Drury-lane—Farewell!

Farewell, farewell, my concert's o'er,
My ball is finished too,
And now I have another shore
In speculative view:
Bunn, Jenny Lind, and Thackeray
I follow in their flight;
So looking from my Brougham, I say
My Drury-lane, good night!

O! tell me true, my Koenig good,
With me wilt cross the wave,
Where "Rule Britannia's" not the mood,
And there's no queen to save?
"Oh, yes, Sir Childe! I'll not forget
By thee to stick alway:
Anew I'll 'Yankee Doodle' set,
And variations play."

Come hither, come hither, my monster drum,
And tell if thou hast fears,
To go where British guns are dumb,
And "British Grenadiers?"
"Oh, yes, Sir Childe! to share thy fame
After I'll roam with thee,
For sheepskin must be much the same
On either side the sea."

Away, away! the steam is up,
The paddle-wheels revolve,
The shores whereon I last did sup
In distance lost dissolve:
America my opening bars
Shall welcome with delight;
Welcome! ye Yankee stripes and stars!
And Drury-lane, good night!

[London Diogenes.]

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUGUST 20, 1853.

The Age of Music.

What is music? And what has it to do especially with this age? And why do we give it such a central eminence among the topics of a journal which seeks to further all æsthetic culture, to represent all the Fine Arts, and "Humanities," making it in a manner the key-stone of our arch?

These are questions which we do not propose now to answer categorically, or systematically, or thoroughly. Nevertheless, in an off-hand and direct way, plunging right into the middle of the subject, as if you and we sat talking in our arm-chairs, reader, we think we can give an answer, substantially, if not in a complete and shapely form.

Music is, then, just what it is commonly claimed to be by its true lovers. We repeat the common phrases. To-wit: Music is a universal language—

—The Fine Art of the feelings, passions, emotions.—Audible beauty.—The natural language of enthusiasm, exaltation, ecstasy.—The vehicle of the religious sentiment, of aspirations too deep, too vague for words.—The most exciting of the Arts.—The CHRISTIAN Art par excellence.—And so on, ad libitum.

These claims are all just; these definitions, if not entirely definite, all true. And why? Because Art, of whatever kind, deals primarily with Beauty; and all Beauty is the result, the form of Motion (that is to say, of all free, unimpeded, undisturbed motion); and Motion, movement, is the universal sign and undeniable assertion of force, of power, of inspiration, in a word of Life; and finally all free, undisturbed motion is vibratory, undulatory, measured, proportionate, rhythmical. Motion is the constituent element and fibre, therefore, of all that we call Music. Music, physically considered, is the direct product of Motion. Without Motion, no Music. Without free vibration, according to the natural mathematical ratios, no tones, no scale, no accords and no discords.

Music, therefore, is directly and immediately the product and the sign of free and measured Motion: as the forms, groups, colors, curves, &c., of the other Fine Arts, are the "still life" after-patterns of the natural forms of motion. The shape of the waves, and the marks they leave upon the beach, are graceful, symmetrical, artistic. The beauty you admire in them is only the form, the outline, the silhouette, the impression of that free, undulating movement of the water. In the same way, may not this compound and perfection of all beauty of form, the human body, in its true estate, be the fixed result and form of the whole complex and harmonious movement of the soul that animates and uses it, in its relations with the outward world?

Physically, then, music is motion, and it is nothing else. And nothing moves that does not impress upon the air a vibration, or (which is the same thing) a sound, which if inaudible to our ears, is so only because the sound is above or below the limited compass of the sensibility of our auditory apparatus. If I sing, a vibration of my soul, my feeling, imparts itself to the atmospheric medium, and travels on until it becomes a vibration in your soul, your feeling.

The spiritual fact of Music corresponds precisely with this physical fact. Its business is wholly with the moring part of human life. It is not (directly at least) the language of thoughts, ideas, perceptions, reasonings: for all these are quiet, passive, prompted by some moving force behind them. But it is the language of the emotions, of the passions, of the prompting impulses of the soul; of the active and impelling principle in us, of the vital springs and forces of our conduct and our characters.

What has it to do, then, with this age in which we live? Rather ask, what has it not to do with an age so full of movement? an age in which humanity is all in motion, with a quicker tempo, and a vaster field and object, than ever before? In the times of most excitement, most life, most progress, when aspirations are the strongest, feelings the keenest, and when pulses beat the quickest, then should music mean most, and then should its meaning be most a necessity of the human soul. Some think music a quiet, dilettante luxury, most incident to times of leisure and the wealthy courts of kings; flourishing only in conservative nooks and retirement. So it may be, temporarily, and in one sense. But the music sipped in such Sybaritic leisure was only born and created amid the most earnest movements of humanity; never when society was stagnant; and if ten quaff it as a sensual, idle pleasure, as one who watches the smoke-curls of his cigar, there is usually at least one soul in which its vibration lives on and becomes a seed-principle of great life and great movement in society by word or action.

We Americans know well enough that here, upon this broad Western Continent, is the Future of Humanity fast building itself up. In proportion to this incalculable amount of new movement of Humanity, shall be, must be, the out-gush of new musical inspiration, the up-heaval of new and mightier than Handelian mountain-chains of sublime works of musical Art, here, in this practical, utilitarian, unæsthetic world.

Music is the language of enthusiasm and hates common-place. All enthusiasm, we said, is rhythmical in its utterance. It rises above prose. Who would crawl and creep, if he had wings? So, as society is the more animated by great ideas and great enthusiasm, the more does it read its own truest texts and prophecies in the rhythmical and universal dialect of music.

We say, universal. Do not all things in our day tend to the opening of perfect channels of intercourse between man and man, the world over? Do not universal trade, universal currency, universal science, universal fraternity, all the machinery of rail-roads, telegraphs, &c., involve the necessity of that language which is universal? And as interests, opinions, prejudices in all their diversity, give way to feelings, purposes, and hopes, which are unitary, instinctively alike in all men, shall we not find music more to our purpose, more to the serious and general ends of life, than any other medium of expression. The crown of utility is Art; and the central one among the Arts is Music.

Finally (there is only room to hint it,) Music is the Christian Art—wholly the product of the Christian centuries—because it is the Christian heaven working in modern societies which constitutes the very vitality of all this mighty, multifarious, and yet unitary movement of which we have been speaking.

Mozart's Twelfth Mass.

Seeing a public performance of this work announced (during the past week) in the Boston daily papers, we were reminded of an old attempt to describe our impression of the music. It may possibly add something to the interest of the performance, with those who heard it. Such as it is, we transfer it from a merely literary magazine, in which it appeared several years since, to these columns, where it is more sure to meet the eye of music-lovers.

The music of the Mass has latterly commanded some attention among musical circles, even in this country, outside of the Roman Church. For music, fortunately, is of no sectarian persuasion, and come from whatever source it may, if it be genuine, great music, it goes to the very inmost heart of all men, and becomes a blending, reconciling influence. Sacred music, in the common sense of the term, includes many forms of composition, from the simplest to the most elaborate, in all of which, much genuine inspiration is most worthily treasured up. The Catholic Mass, once a very solemn and severe musical service, limited to great plainness, was in its essential form, something so germinal and organic as to be very attractive to the modern composers; and in the hands of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Hummel, Cherubini, and the like, it has become expanded (some would say secularized;) into the most perfect, in many respects, of all the forms of extended vocal and instrumental composition.

Such music is too beautiful, too vital, too human, too universal and eternal in its meanings to be monopolized by any church. They belong to humanity,—these precious legacies, these living holy influences of genius; and none the less so that we gratefully acknowledge that it was the patronage, and to some extent the spiritual maternity of the Roman Church, which chiefly called such genius to such occupation. When will Protestantism do as much? Let those who are anxious to improve its music borrow what they can, of these good things; let them study till they appreciate this part of the common heritage, come through what hands it may, till warmed by what is true and divine in it, their Protestantism, or religion of whatsoever name, shall itself impart an impulse to the genius that can create even greater music than has yet been.

The depth and beauty of the Masses grow upon the hearer with every repetition; and little musical groups who study them together, singing such portions as they can, by way of practice, or holding social "readings" of them for the edification of themselves and listening friends, soon become partial to them, before all other vocal music. And well it may be! For in their composition the rarest genius, the profoundest musical learning and science, the most inspiring texts, and the most solemn occasions conspired. The Mass is commonly written in four voice parts, (sometimes, as in Beethoven's Missa Solennis in D, with four solo and four chorus parts,) with alternations of solo, quartet, and chorus passages. And each voice-part, as well as the air, has a movement and a melody of its own, maintaining a clear individuality, at the same time that all are woven into a complex and harmonious unity, according to the profound fugue principal which more or less runs through all Art, hinted at when not strictly followed. But all this science is perfectly subordinated and essential to expression. Complex and subtle as is the organic structure of such music, it is so because it is so spontaneous a creation of nature and of feeling. Mozart's and Haydn's Masses abound in melodies, which entwine themselves about the popular heart as sweetly and as readily, as any street tunes, only let them become equally familiar; showing that the highest can speak to the common breast.

Nor is it such an objection, as it seems at first sight, that they are sung in a foreign and a dead language. The Latin text of the Mass, which is always the same, and not, like our psalmody, a whole voluminous rhymed literature, any dozen of whose stanzas are made to go to the same tune, if only of the right length,—rehearses in few, fit, manly and euphonious words, all the essential moods and phases, memories and attitudes, and aspirations of the Christian worship. They are mostly of a very universal character; all, indeed, easily interpreted so. And this little series of time-hallowed texts or germs, which every worshipper can understand, (since they simply recall common experiences, and do not task the reason with new trains of thought,) are verified, over and over, by music, into infinitely various suggestions. There is no risk of sameness; for, for the purpose of music, a few good words are better than many, and old words are better than new. What the Madonna has been as a subject to the old painters, are these constant texts of the Catholic Mass to the composers. The words, though in a dead tongue, are in these cases living symbols: the oldest and most universal symbols, those which are identified with more than one age and one people, so they be simple, are the best. Now to an habitual audience, no matter how illiterate, the meaning of the Gloria, the Benedictus, the Sanctus, the Crucifixus, etc., is as readily recognized, as if each one could translate and parse each Latin noun and verb; far more readily apprehended, in fact, than would be the sense of some new sentences or stanzas every Sunday in their own vernacular.

As we have said, there is abundant alternation of sentiment in a Mass; it modulates through all the important shades of the devout emotions, while the impression of the ensemble is predominating cheerfulness,—without which it could not be the voice of any true religion. The grave and solemn supplication of the opening Kyrie eleison (Lord, have mercy;) the triumphant Gloria in Excelsis, subdued to heart-felt, quiet thankfulness in the Gratias agimus, shaded for a time by the Miserere and Qui tollis, but sparkling into sunshine again in the Quoniam; the angust Cum Sancto Spiritu, wrought frequently into an elaborate fugue: this for introduction. Then the middle portion, which is the "heart" of this great "mystery," consisting of, first the cheerful, honest, hurried, narrative style of the Credo; next the deep, dark, mysterious, awe and pity-moving harmonies of the Et incarnatus est and the Crucifixus; and finally the sudden deliverance and contrast of the Resurrexit, leaping forth in rapturous joy and freedom. To this add another solemn choral pause, the Sanctus; then the stately, gentle, spring-like Benedictus; the profound tenderness of the Agnus Dei; and the happy, child-like dismissal hymn of Dona nobis pacem: and is not here enough, when it is all made alive and glowing with the recreative warmth of music, to constitute a complete act of worship in itself?

On the distinctive styles of the great modern Mass composers, we can say little here. Haydn's Masses are perhaps the most popular, as well as the most uniformly elaborate and ornate in their structure; child-like, sunny, fertile in imagery, and of an infallible ease, and grace, and elegance, as you would expect from the composer of the "Creation," and the "Seasons;" and he can take you shuddering through subterranean passages of dark and gloomy harmony. But Mozart is deeper and more spiritual, while the greater part of his masses, written before he was twenty-two years old, are comparatively unlabored and spontaneous productions, that seem to have gushed forth directly from his young religious nature. And yet they seem, the best of them, to have been wrung from the profoundest experience of the long-tried heart of a man, as well as to pour forth the raptures of a bright seraph-soul, which has not yet buried any portion of its heavenly inheritance in the earth. Beethoven wrote but two, and they are as grand and deep and original, and full of the sense of the Infinite, as are his mighty instrumental works. Hummel and Cherubini we have only room to name.

It was to Mozart that the peculiar spirit of this kind of music was most native. You feel it in the most careless, as in the most elaborate thing he does in this form. All that we have said has been simply preparatory to an attempt at a descriptive analysis of what is the greatest of his regular masses, namely, his celebrated Twelfth Mass. But in offering it, we must confess our perfect consciousness of the untranslatable-ness of music into speech. The "Requiem" is a more stupendous production, and undoubtedly the deepest revelation of Mozart's genius; but here we take the Twelfth Mass, as a specimen of the regular Masses.

It opens in G major, and is commonly called the Mass in G, although a majority of its movements are in the next related and most central, that is to say, the natural key—the complete noon-day sunshine of the key of C. This would be Greek to unmusical readers, and indeed there are learned musical theorists who deny that there is any characteristic difference in the keys or scales of music; yet in the every day experience and conversation of musicians, such a difference is recognized and means not a little. The tone marked C in our tone-system, or series, occupies about the centre of the whole compass of tones through which the four classes of male and female voices range; and correspondingly it may be supposed that a line equally dividing the whole audible compass of tones high and low (audible, we mean, and appreciable to the collective hearing of humanity,) would pass through a tone marked C, which, though subject to some variation of the "concert pitch" through ages, is always an approximation to, a sounding, as it were, for that absolute centre of our human scale of hearing. It is the equatorial region, so to speak, of the tone-sphere. As each of the twelve notes is the centre of one system, the fundamental "tonic," the alpha and omega of one scale; so the whole C scale or system is the greater centre about which all these systems turn, holding the same sovereignty or chiefship among the various keys, which the key-note or tonic holds among the tones of its own special scale or key. Its expression is of the fullness of life, the completed octave of experiences. There is a sense of at-home-ness and repose when music stays in it or returns to it. It is broad and sunny and serene, with the calmness of a fully awakened being, of a harmonious activity in which all the struggling aspirations or sinking regrets seem reconciled forever in the joy of perfect realization. The very sublimest heights of musical effect, the few grandest passages which have seemed to rend the veil and universalize our being while we listened, are in this key. For instance, the chorus "And there was Light," in Haydn's Creation, and the magnificent climax of Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, where all the struggling, restless purposes of the preceding movements effect their deliverance into C major in the Triumphal March. It cannot be said, of course, that this is the only sublime; but the sublimity of all other keys has in it always something of the restlessness of passion; this alone reaches the clear celestial; this alone is Light itself, colorless, because in it all colors blend. Most suitable is it for this blithe Catholic worship—for the truly catholic and universal sentiment of the Mass. For this is the religion of Joy. Creeds may narrow and authority may crush the ignorant votary; but listening to this music he is caught up into celestial states. As we have written elsewhere, the mystery of the cross and the ascension, the glorious doctrine of the kingdom of heaven, are not reasoned out to his understanding, or doled out as dry crumbs of catechism, but they are passed through his very soul, like an experience, in these all-permeating clouds of sound.—But to proceed at once to our analysis.

A single firm bass voice commences the Kyrie eleison, and pronounces these words twice in a grave and slowly measured tone of supplication, yet fully self-possessed and balanced. Then a single tenor begins repeating the same notes, the first voice pausing for a measure, but instantly overtaking it with a more figured and elated step, though always slow and dignified as it began. Soon a soprano and an alto pour in their sweet floods to swell the strain—floods of rose-light upon the gray heaving ocean. The orchestral accompaniments brighten and become more varied as the full choir adds its weight to the quartet; and the parts go on, now blending in rich chords, now echoing each other's sudden thoughts of melody, until there is a regular cadence on the key-note, and a momentary suspension of the voices. The instruments however keep on, modulating into the Dominant, when presently again a single bass begins with Christe eleison (Christ have mercy!) and is joined as before by the tenor, and then by the upper parts of the quartet. The musical ideas expand and multiply; the accompaniments grow more and more active and inventive of all manner of melodic graces. The perpetual transformations and reproductions of the musical themes, it is impossible to describe; but hope and trust and love find large room and free play in the course of this solemn initiatory supplication, and Music exercises its right here of lifting into lyric fervor even the prayer in which our souls bow down. The Christe closes on the chord of D, the instruments adding at the same time the Dominant Seventh, whereby the original key-note is brought back, and with it a repetition of the Kyrie in the same plainer and severer strain in which it was first given out.

Now in quick yet steady time goes up the Gloria in excelsis (Glory to God in the highest,) in full chorus, climbing through the common chord intervals of the key of C. The heat is in the accompaniments, the voices take deliberate, long notes at first. Through one whole octave they have climbed, and the silvery soprano soar to G above, which they sustain as long as breath will hold out, while the bass makes vigorous laconic answers, several times, to the liquid chiming voices of the tenor and the alto, as they move so brotherly and sisterly, arm in arm together. Boldly and swiftly falls the unison, as an individual sunbeam, in the words et in terra ("and on earth"); and sweetly, as in rainbows, does that beam spread itself open into all the colors of a soft full chord upon the word pax (peace), which the voices breathe once, and then hush themselves to listen to the ethereal accompaniments, then breathe it once again. Twice is the whole passage given, for the ear demands it. The great choir resigns to the quartet the gentle ejaculations: Laudamus—benedicimus—adoramus—glorificamus ("we praise thee, we bless thee" &c.), and the subdued devotion of the Gratias agimus ("we give thanks"), which sinks awhile into the serious minor mood of gratitude ("most musical, most melancholy!"); when the whole vocal sea breaks in again with the "Lord God, Father Omnipotent," for a triumphal close. This Gloria has been sung in Boston with sublime effect by a chorus of seven hundred voices, during the August Musical Conventions; the only drawback being the substitution of English words.

In the earnest, deep Adagio of the Qui tollis peccata mundi (Who takest away the sins of the world), and the Miserere, in C minor, the plaintive voices slowly and painfully lift their long chromatic waves of harmony, while the blessed skies descend in mercy upon them in the exquisite melodic figures of the orchestra. They soon emerge into the relative major of the key, and the smothered prayer of penitence breathes freely again in the genial element of E flat, in the very darkest depths of its prostration pressing open now and then the gates of solemn joy. It is the grandeur of grief, wherein glorious prophecies are born. The sad chorus sinks into itself again, into the same minor key; but in its last and lowest prolonged murmur, with which it dies away, the Third is raised (a common practice in the old ecclesiastical music, and one most true to nature), and the closing chord surprises and revives you with C major.

Forth springs the sprightly Quoniam, rejoicing in its freedom, and you fling off every weight to revel in its long lark-like carols. This is in G. And now comes the grand finale to this anterior portion of the Mass, the elaborate Amen fugue: Cum Sancto Spiritu. All the voices are consolidated at first upon the massive chord of C, and give the words out once in simultaneous Adagio movement. Then the basses start off with the swift theme or subject of the fugue; the tenors follow, then the alti, then the soprano, and all these go up in spiral chase, kindling with new enthusiasm, and weaving of their eager individualities a perfect unitary Whole, which rises as serenely as if there were no rivalry, no mutual pursuit and flight among its members. It is the admirable balance resulting from the very furor of their emulation. In point of artistic skill, this of course is the difficult and learned citadel of this whole composition. But it is not a mere scientific achievement; nor is a true fugue ever merely that. There is no form in nature, in which life, force, passion, genius, more spontaneously clothes itself, than in this which is the fugue in music, and which in other arts has manifestations perfectly analogous, while nature's forms of motion, as waves, fountains, running fields of grain, the upward flickerings of flame, and the spiral tendency in plants, are types of it, both variable and constant, on all sides of us. The fugue is the sublimest form of music, the orderly whirlwind of passionate enthusiasm, of religious rapture, raised by the feeling of the Infinite, and striving with exhaustless energy, "renewed like the eagle's," to reach the throne of the One. A fugue seems never finished; it is a typical form of the Infinite. More or less of it, its spiral tendency, enters into all Art. And in music we are disposed to think it the inspired part of all form, the very heart-secret and most unteachable and esoteric method of genius. Its expression in this Amen Chorus, is as of wave after wave of being, pouring in to swell the ocean triumphs of God.

The middle portion of the Mass is the Credo, or confession of faith, which embraces several movements, and is always joyous. In this Mass of Mozart, it has all the bold confidence and child-like innocence of a spontaneous declaration of trust in infinite goodness. The words of this old creed literally never yet went down with all devout minds, but their general tenor is broad and universal, and music, the interpreter in this case, is altogether so. It extracts and reëmbodies only the spirit of the doctrine, leaving the "letter that killeth;" it brings out that inmost life of it which all hearts feel, and miraculously revivifies and transfigures the cold statements of the understanding with the warm faith of feeling. In music there is no controversy; in music there are no opinions; its springs lie deeper than the foundations of any of these partition walls; its breath floats undivided over all their heads. No danger to the Catholic, whose head is clouded by dull superstitions, so long as his heart is nourished and united with the life of all lives by this refreshing dew!

The commencement of this Credo is a quick movement in C major, full of spirit and decision, and of an upsoaring faith. The voices climb above their respective natural limits, semitone by semitone, leisurely exulting upon each new height won; and it seems as if the whole tone-structure would grow up into the sky. A happy idea in the orchestral accompaniment, adds unspeakably to the grace and buoyancy of this: one little rhythmic figure of a single measure, reiterated through it all, only floating higher or lower with the vocal harmonies, seems to coin the whole space between earth, and heaven into bird-like carols; so simple, yet unpurchasable are the means of genius. Now creeps the awful shadow of a mystery over all this sunshine. The key is changed to the relative minor; a bold and startling call of the instruments commences the Adagio, answered by mellow, mournful strains of the wind instruments, sombre and portentous.—A tenor solo sings of the Incarnation, in a most pathetic, deeply reverent strain; Crucifixus, in short broken accents, is whispered by the bass, the soprano, the alto, first in succession, then together, while the tenor pursues its mournful theme. All unite in long grave tones of darker harmony on the words Passus et Sepultus est, ("he suffered and was buried,") and again the struggling chords pass out with a shudder into the bright daylight of the major of the key. At the Et resurrexit, (and he rose again,)—this too in the key of C,—the exultation of the strain seems almost audacious, so quaintly and irresistibly are the crowded syllables hurried away by the energy of the music. There is a certain see-saw carelessness too, in the rising and sinking of the song-tide, which tempts one to ask if humor can have place in heaven. The reaction, in the accompaniments, between a rushing bass and syncopated full chords in the upper parts, gives a crowded and disorderly sensation, when nevertheless all is perfect order, and the beautiful goddess of Art never snaps her magic coasts.

It is a singular fact that music so unconsciously betrays a chaste smile of humor in the midst of some of its most exalted passages. Mozart's operas and Haydn's quartets, are full of humor, which resides purely in the music. The symphonies of Beethoven relax their proud flight, and recover their Titanic strength, in the versatile, wild Scherzo, which means jest and frolic. Even in Handel's most sublime Messiah, there are touches of colossal humor in the play of one or two of those grand choruses. Strange as it may seem, this frolic child was born amid the heaviest brain-work, and hard by the holiest springs of feeling. There is nothing trivial in it, certainly in this case; moreover something of it is attributable to a certain traditional Catholic cant, as it were, in music, of which there is always more or less in this part of a mass. The time is rapid, the rhythm irregular (the frequent syllables seeming rather chanted than sung,) the voices much of the way in unison, and the whole progression singular. But after the sweet, subdued strain: Confiteor unum, how solemn and big with meaning is this very unison upon the words Et expecto resurrectionem! ("I await the resurrection!")—all the manifold hues of feeling, whose variety made harmony, shrink back into naked identity, at the solemn surprise of that thought! Every trace of sportiveness or quaintness has long since vanished, and now the passage Et vitam venturi sæculi, passes off with mingled bursts of rapture and low tremulous tones of love. Here ends the Credo.

In the third and last division of the mass we have the grave and solemn Sanctus, in full chorus, as of a kneeling multitude, which is incontinently followed by the loud clarion peals of the Hosanna in Excelsis! And then that most exquisite introductory symphony—almost overture—to the Benedictus qui venit, (blessed is he who cometh,) with its innocent, blithe pastoral warble of reed instruments, is played in the key of F, which is always like a soothing walk with nature. This is the most elaborate and ornate portion of the Mass, excepting of course the fugue before described. Full of tenderness and grateful love, it gives free scope to voice and fancy; and the fond melodies, as if loath to part with their sweet lives, grow into livelier efflorescence, and require of each part in turn a solo such as tries the heights and depths, and flexibility of the best trained voices. It is a beautiful and finished whole and leaves nothing which heart or taste could desire.

But our terms, as well as the reader's patience, no doubt, are exhausted, and we will signalize the Agnus Dei, whose beauty and tenderness are perhaps the most profound of all, by silence; and let the whole float gracefully and lovingly away in the fresh, buoyant, simple strain of the Dona nobis Pacem, (grant us peace!)

Jullien's Orchestra.

The London Musical World names the following performers, who were to follow their leader to this country in the steamer from Liverpool, on the 3d inst.:

Four first violins—Thomas Baker (leader), Henry Hill, E. Mollenbauer, and F. Mollenbauer. These gentlemen are all known to the public as talented artists. The extraordinary duet playing of the brothers Mollenbauer must be well remembered by those who attended Jullien's concerts in the winter.

Second violin, Louis Barque; tenor and viol d'amor, Schreus; first violoncello, Lütgen; second violoncello, Engelke. Most of these are from the celebrated band of the Theatre de la Monnaie, otherwise the Grand Opera, at Brussels.

A. Winterbottom, and White—both English double-bass players of talent.

LAVIGNE, first oboe—one of the greatest performers in the world; De Prins, second oboe—another good player on the same instrument, also from Brussels.

WUÏLE, first clarinet—the Belgian Lazarus, an artist who has no superior on his instrument; Sonnenberg, second clarinet, a player of the highest ability, who has frequently distinguished himself at the Drury Lane concerts.

COLLINET, flageolet—the little king of that little instrument.

REICHERT, flute—an executant of unrivalled ability, whose performances have been frequently the source of astonishment and delight to the musical public during the season now expiring, (at Benedic's monster-concert, at the concerts of the New Philharmonic Society, at Jullien's Testimonial Concert, at the benefit of Sims Reeves, &c., &c.) Reichert is a Belgian, and was introduced to Jullien, while at Brussels, by Fétis, the distinguished theorist, critic, and principal of the Conservatoire.

Second flute, Charles—a good player; first bassoon, Hardy, an English performer of eminence; horns, Stenebrugg and Hughes—the former from Brussels, and both tried performers.

WINTERBOTTOM, trombone—one of the finest players on that fine instrument, who performed a solo, composed by David, the violinist of Leipzig, at the Philharmonic Concerts this season, with the greatest success.

Ophicleide, S. Hughes; Cornet-à-pistons, Holt; Drums, F. Hughes—well-known English players of ability.

DUEM, trumpet—from Brussels—the greatest player on that difficult instrument in all Belgium, and an equal proficient on the cornet-à-pistons.

Solo Cornet-à-pistons, KOENIG; Solo Contrabasso, BOTTESINI; Solo Vocalist, ANNA ZERR. Bottesini will go in an English boat, after the rest of the band.

We may add that the music in Struensee, which its illustrious composer, Meyerbeer, presented to Jullien at Berlin, will be among the novelties introduced at Castle Garden.

Miss Elise Hensler.

The Gazette Musicale of Paris (M. Fétis's paper) reports the annual Concours, or trial of skill, among the pupils of what is now styled the "Conservatoire Impérial de Musique et de Déclamation," which occupied the last week of July. There were competitions held and prizes given on different days, in harmony, in piano, organ and double-bass playing, in fugue and counterpoint, in solfeggios, and finally on Saturday in singing. Our young friend had not been in the Conservatoire long enough to compete according to usage; but a special exception was made in her favor. Nor was it reasonable to anticipate a prize in her case, among so many much more practiced singers; yet out of twenty-nine competitors, she stood as high as number six, having received by unanimous vote of the judges the second accessit, which is the fourth degree of distinction, after a first and second prize and first accessit. Several Americans were present, who seem to have taken an enthusiastic interest in the occasion; and we were weighing the propriety of publishing a private letter, when we found a fuller one already public in the New York Times, of which we copy the principal portions. There is no need of our helping the newspaper circulation, which it is sure to receive; but our journal would hardly be complete without it. We rejoice sincerely in the success of the young artist, and congratulate those who so heartily came forward to ensure her talent the best European culture.

The young lady in question was Miss HENSLE, whom some music-loving Bostonians sent to Paris about six months ago, to perfect her musical education. She passed her examination for admission easily, and made such progress that M. Auber advised her to sing at the Concours, on trial, of which I am speaking. This was a rare proof of confidence, for she had been in the institution less than four months, and there are few instances of competing at an exhibition, after so brief a period of study. It was of course out of the question for her to win a prize. There were thirty concurrents besides herself, all of whom had been pupils over a year, and many over two years, and some of whom had in previous trials obtained prizes, and now, of course, expected higher prizes. The prizes are five: the First Prix consisting of 200 francs, or its value in music; the Second Prix consisting of 100 francs, or its value in music; and a First, Second, and Third Accessit, or certificate, without any value attached to it, other than the honor of having won it. The judges are nine in number: Auber, Adam, Halevy, Carafa, &c.; they sit in a large box in the first tier, directly in front of the stage. They make no allowances for anything—neither for fear, for youth, for failure of memory—the examination is purposely made severe, and is surrounded with as many circumstances of awe as possible. It is thought, with reason, that persons who are to confront audiences of many thousand persons, and obtain their bread before the foot-lights, must be trained early to forget their apprehensions, and devote all their energies to the purposes before them. There is no orchestra—the accompaniment is that of a simple piano. The singer's voice is alone in the theatre, with the compact audience, the frowning judges, and its friends under the chandelier, if it has any.

Our protégé was the twenty-fourth upon the list—the turn had been decided by drawing numbers from a hat—Auber's hat. If she were frightened, (and she says she was,) it did not appear in her voice. She overcame the thickly sown difficulties of the air, easily, and struck into the trill towards the end, which waylays the executant like Hell-gate in smooth water, with decision and effect. The audience listened better than they had listened lately, and were evidently rivetted by the exceeding beauty of the voice, though they had just heard more brilliant execution. The success was better than we had dared to hope, and we agreed that if there were six prizes, we might venture to claim one.

When the Concours was over, the disputants were called upon the stage, and the voting began in the jury-box. Casta Diva, which had been most admirably sung, won the first prize; and M. Auber communicated the gratifying fact to the smiling Mlle Girard. The laureate rose, and curtsied to the jury; and the audience applauded à outrance. This prize was granted unanimously. In the second prize there was a dissenting voice—one ball was given for Miss Hensler. We, under the chandelier, exchanged wondering glances, and supposed we had misunderstood. The voting continued—four balls for Miss Hensler, for the first accessit! "Why, what does this mean," said Mr.

—of Boston. "Why, it means," said Mrs. —, of Philadelphia, "that we shall have the second accessit, sure." Great agitation ensued under the chandelier. The voting began again. Nine balls, a unanimous vote, for us and our candidate! This result, utterly unexpected and un hoped for, was the cause of congratulations on all sides. Perhaps the most pleased was Bordogni, the Professor, who confesses now that he had aimed at the third accessit, but not at the second.

Musical Intelligence.

New York.—Jullien's "monster" ophicleid is exhibited in Broadway, and there is much talk of his monster drum, used in his concerts when great, striking effects are required, and played upon, it is said, by a drummer at each end. This has not yet arrived; it probably will take two ships to bring it. But Jullien has a bigger drum than that at his command; namely, the great press drum, which stretches its sheep-skin over the whole land, and is a wonderful E pluribus unum, made up of a vast number of all sorts of drums, including "snare-drums," "side-drums," "base-drums," humdrums, and doldrums. This is the great drum suspended over Jullien's orchestra, one end of it in Europe, the other (now the loudest) in America; and Jullien is the king of drummers thereupon.

Foreign.

PARIS.—The Académie Impériale de Musique will reopen on the 8th or 10th of August, with the Huguenots. M. Meyerbeer has written some new airs de ballet for the third act.—Madame Viardot has arrived in Paris.—Emile Prudent has left Paris for Geneva.—Sowinski, the pianist, has gone to Vichy.

Ferdinand Hiller has left Paris for Cologne, where he intends to reside permanently, as principal of the Conservatoire in that city.

M. Halevy has finished his new three-act opera for the Opera Comique, which is in full rehearsal, and will in all likelihood be brought out in the first week of August. Meanwhile they have been playing at that theatre Haidée (Auber), the Diserteur (Monsigny), Le Maçon (Auber), and L'ombre (D'Argentine), with Mademoiselle Revilly and Lemercier, MM. Sainte Foix, Mocker, and Puget. The last, a new tenor, appears to have achieved a great success in Haidée, which has resumed all its old popularity.

The Theatre Lyrique will shortly re-open with a new three-act opera by Adrien Boieldieu, the son of the famous Boieldieu.

Two other new operas, by Clapisson and Wekerlin, are in preparation. Among the troupe are Madame Cabel, from Brussels, M. and Madame Meillet, from the Opera Comique, &c., &c. M. Séveste, the manager, has appointed M. Deloffre, the violinist, who was so many years in England, the chef-d'orchestre. The Opera Lyrique is the third national French Opera in Paris. Carlotta Grisi is in Paris.

Liszt is expected daily at Paris.—The music publishers of Paris have addressed a circular to the Operatic composers, requesting them not to allow the authors of Fuadivilles to insert popular airs from their operas in their pieces until after the expiration of five years.—Madame Ugahle is singing at the Variétés.

A letter from a small Italian town, called Bussetto, informs us that Verdi is composing an opera on the subject of Shakspeare's King Lear.

Pesth.—Mademoiselle Terésa Milanollo, the violinist, is giving concerts here with great success.

At Seville a new opera has been brought out by a Spanish composer, in which Madame Gassier has completely taken hold of the public sympathies. The name of the composer is not mentioned.

Advertisements.

HAND-BOOK OF SINGING.

RIMBAULT'S HAND-BOOK OF SINGING: being the Second of Rimbault's Series of Elementary Music Works. Just published. Price 50 cents. OLIVER DITSON, 115 Washington St.

NORMA.

JUST PUBLISHED: THE OPERA OF NORMA, WITH ENGLISH AND ITALIAN WORDS. Price $2. Being No. 1 of "Ditson's Edition of Standard Operas."

"At the low price of two dollars this opera is accessible to every music-lover, and in a form convenient and beautiful."—Journal of Music.

"A perfect mine of musical wealth."—Ch. Freeman.

"One of the most beautiful and recherche of all the elegant musical publications—and their name is legion—which have appeared from Mr. Ditson's teeming press."—Yankee Blade.

"Less than half the cost of a similar edition published in England, it is within the reach of all."—Transcript.

"Superb both as regards the composition, and the taste and skill displayed in its typographical and its mechanical execution generally."—Pathfinder.

DON GIOVANNI, by MOZART, will be ready in a few days. Price $1. Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

Sold by all Music Dealers.

SOPRANO SINGER.

A YOUNG LADY is desirous of procuring a situation as SOPRANO SINGER in a Quartet Choir, by the 1st of October. Application to be made to Miss FANNY FRAZER, care of G. P. REED & Co., Tremont Row. Aug. 20.

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE,
No. 86 TREMONT STREET, BOSTON.

WHITE BROTHERS,
DEALERS IN MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS,
Best Italian, German, French and English Strings,

AGENTS OF

J. André, Offenbach; and G. André, Philadelphia,
FOR THE SALE OF FOREIGN CLASSIC MUSIC,
CHOIR MUSIC, &c.

Instruments Made, Repaired, Tuned, Bought, Sold, or
Exchanged, on the most favorable terms.

IRA J. WHITE. A. WARREN WHITE.
iii 2 3m

Pianos and Melodeons to Let.

OLIVER DITSON,

Music Dealer, 115 Washington St., Boston.

HAS a good variety of Piano Fortes, Melodeons, Seraphines,
and Reed Organs, to let, for city or country, on low terms.
If, within one year from the time of hiring, the party should conclude to purchase the instrument, no charge will be made for rent of it, except the interest on its value. 25 tf

L. O. EMERSON,

Teacher of the Piano-Forte and Singing.

APPLY AT HIS RESIDENCE,

No. 12 INDIANA PLACE, BOSTON.

iii 13 3m.

A. W. FRENZEL,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC, and late Leader of the "SAXONIA ORCHESTRA," having made Boston his residence, is prepared to give Lessons on the Piano-Forte and in Singing, both in the English and German languages; also to accompany with the violin more advanced pupils in the Sonata-duos of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c. During the summer season, Mr. F. offers his services to classes out of town. Or he will receive scholars, from the city or the country, at his Music Rooms, No. 4 Pine Street, Boston, where he may always be found before 10 A. M., and between the hours of 1 and 3 P. M. iii 6

JONAS CHICKERING,

RESPECTFULLY gives notice to his friends and the public
that, having recovered from the late disastrous effects produced by the destruction of his factory, he is now ready to receive orders for PIANOS, which he promises to execute with
as much faithfulness and promptitude as heretofore.

379 Washington Street, Boston. tf

Mar. 5.

HEWES' PATENT

AMERICAN ACTION PIANOFORTE.

THE MANUFACTURER is in possession of numerous testimonials from distinguished Musical Professors, who have used the greatly improved ACTION PIANO, commending it
in high terms. The attention of purchasers and amateurs of Music to an examination of its superiority, is solicited.

GEO. HEWES, 365 Washington St., Boston. tf

Apr. 10.

THEODORE T. BARKER,

MUSIC STORE,

No. 381 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

Chickering's Pianos to let.

All Foreign and American Musical Publications received as soon as published. ii 23 3m

N. D. COTTON,

IMPORTER AND DEALER IN

English, French, and American Stationery,
DRAWING & PAINTING MATERIALS,

No. 13 Tremont Row, Boston.

*. * Wedding and Visiting Cards Engraved and Printed. 16 tf

D. B. NEWHALL,

MANUFACTURER AND DEALER IN
PIANO FORTES,

No. 344 Washington Street, Boston.

PIANO FORTES REPAIRED, TUNED, & TO LET.
Apr. 10. tf

BEETHOVEN'S ORATORIO OF ENGEDI, or
DAVID IN THE WILDERNESS, known as the MOUNT OF OLIVES, is this day published in a neat, convenient form for the singer or concert-goer by

Geo. P. Reed & Co., Publishers,
17 Tremont Row, Boston.

— Edward L. Balch,

NEW SINGING BOOK!

UNION OF POPULAR AUTHORS!!

WM. B. BRADBURY.

GEORGE F. ROOT.

THOMAS HASTINGS.

T. B. MASON.

THE SHAWM.

A COMPLETE LIBRARY OF CHURCH MUSIC. By WILLIAM B.
BRADBURY and GEORGE F. ROOT, assisted by THOS. HASTINGS and T. B. MASON.

It is believed that by a union of the experience and resources of so many distinguished authors, a work of peculiar interest and usefulness has been produced. It contains in all about one thousand compositions, thus affording opportunity to collect together all the old favorites, and yet to give an increased amount of new music.

Some features of the work may be mentioned as follows:

1. PSALM AND HYMN TUNES.—These may be divided into two classes, the old and the new. It is safe to assert that no previous similar work has contained nearly as many of the favorite compositions of all our most popular American as well as foreign authors. But few tunes are in familiar use in the vestries, social meetings or congregations of any portion of the land, which are not here preserved. Besides their own compositions, the authors have, by special arrangement, been permitted to make use of many of the favorite works of Mr. LOWELL
MASON, and other distinguished authors.

The quantity of new tunes presented is also unusually large.
Assistance from abroad has been enjoyed by foreign correspondence, as well as by untiring research among the works of the greatest composers of the past and present. But especially will the Shawm be found rich in its home department. Besides the authors themselves, many of our most celebrated American musicians have contributed to its pages.

2. VARIETY OF METERS.—While the chief portion of the work is devoted to those meters which are in most common use, there will be found tunes of every meter in use by any denomination. Some idea of the variety and completeness in this respect, may be obtained from the fact that there are over one hundred different meters represented.

3. ANTHEMS, CHANTS, SET-PIECES, &c.—Due attention has been paid to this portion of the work, and there will be found pieces appropriate to almost every possible religious occasion.

4. The new Cantata (or Oratorio) entitled DANIEL; OR THE CAPTIVITY AND RESTORATION, in three parts. The words are by C. M. Cady, Esq., assisted by Miss Frances Jane Crosby; the music by George F. Root and Wm. B. Bradbury. Though complete as a whole, and designed especially for Societies, Choirs, Singing Schools, &c., nearly all the choruses may be used as original pieces in the regular sanctuary service.

5. THE SINGING CLASS, is a department designed as a complete manual for Music Classes, which has received most careful attention. The brief space of time usually allotted to the study of the Elementary in Singing Schools has been kept in mind, and a new arrangement has been adopted, intertwining the practical with the theoretical from the very first lesson, and combining simplicity with progression. The introduction of quite a number of easy glees and part songs in this elementary department is a feature which will help to keep in active exercise the interests of a class.

6. INDEXES.—The completeness of these will add much to the convenience of the work. The Chorister's Index refers to nearly every Hymn Book in use.

7. THE BEAUTY OF THE TYPOGRAPHY will elicit admiration.

8. THE CHEAPNESS OF THE WORK; though containing so greatly increased an amount of matter, and combining the labors of several authors, the price will not be greater than that of previous works.

Other points might be alluded to, but it is hoped every teacher of music and chorister will be sufficiently interested to make a careful examination of the work for himself. Any such can have a copy sent him free of postage, for examination, by remitting 60 cents to the publishers.

aug 13 4t

MASON BROTHERS,

No. 23 Park Row, New York.

J. C. WOODMAN,

ORGANIST AND CONDUCTOR OF MUSIC AT CENTRAL CHURCH,

Teacher of Singing, Piano Forte, &c.,

No. 94 Chestnut Street, Boston.

iii 2 3m.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.

FOREIGN MUSIC DEPOT,

GIRARD HOUSE BUILDINGS,

NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,

PHILADELPHIA.

N. B. The complete works, for Piano, (Quartets, Trios,
Duets for Piano and Violin, Duets for four hands and Piano solo pieces,) of BEETHOVEN and MOZART, as also the Piano solo
works of CLEMENTI and HAYDN, as published by J. André, Offenbach, in sets, at very low prices. We have appointed

Messrs. WHITE BROTHERS,

TREMONT TEMPLE, BOSTON,

our Agents for the sale of the above Standard Editions of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, &c. &c.

iii 2 tf

MRS. ROSA GARCIA DE RIBAS,

TEACHER OF THE

PIANOFORTE, SINGING & GUITAR,

2 Seneca St., corner Harrison Avenue.

MR. De RIBAS will give instruction on the Oboe and
Flute. Also MUSIC ARRANGED, TRANSPOSED, &c.
Boston, April 23. 3m

Letter-Press, Music and Job Printing—Office,

SIGNOR G. C. GUIDI respectfully informs his former pupils and the public, that he has resumed his instructions
in SINGING, after the Italian school, with the intention to settle permanently in Boston. In order to accommodate those who may not wish to take private instruction, he will open classes for ladies and gentlemen, on moderate terms. None
but good voices will be admitted. Terms liberal for persons intending to study for professional purposes.

Sig. G. can be consulted free upon any musical subject, daily, from 12 to 2, at Mr. Hewes's Piano Manufactory, No. 365 Washington street, where terms and time for classes may be known.

Orders or notes for Sig. G. may be addressed to him at G. P.
Reed & Co.'s Music Store, 17 Tremont Row, and at Oliver
Ditson's, 115 Washington street. Feb. 5.

A CARD.

THE SUBSCRIBER respectfully offers his services to the public as Teacher of the Piano-Forte, the Violin and the Guitar, also of Harmony and Singing, after a clear and easy method. He will also accompany pupils, both in seminaries and in private houses, in the practice of Duets, Trios, &c.
Address for the present at 168 Tremont Street.

March 26. 3m.

CARL GÄRTNER.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
265 Washington Street, Boston.

Oct. 16.

3m

T. BRICHER,

Organist and Conductor of Music

At the Bowdoin Square Church.

OFFICE UNDER THE CHURCH. . . ENTRANCE ON CHARDON ST.

Jan. 22. 3m.

H. S. CUTLER,

Organist at the Church of the Advent, also of
the Boston Harmonic Society.

ADDRESS—(Care of ROLAND CUTLER, No. 4 Market Square, Boston.) 22 tf

F. F. MÜLLER,

DIRECTOR OF MUSIC AND ORGANIST at the Old South
Church; ORGANIST of the Handel and Haydn Society;
ORGANIST of the Musical Education Society, &c. &c. &c.
Residence, No. 3 Winter Place, Boston. ii 7 tf

NATHAN RICHARDSON,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC.

Letters may be addressed at the Revere House, Boston. 25 tf

GEORGE F. WILLEY,

TEACHER OF MUSIC.

Private Tuition in the principles of Music and the Cultivation of the Voice.

MUSIC ROOM, THE LECTURE ROOM OF KIRK STREET CHURCH,
RESIDENCE, 34 FRANKLIN SQUARE, SUFFOLK STREET,
Feb. 5. LOWELL, MASS.

Germania Serenade Band.

THE SERVICES OF THIS ASSOCIATION can be secured
by applying to
ii 14 tf G. SCINAPP, Leader,
364 Tremont Street.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

AT 21 SCHOOL STREET, BOSTON.

$2 per annum, in advance.

ITS CONTENTS relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time,—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music published at home and abroad. 3. A Summary of the significant Musical News from all parts; gathered from English, German, French, as well as American papers. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6.
Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, Architecture, Poetry, Esthetic Books, the Drama, &c.—
8. Original and Selected Poems, short Tales, Anecdotes, &c.
Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished. Address, (post paid,) J. S. DWIGHT,
21 School Street, Boston.

RATES FOR ADVERTISING.

For half a square, (8 lines,) or less, first insertion, . . . $0.50
each additional inser. 25

For a square, (16 lines,) first insertion, 1.00
each additional insertion, 50

On advertisements standing three months or longer, a discount of twenty per cent. on the above rates is allowed.
(A column counts as seven squares.)

Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements,
quarterly in advance.

No. 21 School St.

DWIGHT'S Journal of Music.

A Paper of Art and Literature.

VOL. III

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 27, 1853.

NO. 21.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

TERMS....TWO DOLLARS PER ANNUM, (IN ADVANCE.)

CITY Subscribers can be served at their houses by the further payment of fifty cents per annum.

☞ For Rates of Advertising, see last page.

POSTAGE, if paid in advance, for any distance within the State, thirteen cents a year; if not in advance, twenty-six cents. To all places beyond the State, double these rates.

J. S. DWIGHT,.....EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

☞ OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St.

By REDDING & CO., 8 State St.

" GEO. P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row.

" A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.

" DEXTER & BROTHERS, 43 Ann Street, N. Y.

" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 722 Broadway, N. Y.

" MASON BROTHERS, 23 Park Row, New York.

" GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.

" G. ANDRE, 229 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St., Balt.

" COLBURN & FIELD, Cincinnati, O.

" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Persons willing to become Agents for procuring subscribers, especially Music-Dealers and Teachers, are invited to correspond with the Editor, as above. Satisfactory references required, and liberal commissions allowed.

☞ Back numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Also bound copies of Vols. I. and II. at prices varying from $2.50 to $3.50.

GAËTANO DONIZETTI.

In 1815 a young man might have been observed toiling along the high road towards Bologna; he oft turned to throw a glance, from time to time, on the walls of Bergamo, the native city he was then quitting for the first time. If a tear coursed its silent way down his youthful cheek in remembrance of the dear father, of the adored mother he was leaving behind him, it was speedily chased thence by the sun-smile of Hope with which alternately his face grew radiant, that smile of Hope, the natural offspring of every young aspirant bound on the unknown yet bright road—to Futurity. Besides, the sun of Italy is so transcendent, the air so pure and light to the lungs of seventeen! and, how eager the pinions of Liberty, when they essay their virgin flight! These mingled feelings, did they not of themselves constitute happiness? Our youthful traveller also, was he not happy? O, truly happy! he was young, handsome, and well-provided, and he dreamed the golden day-dream of Glory, Honor, and Wealth. Yet how far was he from appreciating the real happiness he then possessed; lost as he was in the Future, and the realization of his reveries.

In 1847, a carriage, carefully closed, entered Bergamo; within it reclined a man of sad and melancholy appearance; his vacant looks portrayed the profoundest grief; and his sombre visage was not relieved by the faintest ray of mind or intelligence. This living corpse which returned to its native city, was that of the young man who left it thirty-three years before, so rich in Hope for the Future. Moreover, his then dreams had been realized; Glory, Honor, Riches, all he had obtained; the world resounded with the praise of his name; kings and crowned heads had disputed for the honor of bestowing their Orders of decoration upon him, and of overwhelming him with their favors; every country had poured forth her gold and her laurel-wreaths as the reward of his Muse; was not all this the happiness he had dreamed of, he had aspired to?—But, at what price had he purchased it? his life would not have sufficed—he had bartered for this—his soul! The mind had given way beneath its overload of daily—of nightly—of hourly toil. Donizetti expiated in agony and suffering, mental as well as bodily, the pleasures he had furnished for thirty years to the intellectual and civilized World.

The examples of longevity amongst musical composers are of the rarest. Mozart, Weber, Cimarosa, Herold, Bellini, Mendelssohn, only proved, by their premature death, what must be the result of over-assiduous labor, and how the Art of Composition, oft-times so vain in its results, becomes serious in its practice. Of all the sister Arts, this is that which exacts the greatest amount of soul-offering from the devotee at its shrine. The inventive faculties cannot disperse themselves into or express themselves by the chisel or brush, as is the case with the Painter or Sculptor. To know how to compose, is to know how to subdue a fever, an estro, and apply it to Music—but this fever, have it who will, if it be deficient in you, you do not compose; ideas fail you, you think you originate, but you merely imitate, or make a piece of mosaic work; if, on the contrary, this estro attack you too often, you die: you die at thirty or at forty years of age; you have completed twenty or thirty lyric dramas, or a superb religious work; your contemporaries proclaim you as "a great man." Ten years after your death, not one note of your compositions is executed: twenty years—and they laugh those to scorn who dare still to cite your name: and your successors rise in the meridian and set with equal swiftness. Is not this a chronicle of nearly all composers, especially of those of Italy? Look, besides, at the painful struggle, which marks a theatrical career anywhere, especially that in Italy!

There is one thing granted in that country to the aspirant, if we are to put trust in public memoirs and private rumors, viz: opportunity; but this, with fatal drawbacks. The Maestro must have his talent at his pen's point; be prepared to illustrate any text, however vapid or absurd; to be serious or comic as the Manager pleases; to study the caprices of singers of every order of caprice, and what is more, the fashion of the hour, whether it be the flourish of a Rossini or the cantilena of a Bellini. For, that the public is in some sort indifferent to what is new, or at least declared to be so, by all who cater for its entertainment, is a fact well known to all who have had dealings with managers and artists; the former having for ever the word—"impossible!" in their mouth when any experiment is proposed; the latter rarely sure or hopeful of any effect, unless it be the repetition of some popular cantabile or bomba. In this we have one element of stage decline, which has never been duly examined, and still less grappled with. To return, however, to the special result of it under consideration,—the wonder seems, under all circumstances, not that so few Italian composers should be original, but that their works should manifest a single taste of novelty. It is observable that at least seven or eight operas were written by the composer under notice, before a symptom of style was revealed; and it was not till after the production of "Anna Bolena," "L'Esule di Roma," and "L'Elisir d'Amore," that he was admitted to take rank among the best of the Opera-writers who supply the Carnivals and Fairs with so-called novelties. On examination of these works, some speciality of merit must be admitted by all save the perversely bigoted. It will be found, that, besides admirable writing for the voices, there is an unusual variety and correctness in the instrumentation.

In Italy, it is sad to say, they do not cultivate the endearing faculty of remembrance; the operas of Verdi by right of their noise, could but be considered as fit antecedents to the roar of the artillery which so recently out-clamored them on the Lombard plains—and the dog-star Verdi has nearly already obliterated the serene planet Donizetti.

Gaëtano Donizetti was born at Bergamo in 1798. His father, holding an honorable municipal office, destined his son to the study of the Law; but, it was prognosticated that the young Gaëtano would become an artist, and his early inclinations and tastes directed his attention to Drawing and Painting. These lighter occupations displeased his father; the son combated the father's wishes, which were for making him a lawyer; the father combated the son's desire to enter the Architectural profession; a compromise between the two was effected; the one gave up the desk; the other the T square; and it was agreed that Gaëtano should become a musician.

He was at first placed with Simone Mayer who then resided at Bergamo. Spite of some already established and undisputed successes, Rossini had not as yet seized and appropriated wholly to himself the sceptre then jointly shared between Paër and Mayer. These instructions, therefore, of one of the first men of his day, were doubtless a great boon to the young Donizetti. Mayer, not slow in acknowledging and appreciating the intuitive aptness of his pupil for the Art, entertained such a sincere friendship for him, that he never addressed him otherwise than as his "dear son." He would not as yet suffer him to undertake studies of too abstruse a nature,—and violently opposed that wish of his family which was for sending him to Bologna to receive the instructions of the Padre Mattei, a learned contrapuntist, the pupil and successor of the famous Padre Martini.

After three years of study, Donizetti was considered to be fairly launched in the career that it was his destiny to run through with so much éclat. He made his debut at Venice in 1818, by a work, entitled "Enrico di Borgogna," which obtained so much success, that he was entrusted with another commission for the same city against the following year. After producing his "Il Fulegname di Livonia" at Mantua in 1819, he visited Rome, where in 1822, the good reception given to his "Zoraida di Granata," not only procured him an exemption from the conscription, but also the honor of being carried in triumph to, and crowned at the Capitol. His immediately succeeding works, which followed one another without interruption, may be looked upon as only signaling that bright epoch of Donizetti's Art-career, in which he but distinguished himself as a happy imitator of the Rossini school. It was not until 1830, that this composer's especial individuality discovered itself in his "Anna Bolena," produced at Milan, and which met with the greatest success. This famous work, composed expressly for Pasta and Rubini, was first presented in England on the occasion of Pasta's benefit in July 1831. The libretto of the piece possesses better poetry than the common run of libretti since the days of Metastasio; but the plot is meagre to a degree, although fiction has been freely called to the aid of historical matter-of-fact. In representing the unhappy Queen, Pasta had an opportunity of uniting in the same part, the prominent beauties of every character in which she had previously distinguished herself, displaying by turns, the most elevated dignity, the tenderest melancholy, and the sweetest pathos. Although forcibly reminded of Medea, Desdemona, and Nina, no direct resemblance might be found to either of those characters—the likeness being no other than that which must necessarily exist in a perfect representation of those passions. The part of Jane Seymour was on this occasion sustained by Mme. Gay, a thin wiry Soprano, and that of Smeaton by Mlle. Beck, a pleasing, but young and inexperienced Contralto. Lablache looked and acted the bluff tyrant admirably, and his singing was in his very best style.

In 1835, Donizetti visited Paris for the first time, and there produced his "Marino Faliero," which work did not obtain the real success that it deserved; Donizetti made but one bound from Paris to Naples; where he produced the same year "Lucia di Lammermoor," an opera destined to make the tour of, and spread its author's reputation through, all continental Europe. The failure of "Marino Faliero" may be, we think, ascribed to the mismanagement of the libretto, which according to* established Opera-fashion, goes as far and foolishly astray from the drama already written, as the story would possibly allow it. The Dogressa is here provided with a lover, and, what is worse, turns out, by her own confession, to be what "the ribald Steno" had declared her,—thus, taking away the offence of his calumny, as well as destroying the chaste, but not cold loftiness of the character as it stands in Byron's drama. In "Marino Faliero," as in Donizetti's other operas, there are to be found spirited and characteristic passages: as, for instance, the opening chorus among the arsenal workmen, which is energetic and stirring; also, the quaintly national gondolier chorus at the commencement of the second act; and the duet between the Doge and Israele Bertucci, if not original, is extremely well written. His two subsequent productions, the "Lucia di Lammermoor" and "Belisario," made their appearance in England somewhat in reverse order; viz. the "Belisario" in the April of 1837, the "Lucia" in that of 1838. With regard to the former work, the libretto follows the original story, about as nearly as "opera-wrights" usually agree with historians. The music may certainly be quoted as "below par"—its original performance in England, (with the exception of Gianoni's very impressive acting and singing in the part of Antonia) was quite a-piece with the music. A Signor Incindi, not long previously a favorite basso at the Opera-Comique of Paris, made his début in the principal part. The most extended stretch of charity could not make us "give one obolus" of praise to his "Belisario." Subsequently produced for Castellan and Fornasari, this opera failed "to draw." The arrival of Signori Rubini and Tamburini and the fame of Mme. Persiani's success in the "Lucia," drew together a large auditory to witness the first representation of that opera in 1838. It must be confessed, that as a whole, in spite of our then great orchestral advantages, this work was received far more coolly here, than in Paris. There is a concerted piece in the second act, "Chi raffrena al mio furore," which has a sweet and flowing melody, and Rubini's last air was worked up by him into a marvel of expression, whence it may be praised as offering the artist a fair canvas on which he may labor—of which opportunity artists have since fulsomely availed themselves: but beyond these points, and a chorus at the opening of the marriage-scene, we cannot and ought not to specify any piece as of especial moment. Rubini of course was Ravenswood,—Tamburini—Sholto Ashton. In the course of the metamorphosis of a Waverly novel into a peg for Donizetti's music, Sir William Ashton has disappeared in toto together with his lady-wife, besides other characters who chequer so impressively the web of the original story; Bucklaw, however, is spared—and was spared on this especial occasion for Signor Tati, who made him as coarse and disagreeable as laird could be in reality, and interpolated an air from "Zelmira" to show his powers; a proceeding remarkably unwise when Rubini was singing and had to sing. Signor Morelli of pains-taking memory made his appearance as bide-the bent, and did his duty in good tune and with great propriety.—Subsequently we have had other "Lucias: Mme. Castellan, Mme. Frezzolini, and Mlle. Lind, whose entirely new and impassioned reading of the character won her in this country the brightest leaves of her many-laurelled wreath.

An opera written for Rome in 1833, entitled "Il Furioso," or, "L'Isola di S. Domingo," was given by the Lyceum opera-Buffa company in 1836, and introduced to this country Signor F. Ronconi (brother to the Ronconi): he was young and full of promise as an actor as well as a singer, his voice being a baritone of peculiarly agreeable quality;—but a Signora Luini, of whom, (owing to previous newspaper-paragraphing) great expectations had been formed, on this occasion made her last, as well as her first experiment in London. The opera (a weak one) in consequence of this failure, was never repeated.

In 1840 our composer revisited Paris; where, in a single year, he produced in succession "I Martiri" (Les Martyrs), "La Fille du Regiment," and "La Favorite." It is a curious fact, that not one of these works then achieved a decided success. "Les Martyrs," of which the libretto was founded on the "Polyeucte" of Corneille, turned out to be the re-production of an opera formerly brought forward at Naples for Nourrit, and, moreover, a performance which the Censorship had interdicted. "La Fille du Regiment" fared but little better at the Opéra-Comique; the after-translation of this piece into every language, and its concurrent representation on all the boards of Europe, sufficed to convince Donizetti, that in judgment of the work, the Parisian public gave an erring verdict; the well-known delineations by Mmes. Lind and Sontag of the bright Vivandière, and the continental reputation of Mlle. Zoia in the same character, are of too recent moment to need recapitulation here. The year 1839-40 witnessed the rise and fall of the Théâtre de la Renaissance; the passing popularity of this house was due entirely to a translation of the "Lucia." The directorship had requested an original work at Donizetti's hands, and he had just completed for that purpose his "Ange de Nigida," when the establishment closed its doors. The (then Royal) Academy having solicited also another score from the popular Maestro, he presented them with "Le Duc d'Albe," the subject of which, however, not pleasing the management, its production was set aside. Winter, nevertheless, was drawing nigh, and a new opera must be forthcoming; the directors begged of Donizetti his "Ange de Nigida," of which there were but three acts; nothing remained for Donizetti, but to re-write the whole of the principal soprano part, at first intended for the light, airy voice of Mme. Thillon, and suit it to the exigencies of Mme. Stolz's hard and declamatory mezzo-soprano; moreover, an entire act had to be added—viz: the fourth. All this was merely play-work to our fertile genius; the commencement of the rehearsals was almost contemporaneous with the drama itself—and all the music was composed in a less period of time than it took the artists to commit it to memory. As it is eminently characteristic of "the man," let us here narrate how this fourth act of "L'Ange de Nigida" (La Favorite) was composed; the act in question being in itself a chef-d'œuvre, and universally acknowledged as such. Donizetti had just dined at the table of one of his best friends; he was refreshing himself with his favorite beverage, a cup of coffee, the aroma of which precious berry he partook of, almost intemperately, in every possible shape, hot, cold, en sorbet, en bonbon, etc.:—"Dear Gaëtano," said his friend, "it grieves me to treat you with so little ceremony, but my wife and self are under an unavoidable engagement to pass the evening from home; we shall be therefore obliged to deprive you of our company; farewell, then, till the morrow." "O, must I go then?" replied Donizetti, "and so comfortably as I am off, enjoying myself over your super-excellent coffee! Do you attend the soirée, and leave me here by the fireside; I am just in working cue; they have only to-day sent me my fourth act, and I am certain to have finished a large portion of it ere I retire." "Be it as you wish," answered his friend, "make yourself quite at home, and here are writing materials in abundance; adieu, then, once again, until to-morrow, for we shall probably return very late, and long after you have left,"—it was then about ten o'clock; Donizetti sat down to his task; and by the time his friends came home, at one in the morning, he saluted them with "Look you here! have I not well employed my time? I have finished my fourth act." With the exception of the cavatina "Ange si pur," which originally belonged to "Le Duc d'Albe," and the andante of the duet, subsequently added at the rehearsals, this entire act had been composed and committed to paper in the short space of three hours! It would have been wrong to have predicted the ultimate success which awaited "La Favorite" from that which attended its first representations. The simplicity of portions of the music seemed "mesquine;" the national melodies which it contained were adjudged as being "cold;" and the famous fourth act itself was at first esteemed as somewhat outré! What success it did then meet with, was, therefore, rather due to the talent of Duprez, Barroilhet (his first appearance,) and Mme. Stolz, than to the merit of the work itself. Mme. Stolz, indeed, appeared to far greater advantage in that, than in any of her after-creations. The "Favorite" succeeded but moderately, without éclat, and in the language of the side-scenes, "did not draw," until a danseuse, till then unknown, and who had but appeared on one occasion at the Renaissance, was transported, like "La Favorite" itself, to the boards of the Academy, and made her début in a pas introduced in the second act of this opera. The success of the dancer was great, that of the opera itself became colossal; people came at first for the dancing, but went away enraptured with the music. "La Favorite," at last, by this casualty, set fairly swimming on the tide of public favor, has since maintained its position as one of the most attractive and permanent works in the repertory of the French Grand Opera.

After visiting Rome, Milan and Vienna, and bequeathing a lyric drama to each of these cities—Donizetti again returned to Paris in 1843, and there composed "Don Pasquale" and "Don Sebastien." The immense favor with which the former was received quite negated the failure of the latter, which failure, must, however, be attributed to the long and painfully lugubrious scenes of funereal pomp, which chilled and deadened in their shroud-like draperies strains worthy of a far better fate; indeed, portions of "Don Sebastien," may be said to exhibit music of a far better order than any of his many compositions. This was the penultimate opera of Donizetti; he subsequently, in 1844, produced his "Catarina Cornaro" (the last) at Naples; and then returned to Vienna, where he sometime held the situation of Kapellmeister to the imperial Court. There it was he composed and produced his Miserere, than which a poorer attempt has rarely been seen, and rarely a work more guiltless of design. No doubt the required conciseness amounted to a serious difficulty; but, assuredly something more than mere correctness might have been attained with such unlimited power of orchestra and chorus as the Maestro had at command.

* At least, then established opera-fashion, Scribe and Meyerbeer have now set a better example.

In 1845 came his last and fatal visit to Paris, whither he brought the now first-developing seeds of that malady to which ere long he was destined to succumb. In a short time, his friends remarked with alarm the symptoms of intellectual decay: the attacks became at length more frequent, and proportionately increased so much in intensity, that it was found necessary to place him in an Asylum at Ivry, which he entered at the end of January 1846: he remained an inmate of this establishment until the month of June 1847, when he was transferred to a similar habitation at Paris, in the Avenue Châteaubriand. The approaching winter caused his medical advisers to fear the northern inclemency for their illustrious patient; they hoped his native air would have a more favorable influence upon his health. He quitted Paris in September; but scarcely was he arrived at Brussels, when he sustained a most violent attack of paralysis; his reason suffered a further diminution, the melancholy which prostrated him assumed a more desperate and incurable character, and his ceaselessly flowing tears seemed to pour forth in unconscious regret at quitting France, the fostering land he was never destined to see again.

He was received at Bergamo by his excellent friend, the Maestro Dolci. Here, a new attack of paralysis seized him on the 4th of April, 1848, and he finally expired on the 8th of the same month, surrounded by his disconsolate home friends, and lamented by the larger and more extended circle of his appreciators and admirers in the world without.

Donizetti thus died three years older than the century; the number and sequency of his operas (almost past reckoning) we give hereafter, but the following are those that keep the stage in London and Paris: "Anna Bolena," "Lucia," "Marino Faliero," "Parisina," "La Favorite," "Maria di Rohan," "Linda di Chamouni," "Gemma di Vergy," "La Fille du Régiment," "L'Elisir d'Amore," "Don Pasquale," and "Betty." Adding those which are still performed in Italy, we believe that a score would comprise all that are in favor, from amongst the four-and-sixty musical dramas which the composer threw off within no very long period. It would be idle to criticise his works severely, the wonder is that they contain so much real music, in the shape of fresh melody, and fairly correct orchestral writing. We refer to the second act of "Marino" with the barcarolle and scena for the tenor; to the brisk and gaillard tunes of "La Fille" (which Mendelssohn was once heard to defend in a fashion little less lively, against some ponderous classical critics)—to the fourth act of "La Favorite"—to the quartet and serenade in "Don Pasquale"—in proof of the assertion that, as compared with his successor Verdi, Donizetti was a sound and charming composer. It was his good fortune to write in turn for Pasta and Grisi, for Duprez, Rubini, and Lablache, (no opera of his do we call to mind as containing a great contralto part;) and it ought to stand for praise, that all the operas thus produced have proved strong enough to remain in request, apart from the particular artists, for whose express exhibition they were composed. In short, though Donizetti's death can only be recorded as a welcome release, so great was his suffering; his withdrawal from active life made a serious void in Italian Opera which no one has as yet filled.

We now proceed to a complete catalogue of his dramatic works in their due chronological order.

No.	A. D.
1	1818	Venice	"Enrico di Borgogna."
2	1819	"Il Falegname di Livonia."
3	1820	Mantua	"Le Nozze in Villa."
4	1822	Rome	"Zoraida di Granata."
5	Naples	"La Zingara."
6	"La Lettera Anonyma."
7	Milan	"Chiara e Serafina," o, "I Pirati."
8	1823	Naples	"Il Fortunato Inganno."
9	"Ariston."
10	Venice	"Una Follia."
11	"Alfredo il Grande."
12	1824	Rome	"L'Ajo nell'Imbarazzo," (pool.
13	Naples	"Emilia," o, "L'Ermittaggio di Live-
14	1826	Palermo	"Alabor in Granata."
15	"Il Castello degli Invalidi."
16	Naples	"Elmida."
17	1827	Rome	"Olivo e Pasquale."
18	Naples	"Il Borgomastro di Saardam."
19	"Le Convenienze Teatrali."
20	"Otto mesi in due ore."
21	1828	"L'Esule di Roma."
22	Genoa	"La Regina di Golconda."
23	Naples	"Gianni di Calais."
24	"Giovetti Grano."
25	1829	"Il Paria."
26	"Il Castello di Kenilworth."
27	"Il Diluvio Universale."
28	"I Pazzi per progresso."
29	"Francesca di Foix."
30	"Smelda de Lamberazzi."
31	"La Romanziera."
32	1830	Milan	"Anna Bolena."
33	Naples	"Fausta."
34	1832	Milan	"Ugo, Conte di Parigi."
35	"L'Elisir d'Amore."
36	"Lancia di Castiglia," (mingo."
37	1833	Rome	"Il Furioso," o, "L'Isola di S. Do-
38	Florence	"Parisina."
39	Rome	"Torquato Tasso."
40	1834	Milan	"Lucrezia Borgia."
41	Florence	"Rosomonda d'Ighilterra."
42	Naples	"Maria Stuarda."
43	1835	Milan	"Gemma di Vergy."
44	Paris	"Marino Faliero."
45	Naples	"Lucia di Lantermoor."
46	1836	Venice	"Bellario."
47	Naples	"Il Campanello di Notte."
48	"Betty."
49	"L'Assedio di Calais."
50	1837	Venice	"Pia de Tolomei."
51	Naples	"Roberto Devereux."
52	1838	Venice	"Maria di Rudens."
53	1839	Milan	"Gianni di Parigi."
54	1840	Paris	"La Fille du Regiment."
55	"Les Martyrs."
56	"La Favorite."
57	1841	Rome	"Adelia," o, "La Figlia del Arciere."
58	1842	Milan	"Maria Padilla."
59	Vienna	"Linda di Chamouni."
60	1843	Paris	"Don Pasquale."
61	Vienna	"Maria di Rohan."
62	Paris	"Don Sebastien."
63	1844	Naples	"Catarina Cornaro."
And. 64	"Le Duc d'Albe," (hitherto unpublished and unre-

There is treasured up also on the shelves of the Opéra-Comique at Paris, a little one-act operetta, of which the title has not as yet transpired. It is almost beyond a doubt, but that both this and "Le Duc d'Albe" will one day be brought forward on the respective boards for which they were originally destined. Independently of his dramatic works, Donizetti had composed several Masses and vesper services, besides other church music. In Italy, innumerable Pezzi da Camera, in the shape of arias, cavatinas, duettes, &c. A series of vocal pieces published at Paris under the title of "Soirées du Pausilippe."—A cantata on "La Morte d'Ugolini," and a dozen quartets for stringed instruments.

Whilst mentioning "La Favorite," we cited an example of Donizetti's facility at composition; we now quote another to prove that he united generosity with talent. During his stay at Naples in 1836—he was given to understand that an obscure little theatre was about to close, and that the performers attached to it were in a dreadful state of distress; he sought them out, and gave them all the money he then had, for the immediate relief of their wants. "Ah!" said one of the artists to him, "you would make us actually rich, were you to give us a new opera!" "As to that," replied the maestro, "you shall have one within a week." A libretto was required, but, not a single dramatist would contribute one to the sinking establishment. Donizetti, calling to his recollection a vaudeville which he had formerly seen at Paris, entitled "La Sonnette de Nuit," made a translation of the same in less than a day: eight days after, the opera of "Il Campanello di Notte" was finished, learned, performed—and the theatre saved!

It will be thus seen that Donizetti was of a literary turn, for he proved on two other occasions that he could unite the talents of the poet to those of the musician; he translated himself the two libretti of "La Fille du Regiment" and "Betty." He married, at Rome, the daughter of a solicitor of that place. This union, though a happy one, turned out but of short duration. He lost two children during their infancy, and his wife was again enceinte when she expired of cholera in 1835. Desolate under his bereavement, he transferred all the affection from his wife to her brother M. Vasrelli, with whom he was ever afterwards united in the bonds of a most affectionate friendship and relationship.

Donizetti was tall, and his frank and open countenance bore testimony to the excellency of the heart and mind that animated it; it was impossible to approach him without liking him, because he continually gave people the opportunity of appreciating one or other of his many good qualities. Whenever he composed, he always had a small ivory scraper carefully laid beside his manuscript. On being once questioned as to the continual presence of an instrument of which he made so little use, he replied—"This scraper was presented to me by my father, when he pardoned me and gave his consent that I should become a musician. I have always taken the greatest care of it, and though I use it but little, it is a comfort to me to have it by my side whenever I compose; as it seems ever to bring with its presence a father's blessing"—these few words delivered with so much simplicity and sincerity will suffice to prove how full of heart was Donizetti. In composing, he worked without a piano-forte, and wrote on easily without stopping; it would have been impossible to believe the actual kind of work he was engaged upon, since continuous and unremitting practice had given him the most clear-sighted and ready facility.

When, at the commencement of his painful malady, he was placed in the asylum at Ivry, his appointed keeper was one of the officers of the place, named Antoine. Although poor Donizetti's intellects were then much shattered, he still manifested a disposition of much kindness, and Antoine became so much attached to his patient, that he never left him; this excellent man did not cease to give the most touching, assiduous, and disinterested attention to him, until his last moments. There is a letter from this Antoine to Donizetti's dear friend M. Adolphe Adam, in which he describes the final sufferings of the renowned maestro; though these portions of the letter are too harrowing and painful for us to quote here, we cannot conclude without giving the affectionate guardian's own account of the funeral honors bestowed on his poor master's memory.

"... The obsequies took place yesterday; the excellent M. Dolci took all the arrangements upon himself, and neglected nothing which should render them worthy of the glory of so great and good a man. More than four thousand persons were present at the ceremony. The procession was composed of the numerous clergy of Bergamo, the most illustrious members of the community and its environs, and of the civic guard of the town and suburbs. The discharges of musketry mingled with the light of three or four hundred large torches presented a fine effect—the whole was enhanced by the presence of three military bands, and the most propitious weather it was possible to behold. The service commenced at ten o'clock in the morning, and did not conclude until half past two. The young gentry of Bergamo insisted on bearing the remains of their illustrious fellow-citizen, although the cemetery in which they finally rested lay at the distance of a league and a half from the town. The road there was crowded along its whole length by crowds of people who came from the surrounding country to witness the procession,—and, to give due praise to the inhabitants of Bergamo, never hitherto had such great honors been bestowed on any member of that city."

Donizetti was Director of the Conservatorio at Naples; Kapellmeister to the Emperor of Austria; and was decorated with the Legion of Honor, as well as with several other orders. Two better mementos of him have survived all these vain dignities—the admiration of his works, and the esteem and love of those who knew, and could appreciate, his nobleness of character and most intrinsic goodness.

* N. B. Those marked with an asterisk have been produced in New York and Boston.—[Ed.]

Sonnets on Musical Instruments.

By C. P. CRANCH.

I.

THE VIOLIN.

The versatile, discursive Violin,
Light, tender, brilliant, passionate or calm,
Sliding with careless nonchalance within
His range of ready utterance, wins the palm
Of victory o'er his fellows for his grace;
Fine fluent speaker, polished gentleman—
Well may he be the leader in the race
Of blending instruments—fighting in the van
With conscious ease and fine chivalric speed;
A very Bayard in the field of sound,
Rallying his struggling followers in their need,
And spurring them to keep their hard-earned ground.
So the fifth Henry fought at Azincour,
And led his followers to the breach once more.

II.

THE VIOLONCELLO.

Larger and more matured, deeper in thought,
Slower in speech, and of a graver tone,
His ardour softened, as if years had wrought
Wise moods upon him, living all alone,
A calm and philosophic creature;
Yet, at some feeling of remembered things,
Or passion smothered, but not purged quite,
Hark! what a depth of sorrow in those strings;
See, what a storm growls in his angry breast!
Yet list again—his voice no longer moans,
The storm hath spent its rage and is at rest;
Strong, self-possessed the Violoncello's tones,
But yet too oft, like Hamlet, seem to me
A high soul struggling with its destiny.

III.

THE OBOE.

Now come with me beside the sedgy brook,
Far in the fields, away from crowded street;
Into the flowing water let us look,
While o'er our heads the whispering elm-trees meet.
There will we listen to a simple tale
Of fireside pleasures and of shepherds' loves.
A reedy voice, sweet as the nightingale,
As tender as the cooing of the doves,
Shall sing of Corydon and Amaryllis;
The grasshopper shall chirp, the bee shall hum,
The stream shall murmur to the waterlilies,
And all the sounds of summer-noon shall come,
And, mingling in the Oboe's pastoral tone,
Make thee forget that man did ever sigh and moan.

IV.

TRUMPETS AND TROMBONES.

A band of martial riders next I hear,
Whose sharp brass voices cut and rend the air.
The shepherd's tale is mute, and now the ear
Is filled with a wilder clang than it can bear;
Those arrowy trumpet notes so short and bright,
The long-drawn wailing of that loud Trombone,
Tell of the bloody and tumultuous fight,
The march of victory and the dying groan;
O'er the green fields the serried squadrons pour,
Killing and burning like the bolts of heaven;
The sweetest flowers with cannon-smoke and gore
Are all profaned, and Innocence is driven
Forth from her cottages and woody streams,
While over all red Battle fiercely gleams.

V.

THE HORNS.

But who are these, far in the leafy wood,
Murmuring such mellow, hesitating notes,
It seems the very breath of solitude,
Loading with dewy balm each breeze that floats?
They are a peasant group, I know them well,
The diffident, conscious Horns, whose muffled speech
But half expresses what their souls would tell,
Aiming at strains their skill can never reach;
An untaught rustic band; and yet how sweet
And soothing comes their music o'er the soul!
Dear Poets of the forest, who would meet
Your melodies save where wild waters roll?
Reminding us of him who by his plough
Walked with a laurel-wreath upon his brow!

The True End and Means of Musical Culture.

By Dr. MARX.

From the "Universal School of Music," (London.)

What, then, is the real and legitimate object of all musical culture?

Enjoyment of its Pleasures—this we pronounce to be the first object of the study and cultivation of music. A joyless occupation with music—and how frequently do we witness this—how common is the remark that, the joy with which the learner commenced the study has gradually given way to indifference, or even dislike!—a joyless occupation is pernicious to artistic culture, and more injurious to the learner than non-occupation, as it not only robs him of the time that might be devoted to other useful or pleasing pursuits, but also destroys his susceptibility for the charms of musical art.

But this enjoyment should be really artistic, not merely extraneous, still less anti-artistic. And here it is our duty, especially to warn against that prurient vanity which delights in displaying difficulties overcome, and technical dexterities acquired solely with a view to astonish others. Nothing is more foreign to genuine Art, which was given to us to raise us from the narrow sphere of personal existence and personal feeling, to the region of universal joy, love, and enthusiasm; nothing is more inimical and destructive to all true love for, and enjoyment of, the musical art, than this poisonous mildew which spreads itself over the practice as well as the productions of that art; nothing is surer to drag the mind from the purifying atmosphere of artistic activity down into a close and painfully oppressive region of envy, jealousy, and selfishness, than such an ill-concealed desire to shine; nothing, finally, reveals more clearly to the intelligent observer the wide gulf that separates vanity from the true perception of Art, than this mistaking of an external means for the legitimate purpose. And yet, how common are such vain desires and efforts in our concert-rooms and private circles! How seldom is it the real intention of our virtuosi and amateurs to delight their hearers; how much more anxious are they to create astonishment amongst the less-practised or unartistic crowds, by newly invented sleights of hand, the legerdemains of a Döhler, Henselt, Thalberg, or whatever may be the name of the latest twelve-finger composer! And how often do we find teachers encouraging such doings, in order to gain new pupils by applause obtained in this manner! The lowest, most unconscious, and merely sensual enjoyment of music, the most superficial delight in a tripping dance tune is more artistic, noble, and fruitful than this wide-spread abomination; a chaste and feeling performance of the most insignificant ballad, or the lightest waltz, is, to a man of real musical knowledge, a better proof of the abilities both of pupil and master, than those prematurely forced, and after all exceedingly cheap, artifices of vanity.

For the mere sensual delight in Art also awakens an immediate spiritual interest; and it is this spiritual interest in Art which we consider as the highest aim of all artistic culture. Let us only be careful not to close the mind and heart in capricious and perverted efforts, tending to suppress or disturb our feelings and the inward working of our spirit, and the immediate sensual impressions from a work of Art will infuse new life through the nerves, a more elevated pleasure through the mind—a life and pleasure such as pure artistic enjoyment can alone impart; the certainty that those around us participate in our feelings will thaw the rigid crust of egotism, and this mutual pleasure will ensure the sympathy and love of our associated friends. The heart opens itself gladly to a new sensation, a new emotion, such as a work of Art excites; it receives the new impressions more readily and fondly, because they are free from the dross and asperities of personality; it is a communion of soul with soul, full of mutual sympathy, and yet free from any material, or otherwise disturbing, adjunct. And thus, the ærial creations of the composer pass their significant existence before us, and dwell with us—now in joy, now in sorrow—just as conceived by the artist, but always innocent and uncorrupted. In union with our personal existence is one of ever-varying ideal-ity, and we experience within ourselves its immeasurable richness, when compared with the narrow sphere of our material life. Conditions and persons long extinct—those charming images conjured up from Hellas and the superstitions of the East, by Gluck—the patriarchal simplicity and grandeur of that people, from whose night was to raise the light of the world, portrayed in Handel's majestic songs—the furious contentions of the Pharisees and their followers, in opposition to the serene holiness of the New Covenant, in Bach's imperishable strains—all this is brought home to us, and the far distant past becomes an imaginary present existence. All that can charm the human heart in innocence, joy, tenderness, or childlike caprice; all that breathless, burning love, exulting delight, or graceful play of affection and humor can present to our excited feelings; the mysterious searching of the mind into its own innate existence, into the hidden depths of the nature of all beings—all that was given to a Haydn, a Mozart, or a Beethoven, to reveal—the whole unbounded range of the spiritual and ideal world, which no word can describe and no mortal eye behold—all is open to us, it is bestowed on us as our own.

To live in and for our Art, to open our whole mind and heart to its influence, in short, to cultivate it in the proper manner—this is the condition on which its invaluable gifts are offered to us. But it is an indispensable condition.

It is not the possession of great artists and great works of Art which secures to a nation, or even to its more gifted individuals, the successful cultivation and the full enjoyment of an Art. Were this the case, no nation would stand more securely upon the pinnacle of musical cultivation than Germany, whose composers have been, at least for a century, the exponents of the richest and most exalted ideas ever embodied in sounds. And yet we have had to experience, in one single century, three different periods of decline, immediately succeeding the days of the highest elevation to which music was successively raised by Bach and Handel—Gluck, Haydn, and Mozart—and, lastly, Beethoven. Indeed, were we disposed to accede to the loudest and most numerous assertions of the day, it would almost appear that all had perished, excepting the memory of the past, that nowhere can a trace be found of that spirit which pervades and which created the masterpieces of former days.

Mere hearing, or an entire dependence upon the ear, is still less deserving of confidence as a means of cultivation, notwithstanding that it must form the basis of, and become our guide through, the whole course of musical education. For we hear both bad and good music, and we discover, not only that the feeble and impure produces its effect (often more rapid and extensive,) as well as the pure and elevated; but also, that in this circumstance we are compelled to recognize a proof of the power of musical sounds, which, under its most imperfect development, still exercises so great a sway over the human mind and feelings, even when unsupported by the influence of auxiliaries, prejudice, or fashion. Indeed, it is undeniable that this sensual power of music often imparts an effect to the performance of works of little intrinsic merit which surprises even the experienced musician, especially when the performance is of a massive character, and is aided by considerable, perhaps over-estimated, talent. It is the power of masses and the real or assumed talent of the principal performers, but not the work itself, which produces such effects. This shows us, on the one hand, how weak is that defence of an artistic production of dubious character which is grounded upon its success; on the other, how hastily those judge and act, who fancy that excellence is alone sufficient to ensure victory. Yes, it will prevail in the end! It will be transmitted from one generation to another, and the edifice of Art will attain as glorious a perfection as has been promised to mankind. It is, however, a different question, whether this certain assurance will justify us in overlooking and neglecting this artistic and moral elevation of the present generation, when it is in our power to promote it. The history of the world counts by centuries and wide intervals, like those between the stars in the firmament, separating from each other epochs of human progress; but the short span of human life could not dispense with a single ray of the beneficent lustre of those stars.

Lastly: the merely abstract, i. e. technical, mechanical, or exclusively scientific cultivation of music, is equally incapable of leading us to that spring which is the fountain head of Art. It is an observation which we have unfortunately but too frequent occasion to make, that such a false, abstract cultivation leaves the mind void and barren, and year after year causes noble germs of life and artistic joy to wither and die. We have but too frequently occasion to notice that the most superficial ideas of the nature and purpose of Art, the greatest indifference as to its real advancement, and the widest aberrations from its true and legitimate course, are to be found amongst those disciples of technical and abstract science, amongst our virtuosi and those dilettanti who follow in their wake, amongst our professors of thorough-bass and æsthetic writers on music.

A proper artistic education, like genuine Art itself, does not aim at mere mechanical proficiency, which constitutes the merit of an artisan—nor does it lay great value upon mere external contemplation, which leads away from the living fountain of Art to dead abstraction; but is directed towards the soul and essence of the thing. The task which it proposes to itself is to impart to every individual, or at least to as many individuals in a nation as possible, a proper idea of the real nature and object of Art, and to ripen this perception into active life.

This task divides itself into two distinct operations. The first is to discover in the student the germs of artistic susceptibility and talent, to awaken and animate them, to remove the obstacles tending to obstruct their growth, and to train and foster them, so that they may become living powers. The second is to take, from the highest artistic point of view, a survey of all that Art is intended to effect, or is capable of effecting, and has already achieved. All this, or as much as each individual is capable of receiving, is now to be imparted to the student. It is not the hand or ear only which it purposes to teach and train; but it aims to penetrate through the medium of the senses to the soul, and by exciting his feelings to awaken his artistic consciousness. This done, the waves of sound may now flow through the air: that which has been internally perceived, which has become the property of the thinking mind, will remain a secure acquisition, a safe foundation for farther operations.

Such is the task of a proper artistic education, sketched in fugitive outlines: the training of the natural abilities, of feeling and understanding, to the highest attainable point of perfection. This is the only means and indispensable condition of a really pure and complete enjoyment of all the blessings which Art can bestow; this is also, more or less, the clearly perceived aim of all those who devote their lives and energies wholly or partially to artistic pursuits—this is especially, whether it be or be not acknowledged, the undeniable and indispensable duty of every teacher.

Would it be an empty dream to wish for our nation, endowed as it is with so much musical talent, a general and really national musical education, in this highest and only true sense of the word? Are not both the wants and claims of our nation clearly indicated by its innate mental depth and fertility, to which the names of hundreds upon hundreds possessed of distinguished talents, and the successful attempts at the very highest tasks in every walk of Art, bear such undeniable testimony? Is our national song—richer, grander, and more deeply felt than that of any other people—never again to resume its important and legitimate place in our public festivals? Is our Protestant church for ever to remain deprived of her own proper and befitting music, which centuries have prepared and perfected for her? Is the Catholic church, in which music constitutes such an important element of worship, to experience in our own country the same continued degradation of the sacred song as in Italy, where strains from Rossini's, Bellini's, and Auber's operas desecrate the holiest moments of devotion; or in Spain, where all church music has ceased, save the chanting of the priest? We do not apprehend such a result; and every one who looks into the future with the same confidence as we, will find in it a stimulus to unremitting exertion. For an industrious and energetic nation like ours, something better and higher is in store, than the mere sensual delights which tender Nature bestows on her children of the South, to wile away their sweet hours of leisure.

The word and labor of a single individual can, however, effect but little in such a matter; the mass of accidental and intentional obstructions is too great to be overcome by the efforts of one man, or a small number of men. But government may accomplish the task, provided it have not only the right will, but also succeed in finding the right men to carry out its designs—not mere artisans, who live by and teach Art as a trade; but men who have made the spirit of Art, as well as its forms, the understanding of its genius, as well as the mastery of its technical difficulties, the task of their lives.

Lastly, and irrespectively of everything that has been said, we have to acknowledge that this condition and culture of Art amongst a nation is altogether dependent upon its political and moral condition; a circumstance which accounts in particular for the direction Art has taken amongst us during the last twenty or thirty years. The whole history of Art, however, testifies that in this respect also, the destiny of a nation is controlled by supreme intelligence and goodness, and not exposed to the whims of a blind fate. Let every one, therefore, cheerfully do his best, and trust that ultimately a blessing will surely attend his honest efforts.

Meyerbeer's "Robert Le Diable."

Some years since a rich Dutchman commenced forming a library of a thousand volumes, consisting entirely of playbills published in all parts of the world. He spared no expense, no trouble, to complete this collection of singular statistics. Through correspondents in the principal towns in Europe, he obtained all the yellow, red, and blue placards which are to be seen daily on the walls of theatres. Having made his selection he classified those he had chosen, and had them bound. In this singular library, are to be found the débûts, the benefits, the names of all the actors, the expedients of managers driven to extremities, the varied history, the stirring life of the dramatic crowd, who, rushing from theatre to theatre—applauded in some, condemned in others,—changing from one rôle to another, sometimes covered with diamonds, sometimes with tinsel—occasionally rising to the top of the profession by their talents or good luck, and afterwards falling from the first parts to mere supers,—playing the lovers in company with five or six successive generations, or ending their career by disappearing to retire—the more fortunate to their ease, the more unfortunate to the hospital; this bustling history of a world quite separate from ours—a world which lives every night before the foot-lights—is written in these bills, in every description of letter used by printers, and tells—how truly—the increase or diminution of the actor's reputation, marked by the size or form of the type in which his name appears.

The drama has also its history and its patent of nobility in these archives. From this pile of advertisements, collected with so much labor, it appeared that the operas which were most frequently represented within a quarter of a century, up to the year 1840, were Der Freischütz, Tancredi, and Robert Le Diable. We shall not attempt to base any theory upon this singular similarity of success. It would be difficult, for instance, to tell why the public has always given so decided a preference to Tancredi, above all Rossini's chefs d'œuvres, unless we can attribute it to the well-known air, Di tanti palpiti, which has been sung by the whole world, and has been even heard by travellers in most remote regions of South America. Whatever the cause, the universal success of Robert le Diable is easily understood. The music comprises specimens of every style; and each auditor may generally select from this fine opera some favorite air for his particular keeping. The story is considered philosophical in France, poetical in Germany, picturesque in Italy, interesting everywhere. All nations and people of every age, are pleased with tales of wonder, and delight in fables. The Devil, who has a son whom with paternal kindness he wishes to bring into the infernal regions, has always been considered a most natural character by every one. Add to this the great variety of the situations, the novelty of some of the passions put in movement, the diversity and the splendor of the scenery and dresses, the nature of the dances, graceful and serious at the same time, the supernatural apparitions, and above all the admirable music, so perfect, that fresh beauties develop themselves upon each repetition of it; and we cannot feel surprised that the world has made this work known, and that it must continue to enchant the eyes and ears of all audiences.

Robert, in the first eight years after its production, was performed in one thousand eight hundred and forty-three (1,843) European theatres. It was first produced in November, 1831, and it is not easy to imagine the influence its immense success has had upon Art and artists. What successive generations of tenori, of prime donne, have essayed the parts of Robert, of Alice, and of Isabelle! How many instrumental performers have learned, executed, varied, and arranged this music! Singers do not last long, particularly tenors; they disappear after a short career, and are heard of no more. At the opera in Paris, a few years makes a striking change; they produce three or four Roberts, and five or six Alices, who pass away as quickly; without speaking of the other characters. We could well fill a library, although, perhaps, not usefully, with the pieces arranged by a thousand composers from the airs of this opera; and in 1824, in Paris—will it be believed,—a grand Mass was selected from its inexhaustible stores. Everywhere, at the theatre, in the tavern, at military parades, in the churches, at concerts, in the cottage, and in the palace, was and is to be heard the delicious music of Robert. Goethe pretty nearly predicted its success—he pointed at Meyerbeer as the only composer, in his opinion, who could understand Mephistopheles, and bring him upon the stage. But Goethe entertained a most patriotic antipathy to Italian music, and would not have considered even Robert as sufficiently orthodox. Nevertheless, Germany seized upon it as being essentially German, and within two or three years it was played in all the German States. At Vienna however, the censure forbade the representation of this great work, German religionists being too strict to permit the production of devils and saints, of monks and the church, the cross and the gates of hell, upon the stage. However, the music was so fine, and was spoken of so enthusiastically, that permission was obtained, to produce it, suppressing the scenes of the cross and the nuns, in the third act, and the church scene in the fifth act; thus changing the plot, and giving to the opera the name of Robert de Normandie. Unfortunately, however, it was produced in a less mutilated condition, at two of the Vienna theatres, and as usual was most successful.

In London it has been played at four theatres at the same time. Six months after its representation in Paris, during the ravages of the cholera, Nourrit, Levasseur, and Madame Damoreau were preparing to bring it out in London. In the meanwhile, an attempt had been made to produce it in English, but this was difficult, as the music had not been published. Bishop went to Paris, obtained some isolated portions of it, attended every representation, remembered all he could, invented the remainder, and arranged it à la Bishop, giving a mere sketch; took merely the outlines, like a traveler making a hasty sketch of a picturesque site while rolling along au grand galop.

Notwithstanding its many deficiencies and faults, Robert thus arranged, met with great success, though we can imagine how much it lost in crossing the channel, when it was necessary to play two other pieces to fill up the evenings of its performance.

In Italy also, Robert was rejected by the censure at the moment Milan, Florence, and Trieste were preparing translations of it. But in a few years afterwards the Marchese Martellini obtained permission to produce it at Florence, and Nourrit was engaged to sing his usual rôle. A few days before his death, his mind was full of his first appearance as Robert in Italy; and in his last letters he spoke warmly and feelingly of the great success he anticipated. In 1840—41, Robert was at length given at Florence on the stage of the Pergola, and played to crowded and applauding houses four or five nights a week, for the greater part of the Carnival, and drew to la bella città crowds of fanatici per la musica from all parts of Italy.

We shall not trace the history of Robert any further. It is too well known to our readers.—Message Bird.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUGUST 27, 1853.

Composer and Public.

We are indebted to a correspondent for the following extract from a German letter. The thought which it contains is an important one, and goes some way to explain and settle, in the sphere of music, the old difference of genius versus popularity. We think the limited reception of Schumann's music, compared with that of Mozart, Mendelssohn and Beethoven, is here well accounted for, without denying Schumann to possess rare genius. But if Schumann's earlier works were more marked by wealth and nobleness of musical ideas, than by mastery of the means of clear, appreciable expression, it was but the fault of inexperience; and we believe it to be generally admitted that his later efforts have been more acceptable upon the score of clearness and symmetry of form, and of that sort of euphony which at once engages the general ear.

The great mass, the public, necessarily must always and everywhere consist of musically uneducated, or at least only partly educated persons, and cannot be expected to imbue the composer with respect for their opinion. And yet this same public is the great power, the tribunal so much dreaded; and every one who appears before it with a labor of his mind, wishes to be well received and to make a good impression, however at bottom of the heart he may despise it.

The question is now: Must the composer when creating his work, consider the million?

We leave aside the species of so-called artists, who know of no other aim but to gain the acclamation of the multitude, and for this deny their proper nature; and again, such as do not rise beyond the level, where the multitude are kept by their taste and powers of conception. Suppose that such an artist meets success, that he becomes the lion of the day:—he has his reward by disappearing with the changing fashion and by being forgotten equally as fast as he has risen. The true artist, however, must strive for a higher end; the world in which he lives is not the acre around him; he follows his genius, he pours out his own innermost thoughts, which fill his soul. For him there is only one danger,—that his imagination carry him astray on false paths; that his mode of conception grow more abstractedly artistic than purely human; that the tone-means which he employs in expressing his ideas be not always the most adequate and practical; and that his work in consequence be misunderstood, or at least, remain without response.

Here, I think, is the point, where the composer ought to be deliberate. He must consider that Music is an Art which requires as its means the sense of hearing, and which, therefore, is approachable by all, and that he makes no sacrifice in the value of his work, if he smoothes the way to its understanding by dint of due consideration of that mediating sense. He therefore must strive for a fine tone-effect, for an appropriate treatment of the instruments and of the human voice, and he must make a rational use of the assistance and advantages which the latter lend. Such an immeasurable genius as Beethoven, who secluded himself more and more from the external world, could follow his muse unguardedly, and finally leave aside all such aids. But I apprehend that even he did not escape the danger intimated above, particularly in his last period, and that the non-consideration of this danger has been of disadvantage, especially in his vocal compositions. I refer, for instance, to his D minor Symphony (the Choral) and the piano works of his last period. Schumann has failed often in a similar direction. In his opera "Genoveva," he introduces many songs, which are entirely unsatisfactory to the performers; and the opera, simply for this reason, could not escape its unavoidable doom, in spite of all the beauties in the choruses and the orchestral part.

In this respect Mozart and Mendelssohn have understood better their advantage; without injuring the conceptions of their genius, they did not disdain to surround their music with sensual beauties. I allow that Mendelssohn sometimes has proceeded in too reflective a manner, but he still reached the immediate beautiful effect, avoiding the reproach, "that the intention is perceived," which, for instance, you can hardly ever withhold from Meyerbeer, who wastes his talent by an empty contending for effect.

In opposition to Schumann, Mendelssohn may be called objective in that sense, that is in his relation to the work which he is about creating; but his compositions appear no less subjective, for he has left on all his works a very individual type, that specifically Mendelssohnian stamp. And this again, in a like manner, can hardly be said of Schumann's musical thought and expression, with his greater share of ideas and wider horizon. Mozart also had much that was stereotyped and constantly recurring in his work, so that he was wanting in complete objectivity, and it was only given to one, to Beethoven, to keep each work completely separate and objective, to appear new in each, and still always the same great and powerful Beethoven.

MORE NATIVISM.—"Native Musician" does not favor us again this week; but in lieu of such amusement we can treat our readers to a few delectable specimens from a new musical journal, which we find upon our desk, and which is altogether devoted to the cause of nativism in general, and to the advertisement of its editor's new psalm book in particular.

Indeed, musical "native Americanism" has now two organs of its own, so that we need no longer publish the anonymous squibs which we receive, to show the nature of the animal. The first is a semi-monthly, called par excellence the "Boston Musical Journal," and edited by Messrs. B. F. Baker and A. N. Johnson. The second, the one from which we quote, is circulated gratis, to the extent of 30,000 copies (according to its own account) and is called "Bird's Musical Advertiser." It commences: "We" (Bird) "have made a book, a singing book," &c., which it proceeds forthwith to announce and recommend as glibly as if it were some new nostrum or elixir, under the title of the "Singing School Companion." This editor is a deadly foe to all foreigners and foreign influence in music. By music he appears to mean simply and exclusively an affair of country choirs and singing schools. He is virtuously indignant against our young countrymen who go to Europe to learn music; puts our friends in Leipsic under sanctimonious ban, for finding quartets of Beethoven and Schubert on a Sunday more edifying than the ninety-nine millions of Yankee psalm-tunes; asks what sort of choir-leaders they will make when they come home, &c., as if that were the end and aim of all true musical culture. But for the specimens; here is the musical creed which it is deemed so important to instill into the minds and hearts of Young America.

We do not dislike foreign musicians, we have the highest respect for some of them; but for that toadyism which is blind to everything which is not imported, we feel the utmost contempt. We have no doubt young men may improve themselves as musicians by practice and study in Europe, but there would be as much sense in importing and adopting the old worn out system, by which Europe is governed, as to think of teaching the masses here, music by any imported system, German or Italian. We want an American system, —and we will have it. (!!)

Lowell Mason has already done more to create happiness, more to introduce this most innocent and pleasing accomplishment to the notice of the millions, than all the foreign teachers have done or will do in nine hundred and ninety-nine years. B. F. Baker will this year, through the influence of his meetings in Boston and other places, do more to educate the mass of young people musically, than all the foreign musicians in America.

Foreign musicians have carried millions of dollars of our money away, and left those who have paid it unfit to enjoy good, simple music, [of the birds?] especially the music of the church [i. e. Yankee Psalmody.]

Will Teachers be so good as to examine the "elements" of the SINGING SCHOOL COMPANION. They are not imitations of any system, they are our own, and was the result of years of experience, with our eyes open to the want of a better system for teachers. They have been approved by many of the best teachers of music in the country, and we venture to hope they will be by others who have not yet seen them.

Four million copies of the "Singing School Companion" sold. So a friend said he was told the other day, and he congratulated us upon our success. We told him it was not so, and we should not sell that number in less than two years.

Do singers quarrel? Yes, about half as much as other people. Do they enjoy themselves? First rate. Just as they deserve to.

We don't mean to praise our book, and therefore only say that it is the cheapest, the best, the handsomest, and the most popular book which was ever published.

Don't go to sleep in the singing seats; you may snore, or you may swallow a fly and get choked.

The above will show how wittily, entertainingly, patriotically and piously the whole sheet is edited. Now, here is our paraphrase of extract number one:

We do not dislike native musicians; we have the highest respect for some of them, whom we see to have more real earnest artistic aspiration than they have of the self-advertising, mercenary spirit; but for that narrow-minded, selfish dread of seeing music in this country judged according to the European, (i. e. the artistic) standard, lest it should spoil the trade of mechanical psalm-book and sentimental song manufacturers, we feel more patriotic shame than individual contempt. We have no doubt young men may learn the elements of music well enough at home of native teachers, and that much true musical impulse is evolved from our thoroughly "native" musical "conventions," so-called; but there would be as much sense in importing and imitating the Chinese music, as in thinking to discover any germ of a high, original, American Art, in such dry, impotent, mechanical manufactures, as go forth annually in cart-loads from the great mill of the psalm-book makers (as a class, we mean). We too want, hope for and believe in, not an "American system" in music, but an American new era of musical Art; a new manifestation of musical genius, which will be distinguished not by narrow nationality, but by the universality, the generous humanity, the broad and glorious inspiration that shall make it the language of a brighter period of a whole human family redeemed and reconciled; but such a music, when it comes, will wear no traces of a blood or spiritual relationship with what is called New England psalmody and musical trading "professors;" these will first have to be scourged out of the temple like the money-changers of old.

A New Church Organ.

MR. DWIGHT,

DEAR SIR:—I visited, by invitation of the well-known organ-builder, Mr. Thomas Appleton, yesterday, his manufactory at Reading, to see and test the qualities of an organ which he had just completed for the use of the new Unitarian Church, in Bangor, Me., to be played upon by Mr. John Tufts.

The organ is twenty-two feet high, fourteen feet wide, and ten feet deep. Its case is made by Mr. Newman, of Andover, in a beautiful imitation of rosewood.

It has two manuals, the lower being the great organ, the upper, the swell with a choir bass; also pedals to the extent of two full octaves; and the position of this instrument in the church will be only six feet from the ground floor. (A great improvement; it would be still better if it were placed on the floor.)

The Great Organ comprises—

1. Stop Diapason, bass, }	56 pipes.
2. Melodia, }	56 "
3. Open Diapason, }	56 "
4. Tenoroon, }	56 "
5. Viol d' Amore, }	56 "
6. Keraulophon, }	56 "
7. Flute, }	56 "
8. Principal, }	56 "
9. Fifteenth, }	56 "
10. Twelfth, }	56 "
11. Sequialtra, (3 ranks) }	168 "
12. Trumpet, treble, }	56 "
13. Trumpet, bass, }	56 "

Whole number, 728

The Swell comprises—

1. Stop Diapason, }	44 pipes.
2. Open Diapason, }	44 "
3. Bourdon, }	44 "
4. Principal, }	44 "
5. Viol da Gamba, }	44 "
6. Night horn, }	44 "
7. Cornet, (3 ranks) }	132 "
8. Piccolo, }	44 "
9. Hautboy, }	44 "
10. Trumpet, }	44 "
11. Tremulant, }	44 "
Total, }	528

The Choir Bass comprises—

1. Stop Diapason, }	12 pipes.
2. Open Diapason, }	12 "
3. Bourdon, }	12 "
4. Principal, }	12 "
Total, }	48
Sub-Bass, }	25

Also, the following Couples—

Great Organ and Swell.
Great Organ and Swell, an octave above.
Pedals and Great Organ.
Pedals and Great Organ, an octave above.
Pedals and Choir Bass.
Pedal Check.
Bellows Signal.

The total number of pipes, then, is 1,329.

Mr. Appleton, in building this fine organ, has fully sustained his well-earned reputation. The depth, fulness and richness of the diapasons, I have not heard excelled; the sweetness of the reed, and other fancy stops, is superb, especially the Melodia, Viol d' Amore, Keraulophon, Night horn, Viol da Gamba and Hautboy.

I have not seen an organ of that size which has given me such satisfaction, whether in detail or as a whole. I thank Mr. Appleton publicly, for giving me the opportunity of seeing and hearing it. He has a host of admirers who will rejoice to hear of his success; and I address this letter to you, my dear Sir, knowing your willingness in promulgating to your readers whatever may be useful to them and encouraging to a worthy man.

Yours Truly,

F. F. MÜLLER.

Boston, Aug. 20, 1853.

The writer of the above is well-known to the lovers of good organ music in our city, and his opinion, so spontaneously expressed, must carry weight with it. We congratulate our Bangor friends on the acquisition of a fine organ, since in the person of Mr. John Tufts, above alluded to, they possess a stirring, modest young "native musician" for an organist, who is in earnest with his Art, spending his energies in the true study and practice thereof, instead of in that self-advertisement and that jealousy of foreigners, which are so characteristic of many of our "native professors."

DONIZETTI.—Many times we have been asked for a list of this popular composer; but have in vain sought for any complete account of him, until now. The article on the first page of to-day's paper, is from the preface to the London edition to Lucrezia Borgia, published by Boosey & Co. We give it rather for its facts, than for its criticisms.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

SALE OF AN ORGAN.—We ask the attention of those interested to the advertisement in another column. The old Odeon organ is associated with some of our best musical experiences, and is in a condition to do excellent service again in many church or concert hall that may become its fortunate possessor.

GERMANIA SERENADE BAND.—We thankfully acknowledge the receipt of a spirited and life-like group picture of Mr. SCHNAPP and his seven musical confreres, all standing with their instruments ready for harmonious action. It is lithographed by Hoffmann, from a daguerreotype by Ives, and printed by P. Wagner. We are sure, many of the recipients of their sweet strains will be glad to possess themselves of this speaking memorial to the eye.

Foreign.

PARIS.—Mme. Charton Demeur is engaged at the Opera Comique, and will perform some of her favorite characters, including Le Domino Noir and le Caid. M. Corti has resigned the direction of the Théâtre Italien. One season has sufficed to show him the difficulties of operatic management. M. Blumenthal is in Paris, en route for Switzerland. Sivori has quite recovered from his late accident.

The French Opera, which is to re-open in a few days, with the salle completely cleansed, restored, and ornamented, is about, it is said, to cease to be under the direction of M. Roqueplan, whose affairs are believed to be in an embarrassed position. His successor will probably be M. Poirson, formerly manager of the Gymnase.—(From the Correspondent of the Morning Chronicle.)

BADEN-BADEN.—The first of the series of concerts intended to be given by Ernst, MM. Seligmann and Ehrlich took place on the 16th ult. The grand saloon could not contain half the crowd who flocked to hear these talented artists. The programme consisted solely of instrumental chamber-music—a quartet by Beethoven, variations for piano and violin by the same author, and solos by Ernst and Seligmann. The success was complete. For the second concert, which took place on the 23rd ult., Mdle. Wertheimer and M. Lyon were engaged. The lady sang an aria by Verdi, which did not meet with much success, but she had her revenge in an air from the Carillonneur de Bruges, for which she received three rounds of well-merited applause. M. Lyon sang twice; he has a very agreeable voice, and the audience were pleased with him. A trio by Beethoven was admirably executed by Ernst, Ehrlich, and Seligmann.

It is impossible to describe the enthusiasm that greeted Ernst in his Feuillet d' album (from the "Gages d' amitié"); and in his Carnaval de Venise, the applause was immense, and the great violinist was unanimously proclaimed the German Paganini. A grand festival is announced for the 20th August, at which Hector Berlioz will conduct his Symphonic cantate—Romeo et Juliette.

COLOGNE.—Mlle. Johanna Wagner has made her debut in this city, and met with a success worthy of her great reputation. She appeared in the part of Romeo, and was well supported by Madame Rudersdorf, as Juliette.

WIESBADEN.—M. Vieuxtemps is about to give a concert at this fashionable town.

MAGDEBURG.—Herr Hartung, who is condemned to death for poisoning, has petitioned the King to adjourn his execution till he has finished an opera, of which he has written the libretto, and has almost finished the music!

Advertisements.

ORGAN FOR SALE.

THE large and well known Organ, built by Thomas Appleton for the BOSTON ACADEMY OF MUSIC, will be sold at auction, unless previously disposed of, on Saturday, 10th of September next, at 10 o'clock, A. M., at the Hall of the Lowell Institute, where it now stands. The Organ is of large dimensions, being 2 feet in height, 16 feet in width, and 12 feet in depth; and cost $5,500. It contains 27 Stops, viz: Great Organ, 11; Choir Organ, 8; Swell Organ, 8. It has all the modern improvements in the action, Coupling Stops, Pedals for Sub-Bass of two octaves, &c.; and in short, all that is usually put into the best Organs in the country. With regard to the quality of its tone, it is esteemed equal to any organ ever constructed by that well known builder.

BENJAMIN PERKINS,
Treas'r of Boston Academy of Music.

Boston, August, 1853.

STANDARD SINGING BOOK,

By Hastings & Bradbury.

PSALMISTA: OR CHOIR MELODIES.

THIS latest Book of Thomas Hastings and Wm. B. Bradbury gives the highest satisfaction in Choirs, Churches and Singing Schools. The following are important features in the book:

- 1st. The rudiments are presented in a very attractive manner, and combine both theory and practice.
- 2dly. The Music is beautiful, devotional and simple.
- 3dly. There is a sufficient variety to meet every religious exercise, and no other book is needed for choir practice where this is in use.
- 4thly. The type is large and plain, and paper good.
- 5thly. The price is sufficiently low to meet the wants of any Church or Choir.

Teachers and Choristers desiring a copy for examination, can have it sent free of postage, by remitting 60 cents to the publishers.

NEWMAN & IVISON.

178 Fulton street, New York.

For sale in Boston by W. J. Reynolds & Co., B. B. Mussey & Co., and Phillips, Sampson & Co.

aug. 27, 3t.

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE,

No. 86 TREMONT STREET, BOSTON.

WHITE BROTHERS,

DEALERS IN MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS,

Best Italian, German, French and English Strings,

AGENTS OF

J. André, Offenbach; and G. André, Philadelphia,
FOR THE SALE OF FOREIGN CLASSIC MUSIC,
CHOIR MUSIC, &c.

Instruments Made, Repaired, Tuned, Bought, Sold, or Exchanged, on the most favorable terms.

IRA J. WHITE.

A. WARREN WHITE.

iii 2 3m

The best Book on Piano Instruction existing!

IN PRESS:—JULIUS KNORR'S GUIDE FOR TEACHERS ON THE PIANO. A full system of instruction, from the very outset, to artistic perfection, with full advice to teachers and pupils. Its progressive order, completeness, and the value of the pieces recommended, (about 200,) make it indispensable to teachers, and invaluable to all players. It is

THE BEST SELF-INSTRUCTOR EXTANT.

It is also THE ONLY KEY to the proper use of Julius Knorr's "Materials," and his "Large Method." Price 75 cents.

G. A. SCHMITT, Petersburg, Va.

iii 14 3m

HAND-BOOK OF SINGING.

RIMBAULT'S HAND-BOOK OF SINGING: being the Second of Rimbault's Series of Elementary Music Works. Just published. Price 50 cents.
OLIVER DITSON, 115 Washington St.

NORMA.

JUST PUBLISHED: THE OPERA OF NORMA, with ENGLISH AND ITALIAN WORDS. Price $2. Being No. 1 of "Ditson's Edition of Standard Operas."

"At the low price of two dollars this opera is accessible to every music-lover, and in a form convenient and beautiful."—Journal of Music.

"A perfect mine of musical wealth."—Ch. Freeman.
"One of the most beautiful and recherché of all the elegant musical publications—and their name is legion—which have appeared from Mr. Ditson's teeming press."—Yankee Blade.

"Less than half the cost of a similar edition published in England, it is within the reach of all."—Transcript.

"Superb both as regards the composition, and the taste and skill displayed in its typographical and its mechanical execution generally."—Pathfinder.

DON GIOVANNI, by MOZART, will be ready in a few days. Price $1.

Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.
Sold by all Music Dealers. ii20

SOPRANO SINGER.

A YOUNG LADY is desirous of procuring a situation as SOPRANO SINGER in a Quartet Choir, by the 1st of October. Application to be made to Miss FANNY FRAZER, care of G. P. REED & Co., Tremont Row. Aug. 20.

L. O. EMERSON,

Teacher of the Piano-Forte and Singing.

APPLY AT HIS RESIDENCE,

No. 12 INDIANA PLACE, BOSTON.

iii 13 3m.

A. W. FRENZEL,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC, and late Leader of the "SAXONIA ORCHESTRA," having made Boston his residence, is prepared to give lessons on the Piano-Forte and in Singing, both in the English and German languages; also to accompany with the violin more advanced pupils in the Sonata-duos of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c. During the summer season, Mr. F. offers his services to classes out of town. Or he will receive scholars, from the city or the country, at his Music Rooms, No. 4 Pine Street, Boston, where he may always be found before 10 A. M., and between the hours of 1 and 3 P. M. iii 6

JONAS CHICKERING,

RESPECTFULLY gives notice to his friends and the public that, having recovered from the late disastrous effects produced by the destruction of his factory, he is now ready to receive orders for PIANOS, which he promises to execute with as much faithfulness and promptitude as heretofore.

379 Washington Street, Boston.

Mar. 5.

tf

HEWES' PATENT

AMERICAN ACTION PIANO-FORTE.

THE MANUFACTURER is in possession of numerous testimonials from distinguished Musical Professors, who have used the greatly improved ACTION PIANO, commending it in high terms. The attention of purchasers and amateurs of Music to an examination of its superiority, is solicited.

GEO. HEWES, 355 Washington St., Boston.

Apr. 10.

tf

THEODORE T. BARKER,

MUSIC STORE,

No. 381 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

Chickering's Pianos to let.

All Foreign and American Musical Publications received as soon as published. ii23 3m

N. D. COTTON,

IMPORTER AND DEALER IN

English, French, and American Stationery,
DRAWING & PAINTING MATERIALS,

No. 13 Tremont Row, Boston.

 Wedding and Visiting Cards Engraved and Printed. 16 tf

D. B. NEWHALL,

MANUFACTURER AND DEALER IN
PIANO FORTES,

No. 344 Washington Street, Boston.

PIANO FORTES REPAIRED, TUNED, & TO LET.

Apr. 10.

tf

BEETHOVEN'S ORATORIO OF ENGEDI, or DAVID IN THE WILDERNESS, known as the MOUNT OF OLIVES, is this day published in a neat, convenient form for the singer or concert-goer by

Geo. P. Reed & Co., Publishers,
17 Tremont Row, Boston.

Jan. 8.

Edward L. Balch,

NEW SINGING BOOK!

UNION OF POPULAR AUTHORS!!

WM. B. BRADBURY,
GEORGE F. ROOT,
THOMAS HASTINGS,
T. B. MASON.

THE SHAWM.

A COMPLETE LIBRARY OF CHURCH MUSIC. By WILLIAM B. BRADBURY and GEORGE F. ROOT, assisted by THOS. HASTINGS and T. B. MASON.

It is believed that by a union of the experience and resources of so many distinguished authors, a work of peculiar interest and usefulness has been produced. It contains in all about one thousand compositions, thus affording opportunity to collect together all the old favorites, and yet to give an increased amount of new music.

Some features of the work may be mentioned as follows:

1. PSALM AND HYMN TUNES.—These may be divided into two classes, the old and the new. It is safe to assert that no previous similar work has contained nearly as many of the favorite compositions of all our most popular American as well as foreign authors. But few tunes are in familiar use in the vestries, social meetings or congregations of any portion of the land, which are not here preserved. Besides their own compositions, the authors have, by special arrangement, been permitted to make use of many of the favorite works of Mr. LOWELL MASON, and other distinguished authors.

The quantity of new tunes presented is also unusually large. Assistance from abroad has been enjoyed by foreign correspondence, as well as by untiring research among the works of the greatest composers of the past and present. But especially will the Shawm be found rich in its home department. Besides the authors themselves, many of our most celebrated American musicians have contributed to its pages.

2. VARIETY OF METERS.—While the chief portion of the work is devoted to those meters which are in most common use, there will be found tunes of every meter in use by any denomination. Some idea of the variety and completeness in this respect, may be obtained from the fact that there are over one hundred different meters represented.

3. ANTHEMS, CHANTS, SET-PIECES, &c.—Due attention has been paid to this portion of the work, and there will be found pieces appropriate to almost every possible religious occasion.

4. The new Cantata (or Oratorio) entitled DANIEL; OR THE CAPTIVITY AND RESTORATION, in three parts. The words are by C. M. Cady, Esq., assisted by Miss Frances Jane Crosby; the music by George F. Root and Wm. B. Bradbury. Though complete as a whole, and designed especially for Societies, Choirs, Singing Schools, &c., nearly all the choruses may be used as original pieces in the regular sanctuary service.

5. THE SINGING CLASS, is a department designed as a complete manual for Music Classes, which has received most careful attention. The brief space of time usually allotted to the study of the Elementary in Singing Schools has been kept in mind, and a new arrangement has been adopted, intertwining the practical with the theoretical from the very first lesson, and combining simplicity with progression. The introduction of quite a number of easy glees and part songs in this elementary department is a feature which will help to keep in active exercise the interests of a class.

6. INDEXES.—The completeness of these will add much to the convenience of the work. The Chorister's Index refers to nearly every Hymn Book in use.

7. THE BEAUTY OF THE TYPOGRAPHY will elicit admiration.

8. THE CHEAPNESS OF THE WORK; though containing so greatly increased an amount of matter, and combining the labors of several authors, the price will not be greater than that of previous works.

Other points might be alluded to, but it is hoped every teacher of music and chorister will be sufficiently interested to make a careful examination of the work for himself. Any such can have a copy sent him free of postage, for examination, by remitting 60 cents to the publishers.

MASON BROTHERS,

aug13 4t No. 23 Park Row, New York.

J. W. TAVERNER,
PROFESSOR OF ELOCUTION,

AT HIS RESIDENCE,

No. 30 CHARLES STREET, BOSTON.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.

FOREIGN MUSIC DEPOT,

GIRARD HOUSE BUILDINGS,

NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,

PHILADELPHIA.

N. B. The complete works, for Piano, (Quartets, Trios, Duets for Piano and Violin, Duets for four hands and Piano solo pieces,) of BEETHOVEN and MOZART, as also the Piano solo Works of CLEMENTI and HAYDN, as published by J. André, Offenbach, in sets, at very low prices. We have appointed

Messrs. WHITE BROTHERS,

TREMONT TEMPLE, BOSTON,

sole Agents for the sale of the above Standard Editions of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, &c. &c.

iii 2 tf

MRS. ROSA GARCIA DE RIBAS,

TEACHER OF THE

PIANOFORTE, SINGING & GUITAR,

2 Seneca St., corner Harrison Avenue.

MR. De RIBAS will give instruction on the Oboe and Flute. Also MUSIC ARRANGED, TRANSPOSED, &c. Boston, April 23. 3m

Letter-Press, Music and Job Printing-Office,

SIGNOR G. C. GUIDI respectfully informs his former pupils and the public, that he has resumed his instructions in SINGING, after the Italian school, with the intention to settle permanently in Boston. In order to accommodate those who may not wish to take private instruction, he will open classes for ladies and gentlemen, on moderate terms. None but good voices will be admitted. Terms liberal for persons intending to study for professional purposes.

Sig. G. can be consulted free upon any musical subject, daily, from 12 to 2, at Mr. Hewes's Piano Manufactory, No. 355 Washington street, where terms and time for classes may be known.

Orders or notes for Sig. G. may be addressed to him at G. P. Reed & Co.'s Music Store, 17 Tremont Row, and at Oliver Ditson's, 115 Washington street. Feb. 5.

A CARD.

THE SUBSCRIBER respectfully offers his services to the public as Teacher of the Piano-Forte, the Violin and the Guitar, also of Harmony and Singing, after a clear and easy method. He will also accompany pupils, both in seminaries and in private houses, in the practice of Duets, Trios, &c.

Address for the present at 168 Tremont Street.

March 26. 3m.

CARL GÄRTNER.

L. H. SOUTHARD,
TEACHER OF MUSIC,
265 Washington Street, Boston.

Oct. 16.

3m

T. BRICHER,

Organist and Conductor of Music
At the Bowdoin Square Church.

OFFICE UNDER THE CHURCH... ENTRANCE ON CHARDON ST.

Jan. 22. 3m.

H. S. CUTLER,

Organist at the Church of the Advent, also of the Boston Harmonic Society.

ADDRESS—(Care of ROLAND CUTLER, No. 4 Market Square, Boston.) 22 tf

F. F. MÜLLER,

DIRECTOR OF MUSIC AND ORGANIST at the Old South Church; ORGANIST of the Handel and Haydn Society; ORGANIST of the Musical Education Society, &c. &c. &c. Residence, No. 3 Winter Place, Boston. ii7 tf

NATHAN RICHARDSON,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC.

Letters may be addressed at the Revere House, Boston. 25 tf

GEORGE F. WILLEY,

TEACHER OF MUSIC.

Private Tuition in the principles of Music and the Cultivation of the Voice.

MUSIC ROOM, the LECTURE ROOM OF KIRK STREET CHURCH,

RESIDENCE, 34 FRANKLIN SQUARE, SUFFOLK STREET,

Feb. 5.

LOWELL, MASS.

Germania Serenade Band.

THE SERVICES OF THIS ASSOCIATION can be secured by applying to

ii 14 tf

G. SCHNAPP, Leader,
364 Tremont Street.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

AT 21 SCHOOL STREET, BOSTON,

$2 per annum, in advance.

ITS CONTENTS relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time.—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music published at home and abroad. 3. A Summary of the significant Musical News from all parts; gathered from English, German, French, as well as American papers. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, Architecture, Poetry, Aesthetic Books, the Drama, &c.—8. Original and Selected Poems, short Tales, Anecdotes, &c. Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished. Address, (post paid,) J. S. DWIGHT, 21 School Street, Boston.

RATES FOR ADVERTISING.

For half a square, (8 lines,) or less, first insertion, . . . $0.50
each additional inser. 25
For a square, (16 lines,) first insertion, 1.00
each additional insertion, 50

On advertisements standing three months or longer, a discount of twenty per cent. on the above rates is allowed. (A column counts as seven squares.)

Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 School St.

DWIGHT'S Journal of Music.

A Paper of Art and Literature.

VOL. III.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 3, 1853.

NO. 22.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

TERMS....TWO DOLLARS PER ANNUM, (IN ADVANCE.)

CITY Subscribers can be served at their houses by the further payment of fifty cents per annum.

☞ For Rates of Advertising, see last page.

POSTAGE, if paid in advance, for any distance within the State, thirteen cents a year; if not in advance, twenty-six cents. To all places beyond the State, double these rates.

J. S. DWIGHT,.....EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

☞ OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St.

By REDDING & CO., 8 State St.

" GEO. P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row.

" A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.

" DEXTER & BROTHERS, 43 Ann Street, N. Y.

" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 722 Broadway, N. Y.

" MASON BROTHERS, 23 Park Row, New York.

" GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.

" G. ANDRE, 229 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St., Balt.

" COLBURN & FIELD, Cincinnati, O.

" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Persons willing to become Agents for procuring subscribers, especially Music-Dealers and Teachers, are invited to correspond with the Editor, as above. Satisfactory references required, and liberal commissions allowed.

☞ Back numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Also bound copies of Vols. I. and II. at prices varying from $2.50 to $3.50.

The Death and Burial of Chopin.

[The following, written as a private letter to friends at home by a young American who made the acquaintance of Chopin in Paris, a short time before his death, has been kindly placed at our disposal. It was written from the heart, and with a true appreciation of the spirit of that most individual, delicate, and spiritual composer. It cannot fail to interest those who have read the memoir by Liszt, translated for this Journal a year ago, and still less those who have learned to know and love the music of Chopin.]

PARIS, OCT. 18, 1849.

Chopin is dead! His ardent, loving soul, too long unequally yoked with a weak, decaying body, has at length been set free. After a weary struggle of more than twelve years with two terrible maladies, consumption and the asthma, he is at rest, a rest from his sufferings too long delayed, a rest from his labors too early granted. He was but thirty-nine years old. From this master so mature in knowledge and in experience, so young in power and freshness and grace, what marvels might we not have expected! Imperfectly known in America, Chopin is recognized in Europe, as a prince in his own right. And now that he is gone, they will bury him like a prince: and not like any vulgar prince, from whose fresh grave the mourners flock to the ante-chamber of his successor. For who shall succeed to the control of that treasury of wayward and subtle conceptions which existed in the heart of this refined, and, in his way, inimitable genius? Chopin's life was in his music. The fiery, chivalrous nationality of the Pole, "ce Français du Nord;" the melancholy, in no degree morbid, of long ill-health, manfully borne; the delicacy, almost feminine, of an aristocratic nature, and of exquisitely nurtured tastes, tastes never languid, never perverse; the tenderness of noble instincts, the truthfulness of earnest convictions: these all combined to make up the charm of Chopin's compositions. Who has not felt, especially in listening to his endlessly varying compositions upon the arbitrary movement of his national dance, the mazourka, that "with that key, Chopin unlocked his heart"? The treasures of that heart he will now unfold, in other spheres, and in the freedom of a grander life!

More sought by fame than seeking it, Chopin passed the twenty years of his life in Paris withdrawn within a circle of highly gifted and appreciating friends, from whom the noble and affectionate qualities of the man won a love more precious by far than the enthusiastic admiration which the rare occasions of his appearance in public secured for the artist. Fortunate they, to whom the full beauty of the composer's works was fully revealed, interpreted as they were, in the confidence of friendship, by him who alone had the secret of their significance!

Driven from Paris by the disturbances of 1848, Chopin went to England, where, after an exhausting season in London, he undertook an autumnal journey in Scotland, which prostrated him greatly, and he came back, as he said, "pierced by the climate." In London he appeared for the last time in public at a concert given for the relief of the Polish refugees. In this respect, like our own G——, Chopin was superior to that selfish indifference in matters of public duty, which has so often been charged upon artists as a body. He loved his country warmly, and never proved recreant to her cause, from the hour when he left Warsaw, an exile of patriotism, to the hour of his death. Holding the Fortunatus's purse of the great musician, he gave of his abundance freely at every call of his country, or of her sons in distress. From the time of his return to Paris, he declined rapidly; but such was the force of vitality in his fine organization, that he died at last only after a keen agony of several hours, bearing up bravely and sweetly to the end. Dear friends were with him—his mother and his sister, who had just arrived from Warsaw. One face alone, which should have been by his bedside, was wanting; strangely, sadly wanting, that he might die with the song of Thékla in his heart. He was of too profound a nature to live or to die an irreligious man; and his simple faith was displayed in his last moments in the most touching and dignified manner. The servants of the house in which he lived, deeply attached to him, brought their children to receive his blessing. "No! my friends," he said; "a sinful man cannot bless your children, but I am going to the dear God, and I will pray to him to bless you and them."—He asked that Mozart's Requiem should be performed for him. The artists of the Conservatoire, the singers of the Italian Opera, have taken it upon themselves to fulfil this request, and the Chant du Cygne of the mightiest of the masters will be sung for the repose of his soul by them in the noble church of the Madeleine! Was I not right in saying they would bury him like a prince?

THURSDAY MORNING.

Yesterday the funeral took place. The body of the immense church, and the Hautes Tribunes, the galleries which run along the side walls between the chapels, were filled with an audience of nearly three thousand persons, gathered by special invitations from the mother, the sister and the near friends of Chopin, to assist at his obsequies. The high altar was canopied in black, the choir filled with the artists who had assembled to do honor to the departed; and before the altar in the body of the church, stood a sort of funereal temple, in which the coffin was to be laid during the mass.

The day was one of unrivalled beauty, and the brilliant sunlight streamed over the gorgeous walls and the silent multitude, the great majority of whom were dressed in mourning. There was an inexpressible solemnity in the first aspect of the scene. But as the throng increased, and the sunlight played more and more brightly on the gay colors and gilded columns of the building, the silence was broken by the buzz of voices, the musicians began to tune their instruments, and my mind gradually wandered off into thoughts most foreign to the occasion, till a sudden thrill ran through us all, and by one common instinct every sound was hushed before a deep solemn voice chanting the opening words of the Roman service for the dead. Slowly moving up the nave came the long procession of white-robed priests,—before them the abbé —, whose magnificent voice filled the church with its low reverberating tones,—behind them four robed in black bearing the dead. I cannot tell you with what a painful shock the reality of the scene rushed then upon my mind! How instantaneously did this one unconscious, senseless form, brought thus into that splendid and brilliant assembly, subdue their splendor and overshadow their brilliancy! Slowly the priests moved on—solemnly the coffin was laid in its place; and disposing themselves about the altar steps the priests went on with their imposing chant. The responses came from the organ-loft, breathed through that distance in so subdued a tone that, but for the extraordinary silence, we should scarce have heard them. For the first time I began to understand the power over the senses and the imagination of the offices of the Roman church. The sounds of the chanting gradually died away, and then after a pause a soft atmosphere of slow, sweet music began to float about us. The music deepened on and on, the exquisite harmony of the instruments flowing a widening river, till suddenly the waves divided before a mighty voice—a voice which rose and rose, louder and more loud, full, rich, more clear than the ring of trumpets, more sweet and deep than the tones of an organ—the wonderful voice of Lablache! My anticipations of this voice were more than fulfilled. Hardly could I persuade myself that it came from human lips. In all its power faultlessly sweet, it overwhelmed my senses in its flood of melody. This was Lablache. Of the rest, to say that my ignorance has no words to describe the progress of the Requiem, is to say little. Even —'s vocabulary might fail him here. How the delicious voice of Viardot came pouring through the serene atmosphere of instrumental harmony! How the great organ thrilled the very walls (this is no metaphor) with its solemn lamentations! How the silvery tones of the wind instruments rang out in triumph over the thunder of the violoncellos and the drums! How the clear, religious tenor voice of Alexis Dupont sent up its divine supplications! You know the parts of this incomparable composition far better than I; yet can you hardly imagine the effect upon me of that divine Agnus Dei near the close, rendered as it was yesterday rendered. Shaken by a mighty movement, the mind could scarce compose itself in the brief, prayerful pause, before a low, dream-like, inexpressibly calm and holy strain came stealing over the soul, and breathing out the perfect benediction of faith and peace from Heaven. Never had I known the profound power of the greatest music till then. Fear, trouble, hope itself, were put at rest, and death seemed beautiful in this revelation of the calm that is with God. The sin and the shame, the sorrow and the suffering of this world—between them and the soul redeemed, what a limitless sea of Light and Love is rolling!—

When I raised my head, the sunlight was streaming broader than before through the wide-opened doors, and the procession was moving out.

The crowd dispersed—the gay world of Paris went on its way rejoicing: the true friends, sorrowing, bore their dead to Père Lachaise, and laid him, yet not with hopeless tears, in his grave.

Faithful to the last, four men, than whom Paris has none more notable in their several ways of life, walked beside the coffin of Chopin to its resting-place: the great-hearted and venerable Prince Adam Czartoryski, Delacroix the painter, Camille Pleyel, and Meyerbeer.

Shall I tell you now what I read in this morning's paper?

"A young man, a German violinist, apparently in extreme poverty, was yesterday arrested by the police, for attacking the Suisse of the Madeleine, during the celebration of the obsequies of Chopin. It appeared that the young man, extremely desirous to hear the performance of Mozart's Requiem, presented himself at the church without a card of invitation, and was refused admission. He applied in vain at all the doors, and having unsuccessfully endeavored to bribe one of the officers by the offer of two francs, he finally contrived to slip in at the western gate. Being discovered by the Suisse, he was repulsed, but made another attempt at another entrance, and succeeded in getting into the vestibule, from which place also he was ejected after a severe struggle. On being interrogated, the violinist could only excuse his conduct on the plea of his raging desire to hear the Requiem, and his fury at being disappointed. It appeared that the forty sous piece which he offered at the gate, was the only money about his person."

Within, the apotheosis of the Artist recognized and triumphant! Without, the Artist poor, unknown, begging for the bread of his soul—spurned by a beadle from the door of God's temple!

SONG OF CAROLINE VON GUNDERODE.*

FROM THE GERMAN.

It is all drear and sad;
Nothing more makes me glad;
Odors no odor bring,
Breezes no quickening;
Poor heart, how sad!

All is so still and gone;
Heart and soul left forlorn;
Seeking I know not what,
Resting not, knowing not Whither I'm borne!

One master mould of clay
Stole all my thoughts away!
Since I its beauty felt,
Near me it still hath dwelt,
Mine, though away.

One sound my heart still hears,
One that my spirit cheers;
Soft as a flute, one word
Soundeth on since 'twas heard,
Stoppeth all tears.

Spring's blossoms all are true,
They all come back anew;
Not so doth Love, alack!
That cometh never back,
Fair, but not true!

Can love so love-less be?
Can mine so stay from me?
Joy sit so heavily,
Hugging inconstancy?
Sad bliss for me!

Phoenix of loveliness!
Thou on bold wing dost press
Far to the sun's bright beam:
Little disturbs thy dream
My lone distress!

J. S. D.

* The celebrated friend of Bettina, who found so tragic a death in the waters of the Rhine.

[From Novello's Musical Times.]

Mendelssohn's St. Paul.

By G. A. MACFARREN.

* * * The merit of this truly great work lies, first in the subject, which, besides that it excites the universal sympathy of every Christian, and especially of every Protestant public, affords many and great opportunities for musical expression of the highest order, without which opportunities the artist would feel in vain, would in vain lavish his skill, capable only, by the cold results of his labor, of exciting our admiration, never of kindling our enthusiasm: and next, in the style of the music, which presents the broad simplicity of the pure contrapuntal school with such bright, vivid coloring as is afforded by the development that our Art, hand-in-hand with the beautiful science that controls it, has undergone since that school prevailed. These are the elements of the success of St. Paul, which would have been, however, but unsubstantial chaos, save for the creative power that moulded them into form, and invested that form with pre-eminent beauty.

There is one drawback in the general effects of this Oratorio, to which only I can attribute its present lesser popularity in England than that of the other great sacred work of Mendelssohn. As such I can only regard the frequency of the narrative recitatives. These could not, without the violation of propriety, have been made musically interesting, neither could they have been made to afford any scope for the display of the declamatory power of the executants; but, necessitated as they are by the arrangement of the text, I feel them to be a sacrifice to the words, of which the words make most ungrateful acknowledgment. In the Messiah and in Israel in Egypt there are no such unfortunate passages, essential to the carrying on of the action of the history at the expense of the musical interest of the Oratorio, and these works are here, perhaps in consequence, very much, I may almost say infinitely, preferred above all the other sacred works of the master,—and Mendelssohn appears to have anticipated the present objection by his avoidance of such a distribution of the subject in his later work. Great as are the dramatic, the declamatory, and the musical beauties that balance the passages to which I refer, and very small as is the extent of these in proportion to the entire work, which is otherwise all of interest, the effect of these narrative recitatives is certainly not outweighed, and if their presence in the Oratorio may scarcely be called a blemish, I, at least, cannot but feel it to be, as I have said, a drawback in the general effect. Either in Germany this drawback, if such it may be called, acts not, or it is counteracted by some other influence that prevails not here, for as I learn on all hands, St. Paul is there the most esteemed among artists, and the most popular with the public of all Mendelssohn's works.

One feature, a very prominent one, of this composition is its incorporation of several of the Chorals or Hymns of the Lutheran Church. This must conduce greatly to the popularity of St. Paul throughout Protestant Germany, where these ancient tunes are very much more generally, very much more familiarly known than are any of the Psalm-tunes, except the hundredth, and possibly some one or two besides, in use in the Church of England, known in this country; because such household, such almost instinctive familiarity with the simple tunes as prevails in Germany must there give a peculiar charm to their introduction in any elaborate composition, to which we (who know the Choral, not by long habit that has grown up from infancy, but for the first time as here presented), are wholly unsusceptible; and, moreover, must enable those hearers to trace the tune through the contrapuntal development to which they are occasionally submitted, with a clearness to which only an intimate knowledge of the work can help us, and with an interest to which we must ever be strangers.

It may be desirable for those who know not the practice (as was my case for long after I knew and admired St. Paul), to explain that it has always been a custom of the Protestant composers of Germany to employ these Lutheran chorals after the manner in which Palestrina and other musicians, who devoted their talents to the service of the church of Rome, employed the Gregorian tones, as plain song or canto fermo on which to construct every variety of contrapuntal elaboration, sometimes simple, sometimes florid, sometimes double, sometimes constructing a fugue upon some independent subject, upon which the canto fermo is ingrafted; and the Protestant writers have emulated, and even surpassed, the profundity of research and complexity of contrivance in which the Roman Catholic contrapuntists so eminently distinguish themselves, as though they identified their art with their church, and the rivalry of the one induced a rivalry, no less honorable surely, in the other. Thus we find that besides harmonizing a collection extending to three hundred or more of these primitive Lutheran chorals, in plain counterpoint, Bach selected from them themes for many of his more elaborate instrumental and vocal compositions, among which may be cited the ten church cantatas, first published a short time since by the Bach society of Leipzig, each of which is founded on one of these venerable tunes, and one of them, consisting of seven distinct movements, airs, duets, choruses, has no other subject but only one choral which is diversified by seven several modes of treatment. Many other composers, if not to the same extent and if not with the same success as Bach, certainly in the same spirit of musicianship, and, I am inclined to believe, also of devotion, have in like wise expended their utmost ingenuity in the treatment of some or other of these Lutheran tunes, and Mendelssohn was in this exercise of his art no less active than the rest.

It is to be observed as peculiar in the treatment of those chorals, that composers have allowed themselves the greatest and the most arbitrary license with regard to the rhythmical arrangement of their theme, writing it either in longer or in shorter notes, in common or in triple measure, with utter indifference as to its original form, if, indeed, it were possible to trace this through the modification to which traditional preservation has subjected them. Not only in the rhythm, but even in the intervals of the tunes we find many various readings in the renderings of various authors, and in the several readings of the same author; thus, in the cantata of Bach to which I have alluded, since the same choral forms the only subject of seven several movements, the effect of the whole is by no means so monotonous as might naturally be expected, since, by lengthening some notes and shortening others, by varying the measures, and by changing some of the intervals, especially by the occasional introduction of notes or ornament, ingenious contrivance elicits more versatility from one fixed theme than barren invention could display with unlimited scope for the exercise of its feeble power. This will account for some discrepancies that appear between some of the chorals introduced in St. Paul as they are here presented and as they are to be found in other compositions, and between the various renderings of the same subject in different parts of the present work.

It must be understood that it is the custom of the performance of the choral in the Lutheran churches, where it is given in its simplest form and sung by the whole congregation, to pause at the end of each strain of the tune and line of the words, however various the length of each, and, when the performance is accompanied by the organ, these pauses are filled up with interludes at the discretion of the organist, more or less after the manner, but rarely to the extent of the interludes played between the verses of the psalms in our parochial churches. This custom has given rise to the practice with musicians of separating the strains of the choral by shorter or longer interludes when they introduce it in prolonged composition, sometimes consisting only of a florid passage while the last harmony of the voices is sustained, sometimes consisting only of extensive fugal development of the subject employed as principal counterpoint against the canto fermo. Such is the origin of the interludes by which, in some cases, the several strains of the chorals employed in St. Paul are divided, with what happy skill and with what admirable effect the complete success and great popularity of these prominent portions of the work in this country, where the tunes derive no interest from constant intimacy and early association, fully attest.

The appropriation of these Lutheran hymns to the subject of the present Oratorio, is peculiarly pertinent, for the same tunes are invariably connected with the same words, and therefore suggest the words to which they belong whenever they are heard, and, these presenting always allusions to, or embodiments of, the principles and tenets which it was the sacred mission of St. Paul to promulgate, their introduction forms a popular, and instantly appreciable, and I think, a simple, beautifully poetical illustration of the narrative of the Apostle's career. Besides this poetical purpose in their incorporation in the work, we have also to consider the powerful relief even upon our unfamiliar ears, they afford to the more extended rhythmical forms, and the more copious development of the other portions of the Oratorio; then we must regard our composer's especial fondness for exercising his musicianship upon these themes, irrespective of their appropriation to the purposes of devotion or their expression of its feelings, evinced in his introduction of them not only in his sacred works, but into his chamber music, which, if not necessarily of a secular character, can scarcely have been designed to bear a sacred tendency: and we may, not unfairly, suppose that this fondness sprang from the custom of his countrymen and from his emulation of that Colossus of counterpoint whose works were his chief and constant admiration, so as to be esteemed, in fact, a point of artistry, no more than from a devotional feeling of which he found his art the most congenial medium of expression. Thus is explained the appearance of the Lutheran Chorals in the work under notice; and the consideration that Luther fulfilled the character of a new St. Paul to the Reformed Church, and that these very verses and these very tunes were of his own dissemination, and are peculiarly characteristic of the Church he established, gives such truthfulness, such pertinence, as I have said, to their present application as must be appreciable by every one.

[To be continued.]

FRENCH ACTORS.—It certainly materially adds to the dignity and respectability of the dramatic profession in France, that a large number of its members are men of refined taste and liberal education, quite capable, if they chose, of earning a living, and of even earning themselves a name, in other arts and pursuits than that they have chosen to follow. Among them are to be found elegant scholars, dramatists, poets, painters, sculptors, musicians—not mere dabblers, but proficient of approved merit. At the Comedie Francaise most of the principal actors are men of learning and literary accomplishments, profoundly versed in the history and practice of their art, to whose literature they have, in several instances, made valuable additions, and which many of them have studied not only in French, but in the masterpieces of foreign poets and dramatists. Samson and Regnier may be cited as brilliant examples of the class of stage players who thus at once illustrate and elevate their profession. At the Odeon, Henry Mounier is at once author, artist, and actor, and in all three lines he is full of originality. He performs in his own plays, and earns double applause. At the same theatre Tisserant is a musician, and has written vaudevilles and some pleasing poetry. In most of the other theatres, and in various degrees, similar instances might be cited. The Porte St. Martin has at this moment among its actors, sculptors, vaudevillists, and the eccentric Bonton, who composes chansonnettes, and is a professor of the guitar.—Blackwood's Mag.

DON'T WALK SO FAST.—"I have often used," says Grétry, "a singular stratagem, to slacken or quicken the pace of a walking companion. To say you walk too fast, or too slow, is unpolite save to a friend; but to sing softly an air to the time of the walk of your companion, and then, by degrees, either to quicken the time or make it slower, is a stratagem as innocent as it is convenient."

AUTUMN.

BY C. P. CRANCH.

Downward Time's sunny slope the year descending,
With slow step, glides;
Like Pan he seems his reedy music blending
With the eternal tides.

The loud, full strains of the bright festive Summer,
He once outpoured,
Now modulate with low and gentle murmur
To a rich minor chord.

Slowly he goes, with gay leaves red and yellow
Around him bound:
With wheat and ripe fruits large and mellow,
Well over-topped and crowned.

As from a tree, he drops the days so golden,
Like his own fruits,
Each one a reflex of that sunshine olden,
That woke Arcadian flutes.

Far o'er the crystal streams, through tangled woods,
To mountain sides,
He breathes o'er all his still autumnal moods,
As softly as he glides.

The grass is green beneath his silent tread;
But the pale leaves
Are falling; passing sometimes o'er their bed
The chill wind sobs and grieves.

And the small rain comes drizzling through the air;
The cold gray cloud
Hangs on the faces of the mountains fair,
And wraps them in a shroud.

Yet stealth on the cheerful stout old Year,
And draws away
His clouds, and bids the sunlight, glittering clear,
Burst out in joyous day.

The glow of vigorous eld, a kindly light
Is on his face.
At morn, at sunset, through the cool moist height
Still goes his steady pace.

Down to the deep vale of the Past he goes.
Invisible gates
Before him open and behind him close,
Locked by the stern old Fates.

And we are gliding with him hand in hand;
There is no spot
Where we may pause to question or command
The power that yieldeth not.

May I but pass as peacefully as thou,
When age draws near,
With fruits and gay leaf chaplets on my brow,
Like thee, departing Year!

UNDER WHAT DENOMINATION COMES A MUSICIAN IN POINT OF LAW?—Bavaria, the land of beer, of poetic monarchs, of Jesuits, and Countesses of Landsfeld—answers that question for us; for itself only, it is to be hoped! The case is this—Richard Wagner, who lives at Zurich, has been prevailed upon to take the direction of a monster musical festival; Wagner is a political refugee, full of new-fangled notions more or less original; a host of musicians from Munich and adjacent towns, wanting to visit Zurich for the occasion, applied for the necessary passports, which were refused, on the following plea:—That artisans—travelling journeymen, (Handwerksburschen) are forbidden to enter Switzerland, on account (sousentendu) that the air is impregnated with notions too liberal to be agreeable to the Bavarian passport-office. This state of things would be ridiculous if it were not serious, and serious if it were not so ridiculous.—London Paper.

A MUSICAL DOG.—Schneitzhofer, a pupil of Cherubini, had a dog which in the orchestra of the Grand Opera in Paris was used as a Diapason, since he, upon the command of his master, invariably gave La as correctly as it could be produced by any tuning-fork.

Seeing the Monkey.

A correspondent of the Newark Advertiser writing from Branfield, Connecticut, gives the following account of the vocal and instrumental music of that place:—

"Our singers are a caution to all hearers not to lend their ears, which Anthony desired to borrow of the Romans. What they lack in skill, they make up in volume. This is especially true of our female vocalists. Why, my dear friend, they scream. Having no taste to discriminate in this matter, and, unfortunately, the directions in their tune books being in an unknown tongue, they attack a psalm as a fort to be carried by storm. And they do carry it.—Evidently, there is a strife among them who shall sing the loudest, and the palm is not yet conferred. They are getting up a concert now, and perhaps the question will be decided, when that comes off. By the way, a good story may be told of our chorister's attempt at improving the psalmody as well as the music of our church. He set some music of his own to one of the Psalms of Watts, a very familiar psalm, in one of which occur these lines:

"O may my heart in tune be found,
Like David's harp of solemn sound."

Calling on his pastor, who has more music in him than you would think, the chorister asked his approbation of a new version of these lines, which would render them more readily adapted to the music he had composed. He suggested to read them as follows:

"O may my heart be tuned within,
Like David's sacred violin."

The good pastor had some internal tendencies to laugh in the singing-man's face, but maintaining his gravity as well as he could, he said that he thought he could improve the improved version, admirable as it was. The delighted chorister begged him to do so, and the pastor, taking his pen, wrote before the eyes of his innocent parishioner, these lines:

"O may my heart go diddle diddle,
Like uncle David's sacred fiddle."

The poor leader, after a vain attempt to defend his own parody, retired, and I guess he will sing the psalm as it stands.

We have an organ of course. They tell us that every church has an organ, if it is anything of a church. Ours is not a very large one, but it is large enough in all conscience for the house, and the playing. It is somewhat larger, and makes more solemn, churchlike music, than the organs which your strolling music pedlars carry in the streets, grinding pennyworths of sound for their ragged customers. But it does sound very much like those vagabond factories of music murder, I fear, from an incident of last Sunday.

A lady from New York was up here, having been spending the summer in the country. As this was to be the last Sabbath of her visit, she took her son, a child of four years old, to meeting with her for the first time. As soon as the organ commenced its strains, the little fellow started up with delight; he looked back to the gallery, he stretched his neck; he got upon the cushions and raised himself to his very tallest; his mother remonstrated with him and told him to sit down. But he refused, and continued gazing aloft with straining eyes. "Sit down," said his mother. "I won't!" he cried, so as to be heard all around, "I WANT TO SEE THE MONKEY."

Jullien's First Concert.

[From the N. Y. Courier and Enquirer.]

Monsieur JULLIEN is a humbug; which may be news to our readers, but is not news to Monsieur JULLIEN. Let us not be misunderstood. Monsieur JULLIEN is not a pitiful humbug, or a timorous humbug, or, worse than all, an unsuccessful humbug; he is a splendid, bold, and dazzlingly successful humbug; one who merits his great success almost as much as if he had not employed the means by which he has achieved it. Monsieur JULLIEN, having blazoned himself and his principal artists in infernal scarlet and black all over the town, for some months,—having issued an infinite series of portraits of himself, and ruined the prospects of the Art Union by establishing several free galleries of portraits of his colleagues,—having occupied (and handsomely paid for) a large portion of valuable space in our columns and those of our principal contemporaries by informing people of what they knew perfectly well before or did not want to know at all,—having brought over from England forty and odd orchestral performers, when we could hardly support those who were already here, and created a dearth in the musician market by recklessly buying up the services of sixty more,—having had six advertisements daily in every journal to announce what could just as well have been told in one,—having withdrawn a rather middle aged looking portrait of Madame ANNA ZERR to substitute a younger and prettier (but not too young and pretty) portrait of Mademoiselle ANNA ZERR,—having announced that the well beloved Castle Garden of the New Yorkers could be formed into "the most perfect salle de concert in the world," and that he had built "an entirely new orchestra on the most approved acoustic principles" for their especial delectation,—having done all this, he sends us a vast and ponderous card of admission printed in scarlet and gold, in the folio form, upon brilliantly enamelled board, and bound in crimson morocco; the meaning of all this being that if the New York public, ourselves included, would go to Castle Garden on last evening we would hear some very fine orchestral music; and this was humbug, although Monsieur JULLIEN gave us all he promised us, and more.

But if this were humbug before we got into "the most perfect salle de concert in the world," what shall we say of the performances after we entered that seventh musical heaven? We mean the performances of Monsieur JULLIEN. Exactly in the middle of the vast orchestra was a crimson platform edged with gold, and upon this was a music-stand, formed by a fantastic gilt figure supporting a desk, and behind the stand, a carved arm-chair decorated in white and gold, and tapestried with crimson velvet, a sort of throne for the musical monarch. He steps forward, and we see those ambrosial whiskers and moustaches which Punch has immortalized; we gaze upon that immaculate waistcoat, that transcendent shirt front, and that unutterable cravat which will be "read about" hereafter; the monarch graciously and gracefully accepts the tumultuous homage of the assembled thousands, grasps his sceptre, and the violins wail forth the first broken phrase of the overture to Der Freyschütz. The overture is splendidly performed. The vast body of strings, the perfectly pure quality of tone, and the absolute execution of the wind band, the marvellous drilling of the entire body, and the conductor's unexceptionable construction of the score, make this hearing of Der Freyschütz an event to be remembered.

But Monsieur JULLIEN again claims our attention, and intends to have it, and will accomplish his intent. The last idea to be allowed to enter the minds of the audience, is that the composer or the musicians have any agency in producing these fine effects. It must be Monsieur JULLIEN, who not only rides the whirlwind and controls the storm, but who furnishes the tempest, the thunder and the lightning. Other conductors use their batons to direct their orchestra. Not so with Monsieur JULLIEN. His band is so well drilled at rehearsal that it conducts itself at performances, while he uses his baton to direct the audience. He does everything with that unhappy bit of wood, but put it to its legitimate purpose of beating time. It is continually in motion, but to judge from its position whether it is moving in the first, the middle or the last part of a measure, would be a puzzling matter. Its use in Monsieur JULLIEN's hands is to seem to draw out the music from one instrument and another, as if it were an enchanter's wand. Now Monsieur JULLIEN lets it float lazily over the heads of the violins as they bow off a graceful legato; now he brings it chickering down through the air as he stretches himself and it towards a flute which is executing a descending staccato; and it chickers up again as the oboe responds in an ascending reply. Suddenly he wheels bolt around, with his back to the audience, and brings it down with vigorous blows and ponderous manner over trumpets, horns, trombones and ophcleides, and the very Castle rocks with the tremendous peal which it seems to startle from their brazen throats. An undulating murmur runs through the string band: it follows, or is followed by the inevitable baton which is swept slowly round the orchestra with an ineffable and weary grace. The movement quickens and the baton accelerates its inspiring pulsations. It seems to lift the performers with it as it is jerked convulsively into the air above their heads. To the uninitiated, that baton seems to compel them to come one by one into the crash and conflict of sound: its vivid energy becomes terrific as the climax approaches; and as it culminates in a crash which sounds like the wreck of matter and the crush of worlds, made musical, Monsieur JULLIEN is seen standing with both hands raised in phrensy, as if he expected to be borne aloft by the explosion,—the baton gleaming above his head. The music is magnificent, and so is the humbug, as Monsieur JULLIEN caps its climax by subsiding into his crimson gilded throne, overwhelmed by his exertions, a used up man.

Monsieur JULLIEN gave us a rich instrumental entertainment last evening; as we remarked before, all he had promised us, and more. The discipline of his orchestra is marvellous. He obtains from fifty strings a pianissimo which is scarcely audible, and he makes one hundred instruments stop in the midst of a fortissimo which seems to lift the roof, as if an hundred men dropped dead at the movement of his hand. He gave us KOENIG, whose cornet utters a tone so pure, so vocal, so human, and whose execution leaves praise without words to utter itself;—BOTTESINI, the PAGANINI of the contra basso, who met his first recognition in these columns and from this pen(!);—and ANNA ZERR, with a voice which seems to start in its ascent where other voices stop, and an execution which puts to shame instrumental precision. Orchestral effects finer than those produced by Monsieur JULLIEN's colossal band could hardly be, and we do not wonder at the enthusiasm which they awakened in the enormous audience which listened to them.

But if all this be true,—as it is—why do we say that Monsieur JULLIEN is a humbug. For this reason. Humbug does not necessarily imply a cheat on one side and a dupe on the other. It is the art of drawing attention and attaining success by a bold but delicate adaptation of one's course to the taste, whim, and prejudice of an individual or community; which generally results in allowing people to deceive themselves. Thousands thought they were delighted last evening with JULLIEN's music; and so very many of them were. But if JULLIEN would dress in a quaker coat, stand at a conductor's desk of pine wood, and make no use of his baton except to direct his performers, he might play to empty benches. But this he very wisely does not do. He gives the people not only what they want, and all he promises, but he gives it to them with all the stimulating and flattering accompaniments which they like. That is, he humbugs them. He knows it, and they more than suspect it.

Jullien's First Grand Promenade Concert.

[From the N. Y. Tribune.]

The arrival of M. JULLIEN forms an era in musical art in this country. His is emphatically a superior mind—he is a man not only of talent but of genius. He has the qualities, intellectual and physical, which fit him for his post. Of a square built solid frame, made to endure fatigue; with a muscular arm, that can work like a steam engine; possessed of indomitable will and unblenching energy; with the skill of a leader, of that class of mind which can magnetize and direct others; a thoroughly scientific musician, bred up in the lore of the schools under Cherubini; with a broad and genial lyrical philosophy, that makes him put all compositions into a crucible and judge them without the names of composers or the pretensions of mere classification; imbued with the bold, strong and, at times, necessarily haughty nature of a progressist and reformer, and hence looking on what has been done as the basis for addition, if not improvement, he stands fitly the representative of advancing Art, a musical director entitled to guide, sway, and triumph. If he play quadrilles, it is because a man of genius can put his genius into a quadrille as well as into a mass or symphony, and a good quadrille has more merit than a mediocre mass or symphony, or in other words, such is the quality of genius, that the soul may shine in the narrowest limits and show itself to be divine. We claim all this for M. Jullien. We claim for him a profound acquaintance with musical composition as a science; a knowledge of instrumentation as rare as special, leaving nothing unstudied in that department; and a power of command that would make itself felt in any other department where pure intellect and high will are demanded.

The name of Jullien has long been familiar to American amateurs of music as the master spirit, who, above all others, has succeeded in combining great masses of orchestral performers, and presenting through them to the London and Paris public the masterpieces of all styles and schools, with such splendid and varied effects, as to attract nightly, for a long series of years, admiring crowds, and prove the possibility of educating whole communities to the comprehension of the beauties as well of instrumental as of vocal music. His concerts have every where been monster concerts. He produces great effects by novel and great means. He invents new and huge instruments, monster drums, monster ophicleides, monster cymbals. For these innovations, and for the apparently extravagant gesticulation with which he directed his orchestra, the London press at first denounced him as "a charlatan" and "a mountebank;" but he lived down their sneers, conquered their prejudices, and reaped a harvest of glory and guineas. He showed the effects of his great instruments to be legitimate, and as suitable in combination with his hundreds of instruments as they would have been out of place in a chamber concert, and he proved that the gestures and actions of a mercurial Frenchman, though seemingly outlandish to the phlegmatic Englishman, possessed a magnetism, under the influence of which a hundred artists are forced to give together any musical phrase with a unanimity of sentiment and precision of time that seem little short of miraculous. In fact, to direct a great orchestra as Jullien does, a man must be all eyes and ears. Every note of tens of thousands played must be heard and judged by him, and come forth pure. He must know as much of the resources of each instrument as he that plays it, and more in its relations and proportions with other instruments. Argus and Briareus, all in one must he prove.

Notwithstanding the critics, Jullien found favor with the public. A success without parallel was his. He has given, in London, Paris and various other European cities no less than three thousand concerts, mostly monster concerts to monster audiences. Each one of his concerts is a music lesson of the first order, and no less than six millions of auditors have already profited by them. He has done more to cultivate the taste of the masses, by affording the best music at the cheapest possible cost, than any other living man, and we therefore look with particular interest upon his present undertaking. The presentation of orchestral music alone at concerts in this city has never yet been pecuniarily a successful enterprise—the public taste seemingly not being educated up to the point of rightly appreciating and enjoying it. If Jullien overcomes the obstacle and succeeds in improving the public taste up to the point of appreciating and rewarding his efforts, it will be no less a source of gratification to himself than to all connoisseurs.

The orchestra was occupied by a vast body of musicians—the largest, we believe, that has ever appeared in America. We have had heretofore on two or three occasions about eighty musicians, that being the number of a truly grand orchestra, according to the Paris, London and Vienna standard. As nearly as we could discern, Jullien's orchestra numbered ninety-seven performers, as follows: 3 flutes, 1 flageolet, 2 clarionets, 2 oboes, 2 bassoons, 3 trumpets, 3 cornets, 4 horns, 4 trombones, 3 snare drums, 1 bass drum, 1 pair cymbals, 2 pairs kettle drums, 17 first violins, 16 second violins, 10 violas, 10 violoncellos, and 11 double basses. Of these, twenty-five were brought by M. Jullien from Europe and the remainder engaged here. A finer body of performers it would have been difficult to get together anywhere.

Jullien took his place promptly at the hour designated for commencing, and after the rounds of applause that greeted him had subsided, commenced the overture to Der Freischütz. It was admirably played and greatly applauded. Then followed one of Jullien's brilliant quadrilles, The Standard Bearer. Next came the "Allegro" and storm movement of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. Never has it been so gloriously given before. The magnificent chromatic runs depicting the storm, the return of calm and sunshine portrayed by the oboes and flutes, and the exquisite diminuendo, closing the movement like the faintest breathing of a zephyr, were incomparable evidence of the skill of the artists and the conductor.

Madame Anna Zerr, in Mozart's celebrated air from Il Flauto Magico, displayed a voice of remarkable registers extending up to D, E, F, and G; but not very just in intonation nor faultless in method. It was an exhibition of musical pyrotechny, the effect being momentarily dazzling, but not memorable. After Madame Zerr's song came a lovely waltz by Jullien, "The Prima Donna." The theme, a beautiful plaintive melody, was played on the cornet by Herr Koenig, the greatest performer living. Never have we heard such a tone and such expression as Koenig produces from this instrument. The audience were enraptured and gave vent to their enthusiasm in tremendous bursts of applause. This Waltz is a remarkable composition, showing Jullien to be a master of his art. A passage for the violins played forte and then pianissimo, was of exquisite beauty and miraculously well performed. So too a splendid chromatic passage, ascending and descending, by all the instruments.

Such was the first night of the world-celebrated Jullien and his company. It has certainly indoctrinated the American people into the nature of a magnificent orchestra, magnificently led. It has placed before them such matchless players as Koenig, Reickert, Lavigne, Wuille, Collinet, Botesini and their worthy auxiliaries; it has revealed their splendid resources in every proportion, from the solo to the simultaneously performing whole. It must popularize musical art. It must elevate its standard. It must mend the morals and manners of the people.

The concerts will be continued every evening, and every evening the programme will be changed. It will always include an overture, two movements of a symphony, an operatic pot pourri, two instrumental solos, one of Jullien's sets of quadrilles, two songs by Madame Zerr, and a variety of waltzes, polkas etc.—a nightly banquet with a bill of fare ample enough for every taste.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, SEPT. 3, 1853.

Relation of the Press to Artists and their Agents.

Scarcely a week has passed, since we commenced our Journal, that we have not felt prompted to write an article upon this subject. We have only refrained, out of the consideration that our views about it would be obvious in our practice. Yet there is a vast deal of vague, ambiguous understanding in this matter, on the part of musical artists, managers, composers, publishers and teachers, which needs to be cleared up; and never could there be a better text for it, than the present excitement of the whole newspaper press about the following charge of bribery, or "levying black mail," made in the last number of the New York Musical World and Times. The substance of the charge, as well as of the cards in reply from Mme. Sontag and her Agent, has been widely copied round; yet we deem it well to give these documents in order, and entire. First, then, the World and Times, of Saturday last, wantonly and audaciously throws this bomb-shell into the editorial camp:

The New York Press bribed!...$15,000 expended for Sontag!...Who has the money?

It is reported of the Sontag "management," that they have paid out several thousand dollars to the press of the city for complimentary notices. It is said that the Times, Courier & Enquirer, Journal of Commerce, Commercial Advertiser, Express, Herald, and the other daily papers (with the exception of The Tribune and the Evening Post) were bribed before Sontag's arrival, and that The Tribune, was shortly after, otherwise brought over. The Sunday papers are said to have been also bribed in time to furnish "material aid and comfort" to Madame Sontag. The country press, it is disdainfully said, are not worth bribing; as they are certain to follow the lead of the city papers. How is this? Will our country friends let us hear from them on this occasion?

But, it seems that the papers would not stay bribed: the operation, it appears, was found to be such a pleasant one, that they wished it repeated as often as possible; so, the unfortunate "management" were kept on bleeding, until the enormous sum of fifteen thousand dollars had been expended. Nor has the bribery been confined to New York only. It is said that the musical critics and publishers of Boston and Philadelphia were propitiated in like manner, and that they were, to the full, as exorbitant in their demands as were their Metropolitan brethren. How is it, gentlemen of Boston and Philadelphia? Let us hear from you, on this question.

Now, is it possible that any such amount of money has been paid to the press of New York, Boston and Philadelphia?—We think decidedly not. We are personally acquainted with the musical critics of most of the daily and weekly papers in this city (Fry, of The Tribune; White, of the Courier & Enquirer; Callicutt, of the Com. Advertiser; Parton, of the Home Journal; Briggs, of the Sund. Courier, &c.) and we are certain that none of them could be influenced by such means. Mr. Otis, of the Express; Mr. Burkhardt, of the Sunday Dispatch, and some other musical critics, we are less posted up about; but their most intimate friends assure us that they are quite beyond suspicion in such matters. In short, we do not believe that any paper of acknowledged respectability in this city, would tolerate such practices in any one connected with its editorial department, as are in this instance charged upon the press of New York, Boston and Philadelphia. But these charges are made openly; they are whispered about by Sontag's attachés; they are discussed in restaurants, Lager-Bier saloons, offices and parlors; and it is time they were sifted and settled.

One thing is certain, namely: Sontag (poor lady) has been made to believe that this money has been thus expended. She complains that she has made nothing, or but very little, during the year she has been in this country. Much money has been taken at her concerts and operas, but she has received (according to her own statement) but very little of it; and when she asks for it, she is presented with enormous bills of expenses, among which are those of the press, as above stated. "Oh, the newspapers cost so much," said she, elevating her hands and eyes toward heaven, "it is impossible to make anything." There is something wrong somewhere. Either Sontag has been robbed, or the Press has received large sums for puffing her. How is it? Who knows? Will the "Satanic" speak out? Will the Tribune speak out? Will the Courier & Enquirer, the Journal of Commerce, the Commercial Advertiser, and the Express, speak out? Will the Home Journal speak out? Will the Sunday Press speak out? Will our Boston contemporaries speak out? Will our Philadelphia contemporaries speak out? Who has the money? Who will disabuse Sontag's mind in relation to the American Press? Somebody should most certainly speak out.

Who will speak out?

To this Mr. Ullman, the agent, replies in a note to the New York Daily Times newspaper, of the same date, as follows:

New York, Friday, Aug. 26, 1853.

To the Editor of the New York Daily Times:

I have read, with unfeigned surprise, the paragraph in your paper alluding to a statement in the Musical World, that Madame Sontag has been made to believe that $15,000 have been given to the Times and other papers, for complimentary notices. I beg to inform you that I have sent the said paragraph to Madame Sontag, and shall receive, to-morrow, her opinion about it.

Although no name is mentioned, I deem it my duty to take this matter in my own hands.

I have no hesitation to state that the sum expended during an entire year, for that purpose does not reach $300—which was given in sums of $20 to $30, to certain Sunday and weekly papers which were in the habit of charging 25 cents a line. This sum was paid previous to the arrival of Madame Sontag, for publishing extracts from European papers.

It is unnecessary for me to state that neither the Times, nor any person connected with your office, has ever asked or received a cent.

With regard to any statement contained in this letter, you are at liberty to adopt the course you deem best. But I have no hesitation to state that, on the arrival of Madame Sontag, Mr. Dyer, of the Musical World, made me the following proposition: 1. That, as he has made arrangements with 2,000 country papers, to send them a weekly correspondence, he agrees to puff Madame Sontag, to the best of his ability. 2. That this plan would bring some 10,000 people from the country to our concerts. 3. That I might pay him $2,000; being $1 for each correspondence.

This was declined by me, when Mr. Dyer made the same proposition to Mr. Zundell, (a particular friend of Madame Sontag's,) to submit it to Count Rossi, who, of course, declined.

Since that time the Musical World has continually attacked Madame Sontag and me.

This happened a year ago. I never said a word. I believe myself to be fully justified in making this statement, at the present moment.

I remain your obedient servant,

B. ULLMAN.

Affirmed before me, this 26th day of August, 1853.

L. H. STUART, Police Justice.

This makes the charge rebound upon the charger, placing him in a pretty awkward predicament until it shall be answered or explained away; but it does not preclude the suspicion, strongly hinted by many of the newspapers in their indignant disclaimers, under which the Sontag agency has labored, of having slipped into her bill of expenses a fictitious item of $15,000 for money paid to conciliate the press. Meanwhile, most of the New York dailies were uttering their indignant protest, both individually and with a certain esprit de corps in the name of the press in general, against such imputation of venality. Most of them pride themselves upon the independence, if upon no other virtue, of their musical criticisms, and declare they puff for the pure pleasure of it, as a man smokes after dinner, not for pay. Some pointedly allude to a pestilent set of musical brokers and chevaliers d'industrie, who waylay foreign artists, on or before their arrival here, and represent their experience, their shrewdness, as indispensable to their success, in guarding them against Yankee craft and imposition, and especially in the sublime art of "managing the press," which they represent to be as venal as it is influential and necessary to be conciliated. We join in this cry heartily; Away with these fellows! say we; for no one conversant with the business of operas and concerts doubts that such exist, and that artists, press and public are alike sufferers by them. Some are chiefly eager to show the cleanness of their own hands in a business which it is vaguely understood is always more or less going on. Some mourn that they have been overlooked in the distribution of the $15,000, and one even adds the complaint that its bill for advertising a Sontag concert which never came off, in Salem, remains still unpaid. Some are most afflicted on Madame Sontag's account, "poor lady," as the Musical World feelingly gives them the cue. While some stand on their dignity, and answer not. Finally appears a note from Mme. Sontag herself, addressed to the New York editors, as follows:

To the Editor of the New York Tribune:

SIR,—In spite of my great reluctance to appear before the public in any other capacity than a professional one, I feel myself compelled to address you these few lines, with a view of giving the absurd statement of having been presented with bills to the amount of $15,000, given to the press for complimentary notices, a full and unqualified denial. After examining the accounts of expenses incurred during my stay in this country, I find only one item that has reference to the different newspapers; this is a sum of $6,701 32 for advertising my concerts and operas in all parts of the Union that I have visited.

I am at a loss to conceive the motive that may have guided the editor of the paper in which this article originally appeared, in making me falsely utter words equally repugnant to my feelings and the amour propre an artist ought to possess; and I cannot but come to the conclusion that if it was not his object to bring the gentlemen who have the direction of my affairs into discredit, it must have been intended as an insult to the press and to me, in making me adopt a practice that I must pronounce unworthy, and is, I hope unnecessary for both.

I remain, your obedient servant,

HENRIETTA ROSSI-SONTAG.

Staten Island, Aug. 30, 1853.

Brief, simple and explicit!—just what we should expect a lady and an artist to write, if write she must. And this removes the burden from Mr. Ullman's shoulders, placing its added weight upon those of the accuser. This too forces the dignified papers aforesaid to break their silence, and utter a word or two of recognition of the matter. Justly enough the Tribune, the Courier, &c., say such charges, made without authority, are not worth their stooping to answer; but for Mme. Sontag's sake they ask, as now, too, all are asking: "What has the Musical World to say for itself? Let it produce its authority."

And here the matter stands. Doubtless the Musical World has already, in to-day's issue, said something for itself, for better or for worse. We sincerely hope, for better.

One thing is certain; it has taken a most effectual mode of advertising itself by identifying its name with all this stir;—far more effectual, and far easier than the alleged correspondence with "2,000 country newspapers," which could be used to puff itself as well as to puff Sontag;—only it remains to see whether it prove not rather a dear mode. This history and these documents, so far as they are mere personal matter are unimportant, and should not in justice to our readers, or our objects, occupy our columns. But they prompt to investigation and exposure of wrong practices, if there be such as are mutually alleged; and above all, they bid fair to prove the beginning of a correcter understanding and a truer relation between artists and the press; and in this view they become significant documents in the present history of music in this country, which a Journal of Music cannot properly omit.

Now we fully believe that the press generally (excepting the "Satanic") is altogether above the pitiful venality alleged. We think with the Tribune and other respectable journals, that it becomes such not to notice such aspersions. If character has got to turn aside to defend itself at every moral dog-bark, what is character worth? And character of course is worth too much to every established journal, to admit of its being bartered away for the petty bribes and favors of the adventurers and harpies that hover round a great singer's "agency," and make a profession of "managing the press." Besides, in the case of the advent of a really great artist, whom the world acknowledges to be such, it is absurd to suppose that journals, whose profession and whose pride it is to be well booked up in all affairs of public interest, should convict themselves of ignorance or wilful silence, by withholding generous notice until bribed to say what they are only too glad to say with no one prompting. It is fair to presume that among editors, and those who volunteer or are employed to notice operas and concerts for them, there are some musical enthusiasts, who love to praise and celebrate what gives them, or what promises them, rare pleasure; there is a great deal of kindly good-will and obligingness among men, even when hardened by the rough labors of the press; there is a natural passion for admiring and for saying we admire; there is a proneness to sympathize with a great artist's triumphs, and a pleasure in the confession of the heart's loyalty; the human heart (at least in most men) craves something to admire and praise; and thus most of the newspaper eulogiums upon singers and performers are sincere, though often too superlative through lack of taste or knowledge. A newspaper perils its reputation by not duly noticing a great artist; this the Jew agents of Madame or Monsieur know too well to think of wasting bribe-money. And even in the case of questionable, and fifth-rate singers, &c., this ready obligingness or superficial musical enthusiasm is too happy to volunteer what Madame's managers have no need to pay for. These springs yield readily to the pressure of adroit managerial fingers, and it requires address, boldness, flattery, knowledge of human nature, and not money, in most cases, to produce the pressure.

This we believe to be the truth in the matter as a general rule; but there are exceptions enough to keep alive and justify a very prevalent distrust in the newspaper notices of artists. As the accusing article says, there is "something wrong somewhere." There is no denying the existence of such things as "puffs;" and by a puff we all understand an insincere eulogium or commendation of a person or an article;—one prompted not by real admiration, but by secondary motives, such as personal obligation, return of service for service, or a price paid outright. There is no denying, also, the existence of the class above-named of go-betweens who live by leeching artists on the one hand and newspaper publishers on the other. It is well known that agents of great artists, like Mme. Sontag, have openly and repeatedly boasted of having the press under their thumb; personally we have heard one of them assert that the place of musical critic in nearly every daily paper in New York was worth from $1,000 to $1,500 a year to the occupant in black mail! We saw that the utterer of the slander must have had experience enough of such venality somewhere and in some way, to render him incredulous of greater honesty in anybody than he knew of in himself. It is known, too, to every member of the press that some of these shrewd and superlatively important gentlemen have somehow acquired very confused ideas about the difference between business and bribery, so that when presented with a lawful claim for advertising, they reluct at payment on the impudent ground that the favor of their patronage has not been sufficiently returned by flattering notices in the editorial columns. It is easy to conceive of circumstances which may tempt volunteer or employed writers for newspapers, to take pay for praising artists beyond their own convictions, as well as beyond the responsible editor's knowledge in such speciality. It is generally believed that much of this is practised; and the very confidence with which Messrs. Dyer and Ullman mutually fling out their challenges, is proof that there is some basis somewhere to proceed upon. Where is it? Let us have the facts; let the truth be sifted out of all this vagueness, and confidence be restored, if possible, to where it was in the honest, good old days before the "Satanic press" had become a power upon the earth. So demand all the newspapers, and so do we.

But this question should be of small account compared with the question of the origin and nature of the vague and false relation now existing between artists and the press, of which too the public is the mystified and greatest victim. This question we propose to answer. We give the answer now in a word, intending to reserve room for the fuller illustration of it next week. We say the vice has all grown out of the mistaken notion that there can be properly any such things as favours in the dealing between artists and the press. If we have praised a singer in our editorial columns, let the singer take it as no favor: we wrote in duty to our readers, to the cause of Art, and to our own convictions or our own need of expression, and not to confer or to return a favor. If the singer advertises largely with us, or sends us free admissions, we consider it no favor, but purely a matter of business. The advertising money pays for the advertisement and for nothing else, and no amount of money can buy a flattering word in the editorial columns. If a publisher sends us new books, new music, he does it at his own risk; we do not acknowledge that it binds us to a favorable notice, or to any notice at all, of what he has published. The value of our notices, of our opinions, ceases to be worth a copper the moment that they are written in the way of personal exchange of favors. This is the principle with which we started, and so far, God be thanked, we have never yet seen cause to swerve from it. It is, to be sure, not the most paying principle, but it is sure to help us in the long run. We wish the press and artists altogether to believe this, and therefore we shall return to the subject next week.

Jullien's Concerts.

NEW YORK, AUG. 31.

MR. EDITOR:—Having been one of a great multitude, numbering some thousands, at Castle Garden last evening, I am enabled to redeem my promise to tell you something about the JULLIEN Concerts. The audience was by no means a musical one, being composed in great part, apparently, of strangers, and of persons unaccustomed to hearing the higher forms of orchestral music. Beethoven and Mendelssohn stood no chance with them. The dance music was better listened to, but the interrupting noise was at all times such as I suppose to be peculiar to Castle Garden and its free and easy summer audiences. The orchestra numbered nearly one hundred, two thirds of whom were collected in New York, and was truly admirable. In precision, unity of effect, and the management of crescendo and diminuendo passages, they left nothing to be desired. Such a mass of stringed instruments, with a solid foundation of a dozen or more double basses, produced an effect which can be obtained in no other way, and to which we are quite unaccustomed.

JULLIEN himself magnetized the whole, and from his baton's tip seemed to draw at pleasure from the different parts of the great instrument he governed, (like the conjurer with his magical liquors,) strains of every degree of quality and strength; now by a graceful and deprecatory wave hushing them almost to silence; then cutting the air till strings and brass and sheep-skin responded with sudden crashes. In an arrangement of airs from one of Meyerbeer's operas, as well as in the quadrilles, these startling contrasts were used with great effect. It was not all thus, however, for we had some music of the highest order, as for instance, one of the overtures to Fidelio, the Andante from the "Pastoral Symphony," and the frolicsome (Scotch?) Scherzo from a Symphony of Mendelssohn. All of them were given with more effect than I have ever before heard; and in their direction Jullien showed his talent in a new and most favorable light. As compared with Benedict and Bergmann, his manner seems perhaps a little extravagant and foppish; but I saw nothing of the charlatan, nor anything to be seriously complained of. He likes to surprise his audience, and this was finely done in an arrangement of airs from Musaniello, by the voices of the musicians joining in one of the choruses.

The solo performers on cornet, flute, and oboe, were each the very best of their kind. KOENIG, the cornet player, gave perhaps the greatest delight, and did it too in the legitimate way, not attempting to make of his instrument what it is not, one of rapid execution, but with steady tones of exquisite purity charming every ear. His treatment of several familiar airs, as "Home, sweet home," was perfectly simple, almost free from embellishment, yet marked by the most refined taste. Mlle. ANNA ZERR did not add to our pleasure, though she was twice encored. Unlike Koenig, she aimed at astonishing, rather than pleasing her audience. Her voice is a high soprano, and its intonation is occasionally faulty. It should be remembered, however, that to sing against so fine an orchestra as this, is a severe trial for almost any voice. The whole concert left a most agreeable impression; and we can assure our friends at home that they have a great treat in store. X.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.... The summer season of music on the Boston Common has ended with credit to all concerned, and with satisfaction to the public. We only hope that Mr. Schuapp, or some such enterprising person, will take advantage of this good beginning, by organizing against another summer a large and complete reed band, expressly for such peaceful uses, and on a principle distinct from military bands.

Classical Matinees.... Our readers who have fasted long from music, will eagerly catch the announcement below of the excellent design of Messrs. Eckhardt, Keyzer, Perabeau and associates. String quartets, with and without piano, are just the music which true music-lovers in and near the city must be glad to hear all winter long, at fit hours in the day-time.

Newport.... The Germanians have given their last "Soirée Dansante," and will soon be concertizing in Philadelphia and elsewhere, previous to their return to Boston.—On the 22d ult. they gave another classical matinée with Mr. OTTO DRESEL, when Schumann's Quintet with piano, Spohr's Nonetto, and Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor formed the programme.—GOTTSCHALE, too, has been creating great excitement by his brilliant piano-playing, as he had done just before at Saratoga. We hope he will soon visit Boston.

A Good Hint.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC.—This periodical holds its old honors, and adds new laurels. The musical criticisms are generally of the rarest delicacy and enlargement, true alike to the best science and the clearest common sense. It would be a blessing to the country if with every piano ordered for a family, a copy of this Journal should be sent. Such writing is needed to make music a beautiful taste, instead of a mechanical trick.

We find the above in that excellent religious paper, the Christian Inquirer, of New York. We are not in the habit of repeating our own praises to our readers; but this contains a practical suggestion, which we italicize, and feel it to be quite reasonable to commend it to the attention of those who think enough of music to have pianos in their houses. If all such would but appreciate the importance of having good, intelligent ideas of music, as well as good musical instruments, they certainly would think it no loss to expend a couple of dollars in a year upon a musical paper, which gives in to no humbug, but treats music as a matter of high and serious Art.

CLASSICAL MATINEES.

THE undersigned, resident artists of Boston, intend to give a Series of Classical Concerts during next winter, in which the best works of the great composers will be performed; such as Quartets, Quintets, Septets, Trios, Duos and Solos, by Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Hummel, Weber, Cherubini, etc. The programme will be made more attractive by Vocal performances between the different pieces, as also Solos for Horn, Violoncello, Piano, Violin, etc., occasionally. Many greater compositions, as, Quartets, Quintets, and Septets for Piano with String and Wind instruments, will be produced, which have never been publicly performed in Boston. To accommodate Ladies and others out of town, we propose to give our Concerts in the afternoon. The time and place will be announced hereafter. The subscription is $2 for the Series of Eight Concerts. Single tickets 50 cents each.

Subscription lists will be found at the different Music Stores.

H. ECKHARDT, } VIOLINS.	CH. EICHLER, ALTO.
WM. KEYZER, } SEPTETS.	TH. MAASS, VIOLONCELLO.
Sept. 3.	II. PERABEAU, PIANIST.

ORGAN FOR SALE.

THE large and well known Organ, built by Thomas Appleton for the BOSTON ACADEMY OF MUSIC, will be sold at auction, unless previously disposed of, on Saturday, 10th of September next, at 10 o'clock, A. M., at the Hall of the Lowell Institute, where it now stands. The Organ is of large dimensions, being 24 feet in height, 16 feet in width, and 12 feet in depth; and cost $5,500. It contains 27 Stops, viz: Great Organ, 11; Choir Organ, 8; Swell Organ, 8. It has all the modern improvements in the action, Coupling Stops, Pedals for Sub-Bass of two octaves, &c.; and in short, all that is usually put into the best Organs in the country. With regard to the quality of its tone, it is esteemed equal to any organ ever constructed by that well known builder.

BENJAMIN PERKINS,
Treas'r of Boston Academy of Music.

Boston, August, 1853.

STANDARD SINGING BOOK, By Hastings & Bradbury.

PSALMISTA: OR CHOIR MELODIES.

THIS latest Book of Thomas Hastings and Wm. B. Bradbury gives the highest satisfaction in Choirs, Churches and Singing Schools. The following are important features in the book:

1st. The rudiments are presented in a very attractive manner, and combine both theory and practice.
2dly. The Music is beautiful, devotional and simple.
3dly. There is a sufficient variety to meet every religious exercise, and no other book is needed for choir practice where this is in use.

4thly. The type is large and plain, and paper good.
5thly. The price is sufficiently low to meet the wants of any Church or Choir.

Teachers and Choristers desiring a copy for examination, can have it sent free of postage, by remitting 60 cents to the publishers.

NEWMAN & IVISON.

178 Fulton street, New York.

For sale in Boston by W. J. Reynolds & Co., B. B. Mussey & Co., and Phillips, Sampson & Co. aug. 27, 53.

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE, No. 86 TREMONT STREET, BOSTON.

WHITE BROTHERS, DEALERS IN MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS,

Best Italian, German, French and English Strings,
AGENTS OF

J. André, Offenbach; and G. André, Philadelphia,
FOR THE SALE OF FOREIGN CLASSIC MUSIC,
CHOIR MUSIC, &c.

Instruments Made, Repaired, Tuned, Bought, Sold, or Exchanged, on the most favorable terms.

IRA J. WHITE.

A. WARREN WHITE.

iii 2 3m

Edward L. Balch,

DWIGHT'S Journal of Music.

A Paper of Art and Literature.

VOL. III.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1853.

NO. 23.

Dwight's Journal of Music, PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

TERMS....TWO DOLLARS PER ANNUM, (IN ADVANCE.)

CITY Subscribers can be served at their houses by the further payment of fifty cents per annum.

☞ For Rates of Advertising, see last page.

POSTAGE, if paid in advance, for any distance within the State, thirteen cents a year; if not in advance, twenty-six cents. To all places beyond the State, double these rates.

J. S. DWIGHT,.....EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

☞ OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St.

By REDDING & CO., 8 State St.

" GEO. P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row.

" A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.

" DEXTER & BROTHERS, 43 Ann Street, N. Y.

" SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 722 Broadway, N. Y.

" MASON BROTHERS, 23 Park Row, New York.

" GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.

" G. ANDRE, 229 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

" MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St., Balt.

" COLBURN & FIELD, Cincinnati, O.

" HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

" JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Persons willing to become Agents for procuring subscribers, especially Music-Dealers and Teachers, are invited to correspond with the Editor, as above. Satisfactory references required, and liberal commissions allowed.

☞ Back numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Also bound copies of Vols. I. and II. at prices varying from $2.50 to $3.50.

[From the Manchester Examiner.]

CARDINAL WISEMAN'S LECTURE

ON THE CONNECTION BETWEEN THE

Arts of Production and the Arts of Design.

[In the spring of 1852, an association was formed by the Catholics of Manchester and Salford, England, to raise funds for the education of the poor. The Committee, in aid of this purpose, invited Cardinal Wiseman to deliver an address upon some literary subject of general popular interest. Accordingly on the 26th of April last, in the Corn Exchange, Manchester, his Eminence spoke for three hours, as follows. We know not that we have ever read anything so calculated to inspire the true sentiment of Art among the working people. Those who are interested in the establishment of Schools of Design in our country, could not ask a better presentation of the importance of their cause.]

Ladies and gentlemen, I ought certainly to commence my address to you by thanking you for the extremely kind manner in which you have been pleased to receive me, but I feel that I must not waste your time in mere expressions of a personal character, feeling rather that I shall have to tax your time and your attention to a considerable extent. I will, therefore, enter at once upon the proposed subject of my address, which has already been communicated to you by my old and excellent friend the Bishop of Salford. And I am sure I need not say, for he already has well expressed it to you, that it is a topic which at this moment has engaged its full share of public attention, as drawing to itself the interest of all the educated classes, and is in fact a topic connected with important questions, the solution of which may have to exert an important influence not only on our social but likewise on our moral progress.

While I wish, however, to escape from the tediousness of a long introduction, I feel that I shall be naturally expected to say a few words on the motives which have induced me to select this particular topic for the city of Manchester. I must be conscious, and it must be obvious also to many, that there are present persons who are much more able to instruct me upon such a subject than I can pretend to be to instruct them. There are persons to whom the topics and the questions connected with my subject have not been merely a matter of recreation and pleasurable pursuit, but a subject of earnest study—the occupation perhaps of their lives, and a duty to themselves and their families. Now, gentlemen, were I to come here with a pretence that I could give you any instruction upon practical matters connected with the great business of this city; did I presume to assert that I was going to give you some information regarding the details of the productive art, for instance—which were new to you all—I certainly should deserve to be received with anything but that kind indulgence which you have already forestalled me, and which I feel you are disposed to extend to me. I should deserve to be treated as was a much greater personage of old—the Emperor Alexander, who, Pliny tells us, was in the habit of visiting the studio of the celebrated Apelles. When on one occasion he began to discourse with that great artist concerning his profession, Apelles, with that frankness which was the privilege of so eminent a man, said to the Emperor, "Hush! If you continue to speak that way, my very color-grinders will laugh at you." And if I did not receive quite so strong a demonstration of disapprobation, I might expect some within themselves to think of me as Hannibal did of that old philosopher, who promised to give a lecture in his presence on the science of war. I come, therefore, with no such pretensions as these. I have come before you as one who has passed many years in contact and familiarity with Art—who has been, perhaps, no negligent observer of what occupies the public attention—who has endeavored to master a topic, the influence of which he sees to be so important upon a class in which he might feel the greatest interest—namely, the poor—to whom it is his duty to assist in educating, and more and more feels that he has a right, and perhaps even a duty to claim indulgence, and to communicate whatever he feels that he is prompted to speak, with the highest and best of motives—the desire of being beneficial to his fellow-creatures. (Loud applause.)

The topic on which I have to address you, then, is the CONNECTION OR RELATION BETWEEN THE ARTS OF PRODUCTION AND THE ARTS OF DESIGN.

By the Arts of Production, I mean naturally those arts by which what is but a raw material assumes a form, a shape, a new existence, adapted for some necessity or some use in the many wants of life. Such is pottery, such is carving in its various branches, whether applied to wood or to stone; such is the working of metals, whether of gold, or silver, or brass, or iron; such is the production of textile matters—of objects of whatever sort and for whatever purpose; such is construction in its different branches, commencing with the smallest piece of furniture, and ascending to a great and majestic edifice. By the Arts of Design, I understand those which represent nature to us in any form, or which bring before us beauty, whether in form or in color.

Now those arts ought, as every one agrees, to be in close harmony one with the other; but that harmony which I wish to establish between them must be an honorable union, an equal compact, a noble league. There is not to be one the servant and the other the master; each must be aware of the advantages which it can receive as well as those which it can confer. Thus the arts, for instance, of design, will have to give elegance of form, grace of outline, beauty of ornament, to that which is produced by the other class of arts; and they in their turn have to transmit, and multiply, and perpetuate the creations of the arts of design. Now it is agreed on all hands that as yet this complete harmony does not exist; that we have far from arrived at that mutual application of the one class to the other, which gives us a satisfactory result. It is unnecessary, I believe, to bring evidence of this. As we proceed, I trust that opportunities will present themselves of bringing before you authorities enough for that assertion. But I may say at the very outset that the report which is published by the department of Practical Art, is almost based upon the acknowledgment that as yet we have not attained that application of the arts of design to the arts of production which we desire, and which is most desirable to the arts of production to obtain. It acknowledges the existence of a necessity for much more instruction than has yet been given. It allows that for several years—thirteen years, at least—of the existence of schools of design, they have not been found fully to attain their purpose, and a new organization and a new system has now begun to be adopted. No one can appreciate, I trust, more than I am inclined to do myself, the advantages which must result from the multiplication of these schools of design as applied to manufactures, and other great improvements which they have already begun to confer, and will continue, no doubt, still more to bestow upon the industrial classes. I believe it most important to propagate to the utmost the love of Science—the love of Art. I believe it most useful to accustom every child even to its first rudiments, its eleme-tary states. I think that if we can make drawing a part of universal education, a great deal will be gained. But this, certainly, cannot be enough. I am willing to grant that we shall have a great improvement upon what we have produced in the form of Art. I believe that we shall see better designers—men with better imaginations—men who understand the harmony and combination of colors better, and who can give to the artisans patterns which will greatly improve every department of our industry. But, I ask, is that sufficient? Will this bring Art up to what we desire? This is the great question. This is the subject of which I am going to treat. It appears to me that there is a very simple mode of looking at it, and it is the one, consequently, which I shall adopt. It is a question partly of experience. It is a lesson much of which history can teach us, and I desire to bring before you such facts as seem to me to bear upon the question, and to enable us to come to a practical and satisfactory conclusion. (Applause.) I will endeavor to state the question under a very simple, but perhaps it may appear not a very practical form.

There is now a great desire to form, not only in the capital, but also in all great cities where industry prevails, museums which should contain all the most perfect specimens of Art antiquity in every age has left us of beauty in design and elegance in form. We wish that our artisans should have frequently before them what may be considered not merely actual models to copy, but likewise such objects as may gradually impress their minds with feelings of taste. Now I should like to have the construction, the forming of such a museum as I should wish the city of Manchester to enjoy. And in describing it I will confine myself entirely to one small department, that of classical Art—classical antiquity—because I know that for a museum intended to be practical to the eyes of artisans, there is a far wider range of collection to be taken than that to which I will confine myself. Well, now, I imagine to myself a hall at least as large as this, and of a more elegant and perfect architecture. I will suppose it to be formed itself upon classical models, and around it shall be ranged not merely plaster casts, but real marble statues and busts collected from antiquity. I would range them round the room so that each could be enjoyed at leisure by the student. There should be room for the draughtsman to take a copy from any side. In the centre I would spread out a beautiful mosaic, such as we find in the museums, for instance, of Rome, or pavement in rich colors, representing some beautiful scene, which should be most carefully railed off, that it might not be worn or soiled by the profane tread of modern men. There should be cabinets in which there should be, but enclosed carefully with glass, so that there would be no danger of accident, the finest specimens of the old Etruscan vases, of every size, of every shape, plain and colored, enriched with those beautiful drawings upon them which give them such character, and at the same time such price. And on one side I would have collected for you some specimens of the choicest produce of the excavations of Herculaneum. There should be bronze vessels of the most elegant form and the most exquisite carving, and there should be all sorts even of household utensils, such as are found there, of most beautiful shape and exquisite finish. On the walls I would have some of those paintings which have yet remained almost unharmed after being buried for so many hundreds of years, and which retain their freshness, and would glow upon your walls and clothe them with beauty, and, at the same time with instruction. And then I would have a most choice cabinet, containing medals in gold and silver and bronze, of as great an extent as possible, but chiefly selected for the beauty of their workmanship; and so engraved gems likewise, every one of which should, if possible, be a treasure. Now, if such a museum could be collected, you would say, I am sure, that so far as classical antiquity goes—classical Art—you have everything that you could desire, and you have as noble, as splendid, as beautiful a collection of artistic objects as it is within the reach of modern wealth and influence to collect. In fact, you would say, if you could not make artists now by the study of these objects, it was a hopeless matter, because here was everything that antiquity has given us of the most beautiful.

Now I am afraid that while you have been following me in this formation of an ideal museum, you have thought it required a great stretch of imagination to suppose it possible that such a collection could be made in any city of England. I will ask you, then, now to spread your wings a little more, and fly with me into even a more imaginary idea than this. Let us suppose that by some chance all these objects which we have collected were at some given period, in the first century of Christianity, collected together in an ancient Roman house; and let us suppose that the owner of the house suddenly appeared amongst us, and had a right to claim back all those beautiful works of Art which we so highly prize, which we have taken so much trouble, and laid out so much money to collect. Now what does he do with them when he has got them back? Why, what will he do with those statues which we have been copying, and drawing, and admiring so much? Pliny finds great fault, is very indignant with the people of his age, because he says they have begun to form galleries, pinacothecas; that such a thing was unknown before; that no real Roman should value a statue merely as a work of Art, but that it was only as the statues of their ancestors that he ought to value them. And thus that Roman looks at them as nothing else. He takes them back, he puts the best of them, not in the centre of a room where it may be admired, but to him it is a piece of household furniture, and he puts it with all its fellows into the niches from which they have been taken, and where they are, perhaps, in a very bad light. It is exceedingly probable that if the statues were not of his ancestors, he would, instead of allowing them to remain in the beautiful hall prepared for them, send them into his garden, into his villa, to stand out in the open air, and receive all the rain of heaven upon them. The mosaic which we have valued so much, and which is so wonderful a piece of work, he will put most probably into the parlor of his house to be trodden under foot by every slave that comes in and goes out. And now he looks about him at that wonderful collection of beautiful Etruscan vases which we have got together, and he recognizes them at once; "take that to the kitchen, that is to hold oil;" "take that to the scullery, that is for water;" "take these plates and drinking cups to the pantry, I shall want them for dinner;" and those smaller—those beautiful vessels which yet retain as they do the very scent of the rich odors which were kept in them—"take them to the dressing-rooms, those are what we want on our toilet; this is a washing-basin which I have been accustomed to use; what have they been making of all these things to put them under glass, and treat them as wonderful works of Art." And of those beautiful bronze vessels, some belong again to the kitchen, others belong to our furnished apartments; but every one of them is a mere household piece of furniture. And then he looks into the beautiful cabinet, and he sends those exquisite gems into his room, to be worn by himself or family, as ordinary rings; and your gold medals, and silver medals, and bronze medals, he quietly puts into his purse, for, to him, they are common money. Now, then, here we have made a collection of magnificent productions of Art; and, in reality, these were all the fruits of the arts of production. (Cheers.)

Now, what are we to say to this? We are to say that there was a period in Rome, and there were similar periods in other countries at different times, when there was no distinction between the arts of production and the arts of design, but those very things which to us now are objects of admiration as artistic work, were then merely things made and fashioned as we see them for the ordinary uses to which we adapt other things of perhaps similar substances, but of a very different form. For, in fact, if you had these vessels, you would not know what to do with them. We could not cook a dinner in them. We certainly could not adapt them to our common wants. But to the Romans they were the very objects which were used for those purposes; and although now in reading the old writers, and trying to make out the dreadfully hard names by which all these different pieces of pottery are called, yet, learned and classical as all that may be, when we come to translate these high-sounding Greek names into English, we get very modest results—pipkins, and basins, and ewers, and flagons, and such homely names as these. (Applause.) Now where is the Art there? Is it that these were designed, do you think, by some man of great reputation, and then that they were all carefully copied, exactly imitated, from his design? Oh! certainly nothing of the sort. The Art that is in these beautiful things is a part of themselves—is bestowed upon them in their fabrication; you may take the Etruscan vase and you may scratch away from it, if you please, every line which had been traced by the pencil of the embellisher upon it; and after that the seal of beautiful design, grace, and the elegance of true Art, are so stamped upon it, that if you wish to remove them you must smash the vase. (Applause.) It is inherent in it; it was created with it.

Then what I fancy is desired, is, that we should bring Art back to that same state in which the arts of design are so interwoven with the arts of production that the one cannot be separated from the other, but that that which is made is by a certain necessity made beautiful. And this can only be when we are able to fill the minds of our artisans with true principles, until really it has pervaded their souls, and until the true feeling of Art is at their fingers' ends. (Loud applause.) You will see, I think, from the example which I have given you, what is the principle at which I am aiming, which I wish to establish. It is this: that at any period in which there has been a really close union between the arts of production and the arts of design, this has resulted from the union in one person of the artist and the artisan.

Such now is the principle that I am going to develop; and, in doing so, I will distinguish between arts of production belonging to two distinct classes. There are those in which necessarily there is manipulation—the use of the hand, or of such implements as the hand directly employs; and there are those in which mechanical ingenuity is employed in the art of production. It is clear that these two must be treated distinctly, and I will begin with the first, which affords the greatest number of illustrations and examples in proof of that principle which I have laid down.

I will begin first, then, with illustrations from metal work. Now, the period in which there was the greatest perfection in this sort of work, as is universally acknowledged, is from about the fourteenth century—1300, I think; to 1600, or at least after 1500. It is singular that in that period five at least, very probably more, but we have it recorded of five of the most distinguished sculptors whose works are now the most highly prized, that they were ordinary working goldsmiths and silversmiths. This is given us in their respective lives; Benvenuto Cellini, Luca della Robbia, Lorenzo Ghiberti, Brunelleschi, and Baccio Bandinelli, all of whom were goldsmiths and workers at first, and developed most extraordinary talent as sculptors. How was this done? Can we conceive a person who is merely a workman, working upon such plate as is put before him, becoming a man of high first-class character in Art? There have been examples, as we should see, but they are rare. But here we have five men, in a limited period, becoming most eminent. Now what was the reason of that? It was because the jeweller, the silversmith, who worked with his hands, was considered of necessity to be educated not only as an artist, but an artist of the highest class; and Vasari observes, in the life of Bandinelli, that in those times no man was reputed a good goldsmith who was not a good draughtsman, and who could not work as well in relief. We have a principle then established, that the person who did the material work in the finer works was an artist who could not only draw but model; and did the same with the metal itself, for that is the nature of that class of work of which I have spoken.

Now, take the life of Cellini. There was a man who originally was put to a totally different employment. His father had no higher ambition concerning him than that he should become a great player upon the flute, and he teased him during all the last years of his life because he had no taste for this, and would run after goldsmiths and others, and learn the different branches of his profession. He led the most wonderful life. He was to-day at Rome; next day at Florence; then he was at Naples; then at Venice; then in France; then back again; in fact, it seems incredible that he could have done any work to any one who reads his life. And he did not travel by train or by any public conveyance which could take on his luggage. He travelled on horseback each time from Rome all the way to Paris. He had no luggage; he was a poor man, and whenever he came and started his shop, he began by making often his own tools; and he worked with his scholars, who were generally young men that became themselves eminent in the profession, in a little open shop, looking to the street; and there he himself hammered, and carved, and cast, and shaped, and did whatever else was necessary for the work. He was an actual working goldsmith, and the beauty of his works consists in this, that they have the impress of genius so marked upon them that they never could have been designed by one person, and executed by another. There is as much art in the finish by his own hand in every enamel, in the setting of every stone, as there is in the entire design; nor does he ever dream of talking of himself in any other way; and yet how he went on from step to step, until at length he produced the most magnificent works, on the largest scale, in marble and in bronze! And he describes how he constructed his own Perseus. He went to buy his own wood, and saw it brought, and when he was casting that most exquisite statue of Perseus, which is still one of the wonders of Art, he had every sort of misfortune. His furnace blew up, the roof was blown off; and the rain came in torrents upon the fire just the moment that the metal was going to be poured in. By his ingenuity, his extraordinary contrivances, he baffled, it might appear, the whole chain of accidents, and brought all out, almost without a flaw, that most perfect piece of workmanship. You may imagine to what a state he was reduced when, the very moment that the metal was ready for pouring out, the explosion took place. He had no other resource but to run to his kitchen, as he says, and to take every piece of copper, to the amount of 200 porringers and different sorts of kettles, and throw them into the fire, and from these that splendid statue came forth. There was genius. (Loud cheers.)

As a curious instance of the most extraordinary ingenuity, he tells us that on one occasion a surgeon came into his shop to perform an operation on the hand of one of his pupils. Upon looking at his instruments he found them, as they were certainly in those days, so exceedingly rude and clumsy that he said—"If you will only wait half an hour, I will make you a better instrument;" and he went into his workshop and took a piece of steel, and brought out a most beautifully finished knife, with which the operation was successfully performed. Now this man, at the time you see him thus working, as I said, in his shop as a common workman, was modelling in the most exquisite manner in wax, spending his evenings in the private apartments of the Grand Duke, modelling in his presence, and assisting him with a hundred little trifles which are now considered treasures of Art. And so wherever he was, and under all circumstances, he acted as an artist, but at the same time, as a truly laboring artisan. It was the same with others in the same profession. He was not the only man by any means whose genius was so universal; because we find him telling us repeatedly that the moment he heard of some goldsmith (and in those days a goldsmith was really an artist, as I have already said) who excelled in any particular branch of Art he determined to rival the medals of one, the enamels of another, the peculiar manner of putting foil to precious stones of another, and, in fact, there was not a branch of Art which he did not consider it his duty to excel in. With this spirit, is it wonderful that men of really great taste should have been produced, men who, you observe, looked upon every branch of productive art as really a branch of the highest art of design; and thus in their own persons combined that art with the power of the tool?

There is another celebrated jeweller of that time, whom he mentions frequently, of the name of Antonio Foppa, a Milanese, who is better known in the history of Art by a name which he received in derision in Spain, the name of Capodursa, which means a bear's face, and which he is known by commonly in works of Art. Cellini describes to us the processes by which he produces his works, and they are so careful, and require such accurate knowledge of Art, that his knowledge must have been very superior indeed in the arts of design. As an instance of what was the latitude and the extent of Art, and how really a jeweller or goldsmith in those days was not above work which in our days no one would dare offer to a person of such a profession, we have a case recorded in the history of one of the painters, Pierino del Vaga, by Vasari, speaking of a very particular friend of Pierino's, a goldsmith. When the Grand Duke of Tuscany was building his palace he gave to this man a commission to make the metal blinds for the ground floor of that palace; and it is considered a great pity that a work of so homely a nature should have perished, because there can be no doubt whatever that it was a work of exquisite beauty. So that, even upon what would be considered the lowest stage of common production, the artist did not feel it was beneath him to design—not to give a design to others, but to execute it himself. We have in the collections, particularly of Italy, in the palace, evident proofs of the great extent to which this combination of various arts must have been carried in works exceedingly complicated, extremely beautiful and at the same time, necessarily requiring a great deal of ability to execute. Those are the rich cabinets in which may be found, mixed together, work in marble, and in ivory, and in wood, and in metals, and in enamel, and in painting, all combined together by one idea, and all executed by one hand, but of the authors of which it seems impossible to find any good trace. They probably were produced by those men called goldsmiths, and who, as I said before, could work as well upon any of those substances, and thus bring them harmoniously to form one beautiful whole. (Cheers.)

Now, proceeding from what is most precious in Art to what is more homely, let us return for a moment to a subject on which I have already touched. I have spoken of the beauty of the productions of antiquity in metal, which were found in the excavation, particularly of those two buried museums, as we may call them, of antiquity, Pompeii and Herculaneum. The collection of these is chiefly in Naples. Except where presents have been made to other countries, they have been jealously kept together. Now, these different objects have not been dug out of temples or out of palaces, but they have been taken out of every sort of house—houses evidently belonging to the citizens—and I think you may see that there is not one in that collection which does not immediately arrest the eye both by the beauty of form, and by its exquisite fancy. Many of them have been engraved in the publication called the Museo Borbonico, the Bourbon Museum, the Museum of Naples; and I think very justly the remark is made by the editor in the fifth volume, that the whole modern civilised world, however vast it may be, and however it may labor in so many arts and so many trades, does not and cannot exhibit even a small proportion of that elegance and ornament varied in a thousand ways, and in innumerable most fantastic modes, which are to be admired in the remains of furniture found in Pompeii and Herculaneum—two cities which occupied so insignificant a place in the ancient world. That is quite true. Now, what are we to infer from this? There can be no doubt, as I have said, on examining these beautiful objects, that they have been for common use. There are scales—steelyards—which can only have been made to weigh provisions; the chains are most delicately worked; the weight is frequently a head with a helmet, most beautifully chiselled; and so genuine and true are these, so really intended for every-day use that one of them has stamped upon it as yet the authentication made at the capitol of the weights being just. This was a steelyard which was in the kitchen, and it was for the ordinary purposes of the house. There are other large vessels which must have served for culinary purposes, and of which the handles, and the rings, and the different parts are finished far beyond what the finest bronzes that are made now in Paris can equal. What are we to conclude? You do not suppose these were the designs of the Flaxmaus and the Baileys of that day. Who ever heard of a great artist in Pompeii and Herculaneum? And how can you imagine that every house furnished itself with what were considered exquisite and extraordinary specimens of Art, for the use of their every-day life? And then, where are their common utensils, if these are not they? If these lamps were not what they burnt, if these candelabra were not the shafts upon which they were hung, if these vessels were not those in which they prepared their viands, where are those? Were they carried away in the flight? But the most precious would surely be carried away, and the commoner be left behind. Nothing of the sort. One may see here everything is to be found; everything is beautiful in shape, and generally in finish. What are we to conclude? Why, that the braziers who made these things were able to make them. They came from the hands of the brass-founder; they have been chiselled in the workshop; they have been finished, not to be put up in cabinets, but in order to be knocked about by servants. Then we have a state of Art in which the producer, the man who makes, who manipulates, who handles the object of manufacture which he produces, was able to do what now defies almost our most superior workmen. (Cheers.)

Now, let us go to another part of the world, and come to a later period. Nuremberg, during the time which I have specified—between 1300 and the middle of 1500—was a centre of Art, and especially in all metal work. There is an observation of Hoffman, a German writer, that Nuremberg was the city in which the artist and the craftsman walked most harmoniously hand in hand; but I think he does not go far enough; he ought to have said that it was a city in which the artisan and the artist were the most perfectly combined. At a very early period—that is, as early as 1355—there was produced a piece of work such as is at this day the admiration of all artists. And what was it! It was a mere well—a fountain in the public square; the beautiful fountain—the beautiful well, as it is to this day most justly called. Now, this was made entirely by the designer—by the artist himself, Höfer, who united in himself these two qualities; and it is acknowledged that in the treatment of the metal work, and in the beauty of the religious images which surround this fountain, but few steps have been made in Art since that time. And he, as I observed, was a mere workman; he did his own work. At a later period—at what is considered the third period of Art, in Nuremberg—there is another remarkable piece of metal work; and I am glad to find that in the last report just published by the department of Practical Art, Mr. Smirke has introduced a letter, in which he begs that this piece of workmanship, which he calls one of the most celebrated productions in metal, may be copied by casts, and brought to this country as a specimen of Art. Now that beautiful production was of as early a period as 1506; it was made between 1506 and 1519; and it is the shrine of St. Sebald, in his church at Nuremberg; and no one who had seen that exquisite piece of work—so beautiful, so elegant, as that no iconoclasm had dared to touch it, though I must say that Nuremberg had been preserved from the reproach of that error—but there it is in its freshness and its beauty, as it came from the artist's hand; in the centre, a shrine of silver, in which is yet the body of the Saint, and around it what may be called a cage or grating of the most perfect metal work, and with statues of most exquisite workmanship. Now I do wish this to be brought to England—a copy, that is, of it—not merely because it will show what was done in ages that we consider hardly emerging from barbarism—not only what beautiful inspirations religion could give the artist, but because it will show to those who are trying to raise the character of any art the true principle upon which alone it can ever be raised to what it was then. They will see the artist portrayed upon it—Peter Vischer—they will see him with his apron on; they will see him with his chisel and his mallet in his hand; they will see that he aspires to nothing more than a handicraftsman, a workman in metal, who yet could conceive first and then design this most magnificent production of man's hand. (Applause.)

Another example, something of the same sort, we shall find in a neighboring country. There is at Antwerp, likewise, a beautiful well near the cathedral; and if you ask who it was that produced this, you will hear that it was one who sometimes had been known as a painter, and at others under the more familiar appellation of the blacksmith of Antwerp—a blacksmith—and there is a piece of iron work, which, I fear, that not our most perfect works could turn out; certainly not—nothing that could be compared with it; and Quintin Matsys was a poor school-boy, who, finding the heavy blacksmith's work too much for him, took to drawing and coloring little images of Saints, to be given out in processions, and thus rose to be a painter and an artist, finding his first profession too heavy for his strength. But this iron work is a work of Art; it is not a work merely cast in the lump, and then put together; but it is a work that required genius, that required great artistic skill; it shows that the artist even worked in iron; that a man who belonged to the very lowest branch of what may be considered the Arts—laboring in metal—was able, notwithstanding, to imagine and to carry out the most beautiful conceptions.

Now, coming to modern times, do we find anything of this sort? I content myself with referring to that last report which I have just mentioned—of the department of Practical Art. In that report there are incorporated letters from some of our best silver and goldsmiths upon the character of the artistic proficiency of the workmen; I will only read one, for all in reality repeat the same sentiment. "At present we seldom find an English workman who understands drawing. Not one of our English workmen has a knowledge of drawing;" and it is said that, without exception, these men will not even go to the school; they have attempted to bring them to the School of Practical Art, that they may learn something of the principles by which the works in their branch of productive Art should be conducted. They cannot induce them even to go and obtain that information, though it is nearly, or entirely, gratuitously given. So little taste, then, so little feeling of Art, is there in our workmen now. Can we expect they will produce works that will rival those of ancient times? For there is that broad, immense difference; in one the artist was the workman; now, the workman has only a degree of intelligence above the machinery which he uses. He can apply those means which are put into his hand, but can have no feeling to give the last touch, or even to bring things to ordinary perfection. On the other hand, we must be struck with the difference, that in France there is much more taste, much more knowledge, much more intelligence in the actual artificer; the exhibition showed that, though we had magnificent things in silver work, and gorgeous objects in metallic productions, beautiful and splendid, yet when you came to look at them with the artist's eye, you could not help observing the immense difference between our English productions and those of France; though, be it spoken to the glory of our English goldsmiths, they have both the taste, and the generosity, and the munificence to bring over and to employ the very first foreign artists; and it was thus we did produce some objects that stood in competition, not with those of the workman's rivals, but with those of his own countrymen.

In Vecht you had an example of what the artists in old times were. He began as a cotton-spinner; he became a manufacturer of toys; then a button-maker; and then he began to work with the chisel. His genius developed itself. He began to retouch and repair ancient armour, and then was tempted, seeing that these were things sought after (it appears with the most honest intention) to imitate them, and he found that they were bought and put in royal and imperial cabinets as real work of what is called cinquecento. And then he imitated the shields, working exactly upon Cellini's principle, that everything, however small, is worked out separately, and then fastened together; that nothing is cast, but that everything, to the smallest tip of the least finger, is hollow; and he worked on, and produced it by his artistic and careful manipulation. He began to work this way, and he found his silver work also became considered as ancient and adopted into collections of valuable antiquities. He then learned the power of his own genius, and he soon rose; and when the late revolution in France took place he had commissions for works to the amount of 60,000*l.* And this was all his own work, the production of his own hands. However, his losses were in common with many others who had engaged in higher branches of art, and he has been since in this country; but certainly those specimens of his work which we had in the exhibition were not only most beautiful but most exquisite; and many persons who took the pains to examine in detail some of works in silver, which were presented by one French house in particular—the Freres Maurice—must have been struck by the high artistic merit of them all. And they are all worked entirely bit by bit by the artist; and it was impossible they could be executed but by an artist who could model as well as draw, and who knew how to treat his metal perfectly, so as to give all the softness, beauty, and delicacy of the original model. (Cheers.)

[To be continued.]

[From Novello's Musical Times.]

MENDELSSOHN'S ST. PAUL.

BY G. A. MACFARREN.

[Continued from p. 171.]

Mendelssohn's entire treatment of this subject, as it will be the object of these remarks to trace, is of a highly poetical character; to do justice, therefore, to his noble creation, we have not only to acknowledge the beauty of phraseology and the masterly development of his ideas, but equally, that secondary interest which betrays the higher purpose of the artist, and which, while it is above criticism, is level with the sympathies of those who are sensitive to it. Such is the distinction between a work of Art and a manufacture—between poetry and handicraft; and with this distinction St. Paul is most powerfully marked. It is now to enter upon an examination of its merits, which, as the expression of my own feelings, is the sincerest tribute I can offer to the memory of a genius that needs not the feeble light of verbal commentary to expound his greatness.

No. 1.—The Overture to St. Paul is of a completely different character and form from any of Mendelssohn's secular compositions for the orchestra. It would seem that the author, regarding the so-called contrapuntal style as the highest, because the severest exercise of a musician's powers, assumed this, in which he was among the moderns singularly successful, for his sacred prelude, emulating therein, with the profundity, the dignity of the ancient school, but animating this with the geniality that inseparably associates his music with the feelings of our own time.

This masterly piece of writing is founded upon the Choral, "Sleepers, wake!" the first three strains of which only, however, are employed in the course of the composition. The Overture opens with a short Introduction in which the Canto Fermo appears, first with simple harmony, and then with a counterpoint of moving crotchets; and this is followed by a Fugue on two subjects, (the first, of a very marked and eminently striking character,—the second, which is introduced after the first has been considerably elaborated and is subsequently employed as a counterpoint to it, moving ceaselessly in semiquavers,) throughout which the Choral is constantly recurring as the Canto Fermo upon which the whole is constructed.

So much, and that the Fugue commences in a moderate tempo, which is gradually accelerated into an animated and very exciting allegro, beginning in A minor, and ending in the major of the same tonic, is matter-of-fact and self-obvious. What I have now to propose, as to the connection, namely, of this Overture with the work, and as to its illustration of the subject, is entirely matter of speculation, and by no means to be accepted from my proposition, but rather to be regarded as an acknowledgment of what impression the music conveys to me, offered as a surety to others that there is a meaning that needs but to be sought to be found, the interpretation of which must depend upon the temperament of the hearer.

Let us suppose, then, that the calm, solemn simplicity of the opening implies a summons from the messenger of peace, addressed to the sleeping world, bidding them awaken to the consciousness of the glory that awaits them. In the chief subject of the Fugue is presented the dejection of the fallen human race—at least, thus I understand the pathetic expression of the melody, heightened by the sighing of wind instruments, that always accompanies the repetition of the last phrase; while the hurried, agitated character of the second subject depicts the troublous tumult of the war of passion. Through this the voice of majesty and love is ever heard, calling mankind to prepare for their redemption with always growing power and with always increasing impressiveness. The conflict of earthly desires rages with more and more impetuosity, and the sufferings of the sorrow-stricken people are ever renewed by that unrest which is at once their nourishment and their fruit, their cause and their result, as the mighty waters that yield the clouds which darken the sight of nature are fed by these clouds manifestings, their anger in the fury of the tempest. The voice from heaven continues still to call, mankind is aroused, the brightness of his immortal glory shines upon him, and the goodness of the Creator is most worthily approved in the purification of his greatest work, the intellect—the power to know, and to understand, and to believe—the soul of man.

No. 2.—This and the following piece constitute what may be considered a kind of prologue to the work, analogous, more or less, to the invocation to the muse with which Milton opens his "Paradise Lost," according to the manner of many, if not most of the extensive poetical works of ancient and modern times. The subject of these two pieces comprises the acknowledgment of the greatness of the Creator, the petition that he will give strength to his people to contend with their enemies and to preach his word, and the thank offering for his bountiful protection. The texts here brought together allude directly to the Apostle and his divine mission, the progress of which forms the action of the Oratorio; and they are also, perhaps indirectly, applicable to the composer, whose sacred province as an artist is, by clothing truth in beauty, by refining doctrine into poetry, to carry on the great work of the first teachers, quickening our knowledge into feeling, idealizing our sense of good with the sentiment of loveliness, and thus to stimulate through the subtle agency of our imagination such innermost emotion, as are intangible alike by fact and argument.

This being the purport of the words, the music is harmoniously also of a didactic character, dignified and earnest, but not solemn—bright, broad, energetic, and simple. The introductory bars of symphony and the opening vocal phrase, "Lord! thou alone art God," which is continuous of them, have a noble majesty that finely embodies the exultant feeling expressed in the exclamation. The stately motion of the accompaniment is arrested for the clearer enunciation of the words, "And thine are the Heavens, the Earth, and mighty Waters," which are thus given with true grandeur of effect, to which the masterly transition into D, that marks the first repetition of the sentence with a brightness that seems unsurpassable, eminently conduces. The fugue treatment of the passage on the words, "The heathens furiously rage against thee," is no less pertinent to their expression than is the agitated character of the accompaniment, the restless motion of which is maintained with admirable continuity, but without any approach to monotony. This troubled character is preserved by the further continuance of the same figure of accompaniment, while the sustained pianissimo of the voices replaces the feeling of complaint with that of supplication when the Almighty is invoked to look upon the prevailing power of our foes, and to give his servants strength to extend his word. Here, the opening subject is with great propriety resumed; and then, a very condensed recapitulation of the principal ideas of the movement forms a powerful Coda that closes in vigorous grandeur with the simple enunciation of the words comprised in the prayer.

It is here to remark upon the careful husbandry of his orchestral resources that especially characterizes the instrumentation of Mendelssohn. In the present Chorus we have an example, of which the Oratorio furnishes many, of how his power lies in the strength of his ideas rather than in the noise of his instrumentation, and by his sparing employment of these means he almost infinitely redoubles their effect whenever he takes advantage of them, and at the same time gives a variety of color to the entire work, which wondrously enhances its interest.

No. 3.—The calm, reposeful, gentle sense of gratitude is beautifully rendered in the simple character of the Choral, "To God on high," as it is here presented, in harmony of plain counterpoint, and without even the ornament of the very customary interludes between the strains. The melody of this Choral is one of the most modern in its phraseology, and certainly one of the most sympathetic of all these primitive offerings of our art to the service of the Reformed Church, and its popularity may be inferred from Bach having harmonized it in no less than four different ways in his countless collection of Lutheran Hymns, which indicates that it is in such very frequent requisition, as not only gives opportunity for the employment of these several renderings, but, exacts this various treatment as the necessary means of varying its effect.

It is rather the province of the schoolmaster than of the critic to enter upon the discussion of points of grammar, and I shall therefore, throughout these remarks, esteem myself happily exempt from any such disquisition—for which, in fact, except as a medium of eulogy, the present work presents the rarest opportunities. To vindicate the candor of my else unqualified admiration, I owe it to myself, and still more to my object, to avow that in the technical treatment of some of these pieces of plain harmony there occur some progressions, the irregularity of which only eludes observation under cover of the general effect, the absorbing interest of which incapacitates us from regarding minuteness of detail that might contribute to what they cannot destroy. I speak with diffidence, not in ostentation, and, having said, believe I have discharged a duty for which I shall gain no more thanks than credit. There needs not to proceed tediously into particulars, avoiding which I shall leave the exceptional passages still open to the admiration of those who are insensitive to their impropriety, whereby I shall escape the Art-evil of checking the impulse to find beauty and to acknowledge it, while this general declaration will, to those who share my scruples, justify the expressions of delight that the examination of this noble work of genius cannot fail ceaselessly to induce.

The transition into F sharp minor that marks Mendelssohn's treatment of the fifth strain of this Choral is very striking, and the effect of the whole is beautifully appropriate.

[To be continued.]

Concert-giving in New York.

One remark about concerts. It has become a settled maxim with professional concert-givers, that profit is not to be expected from concerts given in New York. The expenses absorb all but the largest receipts. New York, say the professionals, is to the rest of the United States, what Europe is to New York, namely, the place where the reputation is made; or, in other words, it is the dog on which the physic is tried. If New York bolts the dose, it is then considered safe to administer the same article to the smaller cities. The musicians tell us that this is the fact, and it should be borne in mind by those who contemplate enterprises of the kind. With regard to the expenses of concerts here, we can testify, of our own knowledge, that they are prodigious; a very moderate concert (like Madame de Berg's, for example) costs five hundred dollars. Some concerts, including preliminaries, have involved an expenditure of as many thousands. Therefore, think twice, before you give a concert.—Home Journal.

A Rehearsal.

[The following humorous description of a rehearsal is from the New York Picayune. It is true to the life, as we can testify.]

Castle Garden presents a very different appearance in the day time, during a rehearsal, to what it does at night when brilliantly lighted and filled with the people in their "Sunday clothes." Having some business with the opera people, we called at the Castle Garden one day last week, and accidentally enjoyed a rich, and to us, an entirely new scene. When we entered the spacious arena, we found the whole of the "powerful orchestra," as the bills say, hard at work on the music of the "Child of the Regiment." Some of them were taking it quite comfortable with their coats off—and we noticed that all who played upon string instruments, or drums, were indulging in a smoke at the same time. This was, no doubt, a privation to the wind instruments, who of course could not "blow" and smoke too. The "trombone" seemed to feel it the most, and took revenge on the "violins," by dividing and turning his instrument into a blow pipe, and chewing bits of paper, and hitting the rest of them on the head. The bald spot on the head of the stout German who played the bass viol, seemed to be a favorite mark for his paper balls, but all the balls he could throw, could never compel him to take his bow off the strings to scratch the abused spot, until the proper rest arrived in the music. Now and then only the pate was attended to. Some of the orchestra played their instruments as if they were paid by the day, and cared for nothing else than the arrival of quitting time. Others entered into the work with all their soul, and seemed to be perfectly delighted with their occupation.

On a high seat, at a piano, with coat off, and wristbands turned up, sat the leader, Max Maretzek, who played the piano with one hand, while he beat time with a baton in the other. His whole body moved with the cadence of the music—and as each singer came forward on the stage, he gave them their starting note, both on the piano and with the voice. We were gazing on him, wondering if he took such an interest in the rehearsal of all operas, when we were astonished to see him throw up his arms in despair, stop the band, and fairly squirm off his seat. At first we thought he might have an attack of cramps in the stomach, but a moment explained all. The ophicleide, in the remotest corner of the orchestra, had played a wrong note, which nearly tore the shirt off and the brains out of poor Max. All eyes were now turned upon the unconscious ophicleide—and "dis ish nit right," rang through the orchestra. The singers on the stage stopped in wonderment, and Baddiali looked daggers. The ophicleide defended his notes, and exhibited his music, which was immediately changed, amid a general expression of German, which of course was all Dutch to us. Madame Sontag was not rehearsing, and it was amusing to hear a sotto voce, belonging, we believe to the "bass drum," sing her role, to the accompaniment of the orchestra. His efforts were received with applause by the "grand chorus" on the stage, and his fellow blowers. Several dark Italian maidens, we were going to say, were walking about the stage, throwing up their arms and eyes, and going through their role.

The "Regiment," which looks so formidable at night, could not be told now, from a meeting of German boot makers on a strike. One cove among them was a "funny man," who danced with all his body, except his feet, all the lively airs in the opera. His effervescence of spirits led him to run a cove down, a "feller soger," back in the front rank, which caused the fellow soldier to let out a streak of Dutch as long as your arm.

While this was going on, the grand finale approached, and the people on the stage became intensely excited, and came down to Max Maretzek, who was in the ninth heaven, and an awful perspiration, and shook their fists at him, and stamped their feet, singing all the while with their utmost force. Max returned their fist-shaking by pounding the piano in a most malignant manner. The orchestra caught the influence, and came down heavy. The bass drum boomed like a distant cannon—the kettle drums rattled in the most tareific manner. The "bass viol" seemed determined to saw the strings in two, if a bow of horse hair can do it. The "Ophicleide" grew red in the face, and the "trombone's" cheeks swelled like a distorted bladder. Grand crash followed grand crash, until we looked above us, to see if the ceiling was still in its place, and then as the last crash was ended, instead of nipping it off short to catch the applause, as they do at night, they all set up the most horrid discord that ever saluted mortal ears. A general roar of laughter succeeds this, and the rehearsal is over.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, SEPT. 10, 1853.

Relation of the Press to Artists and their Agents.

SECOND ARTICLE.

We took occasion last week, apropos to the "black mail" controversy raging in New York, to offer some remarks upon the whole subject of the relation of the Press to persons who give operas and concerts which they expect the Press to notice. With the special controversy in question we have here no more to do, subsequent developments having plainly narrowed it to a question of veracity between individuals in New York. Leaving aside individual cases and persons, we wish, if it be possible, to introduce some distincter light into what has hitherto been a very vague and delicate subject. This, to be sure, is mainly for the benefit of artists, publishers and musical professors, and may not prove entirely entertaining to our general readers. Yet it concerns them also; it concerns the entire music-loving public to know what principles govern or should govern the Press in those notices of musical doings on which the public is so accustomed either to rely or to complain that it cannot rely.

The subject of the alleged outright buying and selling of editorial opinions,—bribery—"black-mail," &c., has been sufficiently discussed. It is only interesting as a matter of fact; as a matter of principle there can be no doubt of its illegitimacy. There is no vagueness here; it is simply crime, and properly should need no intervention of the casuists, but only of the constable. We have to do now with matters more ambiguous, with those vague expectations entertained toward the Press by musical artists, agents, publishers, &c., who have business therewith. We have already traced the origin of all this vagueness to the false and illegitimate presumption of favor in the dealings of these people with the Press:—a very natural and innocent presumption it may be in the first place, but which leads to a vast deal of insincerity and mischief, and to a very general confounding of generosity with justice, of personal with public obligation.

1. There are several ways, or kinds of "favors," by which musical agents, &c., are apt to fancy that they bind an editor to favorable notice. The most considerable and most common is by advertising in his paper. Newspapers depend upon their "advertising patrons" for their chief support; even a small weekly journal, like our own, does this to some extent. The idea is, then: We bring business to you, therefore we expect you to commend customers to us; we pay you so much for advertising our concert, or our new book, therefore you must urge your readers to go to the one or buy the other. (At the most, the equal return would be that the editor himself should buy the ticket or the book, not that he should drum up other purchasers.) But is this reasonable? is it right? Because you buy of us does it therefore follow that we can honestly send people to buy of you? Because our wares (our types, our columns) suit your purposes, does it follow that what you have to sell should suit our readers? By no means. If you advertise with us, it is because you think the simple advertisement worth to your business more than you pay us for it. The quid pro quo for what you pay us (viz. our stated, honest price) is the circulation which our paper gives your advertisement; that is the "value received," and you have no right to look to us for any more. We have no right to grant you any more, when by so doing we might idly or insincerely bias our readers as to the merit of what you advertise. Yet every editor knows how common a thing it is for advertisers to expect "a little word or two of editorial" in corroboration of the statements of the advertisement, just by way of "preparing the public mind" for the new book or the new prima donna. Perhaps the newspapers themselves, at least many of them, are to blame as being partly the creators of this expectation. It is the rule with many papers to notice only the performances or publications of those who advertise with them, thus seeming to countenance the inference that their editorial notice is to be taken as a premium upon advertising patronage: in which view of course the notice, or the general tenor of the successive notices of the advertising party, must be favorable. It certainly is a pitiful meanness to take advantage (as many do) of an editor's obliging disposition by making his gratuitous notice and commendation of you and your product save you the expense of an advertisement; wheedling or importuning a paper into doing your work at its own expense. But even this meanness, from which all papers sometimes suffer, is no justification of a practice which couples advertising with the hope of editorial favor.

2. Complimentary free tickets. This is another still more delicate matter to handle. There is all sorts of ambiguity and indefiniteness about the position in which an editor or critic is placed by the receiving of a free ticket to a public performance, and still more by the almost universal practice, which has caused such accommodations to be expected as a matter of course. Indeed so common is the practice, that it becomes a slight, almost an insult, to be overlooked in the distribution of these courtesies. The majority of intelligent and respectable concert-givers and their agents doubtless hold and act upon the right theory of the matter, although the theory may never have been stated. But there are many small and silly enough to withhold the card of in-vitiation from a paper which does not praise them and humor them "to the top of their bent" in its criticisms; who so far forget the dignity of their calling as to try to palm off their cards on editors as due-bills payable in "puffs" of them and their performances. Contemptible assumption! Of course every editor with any self-respect would infinitely rather stay at home or pay for his own ticket like his neighbors; (probably in most cases he would choose the former, ticket or no ticket.) This puny revenge on the part of managers for unfavorable criticisms, as well as the meanness sometimes shown in the accommodations for the press at the theatres and concerts, has led some respectable editors to decline such "privileges of the press" altogether, and insist on paying for their ticket when they care to witness a performance. Decidedly we say, let the entire press demand to be placed on the same footing with the general public in these matters, if the system of free or complimentary tickets really does imply an obligation on the part of the receivers to publish favorable notices, or any notices at all, of all they go to see and hear. Better waive the privilege, than have any ambiguity about it. If the editor or critic receive nothing, then he is not bound; then his relation to the artist is a sound, legitimate and honorable one.

But, we apprehend, experience has settled it to be for the general interest of all concerned, both artists, press, and public, that the public reporters or journalists, in any or in all spheres whereof it is their business to keep the public advised and enlightened, should have free, convenient, honorable access to all that is publicly going on in such spheres. This, we take it, is the true theory and rationale of the free ticket system. It is for the interest of artists that editors and true connoisseurs, who write about such matters, should be at all times free to witness their exhibitions, because without the journals it is not possible to arrest and hold the public attention to such things. It is for the interest of the whole exhibiting class collectively and in the long run, that this freedom of access be extended to the reporting class collectively and as a permanent system, and without weighing or questioning the benefit in any given instance. In other words, the independent, conscientious, and fair-minded musical critic views the matter thus: If Madame Sontag, or Max Maretzek, or Ole Bull, or Gottschalk, sends me a ticket to her or his artistic entertainment, it must not bind me in this especial case to notice favorably, or at all, unless I shall see fit, but it is sent me to increase the probabilities of my so seeing fit, and it pledges me (so far as it goes) anew to the whole general cause of Art and of my readers' interest in Art, which I am already pledged to serve, by noticing the works and deeds of artists at such seasons and in such measure as I shall feel truly moved and able. In accepting the ticket I have entered into no bargain with the sender, either to praise him or to speak of him at all. The test of my fidelity to my own proper function in this case is, the readiness and enterprise and fairness with which I seize upon and improve true texts of Art. But often silence is the truest comment; and often it is impossible amid the pressure of many things to speak of all, while I cannot properly discharge my duty to any unless I have the chance to know of all.—By no other theory of the critical office is true criticism possible. Now is it, or is it not for the interest of artists altogether that there should be true and honest criticism? If it is (as in the long run who can doubt) then it must proceed from those who have every convenience to hear and know about not only such performances as the hearing binds them to praise, but all performances from which knowledge of the Art and its true standards can be learned. In other words, the public only values the criticisms of those well booked up. Now will you destroy all criticism, will you invite none but favoring critics to your concerts, and thereby destroy all public confidence in newspaper notices of Art, because you, luckless virtuoso, may chance to get passed over or to fare hardly in the scales of criticism?

It is evident therefore that an editor or critic cannot enter a concert room in that unbiased state of mind which makes a criticism of any worth, if his admission there be construed as a pledge to write in any given manner or at all; and if it be for the general interest that editors have a free admission, then it must be with the fullest understanding that it implies no pledge in any given instance. The critic's duty is first and foremost to his readers and to Art, and then to the artist simply as an artist, and not as one who can retain him as an advocate in a pecuniary speculation; that is the business of Madame's agents and not of the editor or critic. We believe this (if we have clearly stated our meaning) to be the only sound theory and basis of the "complimentary ticket" system. We can conceive of no other understanding on which an editor can accept such accommodation (as an editor,—of course he is a man too, and a private individual sometimes) and preserve the purity of the critical function inviolate. At all events let it be one thing or the other; away with all this ambiguity; let the free admission of the press be a regular, honorable, unexceptional rule and system, or let it be abolished altogether. If it is retained, let it be wholly in the light of a facility, a means of knowing and of judging, which it is the interest and duty of the public in all ways to extend to the public reporters. If it cannot be retained in this broad and honorable sense, let it be given up, and let editors pay like other people, when they want to see and hear. By either of these two systems, and by no other, does the relation of the Press to public performers become a clear and unequivocal one. We cannot doubt, as we have said before, that most intelligent and honorable artists and editors do practically regard the complimentary ticket system in this only sound and reasonable light. It is only small and jealous people and pretenders, those who really are not artists, who would keep criticism at a distance and invite in only those whom they can hold committed to admire and praise them.

There are still other branches of this subject which require consideration, but we have no room now.

Gould's History of Church Music in America.

This is quite an entertaining book. More than that, it is a faithful and a curious chapter in the history of actual New England life and manners. Church music in America of course means psalmody. It has had its heroes and apostles in its day, and really has constituted a sort of quasi musical world, full of events and glories, by itself, the patriotic inhabitants whereof seldom looked abroad as if there could be any greater worlds; or if they did, if they got any intimations of other schools of Art, of Palestrinas, and Beethovens, and Rossinis, &c., these to them were cold and distant Jupiters and Herschells compared to this warm, eventful, central globe of psalmody, in which their great "composers" (so they called each other) rivalled Handel by their tunes, sung in the village choirs with so much unction. (And they had reason; Handel, or Mozart, never wrote such tunes, though modern, degenerate psalm-book makers use their names a great deal.)

There is some grand music, however, in the simple form of psalmody and chorals, and it is impressively employed in the worship of all Christian people. But New England, we do believe, is the only place where the multiplication of psalm-tunes has become a business for thousands and where the whole musical Art and the whole cause of musical culture has been regarded purely from the stand-point of psalmody. There are thousands of our country choir enthusiasts who regard psalmody as the only legitimate, pure music, and look on all the rest as fantastical, sophisticated, questionable stuff, an innocent diversion sometimes, but no more; and we are credibly assured that in many of our country towns they look on Mason, Woodbury, Baker, &c., as greater composers and geniuses than all the Handels, Mozarts and Beethovens they "hear'n tell of."

We do not believe that New England psalmody will hold anything like that place in the history of Music, which its principal creators and compilers, and the authors of such books as this before us, seem to fancy. Yet it has not been without its uses in cherishing religious sentiment, in cheering barren and prosaic lives, and in stimulating some love of music among us. And we thank the author of this very readable history for his faithful, modest, cleverly accomplished work. It is full of quaint and pleasant anecdote; it revives the memory of many persons who ought not to be forgotten; it chronicles the revolutions of styles and tastes; it avoids offence to "living authors," by neither blaming or praising any; it preludes by a brief digest of the early history of music, omitting no part of the scriptural allusions; and it abounds in good, sensible, practical suggestions. For the writer is a teacher of great experience, having taught singing-schools in about a hundred different places, numbering some 50,000 pupils! (A list of these schools is appended.)

He also adds a list of all the "Collections" published in this country between the years 1810 and 1852; they number about eighty. A spirit of great simplicity and kindliness pervades all the writer's reminiscences. He is himself a product of the village choir, a genuine enthusiast of that school of music.

The book is a neat duodecimo of 240 pages, published by Gould & Lincoln, of this city.

A NEW VOLUME of this journal will commence with the number for Saturday, October 8th. Just the beginning of the musical season, and just the time for new subscribers to begin to read our paper. We trust our friends, who are satisfied that this paper is worth sustaining, will use a little effort to induce others to subscribe.

We would also state for the benefit of those who may wish to keep connectedly such mirror of the musical times as we have given for the eighteen months past, that we have a good supply of all the back numbers on hand, with bound volumes of the first year.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB are actively preparing for the coming season. Their friends will be glad to learn that an excellent artist is on his way to join them, who will sustain Mr. Lehmann's part. Mr. August Fries has been spending the summer in Leipzig, studying assiduously new works for the coming season, which will be presented by the Club in the careful and appreciative style for which they are distinguished. We hope and expect they will meet with all the encouragement they deserve for their persevering efforts for the introduction of music of the highest character in Boston; and surely no association has done more than they have towards it, in the same length of time.

NEWPORT.—A private correspondent writes us:—"GOTTSCALK gave three concerts here with indifferent success." [How differently success is measured by the newspapers and by the knowers!] "I heard him at a concert given for the sufferers in New Orleans. His own compositions are without much merit; though I found several new bravura figures of excellent effect, but which he repeated in every piece. He played a portion of Weber's Concert-Stück nicely, (without accompaniment), introducing octaves, finely done. He certainly has much and clear execution.—But O! that splendid Pleyel piano! such a tone! such clearness in the bass!" &c.

..... "As for Jullien and his orchestra, I really believe, although there may be much clap-trap and mere glitter in his affairs, he will popularize orchestra music more in six months, than the efforts of any local society can do in ten years. I don't think this is saying much. If such is to be the case, why good luck to his coming!"

London.

SPOHR'S "JESSONDA" has been the event of the month, having been produced at the Royal Italian Opera, under every advantage, but with limited success, on the 6th and 9th August. Mr. Chorley's criticism upon it, in the Athenæum, so well recalls our own impressions of whatever we have heard of Spohr's vocal music, that we feel considerable assurance of its justice. We copy the substantial portions.

The story, taken from M. Lemierre's 'Veuve de Malabar,' affords scope for descriptive music and contrast in national and local color,—though it is arranged with small regard to dramatic situation. How Jessonda, (Bosro,) a Portuguese by birth, and the half-wedded widow of a Rajah, is rescued from becoming the bride of fire in solemnization of her lord's funeral obsequies, by the intervention of her old lover, a Portuguese General Tristano (BELLETTI)—the part that Nadori, (LUCCHESI) a young Brahmin, and Amazili, Jessonda's sister, (CASTELLAN) take in her deliverance—need not be told point by point; so widely has the work been circulated in the closet and in the concert-room. Not less universal has been the tradition that 'Jessonda' is Dr. Spohr's best opera. This we cannot think. The music is throughout carefully made, but in no part or portion of it is it dramatic. There is the vapidity of opium in its sweetness,—not the rich, healthy savor of honey. There is the whine of complaint without the persuasion of grief in its sorrow,—the strain of disquiet without the depth of emotion in its passion. Though the structure is good, the ideas are meagre, mannered, and wanting in freshness. From the rising of the curtain till the falling of the same, there is not a simple melody, as we understand the word,—but in its place a surfeit of phrases, the pattern of which suggests the idea of quotations from Mozart, diluted and disguised by the perpetual use of the appoggiatura. The repetition of well-beloved harmonies and cadences—the monotonous manner in which the voices are treated with reference to the orchestra (not the orchestra with reference to the voice)—become utterly cloying. The perpetual unsettlement of chromatic modulation could not be pushed further, whether the singer be the Indian widow, her sister, her lover, or the Portuguese General—whether solitary or in concert. Dr. Spohr has only one receipt for conducting adagio or allegro—lament or triumph-chant—to a close. Further, skilful and elaborate as is his instrumentation—about the nearest marqueterie (to venture a fantasy) that exists in Music,—it is never brilliant. We are forever fancying the climax about to come, which never arrives,—forever listening for some relief of variety to the ear, that never is administered. How dead and dull, in short, is the orchestral sound—how deficient in that life, without which there is no dramatic vitality,—the student will best ascertain by comparing (without reference to their respective ideas) the combat finale in Spohr's second act, to the finale in "Don Juan"—the "Waffentanz" in the Portuguese camp, to any of Gluck's airs de ballet. The impression, in short, of lassitude arising from want of dramatic impulse, want of interest in idea, and want of variety in treatment, became so complete as the opera went on, that in very impatience of work so carefully put together and thus apparently so good—but in reality so bad because devoid of invention—the ear at last began absolutely to think of Bellini's baldest unison with toleration, and to escape from the sighing, dying closes of airs without tune, from passages without novelty, complications without force, and difficulties without effect—to such threadbare and comparatively flimsy pieces of display as Pacini's rondo from 'Niobe' or the delicious serenade from 'Don Pasquale';—Rossini, of course, not coming into the comparison. Nay, as regards its composer's own operatic works, 'Jessonda' contains nothing which for freshness may compare with the introduction to 'Faust,'—for cantilena with the grand airs for Cunigonda and Ugo from the same opera,—for character with the song 'Va shamando' of Mephistopheles,—for display of the voice with the favorite terzett from 'Zemire and Azor.'

The spirit of the above remarks must not be mistaken, —however imperatively we feel them called for, in aid of those who love in their pleasures to think, to class, and to know how it is they can be wearied, even if they love good music, by the work of a good musician. The high finish and delicate humor of Addison's prose style do not make 'Cato' endurable as a stage-play. The acquirement, individuality, and consistency which Dr. Spohr displays in his instrumental compositions cannot enchant our ear into accepting a stage work so lugubrious, sickly, and mono-chromatic as the opera in question. Let it, however, be noted, to keep the balance true, that 'Jessonda' suffers from the hearer's familiarity with its composer's style. Possibly no classical writer ever existed whose peculiarities pall on the taste so rapidly as those of Dr. Spohr. There is, and there must be, a time with every amateur when his manner is felt to be seductive,—but to that, with many, succeeds a period when the entire mass of his music, marked as it is with one touch and one tone of color, is listened to with a calmness not far from indifference as being mechanical and monotonous. The lukewarmness may be as unjust as the love was immoderate; but the sequence of one to the other remains a fact not to be avoided.

JOHN PARRY.—Cocks's Miscellany announces the retirement from public life of this incomparable singer and composer of musical drolleries, such as 'Fair Rosamond,' 'Blue Beard,' &c. He was the prototype of Mr. J. L. Hatton, in those genial, funny entertainments, by which he was wont to set us laughing unto tears. The Athenæum says of him:

It should be recorded, that Mr. John Parry's drolleries have been as delightful to the most scientific and most fastidious of musicians as to the general audiences that flocked to listen to "the accomplished young lady" and "Fair Rosamond," or to assist at the wondrous amateur singing and pianoforte playing so shrewdly and mirthfully reproduced in his later entertainments. Mr. John Parry's whimsies were started, if we mistake not, under the aid and by the abetting of Madame Malibran at Naples; but we have seen Mendelssohn sit to listen by the hour with the eager face of an enjoying child, and we have heard Chopin laugh till he was almost "ready to die" (so frail in his case was the machine) at the travesties, parodies, imitations, and amphigouris of this racy humorist.

STERNDALE BENNETT.—The Concert-Direction at Leipzig have made a handsome and liberal offer to Mr. Sterndale Bennett, to conduct the whole series of Abonnement Concerts, held at the Gewandhaus, during the winter. These concerts—the most famous in Germany—were formerly directed, as our readers well know, by the late Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy. During his visits to Leipzig, which were of long duration, Mr. Sterndale Bennett performed his third and fourth pianoforte concertos at the Gewandhaus concerts; and also held the baton by Mendelssohn's own desire, when the illustrious composer himself was the sole performer. The series comprises twenty performances, beside extra concerts, for charities, &c., and extends from the end of September to the beginning of March. We are not yet informed, whether Mr. Bennett has been able to accept the very honorable proposal of the Leipzig Directors. It is worthy to be placed on record, as the first compliment of the kind that was ever paid by a foreign society to an English musician. —London Musical World.

Advertisements.

TEMPLI CARMINA: A NEW MUSIC BOOK, BY GEORGE KINGSLEY.

THE attention of Teachers and Choirs is especially called to this NEW COLLECTION OF CHURCH MUSIC, as worthy of their careful examination and favorable consideration. It is the result of much discriminating labor on the part of the Editor, and we think will prove highly acceptable to the musical public. Selections have been made from the most distinguished EUROPEAN COMPOSERS, adapted and arranged with scrupulous regard to the elevated purposes of RELIGIOUS WORSHIP. Many beautiful pieces are from the Compositions of BEETHOVEN, HAYDN, MOZART, MENDELSSOHN, SPOHR, NEUKOMM, DR. LOEWE, and other eminent composers, also many pieces of more simple structure, which are often greater favorites with congregations than music of a more complicated and elaborate style. It contains an Episcopal service, with a large variety of Chants, Anthems, &c. There are also several pages of Chants adapted to the services of Churches of different denominations, the words selected from the Bible and from Psalms and Hymns, with the usual variety of Metrical Tunes. Twenty-four pages are devoted to Elementary Instruction, in which are many valuable extracts from Lablache's Solfeggi. It is hoped, among the multiplicity of Music Books now before the public, that this may not be passed by without examination, for we believe it will be found equal to any modern collection extant, and superior to very many. Valuable recommendations have been received from Philadelphia, Buffalo, Troy, and other cities, from gentlemen at the head of the musical profession in the country.

The TEMPLI CARMINA will be for sale at the principal Book Stores throughout the Country, or it can be obtained directly of the publishers, who will supply all orders at reasonable prices.

P. S. Copies for examination will be forwarded free of postage, to any part of the United States, on receipt of 75 cents in postage stamps.

HOPKINS, BRIDGMAN & CO.,
Publishers, Northampton, Mass.

Sept. 10. 3t

OLIVER DITSON,
Music Dealer, 115 Washington St., Boston,
HAS a good variety of Piano Fortes, Melodions, Seraphines and Reed Organs, to let, for city or country, on low terms. If, within one year from the time of hiring, the party should conclude to purchase the instrument, no charge will be made for rent of it, except the interest on its value. 25 tf

SOPRANO SINGER.

A YOUNG LADY is desirous of procuring a situation as SOPRANO SINGER in a Quartet Choir, by the 1st of October. Application to be made to Miss FANNY FRAZER, care of G. P. REED & Co., Tremont Row. Aug. 20.

HAND-BOOK OF SINGING.

RIMBAULT'S HAND-BOOK OF SINGING: being the Second of Rimbault's Series of Elementary Music Works. Just published. Price 50 cents.

OLIVER DITSON, 115 Washington St.

NORMA.

JUST PUBLISHED: THE OPERA OF NORMA, WITH ENGLISH AND ITALIAN WORDS. Price $2. Being No. 1 of "Ditson's Edition of Standard Operas."

"At the low price of two dollars this opera is accessible to every music-lover, and in a form convenient and beautiful."—Journal of Music.

"A perfect mine of musical wealth."—Ch. Freeman.

"One of the most beautiful and recherché of all the elegant musical publications—and their name is legion—which have appeared from Mr. Ditson's teeming press."—Yankee Blade.

"Less than half the cost of a similar edition published in England, it is within the reach of all."—Transcript.

"Superb both as regards the composition, and the taste and skill displayed in its typographical and its mechanical execution generally."—Pathfinder.

DON GIOVANNI, by MOZART, will be ready in a few days. Price $1.

Oliver Ditson, 115 Washington St.

Sold by all Music Dealers. iii20

L. O. EMERSON,

Teacher of the Piano-Forte and Singing.

APPLY AT HIS RESIDENCE,

No. 12 INDIANA PLACE, BOSTON.

iii 13 3m.

A. W. FRENZEL,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC, and late Leader of the "SAXONIA ORCHESTRA," having made Boston his residence, is prepared to give Lessons on the Piano-Forte and in Singing, both in the English and German languages; also to accompany with the violin more advanced pupils in the Sonata-duos of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c. During the summer season, Mr. F. offers his services to classes out of town. Or he will receive scholars, from the city or the country, at his Music Rooms, No. 4 Pine Street, Boston, where he may always be found before 10 A. M., and between the hours of 1 and 3 P. M. iii 6

JONAS CHICKERING,

RESPECTFULLY gives notice to his friends and the public that, having recovered from the late disastrous effects produced by the destruction of his factory, he is now ready to receive orders for PIANOS, which he promises to execute with as much faithfulness and promptitude as heretofore.

379 Washington Street, Boston.

Mar. 5.

tf

HEWES' PATENT

AMERICAN ACTION PIANOFORTE.

THE MANUFACTURER is in possession of numerous testimonials from distinguished Musical Professors, who have used the greatly improved ACTION PIANO, commending it in high terms. The attention of purchasers and amateurs of Music to an examination of its superiority, is solicited.

GEO. HEWES, 365 Washington St., Boston.

Apr. 10.

tf

THEODORE T. BARKER,

MUSIC STORE,

No. 381 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

Chickering's Pianos to let.

All Foreign and American Musical Publications received as soon as published. ii23 3m

N. D. COTTON,

IMPORTER AND DEALER IN

English, French, and American Stationery, DRAWING & PAINTING MATERIALS,

No. 13 Tremont Row, Boston.

 Wedding and Visiting Cards Engraved and Printed. 16 tf

D. B. NEWHALL,

MANUFACTURER AND DEALER IN PIANO FORTES,

No. 344 Washington Street, Boston.

PIANO FORTES REPAIRED, TUNED, & TO LET.

Apr. 10.

tf

BEETHOVEN'S ORATORIO OF ENGEDI, or DAVID IN THE WILDERNESS, known as the MOUNT OF OLIVES, is this day published in a neat, convenient form for the singer or concert-goer by

Geo. P. Reed & Co., Publishers, 17 Tremont Row, Boston.

Jan. 8.

Edward L. Balch,

CLASSICAL MATINÉES.

THE undersigned, resident artists of Boston, intend to give a Series of Classical Concerts during next winter, in which the best works of the great composers will be performed; such as Quartets, Quintets, Septets, Trios, Duos and Solos, by Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Hummel, Weber, Cherubini, etc. The programme will be made more attractive by Vocal performances between the different pieces, as also Solos for Horn, Violoncello, Piano, Violin, etc., occasionally. Many greater compositions, as, Quartets, Quintets, and Septets for Piano with String and Wind instruments, will be produced, which have never been publicly performed in Boston. To accommodate Ladies and others out of town, we propose to give our Concerts in the afternoon. The time and place will be announced hereafter. The subscription is $3 for the Series of Eight Concerts. Single tickets 50 cents each.

Subscription lists will be found at the different Music Stores.

H. ECKHARDT, } VIOLINS.	CH. EICHLER, ALTO.
WM. KEYZER, } Sept. 3.	TH. MAASS, VIOLONCELLO.
	H. PERABEAU, PIANIST.

STANDARD SINGING BOOK,

By Hastings & Bradbury.

PSALMISTA: OR CHOIR MELODIES.

THIS latest Book of Thomas Hastings and Wm. B. Bradbury gives the highest satisfaction in Choirs, Churches and Singing Schools. The following are important features in the book:

1st. The rudiments are presented in a very attractive manner, and combine both theory and practice.

2dly. The Music is beautiful, devotional and simple.

3dly. There is a sufficient variety to meet every religious exercise, and no other book is needed for choir practice where this is in use.

4thly. The type is large and plain, and paper good.

5thly. The price is sufficiently low to meet the wants of any Church or Choir.

Teachers and Choristers desiring a copy for examination, can have it sent free of postage, by remitting 60 cents to the publishers.

NEWMAN & IVISON.

For sale in Boston by W. J. Reynolds & Co., B. B. Mussey & Co., and Phillips, Sampson & Co. Aug. 27, 34.

The best Book on Piano Instruction existing!

IN PRESS.—JULIUS KNORR'S GUIDE FOR TEACHERS ON THE PIANO. A full system of instruction, from the very outset, to artistic perfection, with full advice to teachers and pupils. Its progressive order, completeness, and the value of the pieces recommended, (about 200), make it indispensable to teachers, and invaluable to all players. It is

THE BEST SELF-INSTRUCTOR EXTANT.

It is also the ONLY KEY to the proper use of Julius Knorr's "Materials," and his "Large Method." Price 75 cents

iii 14 3m

G. A. SCHMITT, Petersburg, Va.

J. W. TAVERNER,

PROFESSOR OF ELOCUTION,

AT HIS RESIDENCE,

No. 30 CHARLES STREET, BOSTON.

G. ANDRÉ & CO.

FOREIGN MUSIC DEPOT,

GIRARD HOUSE BUILDINGS,

NINTH STREET, ABOVE CHESTNUT,

PHILADELPHIA.

N. B. The complete works, for Piano, (Quartets, Trios, Duets for Piano and Violin, Duets for four hands and Piano solo pieces,) of BEETHOVEN and MOZART, as also the Piano solo Works of CLEMENTI and HAYDN, as published by J. André, Offenbach, in sets, at very low prices. We have appointed

Messrs. WHITE BROTHERS,

TREMONT TEMPLE, BOSTON,

our Agents for the sale of the above Standard Editions of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, &c. &c.

iii 2 tf

TREMONT TEMPLE MUSIC STORE,

No. 86 TREMONT STREET, BOSTON.

WHITE BROTHERS, DEALERS IN MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS,

Best Italian, German, French and English Strings,

AGENTS OF

J. André, Offenbach; and G. André, Philadelphia,

FOR THE SALE OF FOREIGN CLASSIC MUSIC,

CHOIR MUSIC, &c.

Instruments Made, Repaired, Tuned, Bought, Sold, or Exchanged, on the most favorable terms.

IRA J. WHITE.

iii 2 3m

A. WARREN WHITE.

MRS. ROSA GARCIA DE RIBAS,

TEACHER OF THE

PIANOFORTE, SINGING & GUITAR,

2 Seneea St., corner Harrison Avenue.

MR. De RIBAS will give instruction on the Oboe and Flute. Also MUSIC ARRANGED, TRANPOSED, &c. Boston, April 23. 3m

Letter-Press, Music and Job Printing-Office,

SIGNOR G. C. GUIDI respectfully informs his former pupils and the public, that he has resumed his instructions in SINGING, after the Italian school, with the intention to settle permanently in Boston. In order to accommodate those who may not wish to take private instruction, he will open classes for ladies and gentlemen, on moderate terms. None but good voices will be admitted. Terms liberal for persons intending to study for professional purposes.

Sig. G. can be consulted free upon any musical subject, daily, from 12 to 2, at Mr. Hews's Piano Manufactory, No. 365 Washington street, where terms and time for classes may be known.

Orders or notes for Sig. G. may be addressed to him at G. P. Reed & Co's Music Store, 17 Tremont Row, and at Oliver Ditson's, 115 Washington street. Feb. 5.

A CARD.

THE SUBSCRIBER respectfully offers his services to the public as Teacher of the Piano-Forte, the Violin and the Guitar, also of Harmony and Singing, after a clear and easy method. He will also accompany pupils, both in seminaries and in private houses, in the practice of Duets, Trios, &c.

Address for the present at 183 Tremont Street.

March 26. 3m.

CARL GÄRTNER.

L. H. SOUTHARD, TEACHER OF MUSIC,

265 Washington Street, Boston.

Oct. 16.

3m

T. BRICHER,

Organist and Conductor of Music

At the Bowdoin Square Church.

OFFICE UNDER THE CHURCH. . . ENTRANCE ON CHARDON ST.

Jan. 22. 3m.

H. S. CUTLER,

Organist at the Church of the Advent, also of the Boston Harmonic Society.

ADDRESS—(Care of ROLAND CUTLER, No. 4 Market Square, Boston.) 22 tf

F. F. MÜLLER,

DIRECTOR OF MUSIC AND ORGANIST at the Old South Church; ORGANIST of the Handel and Haydn Society; ORGANIST of the Musical Education Society, &c. &c. &c. Residence, No. 3 Winter Place, Boston. ii7 tf

NATHAN RICHARDSON,

PROFESSOR OF MUSIC.

Letters may be addressed at the Revere House, Boston. 25 tf

GEORGE F. WILLEY,

TEACHER OF MUSIC.

Private Tuition in the principles of Music and the Cultivation of the Voice.

MUSIC ROOM, THE LECTURE ROOM OF KIRK STREET CHURCH, RESIDENCE, 34 FRANKLIN SQUARE, SUFFOLK STREET, feb. 5. LOWELL, MASS.

Germania Serenade Band.

THE SERVICES OF THIS ASSOCIATION can be secured by applying to

ii 14 tf

G. SCHNAPP, Leader, 304 Tremont Street.

DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

AT 21 SCHOOL STREET, BOSTON.

$2 per annum, in advance.

ITS CONTENTS relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time,—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music published at home and abroad. 3. A Summary of the significant Musical News from all parts; gathered from English, German, French, as well as American papers. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, Architecture, Poetry, Æsthetic Books, the Drama, &c.—8. Original and Selected Poems, short Tales, Anecdotes, &c. Back numbers, from the commencement, can be furnished. Address, (post paid,) J. S. DWIGHT.

21 School Street, Boston.

RATES FOR ADVERTISING.

For half a square, (8 lines,) or less, first insertion, . . . $0.50
each additional inser. 25
For a square, (16 lines,) first insertion, 1.00
each additional insertion, 50

On advertisements standing three months or longer, a discount of twenty per cent. on the above rates is allowed. (A column counts as seven squares.)

Payments required in advance: for yearly advertisements, quarterly in advance.

No. 21 School St.

DWIGHT'S Journal of Music.

A Paper of Art and Literature.

VOL. III.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1853.

NO. 24.

Dwight's Journal of Music,

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY,

TERMS....TWO DOLLARS PER ANNUM, (IN ADVANCE.)

CITY Subscribers can be served at their houses by the further payment of fifty cents per annum.

For Rates of Advertising, see last page.

POSTAGE, if paid in advance, for any distance within the State, thirteen cents a year; if not in advance, twenty-six cents. To all places beyond the State, double these rates.

J. S. DWIGHT,.....EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

EDWARD L. BALCH, PRINTER.

OFFICE, No. 21 School Street, Boston.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED

At the OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 21 School St.

By REDDING & CO., 8 State St.

GEO. P. REED & CO., 13 Tremont Row.

A. M. LELAND, Providence, R. I.

DEXTER & BROTHERS, 43 Ann Street, N. Y.

SCHARFENBERG & LUIS, 722 Broadway, N. Y.

MASON BROTHERS, 23 Park Row, New York.

GEORGE DUTTON, JR., Rochester, N. Y.

G. ANDRE, 229 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

MILLER & BEACHAM, 181 Baltimore St., Balt.

COLBURN & FIELD, Cincinnati, O.

HOLBROOK & LONG, Cleveland, O.

JOHN H. MELLOR, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Persons willing to become Agents for procuring subscribers, especially Music-Dealers and Teachers, are invited to correspond with the Editor, as above. Satisfactory references required, and liberal commissions allowed.

Back numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Also bound copies of Vols. I. and II. at prices varying from $2.50 to $3.50.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

An Opera Night at the Fenice.

"Writing," says Lord Bacon, "makes an exact man." Upon this hint, M. Honoré de Balzac has written. Not only is it true of him that no man ever "wrote himself" with such determined perseverance into so good a style—no man ever made his business more subserve his general education. Within all his romances, whatever be the envelope, whether the sugar of sentiment or the pepper of passion, one is pretty sure to find a healthful pill of science. Lovely ladies unexpectedly engage you in a discourse on agriculture, a prose Georgic of the 19th century,—you are lulled to rest in the richest and quaintest and coziest of Flemish chambers to hear a lecture on chemistry from a Polish dragoon out of service. Your feelings are harrowed by the most elaborate representation of the sufferings of a virtuous and noble son left to struggle with his young wife in the grasp of misery by an avaricious old father, only that you may turn with the attention of a relieved and grateful mind to a history of the paper manufacture in France.

Do you suppose that in thus lavishing his learning upon his love tales, Balzac means to "popularize the highest instruction," or even to act the part of a Berquin by you? Not at all. Pas si bête! M. de Balzac is a priest of Love and the Church of Rome; when he talks science it is as a priest talks his theology, not to instruct but to confound and impose upon you. This is his object so far as you, his fair reader, are concerned. Beyond this and in regard to himself, we may be sure that the fifteen octavos of La Comédie Humaine were to him a series of Memoranda, aiding him to retain the various acquirements he made in the course of his indefatigably studious existence.

As we have not undertaken here to criticize Balzac's works, but merely to steal from them for the benefit of our musical friends, we may be permitted to say that the view we have taken of his writings allows us a delightful liberty in the way of retrenchment and omission, of which we shall avail ourselves in setting forth, or oversetting, as the Germans have it, into English, some passages of Massimilla Doni, which particular story Balzac has the honesty to own was written under the direction of a musical feuilletonist.

Balzac was as scrupulously faithful in the execution of his work as any artizan of Paris, and the couleur locale of the following description of an opera night in Venice is most admirably rendered. As for the comments of the Duchess upon Rossini's Mosé in Egitto, we certainly might take exceptions thereto, but they come most naturally from her lips, and they are at least conceived in the true spirit in which great musical compositions should be judged. Balzac "studied under the best teachers" and Jacques Strunz was a superior man.

The scene of our story is laid at Venice, and, of course, in the time of the Austrian dominion. The habitués of the Fenice are excited by the promise of two débuts. A great cantatrice, La Tinti, and a great tenor, Genovese, are announced to appear together in the Mosé. On the first night however the tenor only appears in the Barbiere, and has one of those insane triumphs which are granted to singers in Italy. La Tinti is unwell. For the second night Mosé in Egitto is announced and this time we shall hear the Tinti whose illness, according to the babblers at the cafés, was improvised in consequence of a quarrel between the tenor, who passionately loves the prima donna, and the prima donna, who cares nothing for him.

In the box of Massimilla Doni, Duchess di Cataneo, are assembled that lady, a lovely Florentine, a young Venetian prince, her cavaliere servente, and a French physician employed by her husband, the Duke, an old man whose only passion is music and who has educated La Tinti, whom he found when a child in the house of a Sicilian innkeeper. The Duke leaves his box, referring the Frenchman to the Duchess as the best interpreter possible of the chef-d'œuvre they are about to enjoy.

"Does an Italian opera, then, really need a cicerone?" asks the physician.

"This is really not an opera, monsieur, but an oratorio," answers the lady, "a work which really resembles one of our magnificent cathedrals and through which I will gladly be your guide. Believe me, it will not be too much to grant our great Rossini the undivided attention of your whole mind, for in order to understand the full meaning of such music one ought to be both a musician and a poet. Music, as the great masters have created it, and as great masters yet to come will continue and expand it, is a new art, an art unknown to the past, which neither possessed so many instruments as ourselves, nor had any idea of Harmony, from which, as from a fruitful soil, the flowers of Melody now spring. An art so new demands new studies, studies which shall develop the sentiment which music addresses. This sentiment hardly exists among you in France, who are so occupied with philosophical theories, with analyses and discussions, and who are forever tormented with internal dissensions. Modern music, which demands profound peace, is the language of tender, loving souls, of souls inclined to a noble interior exaltation. This tongue, a thousand-fold richer than speech, is to speech what thought is to words: it arouses our sensations and our ideas in their own proper shapes, and leaves them precisely what they are in every case. This power over our inward being is one of the grandeurs of music. Other arts impose definite creations upon the mind; the creations of music are indefinite, infinite. We are obliged to accept the ideas of the poet, the picture of the painter, the statue of the sculptor, but each of us interprets music according to the dictates of his joy or his sorrow, his hope or his despair. Where the other arts enclose our thoughts by fixing them upon some determinate thing, music gives them the freedom of the whole universe, which she has the power of expressing to us. You shall see how I understand the Moses of Rossini."

She stooped towards the Frenchman and whispered to him, "Moses is the liberator of an enslaved people! Remember that, and you will see with what a religious hope the whole Fenice will listen to the prayer of the delivered Hebrews!"

When the orchestra had sounded the three chords in C major, with which the master begins his work, to make us understand that his overture will be sung, (for the true overture is the vast theme which runs on from this sudden opening to the point at which the light appears at the command of Moses,) the Duchess could not repress a convulsive movement, which showed how perfectly this music accorded with her hidden grief.

"How those three chords seem to freeze one!" she said. "They make us expect some great sorrow. Listen attentively to this introduction, the subject of which is the terrible elegy of a people smitten by the hand of God. What groanings! The king—the queen—their heir—the nobles—the whole people are sighing, they are wounded in their pride, in their conquests, suddenly arrested in their greedy ambition. Dear Rossini! thou didst well to throw this bone to the Tedeschi, who denied us the gift of harmony and of science. An Italian alone could have written this theme, so fruitful, so inexhaustible, so thoroughly Dantesque. Do you believe it is nothing to dream, for one moment, of vengeance?"

Thus the Duchess spoke whilst the curtain was rising. Then the Frenchman listened to the sublime symphony with which the composer opened the vast biblical scene. He is to express the grief of a whole people. Grief is always uniform in its expression, especially the grief of physical sufferings. So, after having instructively divined, like all men of genius, that there ought to be no variety in his ideas, the musician, having once formed his leading phrase, has passed it through all gradations of tone, grouping his masses and his personages together upon this motif by cadences and modulations of the most admirable flexibility. In this simplicity we recognize power. How thrilling is the effect of this phrase which represents the sensations produced by cold and darkness upon a people born and bathed continually in the luminous waves of the sunlight! This slow, musical movement seems positively pitiless. This cool, mournful phrase suggests to us the image of the whole people bound like a criminal upon the slowly revolving wheel, to be broken in every limb, beneath the regularly recurring strokes of the Divine Justice.

And the Frenchman was conscious of the deepest emotion, when finally burst out the explosion of all these united sorrows:

O, Nume d'Israel!
Se brami in libertà
Il popol tuo fedel
Di lui, di noi pietà!

(Oh God of Israel! if thou desirest the freedom of thy people, have pity on them and on us!)

"Never was there a more complete idealization of Nature. In great national misfortunes, each one for a long time laments by himself, then there arise above the mass, here and there, cries of anguish more or less violent,—finally, when the suffering has become universal, it breaks forth like a tempest. When once they have come to an understanding of their common misery, the low murmurs of the people become outcries of impatience. Thus has Rossini proceeded. After the explosion in C major, Pharaoh chants his sublime recitative: Mane ultrice di un Dio! The original theme assumes a sharper accent. All Egypt summons Moses to help her!"

The Duchess had availed herself of the interval required by the arrival of Moses and Aaron to explain this fine passage. "Let them weep!" she added passionately, "let them weep! Egyptians, expiate the sins of your senseless Court! With what art this master has employed all the sombre hues of music, all the gloom of the musical palette! What cold shadows, what frosts! We no longer perceive either the palaces, the palm-trees or the landscape of Egypt. And how blessed will be the effect upon the heart of the religious notes of the heavenly physician who is coming to heal these wounds! How everything is graduated to bring us to the Invocation of Moses! This invocation, you will observe, is only accompanied by brass instruments. These it is which give to this passage its grand, religious tone. Not only is this arrangement admirable in this place, Rossini has even drawn new beauty from the obstacles he thus put in his way. He has been enabled to reserve the stringed instruments to express the day which will follow the darkness, and thus he will attain one of the most powerful effects known in music. Till the time of this inimitable genius was ever so much power drawn from a recitative? We have not yet had one air, one duo. The poet has sustained himself by the force of his thoughts, the vigor of his images."

[To be continued.]

[From the Manchester Examiner.]

CARDINAL WISEMAN'S LECTURE

ON THE CONNECTION BETWEEN THE

Arts of Production and the Arts of Design.

(Continued from p. 180.)

Now, let us proceed to what may be considered a higher branch of Art, and that is Sculpture. We shall find exactly the same principle go throughout: all the greatest artists of the most flourishing period were men who did their own work. You are probably aware—many, I have no doubt, are—at the present day, when a sculptor has to produce a statue, he first of all makes his model in clay—probably a drawing first, then a small model, then a model exactly as he intends the statue to be full-sized and completely finished; from this the cast is taken in plaster; the block of marble of proper size is put beside it, and a frame over it from which there hang threads with weights; these form the points from which the workman measures, from corresponding lines, first to the models, and then from these which are over the cast to the cast itself; and by means of the merest mechanical process he gradually cuts away the marble to the shape of his cast, and often brings it so near to the finished work that the artist himself barely spends a few weeks upon it. This was so much the case with a very eminent sculptor, that it is well known he hardly ever had occasion to touch it. Now, that was not the way the ancients worked; they knew perfectly well that there was more feeling in the few touches which the master-hand gives, even from the very beginning of the work, than there can be in the low and plodding process of mechanical labor; and we find those who were really exquisite sculptors in ancient times were also their own workmen. Vasari tells us of Orcagna, that he made at Florence seven figures, all with his own hand, in marble, which yet exist. Now, Orcagna was certainly a remarkable person. He was a sculptor, a painter, and an artist; and so justly vain, if one may so speak, of this varied character of his Art that upon his monuments or sculptures he calls himself a painter; upon his paintings he always calls himself a sculptor: his paintings are to be found in the cemetery at Pisa. The most beautiful and splendid of his works is the matchless altar in the Church of San Michaeli, in Florence, of which, I am glad to say, there will be an exact copy in the future Crystal Palace. This artist, now, whose work is certainly most beautiful, most finished, as far as we can gather from his life, actually did the work with his own hands, and carved the whole of the marble himself.

I shall have occasion to speak of another celebrated artist under another head, and therefore I will mention one who became very celebrated, and from whose life it is evident that he did the whole of the carving with his own hands, and that is Brunelleschi. He lived at the period when Art was truly becoming most beautiful—the period which just preceded the appearance, perhaps, of a still greater artist, but who in some respects, departed from the purest principles of Art. He was the contemporary of Donatello, and they were both very great friends, and worked even in the same church. An anecdote related by Vasari, in the life of Donatello, will show us how truly Brunelleschi was not merely a sculptor, but a carver, who performed the work with his own hand. He tells us that Donatello had received a commission to carve a crucifix, which yet exists in the Church of Santa Croce, under a beautiful painting by Taddeo Gaddi, and that he produced what was considered a very fine work, but he was anxious that his friend Brunelleschi should see and approve of it. He invited him, therefore, one day to inspect it, which shows that the work had been covered up and concealed during the execution. Brunelleschi looked at it and said nothing. His friend Donatello felt hurt. He said—"I have brought you here to give me your opinion; tell me candidly what do you think of it?" "Well, then," Brunelleschi said, "I will tell you at once, that is a figure, not of Christ, but of a peasant or a rustic." Donatello was indignant. It was perhaps the most beautiful specimen of the subject in carving which had been produced; and he used an expression which became a proverb, and I cannot help remarking how many expressions of artists have turned into proverbs. The expression in Italian means this—"Take you a piece of wood and make another." Brunelleschi did not reply. He went home. He did take a piece of wood. He said nothing to Donatello, and he carved his crucifix. When it was quite finished, he met Donatello, and said, "Will you come and sup with me this evening?" Now, I narrate this anecdote partly because it shows us what the great artists were—that they were not great gentlemen living in any particular style. (Applause.) "I will do so with pleasure," said Donatello. "Then come along;" and Brunelleschi, as they went, stopped at the market, bought eggs and cheese for their supper, put them in an apron, and said to Donatello, "Now, you carry these to my house while I buy something else, and I'll follow you." Donatello entered the room, saw the crucifix, let fall his apron, and smashed his eggs. (Laughter and cheers.) Brunelleschi soon followed, and found Donatello with his hands stretched out and his mouth open, looking at this wonderful work. "Come," said he to Donatello, "where's our supper?" "I have had my supper," said he; "you get what you can out of what is left." And then, like a true, noble-hearted, generous artist, he took his friend by the hand, and said, "You are made to represent Christ; I only to represent peasants." (Cheers.) Now, this shows, as I said before, that this poor artist carried on his own work with his own hands, shut up in his own house; in fact, that as Vasari tells us, he never allowed any one to see it until it was quite completed.

There can be no doubt that among all the names celebrated in Art, there is not one that can be put in comparison with that of Michael Angelo; a man who, not merely from his follower, disciple, and intimate, Vasari, but even from jealous, and envious, and ill-tempered Benvenuto Cellini, receives constantly the epithet of "the divine." No man certainly ever had such a wonderful soul for Art, in every department—the cupola of St. Peter, as an architect; his Moses and his Christ, as a sculptor; and his Last Judgment, on the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel, as a painter, are three monuments which would have made the eternal fame, not of three, but of a hundred artists in each department. (Applause.) Great, noble, generous, and, though perhaps somewhat in his temper not amiable, yet sternly honest in all his dealings, he seems to have been the great centre, around which the Art of his period revolved. There was no one so great, so sublime in any particular branch of it, that did not look up to Michael Angelo, and consider him his superior. It is acknowledged that Raffaello went into the Sistine Chapel, and saw Angelo's wonderful works, and changed entirely his style upon beholding them; and it is particularly acknowledged by the writers of that time that in every other department he was considered equally supreme. Now, you would suppose that this man, upon whom commissions poured in every day for great works, would have employed a number of artisans to assist him; that he would have had carefully prepared models, which he would have entrusted to skilful artificers, so as to lighten his labor; but no such thing. There is every evidence we can desire that from the beginning to the end, Michael Angelo performed the whole of his own work; that he began with the piece of marble as it came from the quarry; that, if not always, pretty generally, he did not even condescend to make a design, or beyond a small wax model, but immediately set to work with chisel and mallet on the figure which he had in his imagination, and which he knew was as truly lurking in the inanimate block. Vasari shows us, in fact, from his unfinished pieces, in what way he must have mapped out the marble and done the work himself; and that is why we have so many vast pieces by him unfinished; either the stroke did not come out as he desired, or it went too far into the marble, and spoilt his labor. But so it is, that by far the greater part of those gigantic pieces which he finished, if not all, were the productions of his own hand, as well as of his own intellect.

